THE NEW CENTURY CLASSICAL HANDBOOK presents, in 1162 pages, over 6,000 entries in alphabetical order describing the great personalities, ideas and accomplishments of Classical Greece and Rome. It offers, in readily accessible form, a fund of knowledge of the two civilizations that provided the fundamental basis for our own. The book has been designed not only for the student but also for the general reader who may lack specialized classical knowledge.

The entries range over the fields of archaeology, architecture, art, geography, history, literature, mythology, philosophy, religion and science. These fields are covered in biographies of statesmen, generals, artists, sculptors, dramatists, poets, philosophers, historians, potters and painters. There are stories of myth and legend, gods and heroes. The book identifies geographical names (countries, cities, rivers, mountains, shrines) and arch-

Preface

Western culture arose in ancient Greece. There a restless, active, imaginative people considered the universe and evolved a wonderful variety of ideas and conclusions about it and themselves. Their Roman conquerors admired and preserved much of the brilliant civilization of the Greeks. To it they made contributions of their own. The combined eras of the two peoples is known as the Classical Age: a name that recognizes the standard of excellence then set up for succeeding ages.

The purpose of this book is to provide convenient and detailed information on the Classical Age in a form that is readily accessible to the general reader and to the student. Included are the figures of myth and legend, gods and heroes, persons and places, fact and fancy. There are biographies of dramatists, poets, sculptors, painters and potters; philosophers, generals, statesmen, and politicians; lost ladies and scoundrels. Résumés supply the reader with a working knowledge of the Iliad, Odyssey, Argonautica, etc., and acquaint him with the great dramas of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. Places of mythological, historical, and archaeological interest are listed, with notice of recent archaeological finds. There are articles on rivers, mountains, shrines, ancient works of art; sibyls and seers; magic herbs, descriptive words; ruins and monuments.

The aim of these articles is to present the material as it appeared to the ancients, rather than to apply modern interpretations. For example, many of the traditions and legends set down by Herodotus and Plutarch about actual people are included. The emphasis is on the stories the ancients told each other, and believed in varying degrees, about people and places of history as well as about figures of mythology. The theory is that the way they themselves saw life and the universe is the most potent factor in the enduring quality of their influence. There is less emphasis on early scientific thought, the area in which, perhaps, the achievements of modern man are most markedly separated from ancient origins. Generally speaking, the period of time covered runs from the mist-shrouded days of prehistory in Greece to the last of the Julian emperors of Rome (68 A.D.). However, the final limit has been flexible in order to include later Roman figures and events that had some special association with the preceding period.

To aid the reader, each figure, whether mythological or historical, appears as a separate entry, rather than in cross-references under the heading of a story in which he took part. When, as sometimes happens, the same name is shared by a mythological figure, a historical figure, and a place, the entry for the mythological figure is given first, for the historical figure next, and for any other subject of the same name last. Dates distinguish historical from mythological figures. Greek names are subject to various spellings in the Latin alphabet. No single rule or group of rules answers every problem that arises in this connection. For this reason, a number of cross-references are included to cover variant spellings. Since, in general, the Romans took over Greek myths and legends with very little change, the Greek names are given.

Sixty-four of the line cuts in the volume were drawn expressly for this work from the originals, from photographs, or from previously published drawings. The figures in the drawings, arbitrarily removed from the shapes and decorations that completed and confined them, are intended rather as illustrations of Greek stories and ideas than as examples of Greek art. The originals are among the most precious examples of that art.

The Editorial Consultant, Professor Jotham Johnson, assisted by Professors Abraham Holtz and Philip Mayerson of New York University, has read the manuscript for historical accuracy, verified and, where necessary, corrected or supplied spellings and pronunciations. Those articles to which their initials are appended have been composed or substantially revised by Professors Johnson, Holtz, and Mayerson.

The editor wishes to thank Miss Margaret Thompson, Curator of Greek Coins, and Miss Joan Fagerlie, Curator of Roman and Byzantine Coins, both of The American Numismatic Society, for their friendly suggestions and help in choosing the coins to be illustrated, and to thank also The American Numismatic Society for the photographs of Greek and Roman coins. Grateful acknowledgment is also made here to the American Journal of Archaeology for the plan of Nestor's Palace on page 950; to The Metropolitan Museum of Art; the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston; the Antikensammlungen and the Glyptothek, Munich; the Staatliche Museen, Berlin; the British Museum; the Louvre; the German Archaeological Institute, Athens; the Museo delle Terme, Rome; the Royal Greek Embassy Press and Information Office; the Italian State Tourist Office; and the Spanish National Tourist Office for photographs which they have supplied. Finally, the editor is profoundly grateful for the many courtesies extended by the Connecticut College Library at New London, Connecticut, and the New York Public Library.

The NEW CENTURY CLASSICAL HANDBOOK is offered as a reference tool to those whose studies or work requires a knowledge and understanding of the Classical Age. For the general reader, it is hoped that it will be a source of interest, information and pleasure to all who have the curiosity and the desire to be informed concerning the basis of our western civilization.

Abacus (ab'a-kus). In architecture, the slab or plinth which forms the upper member of the capital of a column or pillar, and upon which rests, in classic styles, the lower surface of the architrave. In the Greek Doric it is thick and square, without sculptured decoration; in the Ionic order it is thinner, and ornamented with moldings on the sides; in the Corinthian also it is ornamented, and has concave sides and truncated corners.

Abae (ā'bē). [Also: Abai.] In ancient geography, a city in Phocis, Greece, noted for its temple and oracle of Apollo. Looted and largely destroyed during one of the Persian invasions of Greece, it was later partly rebuilt under the Roman emperor Hadrian. Ruins of parts of the town still exist.

Abantes (a-ban'tēz). According to Homer (Iliad), a warlike tribe of Euboea, who allied themselves with the Greeks in the Trojan War. They were fierce fighters, and it was their custom to shave the hair from the fore parts of their heads to prevent their enemies from grasping the forelock in close combat. Theseus emulated their practice. The Abantes are also named in legend as a people of Epirus among whom the Colchians, frustrated in their attempt to capture Jason and Medea, settled rather than return to Colchis and face the wrath of Aeëtes.

Abarbarea (a-bär-ba'rē-a). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a fountain-nymph. She was the mother, by Bucolion, of twin sons, Aesepus and Pegasus, who were slain by Euryalus in the Trojan War.

Abaris (ab'a-ris). [Called the Hyperborean.] Mythical Greek sage, assigned by Pindar to the 6th century B.C., by Eusebius to the 7th. According to these writers and to Herodotus, Apollo gave him a magic arrow on which he traveled and which he gave to Pythagoras in exchange for instruction in the latter's philosophy. He was believed to have worked miraculous cures, and was widely invoked by the ancient Greeks in oracles and charms.

Abas (ä'bas). Named by Homer (Iliad), as a son of the dream-interpreter and diviner Eurydamas. He was slain by Diomedes in the Trojan War.

Abas. According to legend, a son of Celeus, king of Eleusis, and Metanira. Demeter, searching for Persephone, was hospitably received by Metanira and given barley-water to quench her thirst. Abas, unaware of her identity, mocked her for drinking greedily and was changed into a lizard by Demeter.

Abas. The legendary grandson of Danaus. He was a king of Argolis and possessed a shield with such marvelous powers that the mere sight of it put his enemies to flight. He married Aglaia and had twin sons, Acrisius and Proetus.

Abas. A legendary companion of Diomedes. He accompanied Diomedes on his voyage to Italy after the Trojan War. Aphrodite continued to persecute Diomedes because he had wounded her during the war. She sent storms at sea and war on land to harass him. Abas and others were transformed into birds by Aphrodite because a companion, Acmon, defied her to prevent Diomedes' company from reaching sanctuary in Italy.

Abdera (ab-dir'ä). A maritime city in Thrace on Cape Balastra, opposite the island of Thasus in NE Greece. According to legend, it was founded by Heracles, who had gone there to fetch the man-eating mares of Diomedes of Thrace, in memory of Heracles' servant Abderus who was slain by the mares while Heracles sought Diomedes. The city is now known to have been colonized (c650 B.C.) by people from Clazomenae. Destroyed some time before 550 B.C. by Thrace, it was resettled (c540 B.C.) by refugees from the Persian occupation of Teos, and became during the next 200 years one of the most prosperous of Greek cities. Thereafter it declined in importance, and the ancient city is now entirely in ruins. A small agricultural community still occupies part of the original site. The air of the region was thought in ancient times to cause people to become dull, and from this came a folk belief among the ancient Greeks that all Abderites were stupid. This conviction persisted despite the fact that a number of famous men, including Protagoras and Democritus, either were born in or were residents of Abdera.

Abderus (ab-dir'us). According to some accounts, a son of Hermes. While tending the man-eating mares of Diomedes for Heracles, he was torn to pieces by them. Heracles founded the city of Abdera beside his tomb and established games in his honor.

Abia (ab'i-ä). In Greek tradition, a nurse of a descendant of Heracles, who raised a temple of Heracles in Ira in Messenia. To honor her, the name of the town was changed to Abia.

Abradatas (ab-ä-dä'tas). King of Susa, fl. 6th century B.C. He was at first an enemy, then an ally, of the Persians under Cyrus the Great. The story of the love of Abradatas and his wife Panthea (the earliest example of sentimental romance) is given by Xenophon (Cyropaedia). The story ends with the death of Abradatas in battle and the suicide of Panthea and her eunuchs.

Abrocomes and Atheia (ä-brok'ö-mēz; ä-thē'ä). [Called Ephesian Stories; also, Abrocomas and Anthia, Habrocomas and Anthia.] Romance in five books by a Hellenistic writer named Xenophon of Ephesus, in which he describes a handsome young Greek couple of the period, their marriage and the complicated series of adventures by which they were separated and finally reunited. The later writers Chariton and Heliodorus are believed to have used this work as a pattern for some of their writing.

Absyrtus (ab-sér'tus). See Apsyrtus.

Abydos (ä-bí'dos) or Abydus (-dus). In ancient geography, a town in Mysia, Asia Minor, on the Hellespont. It was colonized by Ionians from Miletus. It was from Abydos that Leander swam across the Hellespont each night to visit his beloved Hero at Sestos. From Abydos Xerxes caused a double bridge to be constructed across the Hellespont by which his army could march into Europe to attack Greece. However, when it was completed a great storm arose and dashed the whole work to pieces. Xerxes was so angry when he learned of the destruction of the bridge that he gave orders for the Hellespont to receive 300 lashes, and that fetters should be hurled into it. Some say he ordered the waters of the Hellespont branded with a hot iron, and commanded those who carried out the task of lashing the water to say the following as they did so: "Thou bitter water, thy lord lays on thee this punishment because thou hast wronged him without a cause, having suffered no evil at his hands." When the waters had thus been punished, those who had been in charge of constructing the bridge had their heads cut off, new engineers were appointed and the work was recommenced. This time the bridge was made of boats—triremes and penteconters (50-oared ships). The keels of the boats ran parallel to the current of the Hellespont to ease the strain on the cables which fastened them together. The ships were also made fast with heavy anchors. In the middle of the strait a gap was left between the ships so that light vessels could pass through them into or out of the Euxine Sea. Sawn planks from tree trunks were laid on the cables and fastened to them, brushwood and earth were packed down on top of the planks to form a roadway, and on each side of the bridge a fence was raised high enough so that the animals passing across could not see the water and become frightened. When Xerxes learned in Sardis that the bridge was ready he set out with his vast army and arrived for the crossing. Now he took a golden goblet and poured a libation into the Hellespont as he prayed for success in his conquest of Greece. Then he cast the golden goblet, a golden bowl, and a sword into the waters. Perhaps this was to make amends for having scourged the waters, or perhaps this was an offering to the sun. Having carried out these rites his vast host successfully crossed over from Abydos into Europe. The people of Abydos did not accompany him into Greece; they were left behind to guard the bridge. However, when Xerxes returned, after the disaster of Salamis (480 B.C.), he found his bridge of boats had been scattered by storms, and this time he crossed back to Asia in his ships which had sailed back from Greece.

Abyla (ab'i-lā). [Also: Abyla Columna, Abyla Mons.] A promontory in Africa, the modern Jebel Musa at Ceuta, opposite the ancient Calpe (the modern Gibraltar). One of the pillars supposed to have been set up by Heracles, either to narrow the opening between the ocean and the inner sea and keep ocean monsters out, or as a headland which he made by cutting a passage from the ocean into the inner sea, hitherto separated by a continuous range of mountains between the European and African continents.

Acacallis (a-ka-kal'is). According to legend, a daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë. She was beloved by Apollo. Her father learned that she was about to bear the god's son and banished her to Libya where she bore Amphithemis, who was also known as Garamas.

Academus (ak-a-dē'mus). A legendary Arcadian who had moved to Athens. When the Dioscuri came to Attica in search of their sister Helen who had been kidnaped by Theseus, Academus is said to have revealed to them her hiding place in Aphidna. As a reward for his services on this occasion the Spartans ever after treated him with great honor and courtesy. After his death, when the Spartans warred on Athens they spared his estate on the Cephissus River. The estate of Academus with its pleasant garden came to be used as a meeting place for philosophers and became known as the Academia or Academy.

Academy. [Greek, Akadeemeia, Akademia.] Name applied to what was originally a public pleasure-ground on the Cephissus River about one mile NW of ancient Athens, on land said to have belonged to Academus, an Arcadian who is supposed to have revealed the place where Theseus had hidden Helen. It was surrounded with a wall built by Hipparchus and was further adorned by Cimon, the son of Miltiades who bequeathed it to the citizens of Athens. It was the resort of Plato who taught in its groves for nearly 50 years.

Acamas (ak'a-mas). In Homeric legend (Iliad), one of Antenor's sons. He accompanied Aeneas at the siege of the Greek fortifications and slew Promachus to avenge the death of his brother Archelochus at the hands of Telamonian Ajax. Acamas was slain by Meriones, Idomeneus' comrade.

Acamas. According to legend, a son of Theseus and Phaedra. He went on a mission to Troy with Diomedes to demand the return of Helen. While there he met Laodice, King Priam's daughter, and fell in love with her. She bore him a son, Munitus. Later he was one of the Greeks who entered Troy in the Wooden Horse and on the fall of the city regained his son. In the meantime he had left behind a Thracian princess, Phyllis, when we went to fight at Troy. Grieving at his long absence she was changed into an almond tree. When Acamas returned and embraced the tree, it burst into flower.

Acamas. Named by Homer (Iliad), as a son of Eussorus. He was a captain of the Thracians, allies of Troy, and was slain by Telamonian Ajax.

Acanthus (a-kan'thus). In ancient geography, a town situated on the base of the peninsula of Acte in Chalcidice. It was colonized by Andros and allied to Athens. The Spartan general Brasidas moved to attack it in 424 B.C. The Acanthians allowed him to enter their city alone, to present reasons why they should surrender to him. It was time to harvest the grapes and they did not want to lose the vintage. Thus, "not being a bad speaker for a Lacedaemonian," the arguments of Brasidas persuaded them to revolt against Athens and to submit to Sparta.

Acarnan (a-kär'nan). In classical legend, a son of Alcmaeon and Callirrhoë, daughter of the river-god Achelous. When he was a child, his mother prayed to Zeus that he might grow to manhood in a single day, along with his brother Amphoterus, so that they could avenge the murder of their father who had been slain by the sons of Phegeus, a king who had once purified him. Zeus answered her prayer. Acarnan and his brother grew up at once and went to Nemea where they found the sons of Phegeus and killed them. Before a full day had passed, they found and killed Phegeus also. After these murders the brothers fled to Epirus and founded Acarnania, named after Acarnan.

Acarnania (ak-ar-nā'ni-a). In ancient geography, a division of Greece, bounded by the Ambracian Gulf on the N, by Amphilochia on the NE, by Aetolia on the E (partly separated by the Achelous River), and by the Ionian Sea on the W. Its ancient inhabitants were the Leleges and Curetes. They were considered rude mountaineers by the people of the Greek city-states, but were nevertheless regarded as Hellenes and as such were allowed to participate in the Panhellenic games.

Acastus (a-kas'tus). An Argonaut, the son of Pelias. According to legend, he joined Jason in the expedition for the Golden Fleece in spite of his father's objections. When the expedition returned to Iolcus and Pelias was killed by the wiles of Medea, Acastus became king of Iolcus. He purified Peleus of an accidental murder. Later he challenged Peleus to a hunting contest because his wife Cretheis falsely accused Peleus of making advances to her. Peleus won the contest with the aid of a sword forged by Daedalus. While Peleus slept Acastus stole the sword and hid it but it was returned to Peleus by Chiron the centaur. Later Peleus returned to Iolcus, captured the city, and killed Acastus and his wife.

Acca Larentia (ak'a la-ren'shi-a) or Acca

Laurentia (lô-ren'shi-a). Various identified in Roman legend: 1) as the wife of Faustulus and nurse of Romulus and Remus, her nickname Lupa (she-wolf, or courtesan) being perhaps the source of the story that they were raised by a wolf; 2) as a beautiful woman won in gambling by Hercules, wife of an Etruscan whose wealth she bequeathed to the Romans, honored by their festival called Larentalia.

Accius (ak'shi-us), Lucius. [Also: Attius.] Roman tragic poet and prose writer, born c170 B.C.; died c86 B.C. He was noted for his adaptations of the Greek cycles, especially the Trojan War, and also dealt with Roman subjects such as the expulsion of the Tarquins. He was greatly esteemed as a tragic poet under the Republic. Of his works only the titles and a few fragments survive.

Acerbas (a-sér'bas) or Akerbas (-kér'-). [Also: Sicharbas.] In classical legend, uncle and husband of Elissa, a wealthy and powerful Tyrian noble, high priest of the Tyrian god Melkarth. In Vergil's Aeneid Acerbas was Sychaeus, husband of Dido (Elissa), murdered for his riches by her brother Pygmalion. Dido was able, however, when she fled from Tyre and founded Carthage, to take the treasure with her.

Acesius (a-ses'i-us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Healer."

Acessamenus (a-ses-a-mē'nus). According to Homer (Iliad), a king in Thrace and the father of Periboea.

Acestes (a-ses'tēz). [Also: Aegestes.] According to legend, a son of the Sicilian river-god Crimisus and Egesta (Segesta), a Trojan woman. After the Trojan War in which he took part, he settled near Mount Eryx in Sicily. He is said to have founded the cities of Segesta (named for his mother), Entella (named for his wife), Eryx, and Asca. He entertained Aeneas and his companions when they stopped in his kingdom on their flight from Troy. Again, when Aeneas had left Carthage, he entertained the Trojans. He took part in the archery contest in the funeral games honoring Anchises, but since the target, a dove, had already been shot to the ground by a contestant, he loosed an arrow into the air with such great speed and power that it took fire as it sped through the heavens. Aeneas regarded this as a favorable omen and gave Acetes first prize. While the funeral games were in progress, the Trojan women, in despair at their continual wandering, set fire to Aeneas' ships in the hope the loss of the ships would compel them to settle down with Acetes, their countryman. Acetes gave his consent and welcome to those who wanted to stay and make their homes in his kingdom. Aeneas and those of his comrades who still had a thirst for glory continued their journey until they should reach their destined home in Latium.

Acetes (a-sē'tēz). A legendary Lydian pilot. He alone recognized a youth who had been captured by the crew of his ship as a god, and protected him from the crew's violence. When the sailors threatened to throw Acetes overboard, the youth entreated the sailors to take him to Naxos. The sailors, pretending to accede to this request, sailed in a different direction. When the youth (really Dionysus) realized what had happened, he used his divine powers. The ship stood still in the sea. Ivy suddenly grew up the masts of the ship and entwined itself about the oars. The youth, crowned with grapes and holding a thyrsus, revealed himself as the god Dionysus. Suddenly lions, tigers, and other wild beasts appeared on the deck around him. The sailors, either maddened by the god or in fear of punishment for their ill treatment of him, leaped into the sea and were changed into dolphins. Acetes sailed on to Naxos with the god and became one of his followers. Later he was bound and imprisoned by Pentheus, who was trying to wipe out the worship of Dionysus in his realm, but the chains fell from his limbs and the doors of his prison opened of themselves to free him.

Achaea (a-kē'ā). [Also: Achaia; called Achaea Phthiotis.] In ancient geography, a small region in S Thessaly, containing Phthia. It was probably the original home of the Achaeans, and it retained its name as late as the time of Herodotus. According to tradition, this was the home of Deucalion who with his wife survived the great flood sent by the gods to destroy wicked mankind. The land was ruled by Xuthus, son of Hellen and grandson of Deucalion. Xuthus left it to help the Athenians in a war. Later, Achaeus, son of Xuthus, returned and won back his father's realm for himself and named it Achaea.

Achaea. [Also: Achaia; original name, Aegialus or Aegialea, meaning "the Coast."] In ancient geography, a mountainous district in the Peloponnesus bordering on the Gulf of Corinth, N of Elis and Arcadia. According to tradition, Achaeans from Argos and Lacedaemon under the leadership of Tisamenus, son of Orestes, invaded this land when they were driven from Argos and Lacedaemon by the Dorians. Driving out the Ionians who inhabited it, they took the land for themselves and named it Achaea.

Achaean League (a-kē'an). A religious confederation in Achaea, at the time of Herodotus consisting of 12 cities: Pellene, Aegira, Aegae, Bura, Helice, Aegium, Rhypes, Patrae, Pharae, Olenus, Dyme, and Tritaea. Somewhat later, Rhypes and Aegae fell into decay, and their places in the confederacy were taken by Leontium and Cerynia.

Achaean League. A political confederation of Achaean and other Greek cities extending over the period of 281-146 B.C. After the death of Lysimachus in 280 B.C., the Achaean cities Dyme, Patrae, Tritaea, and Pharae formed a confederation to resist the Macedonian domination, and were afterward joined by the other Achaean cities, except Olenus and Helice. In 251 B.C. the confederation acquired new strength by the accession of Sicyon, under the leadership of Aratus. In 245 Aratus was elected strategus (general) of the league, which under his guidance rapidly rose to national importance. In a short time it embraced Athens, Aegina, Salamis, and the whole of the Peloponnesus with the exception of Sparta, Tegea, Orchomenus, Mantinea, and Elis. It was destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C., and with it fell the last stronghold of freedom in Greece. The Achaean League is remarkable as one of the most perfect types of federal government which has been handed down from antiquity. The confederation was inseparable, every city having equal rights with the others; in foreign affairs the federal government was supreme. Common affairs were regulated at general meetings held twice a year by the citizens of all the towns.

Achaeans (a-kē'an). [Also: Achaei, Achaians, Achivi.] One of the four principal peoples of ancient Greece (the Aeolians, Dorians, and Ionians were the other three). The Achaeans were one of the invading tribes which settled in the Peloponnesus. According to tradition, Xuthus, son of Hellen, came from his realm in Thessaly to help the Athenians in a war and was given Creusa, daughter of King Erechtheus, as a reward. After the death of Erechtheus, Xuthus was appointed to choose his successor. He named Cecrops, son of Erechtheus, but the other sons of Erechtheus did not approve this choice and Xuthus was compelled to flee. He went to Aegialus, a land in the north of the Peloponnesus between Elis and Sicyon. Achaeus, a son of Xuthus and Creusa, left Aegialus and won back his father's land in Thessaly, but he left behind two sons who married two daughters of Danaus and settled in Lacedaemon and Argos. The descendants of these two sons of Achaeus, dwellers in Lacedaemon and Argos, were at first the only Greeks in the Peloponnesus to be known as Achaeans. (The Achaeans of Argos were also known as Danaans.) The descendants of Achaeus in Thessaly in the region about Phthia were also called Achaeans. Ion, son of Apollo and Creusa but thought by Xuthus to be his son, remained in Aegialus, married Helice, daughter of King Selinus, and succeeded his father-in-law as king of the Aegialians whom he now named Ionians after himself. Generations later the Heraclidae (Dorians) returned to the Peloponnesus and drove the Achaeans out of Argos and Lacedaemon. These Achaeans sought asylum with the Ionians of Aegialus, but the Ionians resisted them by force. Tisamenus, son of Orestes, was the leader of the Achaeans. He was killed, but his followers defeated the Ionians. The Ionians fled to Helice and later left the region under a truce. The Achaeans divided up their land, which they renamed Achaea, and settled in their cities which now became known as the 12 Achaean cities. These cities were Dyme, Olenus, Pharae, Tritaea, Rhypes, Aegium, Cerynia, Bura, Helice, Aegae, Aegira, and Pellene. The Achaeans furnished the largest contingent in the Greek force that Agamemnon led against Troy to recover Helen of Sparta. In the Persian War the Achaeans of Achaea played no heroic part as they scorned to be led by Dorians (Spartans), and to the extent that they did not help their fellow Greeks they helped the Persians. The name Achaeans is applied generally to all Greeks in Homeric poetry, and to some extent by poets in later times. The Achaeans formed the ethnic basis of the Achaean League which lasted until 146 B.C. when the Romans finally subjugated the Greeks.

Achaemenes (a-kē'mē-nēz). [Old Persian, Hakhāmaniš, meaning "the Friendly."] Probably the leader (fl. c7th century B.C.) under whom the Persians first settled in the country subsequently called Persia, and the eponymous founder (possibly mythical) of the ancient Persian royal family of the Achaemenidae. He was, initially, ruler of Anshan, in SW Persia. His name was later used as a family name, beginning (550 B.C.) with Cyrus.

Achaemenes. A son of Darius, and the brother of Xerxes I. He accompanied Xerxes as one of the commanders of the fleet in the Persian War. He advised Xerxes to keep his fleet together for the attack on Salamis, in opposition to the advice of Demaratus, the Spartan. The latter had advised Xerxes to send a part of his fleet directly against Sparta and so pin down the Spartans while the land army of Xerxes was subjugating Greece. Achaemenes was killed at Papremis by Inarus the Libyan.

Achaemenidae (ak-ē-men'i-dē). [Also: Achaemenides, Achemenides, Achemenids.] Ancient royal family of Persia, founded c600 B.C. Its leading members were Achaemenes, Cyrus the Great, Cambyses (Gaumata, the Magian usurper), Darius Hystaspes, Xerxes I, Artaxerxes I, Xerxes II, Sogdianus, Darius Ochus, Artaxerxes Mnemon, Ochus, Arses, and Darius Codomannus.

Achaeus (a-kē'us). Legendary son of Xuthus and Creusa. He fled with his father from Athens to Aegialus in the Peloponnesus. Two of the sons of Achaeus married two daughters of Danaus, settled in Argos and Lacedaemon and their descendants became known as Achaeans. They later invaded Aegialus, took over the region and named it Achaea. Achaeus left Aegialus and went to Thessaly where he won back his father's lands, and named the region Achaea and the people Achaeans for himself. Thus there were two groups in Greece known as Achaeans, those in Achaea in the Peloponnesus, and those in Thessaly in the region of Phthia. The name Achaeian was also sometimes applied as a collective name for all the Greeks. Achaeus or Achaios (a-kā'os). Greek poet of Eretria in Euboea; fl. c484-448 B.C. He was the author of from 24 to 44 plays, only fragments of which remain and of which the titles of only 19 are now known. He contended with Sophocles and Euripides in the great Hellenic dramatic contests of his day, and won the prize once.

Acharnae (a-kār'nē). Deme in Attica where the ivy plant was said to have first appeared. Here Dionysus Kissos (Ivy) and Dionysus Melpomenus (Singer) were invoked. Apollo Agyieus and Heracles were also worshiped here.

Acharnians (a-kār'ni-anz), The. Comedy of Aristophanes, first brought out under the name of Callistratus, at the Lenaea, or rural Dionysia at Athens in 425 B.C. It was awarded first prize. It was an attempt to support the aristocratic peace-party against the intrigues and intimidations of the democratic war-party represented by the chorus of Acharnians. In form it is an extravagant farce rather than a comedy.

Achates (a-kā'tēz). In Roman legend, a Trojan, the faithful friend and companion of Aeneas. He accompanied Aeneas on the flight from Troy and was his inseparable companion in all his adventures.

Acheloïdes (ak-ē-lō'i-dēz). A name for the legendary Sirens, daughters of Achelous.

Achelous (ak-ē-lō'us). The river-god of the Achelous River in NW Greece which formed part of the boundary between Aetolia and Acarnania. He was the oldest of the 3000 sons of Oceanus and Tethys, and as such was worshiped throughout Greece and in the colonies. His name in religious rites became synonymous for any stream, and sacrifices to Achelous were always prescribed along with the prophecies given out by the oracle of Dodona. He had the power to assume three forms: that of a man with a bull's head, that of a speckled serpent, and that of a bull. Achelous was one of many who courted Deianira, supposed daughter of Oeneus of Calydon. When Heracles also came wooing her, all her other suitors left the field to him and Achelous. Achelous claimed her on the ground that he was a deity. Heracles boasted that he could give her Zeus for a father-in-law. To this Achelous retorted that if it were so, which he doubted, then Alcmene, Heracles' mother, was an adulteress. Heracles, enraged at this slur on his mother's honor, proposed that he and Achelous wrestle for the hand of Deianira, the winner to become her husband. Achelous wrestled first in his form as a bull-headed man, and Heracles succeeded in throwing Achelous. The river-god, finding himself pinned by the mighty Heracles, transformed himself into a serpent. But Heracles laughed, told him he had strangled serpents in his cradle, and grasped Achelous firmly in his fists. Achelous now assumed the shape of a bull. Heracles seized him by the horns and hurled him to the ground, thus defeating him in all his forms. One of Achelous' horns was broken off in his fall and, according to some, naiads took it and filled it with fruits. It became the Cornucopia (Horn of Plenty), and was always miraculously filled. To cover the spot where the horn had been Achelous ever after wore a wreath of river reeds. Achelous was said to have been the father of Pirene, who was transformed into a fountain. He was also said by some to have been the father, by the muse Terpsichore, of the Sirens. He fell in love with Perimele, daughter of Hippodamas, and ravished her. Her father hurled her into the sea but Achelous caught her and held her up. He prayed that she might be given a resting place or that she herself would be changed into such a place. She was transformed into an island, one of the Echinades islands which lie at the mouth of the Achelous River. Achelous purified Alcmaeon for the murder of his mother and gave his daughter Callirrhoë to Alcmaeon for a wife.

Achelous. [Modern names, Akheloos, Aspropotamos.] River in NW Greece which rises in Epirus, in the Pindus Mountains, forms part of the boundary between what was ancient Aetolia and Acarnania, and flows into the Ionian Sea.

Achemenides (ak-ē-men'i-dēz). A legendary Greek who fought at Troy and sailed for home with Odysseus after the fall of the city. He accompanied Odysseus when he visited the cave of Polyphemus in Sicily but was left behind when Odysseus and his remaining companions escaped from the giant. When Aeneas later stopped at the island Achemenides came running out of hiding and warned him that there were many giants there, as huge and cruel as Polyphemus. He advised Aeneas to flee and begged him to take him with them, even though as a Greek he was their former enemy. Aeneas pitied him and carried him off in his ship.

Achemenides or Achemenids (ak-ē-men'idz). See Achaemenidae.

Acheron (ak'e-ron). In ancient geography, the name of several small rivers in Greece, of which the chief (the modern Gurla) was in Thesprotia in Epirus. It flowed through Lake Acherusia, received the waters of the Cocytus (the modern Vuvos), and emptied into the Ionian Sea.

Acheron. In Greek mythology, one of the five rivers surrounding Hades, the river of woe. The souls of the dead had to bathe in it or cross it. Later it became synonymous with the lower world in general.

Acherusia Palus (ak-e-rō'si-a pā'lus). [Eng. trans., "Acherusian Bog."] In ancient geography, the name of several small lakes supposed to be connected with the lower world. The most important were the lake through which the Acheron flowed, and one about 11 miles W of Naples, the modern Fusaro Lake. Like Acheron, the name came to be applied, in ancient literary usage, to the lower world itself.

Achilleis (ak-i-lē'is). [Also: Achilleid.] Name given to the part of the Iliad comprised by Books I, VIII, and XI-XXII, regarded by some critics as constituting a poem of which the theme is the "wrath of Achilles," and which is distinct from, and older than, the rest of the Iliad. The name Achilleis was first applied to these books by Grote.

Achilles (a-kil'ēz). In Greek legend, a son of Peleus (for this reason he was also called Pelides) and the sea-goddess Thetis. He was the grandson of Aeacus (for this reason he was also known as Aeacides), and thus a descendant of Zeus. He was the youngest of seven sons born to Peleus and Thetis. His mother, wishing to immortalize her sons, one by one placed his older brothers in the flames to destroy their mortal parts and sent the immortal remains to Olympus. When Achilles was born she anointed him with ambrosia by day and placed him in the fire at night to burn away his mortal parts. Peleus interrupted her as she was performing this ritual and cried out in terror. She dropped her infant and fled back to the sea in anger. Some say Achilles' entire body had been made invulnerable by the ministrations of his mother, except for one ankle-bone which had been scorched but not burned. Peleus replaced the ankle-bone with one taken from the giant Damysus.

Others say Thetis rendered her son invulnerable by dipping him in the Styx. The ankle by which she held him in the water was his only vulnerable spot. When Thetis disappeared into the sea, Peleus entrusted his infant son to the care of Chiron, the centaur. The kindly centaur reared him on Mount Pelion, feeding him on the entrails of bears and lions to give him courage and, some say, on honey and the marrow of fawns to give him swiftness of foot. He learned to ride, hunt, play on the lyre, and to master the arts of healing. He was taught how to sing by the muse Calliope. He was so swift of foot and had such courage that at the age of six he overtook and subdued wild animals and dragged them back to Chiron's cave. Although Thetis had left the house of Peleus she did not lose interest in her son, of whom it had been predicted that he would be greater than his father. (It was because of this prophecy that Zeus gave up his pursuit of Thetis and married her to Peleus.) She was a sea-goddess and had the gift of prophecy. When the Greeks massed to sail to Troy to recover Helen, Thetis knew that if Achilles accompanied them he would gain glory and die young. She sent him to the court of Lycomedes on the island of Scyrus to save him from this fate. There he was dressed as a girl and lived among the women, and there he fathered Neoptolemus on Deidamia, the daughter of Lycomedes.

The Greeks were informed by a seer that they could not overcome the Trojans without the aid of Achilles. Odysseus, Nestor, and Ajax (as some say), the cousin and friend of Achilles, therefore went to Scyrus to fetch him. Some say Odysseus brought jewels, girdles, and other things of interest to ladies. Lycomedes welcomed these envoys but disclaimed all knowledge of Achilles. Odysseus, ever ready with a scheme, asked permission to make gifts to the ladies of the court. He displayed his rich gifts, among which were included a shield and a spear. As the ladies hovered over the treasures, a loud trumpet blast was heard. One of the maidens instantly seized the shield and spear, and prepared to rush into battle. Others say Odysseus came to Scyrus disguised as a merchant and that among his wares he included a few weapons. Achilles revealed himself by lovingly handling the weapons. In either case, Achilles revealed himself to the triumphant Odysseus and promised to lead his Myrmidons against Troy. But others say these are just tales to exalt the ingenuity of Odysseus. According to their accounts, Achilles readily agreed to march against Troy when Nestor and Odysseus came to his father's court in Phthia. Peleus armed him with an ashen spear and golden armor, and gave him immortal horses, and sent him off with Phoenix, his trusted friend and tutor. Patroclus, his beloved friend, and his Myrmidon warriors also accompanied him.

Achilles was the handsomest, the swiftest, the strongest, and the bravest of the Greeks who went to Troy. The mere sight of him struck terror into the hearts of his enemies. Accompanied by Patroclus, Phoenix, and the Myrmidons, he sailed from Aulis with the other Greeks. Under the impression that it was the Troad, they attacked the coasts of Asia Minor. Achilles and Patroclus attacked Mysia. Telephus, king of Mysia, bravely drove the Greeks back but in pursuing them he tripped over a vine and was wounded by Achilles' spear. After the Greeks left Asia Minor, their fleet was scattered by a storm and they returned separately to their homelands. Achilles went back to Scyrus and married Deidamia. At the second gathering at Aulis, the Greeks were wind-bound. Calchas the seer said that only the sacrifice of Iphigenia, Agamemnon's daughter, would appease Artemis and secure favorable winds. In order to secure the presence of Iphigenia, Agamemnon told his wife Clytemnestra that Iphigenia was to be married to Achilles. Achilles was furious when he learned that his name had been used to bring Iphigenia to Aulis so that she could be sacrificed. He offered to defend her, but Iphigenia readily consented to be sacrificed and, the rites having been performed, favorable winds sprang up and the Greeks put to sea again. They sailed to the island of Tenedos near the Troad. Achilles had been warned by his mother that if he killed a son of Apollo, he would die by Apollo's hand, and he took Mnemon, a servant, with him to remind him not to attack the sons of Apollo. When the Greeks neared Tenedos, King Tenes, said to be a son of Apollo, refused them permission to land and hurled huge stones at their ships. Achilles impulsively leaped into the sea, swam ashore, and killed Tenes. Too late he remembered his mother's warning and then killed Mnemon for failing to remind him of it. But some say Achilles killed Tenes because of a quarrel that arose over Tenes' sister Hemithea. An embassy which the Greeks sent to Troy from Tenedos to demand the restoration of Helen was unsuccessful. They now sailed past the headland of Sigeum and beached their ships before Troy. There was a prophecy that the first to land at Troy would be the first to die. For this reason Achilles did not leap ashore immediately; some say he was the second and some say the last to land. When he did reach shore, he was attacked by Cycnus, a son of Poseidon who had been rendered invulnerable to sword, spear, and arrow. Cycnus had killed many Greeks before he confronted Achilles.

Achilles hurled his spear at him only to see it bounce harmlessly aside. His sword also being ineffective, Achilles battered Cynus about the head with his shield until he fell, whereupon Achilles strangled him with the straps of his own helmet. But some say Achilles killed Cynus on Tenedos by crushing his head with a stone. It is said that after landing at Troy, he found Troilus, said by some to be a son of Apollo. He was in the sanctuary of Thymbraean Apollo, which was in neutral territory, when Achilles came upon him and killed him. He captured Lycaon, son of Priam, and sold him as a slave. But Lycaon was ransomed and returned to Troy where, 12 days later, he again fell into the hands of Achilles, who killed him. He made a raid on the cattle of Aeneas. Until this time Aeneas had been neutral in the struggle, but because of this raid, in which he barely escaped capture, Aeneas went over to the side of the Trojans. In raids which Achilles made in Asia Minor and the Troad, he seized and sacked 11 inland cities and 12 seacoast towns, among them: Lesbos, Phocaea, Colophon, Smyrna, Clazomenae, Cyme, Aegialus, Tenos, Adramyttium, Side, Endium, Linnaeum, Colone, Hypoplacian Thebes, Lyrnessus, Antandrus, and others. To Agamemnon, as commander of the expedition, he handed over the lion's share of the booty from these conquests. For himself, he kept Briseis, wife of Mynes of Lyrnessus whom he had slain and whose kingdom he had destroyed. Briseis was the cause of the famous quarrel between Achilles and Agamemnon. The latter, on being forced to relinquish his captive Chryseis to placate Apollo, demanded Briseis from Achilles in her place. As Agamemnon was the commander Achilles had no choice but to obey and yield Briseis whom he had come to love dearly. But to punish Agamemnon and the Greeks, Achilles withdrew from the fighting, taking Patroclus and his Myrmidons with him. He persuaded his mother to ask Zeus to make the Greeks suffer at the hands of the Trojans, to atone for the arrogance of Agamemnon and the injuries inflicted by him. Agamemnon soon regretted his rash action in arousing the ire of Achilles. As the Greeks were battered by the Trojans, he sent an embassy to Achilles to try to persuade him to return to the war. The ambassadors offered to restore Briseis, to give Achilles any one of several rich cities, and also one of the daughters of Agamemnon for his wife. Achilles rejected their offers, saying that all Agamemnon's proffered gifts he could acquire, but the soul of a man is never won by pillage or capture. Agamemnon, Achilles said, could not soothe his injured spirit with bribes. He threatened to take his ships and his men and go home; he remembered his mother's prophecy that if he fought at Troy he would gain everlasting fame but would die young. On the other hand if he returned to his homeland he would enjoy a long life, but one without glory. The disasters which overtook the Greeks when they no longer had the irresistible aid of Achilles, the death of Patroclus, and Achilles' return to the battle, are described in the Iliad. After Achilles had avenged the death of Patroclus by slaying Hector, whose body he shamefully mistreated until it was ransomed by Priam, he buried Patroclus and remained in his tent, mourning his loss with his dear friend and cousin, Telamonian Ajax. Ajax heard the clamor of battle as it increased to a roar and roused Achilles. They sped to the battle and found that Penthesilea the Amazon had come to the aid of the Trojans, boasting that she would kill Achilles. Fighting with glorious valor, she had driven the Greeks back to their ships. Achilles sought her out and, mocking her for her daring, he slew her. He removed the helmet from his fallen foe and saw her young face, lovely as a sunrise even in death. Instantly he fell in love with her beauty and was pierced with wild regret for her death. Thersites, the ugliest man of the Greek expedition, sneered at him for his tears over his dead enemy. Achilles flew at him in a rage and killed him. Odysseus took Achilles to the island of Lesbos where, after he had sacrificed to Apollo, Artemis, and Leto, he was purified for the murder. Memnon, the son of Eos, next came to aid the Trojans. He and Achilles met in combat. Each boasted of his immortal forbears; each swore to kill the other. But Memnon's fate, clad in black, came to his side, and after a glorious struggle, Achilles slew him. Hector, dying before the Scaean gate, had prophesied that Achilles would die at the hands of a god and a hero. Other omens, oracles, and prophecies made it plain that Achilles would not survive the war. Apollo meant to avenge the deaths of Troilus and Tenes. Poseidon resolved to avenge the death of his son Cynus. Achilles' hour had now come. Paris directed an arrow at him as he fought before the Scaean gate and pierced his ankle, his only vulnerable spot. Some say Apollo guided the arrow of Paris, and some say the god shot it himself, disguised as Paris. Achilles drew the arrow out of his foot and flung it from him; it was instantly sped back to Apollo. Achilles wrathfully demanded to know who shot him. Glaring and warlike to the last moment, he grasped his spear, hurled it, and slew one more Trojan before he expired. Telamonian Ajax lifted his body and protected it, though besieged on all sides by the Trojans. All day the battle raged for possession of Achilles' body, but Ajax stood firm, and succeeded in carrying it back to the ships. Then Zeus sent a great storm to end the fight. However, others say Achilles died in quite another way. They say he saw Polyxena, daughter of Priam, as she stood on the walls of Troy casting down rings and bracelets to make up the ransom for Hector's body, and that Achilles fell in love with her. He secretly entered into negotiations with Priam, who promised to give him Polyxena if he would persuade the Greeks to raise the siege of Troy. When Achilles went alone and unarmed to the sanctuary of Thymbraean Apollo to confirm the negotiations, he was treacherously slain by Deïphobus. Or, as some say, Paris shot him from ambush when Achilles went to the sanctuary to ratify the treaty of marriage with Polyxena. On the death of Achilles, Thetis rose with a great cry from the sea. Accompanied by her Nereids, she came to mourn her son. The Muses also grieved. Thetis commanded the Greeks, grievously wounded by his loss, to hold funeral games in his honor, and to award his armor, which Hephaestus had made for him at her request, to the bravest of the Greeks. His ashes along with those of his beloved friends Patroclus and Antilochus were placed in a golden urn fashioned by Hephaestus, and buried on the headland of Sigeum. Thetis took his spirit to Leuce, an island off the mouths of the Ister which was given to Achilles by Poseidon. There, according to some accounts, he married Helen and lived happily. Travelers who sailed near the island said they could hear the voices of Achilles and his friends across the water as they recited the verses of Homer which extolled their own exploits, accompanying themselves on the lyre as they sang. But some say Achilles married Medea and went to live in the Isles of the Blest. Homer, however, says he went to Tartarus, and when Odysseus visited the Underworld on his way home from Troy, he saw Achilles striding unhappily about the Fields of Asphodel, bitterly lamenting his fate, and declaring that he would far rather be a live slave than a dead hero. The women of Elis honored Achilles with funeral rites at the opening of the Olympic Festival, and the Thessalians sacrificed to him annually. He was honored and worshiped at many places, the most revered of his shrines being his tomb on the Hellespont.

Achilles Tatius (tā'shus). Greek astronomer who flourished in the late 2nd century (or during the 3rd century) A.D. He was one of the many commentators on the astronomical work, in verse, Phenomena (or Phainomena) written by Aratus of Soli. His commentary,

entitled On the Sphere, is preserved in a fragmentary condition.

Achilles Tatius. Greek rhetorician and novelist who flourished probably in the 4th century A.D. at Alexandria in Egypt. He was the author of the Greek romance, in eight books, on the adventures of Clitophon of Tyre and Leucippe of Byzantium. This tale of two lovers who suffer many adventures before at last they meet continued to be popular until the fall of Byzantium in the 15th century. It is well constructed, and in the telling of it the author exhibits his wide reading by his descriptions of places, works of art, and natural phenomena.

Achilleum (ak-i-lē'um). In ancient geography, a place on the promontory of Sigeum, in NW Asia Minor, in the Troad, containing, according to tradition, the tomb of Achilles.

Acidalia (a-si-dā'li-a). Epithet of Aphrodite, from a fountain named Acidalius near Orchomenus, in which the goddess was said to bathe with the Graces.

Acis (ā'sis). In classical legend, a beautiful Sicilian youth, the son of Faunus and the sea-nymph Symaethis. He was beloved by Galatea and was slain by the Cyclops Polyhemus, his unsuccessful rival. Galatea transformed the blood of his crushed body into a river which bore his name.

Acmon (ak'mon). A legendary Greek follower of Diomedes. When Diomedes at last returned to his own home after the Trojan War, he was driven out by his wife and her lover. With a number of his followers, among them Acmon, he set out for Italy. But because he had once wounded Aphrodite in the Trojan War she continued to harass him, sending storms to scatter his ships at sea and besetting him with war on land. The followers of Diomedes became discouraged by so many misfortunes. Acmon sought to hearten them. Their condition could not be any worse, he said; they should therefore defy the goddess who persecuted them and press on to Italy. For his defiance Aphrodite transformed him and a number of the followers of Diomedes into birds.

Acontius (a-kon'shi-us, -shus). Principal character in the tale of Acontius and Cydippe, told by Aristaenetos and by Ovid. "Acontius gathered an orange in the garden of Venus, and having written on the rind the words, 'By Artemis, I will marry Acontius,' threw it in Cydippe's way. She took it in her hand, read out the inscription, and threw it from her. But Artemis heard the vow, and brought about the marriage." William Morris took the legend for the subject of one of his poems in The Earthly Paradise.

Acræ (ak'rē). In ancient geography, a city of SE Sicily, situated about 20 miles inland and W of Syracuse. It was founded (664 B.C.) by colonists from Syracuse. Quarries near the ancient city are filled with tombs dating from various periods. The ancient city was built on a hill above the modern town of Palazzolo Acreide.

Acræa (ak-rē'ā). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as a goddess of the heavens and the winds, meaning "Of the Height."

Acragas (ak'ra-gas). [Latin, Agrigentum; modern names, Agrigento, Girgenti.] In ancient geography, a city of Sicily, situated on a high hill near the shore on the SW coast of the island. It was founded c582 B.C. by colonists from the Dorian city of Gela. Shortly after its founding it was compelled to defend itself, perhaps under the tyrant Phalaris, from attacks by the Carthaginians (c560-550 B.C.). By the beginning of the 5th century B.C. it was a flourishing and prosperous city, called by Pindar "the fairest of mortal cities." It outstripped Gela and became second only to Syracuse among the Greek cities of Sicily. Under the tyrant Theron (died c472 B.C.) the city was greatly enlarged: its walls were extended to include both eastern and western summits, a water supply was provided, and the foundations were laid for a magnificent row of temples along the south wall between the rivers Acragas and Hypsas. Following the defeat of the Carthaginians at Himera (480 B.C.) the city flourished. In 472 B.C. the tyrants were overthrown and a democracy was established. A high degree of prosperity and even luxury was attained and the temples begun by Theron were completed. In 406 B.C. the Carthaginians besieged the city, which had refused immunity in return for neutrality in the struggle that Carthage now undertook to reduce and conquer Greek Sicily. After a siege of eight months, in which they were deserted by their allies and mercenaries, most of the inhabitants abandoned their city. Under cover of darkness they marched out, leaving those either unable or unwilling to go to be butchered by the Carthaginians under the command of Himilco, who sacked the city. It remained a Punic city until c340 B.C., when it was rewon and recolonized by Timoleon, the general sent by Corinth to rescue her colony of Syracuse. During the Punic Wars the city was sacked by the Romans (261 B.C.) and by the Carthaginians (255), and finally fell to Rome (210 B.C.). Many remains of the magnificent temples constructed in the 5th century B.C. are to be found on the site, including temples of Zeus, Heracles, Concordia, and Hera, as well as remains of the 4th century B.C. temples of Demeter, Castor and Pollux, and Hephaestus. The poet and philosopher Empedocles was a native of Acragas.

Acrisius (a-kris'i-us). In classical legend, a son of Abas and Aglaia, and the great-grandson of Danaus. He was the twin of Proetus with whom he struggled in his mother's womb and with whom he was destined to struggle all his life. Their father, king of Argos, left his kingdom to his twin sons with instructions that they should rule alternately. But Acrisius refused to give up the throne when it was Proetus' turn to rule, and drove him out of the kingdom. Proetus fled to Iobates in Lycia. He later returned with reinforcements supplied him by Iobates and waged war on Acrisius. The battle was indecisive and the brothers decided to divide the kingdom between them: Acrisius took Argos and Proetus became ruler of Tiryns. Acrisius' wife Aganippe, or as some say, Eurydice, bore him a daughter, Danaë. Acrisius, who wanted a son, consulted an oracle and was told that he would have no sons and that he would meet his death at the hands of Danaë's son. To prevent the fulfillment of the oracle, Acrisius confined Danaë in a prison with bronze doors. Zeus, however, came to Danaë in a shower of gold and she bore him a son, Perseus. Acrisius, on learning of this, doubted the paternity of his grandson; nevertheless, he wanted to destroy him. Reluctant to kill his own daughter and her son, he locked them in a chest and set them adrift on the sea. The chest was washed ashore on Seriphus, and Danaë and Perseus were saved. Perseus grew to manhood and carried out his mission to secure the head of Medusa. Acrisius learned of his exploits and, mindful of the oracle, fled from Argos to Larissa. Perseus, unaware that his grandfather was there, also went to Larissa to take part in funeral games. In the discus-throwing contest his discus was carried out of its course by the wind or by fate. It struck and killed Acrisius who was standing as a spectator, unaware of the fact that his grandson was one of the contestants. Thus the oracle concerning the death of Acrisius was fulfilled. He was buried in the temple of Athena on the acropolis of Larissa.

Acrocerania (ak'rō-sē-rō'ni-ā). [Also: Akro-keraunia; modern Greek, Glossa; Italian, Linguetta.] In ancient geography, a promontory projecting from what was then the NW part of Epirus (and is now SW Albania) into the Ionian Sea. The name has sometimes been incorrectly extended to the whole range of the Ceraunian Mountains.

Acrocorinthus/Acropolis

Acrocorinthus (ak''rō-kō-rin'thus). [Also: Akrokorinthus, Acro-Corinth.] Hill, about 1885 feet high in Greece, under the N slope of which lies the city of Corinth. According to legend, Poseidon and Helius struggled for control of the land about Corinth. Briareus awarded the hill to Helius. He in his turn gave it to Aphrodite. On the slopes of the hill were many temples and altars, and on the summit a temple of Aphrodite. The spring behind the temple was given to the city by the river-god Asopus to reward Sisyphus for informing him that it was Zeus who had carried off his daughter Aegina. Some say this spring and the Pirene spring are the same, that the water flows underground from one to the other. The hill, celebrated for its extensive view, is now covered with ruins. There are scanty remains of the ancient fortifications and of the celebrated temple of Aphrodite and other religious structures.

Acropolis (a-krop'ō-lis). A general name for the citadel of an ancient Greek city. The name is especially appropriated to that of Athens, whose Acropolis is a precipitous rock that rises about 260 feet above the city, extends 1000 feet from E to W, and is 400 feet in its greatest width. It forms a natural citadel, and in earliest times was the site of ancient Athens itself, strongly fortified and containing the palace of the king. It was a center of worship from most ancient times. Here were the palaces of Cecrops and Erechtheus, and here Athena vied with Poseidon for control of the city.

The well of Clepsydra, below the northwest corner of the Acropolis and reached in ancient times by a covered stairway, supplied the citadel with water. Nearby was the cave where Apollo is said to have ravished Creusa, daughter of Erechtheus, and fathered Ion, ancestor of the Ionians. Traces of settlements of the Neolithic Age have been found on the slopes of the Acropolis. The first palace on its upper surface was erected between 1900 and 1600 B.C. Traces of structures of the age of Cecrops (traditional date, 1581 B.C.), Erechtheus, and other early kings include a palace, parts of Pelasgian walls, and the platform where the temple of Nike stands. Traces of a temple from the period 1100-750 B.C. also survive. Down to about the 7th century B.C. the Acropolis was a fortified citadel. After that time it came to be considered as a sacred area and private dwellings were removed from it, leaving a few temples and a simple propylaeum. The foundations of an ancient temple of Athena, lying between and partly under the sites where the Erechtheum and the Parthenon now stand, were recognized and studied by Dörpfeld in 1885. The Doric, peripteral temple, which measured 70 by 137 feet, went through three phases. The earliest part of it was raised on the foundations of a prehistoric Mycenaean palace about the time of Solon (c638-c559 B.C.), and was entirely dedicated to Athena Polias. Toward the end of the 6th century B.C. the Pisistratidae, seeking to equal the beautiful temple erected by their rivals the Alcmaeonidae at Delphi, transformed the naos of the temple and, 520-510 B.C., added 12 columns on the flanks, six columns on the façades, and painted marble pediments. The temple was destroyed by the Persians, 480 B.C., and was partly restored. In 454 B.C. the treasury of the Confederacy of Delos was brought from Delos and placed in the restored temple. On completion of the Parthenon the treasury was removed thither. After the completion of the Erechtheum (407 B.C.), the restored section of the ancient temple of Athena Polias fell into disuse. It was destroyed by fire in 406 B.C. and its foundations were covered over by a terrace. In the 6th century B.C. there was a temple on the present site of the Parthenon, and many smaller temples and treasuries as well on the Acropolis. In this century Pisistratus and Clisthenes made additions to the temples. All of these were completely destroyed when the Persians attacked, took the citadel and burned it, 480 B.C. After the successes of the Greeks at Salamis (480) and Plataea (479 B.C.), the Athenians returned to the city which they had abandoned when the Persians swept down on it. Themistocles, the successful commander at Salamis and the most influential man in Athens, immediately set about rebuilding the walls of the city and those on the north side of the Acropolis as well, using drums of the columns of the ancient temple of Athena and other marble fragments created by the Persian destruction as building materials. These fragments, set into the wall in a kind of pattern and plainly visible to all, were a constant reminder to the Athenians of the Persian vandalism. Cimon continued the work of Themistocles. He built walls on the east and south slopes and increased the top area by filling it in with the rubble that was strewn about the Acropolis. By the time of Pericles (c495-429 B.C.), the Acropolis had been shored up by walls and its area increased but its surface was a mass of ruins. Cleared of ancient structures of varying periods, it presented a site for a planned development of new buildings. Pericles seized this opportunity to create here a great religious center and artistic memorial to the victory of the Greeks over the Persians. Ictinus, Callicrates, and Phidias were given the responsibility and authority to carry out his plan. The buildings and remains from this period (last half of the 5th century B.C.) make of the Acropolis a world-famous monument of the Classical period. The traveler Pausanias describes the Acropolis as it was in the 2nd century A.D. His description, the only complete contemporary account of any age, provides a full description of buildings, statues, and altars that have since disappeared, and also makes possible the identification of many objects that have remained.

In the Pelasgic period (1600-1100 B.C.) the Acropolis could be approached by a stairway cut into rock at the northeast corner. This led to the palace of the ancient kings. The natural entrance was on the west, through the Enneapylon, the nine gates that were added to the Acropolis perhaps in the 10th century B.C. By the time of Pausanias the main entrance was by a great gate, the Propylaea on the west. This vast, never-completed structure was designed by Mnesicles. His design, majestic and symmetrical, had to be altered when priests of Athena Nike and Brauronian Artemis refused to allow their ancient precincts to be invaded to make room for the south side of the proposed Propylaea. Work on the structure was begun in 438 B.C., but was halted 431 B.C. by the outbreak of the Peloponnesian Wars. The design was modified in succeeding centuries and additions were made to it. Among the last of these was that by Caligula in 40 A.D. The present approach to the Propylaea is by the Beulé Gate, so-called because it was uncovered by the French archaeologist Ernest Beulé in 1853. A western extension of the Propylaea, it was added perhaps in the 2nd century A.D., and was covered by the Turks when they used the Acropolis as a fortress. The Propylaea were transformed into an archbishop's palace (12th century), and were later used for administrative offices; about the middle of the 17th century the Turks who had occupied the Acropolis since 1394 stored gunpowder in it. This was ignited by a thunderbolt and exploded. Thus, part of the structure was destroyed (1640). It is now being restored. In ancient times a winding path was followed by the sacred processions to the Acropolis in the Panathenaic festival. This was replaced by a marble ramp that led to the Propylaea. On the south or right side of the Propylaea is the little temple of Athena Nike, goddess of Victory, built on a bastion that juts out to the west, on a site that was from ancient times a precinct of Athena. The ancient cult image was of wood, and depicted the goddess without wings, holding in one hand a pomegranate, symbol of peace and fertility, and in the other her war helmet. This edifice came to be known as the temple of Nike Apteros (Wingless Victory) perhaps from the ancient statue. Here, some say, Victory was presented as wingless so that she could never fly from Athens. The exquisite relief sculptures of the Victories, including the charming Victory Loosing Her Sandal, from the balustrade of the temple, are now in the museum on the Acropolis. On the site of the temple of Athena Nike, so legend says, Aegeus stood to look over the sea, watching for the ship whose sails would tell him the fate of Theseus. From here, when he saw the black sails of death, he hurled himself to the rocks below. The temple of Athena Nike, built 440 B.C., was pulled down by the Turks in 1687, and its material was used by them to build a rampart against the Venetians. It was carefully reconstructed from its original pieces in 1835, later found to be near a state of collapse, and in 1936-41 was rebuilt again, when remains of an older temple were found.

Acropolis/

To the left of the Propylaea was what Pausanias referred to as a building with pictures, the Pinacotheca. Among the pictures he mentions in it were representations of Diomedes taking the Palladium from Troy, Odysseus fetching Philoctetes at Lemnos, Orestes killing Aegisthus, Pylades killing the sons of Nauplius who had come to the aid of Aegisthus, and Polyxena about to be sacrificed on the tomb of Achilles. There were many more pictures, but all of these and the foregoing have been lost. Inside the Propylaea, at the entrance to the Acropolis, was a figure of Hermes of the Gateway. Near it was a small stone on which Silenus was supposed to have sat and rested when he came in the train of Dionysus to Athens.

To the south center of the Acropolis is the Parthenon, a temple that for strength and simplicity, perfect proportions and harmonious relation to its site, has never been equalled. This was Athena's great temple, named from her epithet Athena Parthenos. Pericles engaged Ictinus as architect and gave Phidias general charge of its construction and ornamentation. Periods in history when such a fortunate combination of geniuses lived at the same time have been rare. Work on the temple, which faces the east, was commenced in 447 and completed in 438 B.C. On its pediments were great sculptured scenes, skillfully designed to fit the awkward and constricted area of a thin elongated triangle with perfect grace. The scene at the birth of Athena was on the east pediment; the west pediment showed the contest of Athena and Poseidon. The building was richly decorated inside and out. Great artists worked on it; rich gifts were made to it in succeeding times, among them the golden shields presented by Alexander the Great after the battle of the Granicus, 334 B.C. In later times, when Christianity spread over the Mediterranean world and the Emperor Theodosius II destroyed many of the great monuments, the Parthenon was dedicated as a Christian church (630 A.D.). Later it was turned into a mosque and equipped with minarets by the Turks, who had occupied the Acropolis since 1394, and it was used by them as an arsenal in a war with the Venetians. During the siege a shot from the Hill of the Muses pierced the roof, ignited the gunpowder stored there, and blew the magnificent building apart (1687). This was the worst disaster that had ever befallen it. Afterward its monumental sculptures, statues, altars, and columns lay in broken heaps on the ground. In succeeding years some of the marble was carried away and used for building material. Early in the 19th century Lord Elgin, ambassador of Great Britain in Constantinople, received permission from the Sultan to gather up what he wished of the fallen and neglected marbles and to carry them off to England, where they were placed in the British Museum, 1816. Across from the Parthenon, to the north, rises the Erechtheum, built after 421 B.C., on the site of one of the oldest sanctuaries of the Acropolis. Here, according to tradition, Athena and Poseidon vied for control of Athens. Poseidon struck the rock with his trident, and a fountain of sea water gushed forth. Athena gave the olive tree as her gift to the city. It was voted the more useful to man and she was awarded the city and became its chief goddess. The Erechtheum housed the ancient shrines of the rivals. The cella in the east of the building was that of Athena. In it was the ancient olive-wood image of the goddess, said to have fallen from heaven in the time of Cecrops. It was burned when the Persians destroyed the Acropolis, or, as some say, was saved by being taken aboard a Greek ship just before the battle of Salamis (480 B.C.). Behind the cella of Athena, to the west, was the cella of Poseidon-Erechtheus. Thus the two rival immortals, Athena and Poseidon, were united in one temple. In Poseidon's cella was enclosed the fountain of sea water, sometimes called the "Sea of Erechtheus," brought forth by Poseidon's trident, as well as the marks of his trident. It was said that when the south wind blew the cistern gave forth the sound of waves. There were also altars to Hephaestus, a god closely associated with Athena in the arts of civilization, and to Butes, an ancient priest of Athena and ancestor of the priestly family, the Butadae. Behind the cella of Poseidon was the Pandroseum, the sanctuary of Pandrosos, daughter of Cecrops and first priestess of Athena. In the enclosure was the sacred olive tree Athena planted as a gift to Athens. The tree was burned during the Persian Wars, but according to tradition it immediately put forth a new shoot. The famous Porch of the Maidens formed a south wing of the Erechtheum, and a north porch was a place of sacrifices to Zeus. The Erechtheum was converted into a church, probably in the 7th century A.D., and in the time of the Turkish occupation it housed the harem of the Turkish commander on the Acropolis. Many altars and statues were on the Acropolis, among them the statue of Athena Lemnia by Phidias, said by Pausanias to be his finest work. There were also numberless statues representing scenes from mythology, images of the gods, and of such mortals as Pericles, Xanthippus, and Anacreon of Teos, the poet. On the south slope of the Acropolis was the sanctuary of Asclepius, begun c420 B.C., an important healing center until its close in the 5th century A.D. To the east of the sanctuary of Asclepius are the remains of a theater of Dionysus built in the 4th century B.C. on the site of the ancient theater in which the plays of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides had been performed. At the southeast corner on the lower slopes was the Odeum, constructed about the same time as the Parthenon.

In 86 B.C. Sulla besieged Athens and destroyed many buildings on the south slope of the Acropolis. In Roman times additions were made to the Propylaea and buildings were added on the Acropolis. A circular shrine dedicated to the goddess Roma and to the Emperor Augustus was erected 14 B.C. Hadrian made rich gifts and repaired buildings. Herodes Atticus, wealthy Athenian and generous donor of buildings, built the theater named for him on the south slope, in memory of his wife Regilla, c160 A.D. From the reign of Theodosius II (401-450 A.D.), the Acropolis ceased to be a center of worship. He caused the monuments to be mutilated or destroyed in a ruthless campaign of Christianization. As noted earlier, the Acropolis was occupied by the Turks for about 400 years. In 1833, following the liberation of the Greeks, the royal ensign of their first king, Otto I, was hoisted on the Acropolis. Almost immediately work was begun on the restoration of the monuments, among the most precious in the western world. Excavations have revealed successively earlier stages of development, before the time of Pericles. The site, crowned by the Parthenon, the Erechtheum whose more delicate outlines, façade, and famous Porch of the Maidens are in good state of preservation, and the temple of Athena Nike, is a center of artistic and cultural pilgrimage. Large marble fragments and the drums of columns of these and other structures remain where they fell, in the hope that means will be found to reassemble and raise them.

Acta Diurna (ak'ta dī-ēr'nā). [Eng. trans., "Daily Events."] Roman official daily chronicle which contained regulations by the magistrates, transactions and decrees of the Senate, accounts of accidents and family news communicated to the editors in addition to official reports of events in the imperial family, and of state and city affairs. The Acta were publicly exhibited on a whitened board (album), which anyone might read and copy, and there were men who made a business of multiplying and transmitting such news to the provinces. After a time the originals were placed among the state archives for the benefit of those who wished to consult them. The publication of such news was made official by Julius Caesar; it ceased, apparently, on the transfer of the capital to Constantinople.

Actaeon/Admete

Actaeon (ak-tē'on). In mythology, a son of Aristaeus and Autonoë, daughter of Cadmus. He lived in Orchomenus. Weary one day from hunting, he sought rest in a grove which, unknown to him, was sacred to Artemis. As he wandered through the grove he inadvertently came on the spring where Artemis and her nymphs were bathing. To punish him because, through no fault of his, he had seen the goddess in her bath, Artemis splashed water in his face and transformed him into a stag. In his new form Actaeon fled. His own hounds, which some say were the Telchines that had fled from Rhodes, picked up the scent of the stag and gave chase. Over-taking him at last, they tore their former master to pieces.

Actaeus (ak-tē'us). According to some accounts, the first king of what later became Attica. In his reign the land was called Actaea. His daughter Aglauros (or Agrauros) married Cecrops who, on the death of Actaeus, succeeded him to the throne.

Actis (ak'tis). In mythology, one of the six sons of Rhode and Helius. Banished from Rhodes for killing his brother, he went to Egypt and founded the city of Heliopolis. There, inspired by Helius, he taught the Egyptians astrology. The Colossus of Rhodes was built in his honor.

Actium (ak'shi-um, -ti-um). In ancient geography, a promontory on the NW coast of Acarnania, in Greece. The ancient peribolos or sacred enclosure, rectangular in plan and built in opus reticulatum, the seat of the famous Actian games of Augustus, still remains. Modern excavations have laid bare extensive ruins of several successive temples, one of the latest of which is that dedicated by Augustus after the victory of 31 B.C. A famous naval battle was fought (Sept. 2, 31 B.C.) near Actium by Octavian (the future Augustus) against Mark Antony and Cleopatra. It was decided by the flight of Cleopatra, Mark Antony's land forces thereupon surrendering to Octavian. The victory secured for Octavian supreme rule over the Roman dominion.

Actor (ak'tor). In classical legend, a brother of Augeas, king of Elis, and reputedly the father by Molione of Eurytus and Cteatus. His descendants are called the Moliones, after their mother.

Actor. In legend, a son of Myrmidon and Pasidice. He was king of Phthia and received Peleus when the latter fled to his court after the murder of Phocus. Actor's adopted son Eurytion purified Peleus for the murder. Actor gave his daughter Polymela to Peleus in marriage and one-third of his kingdom as her dowry.

Actoridae (ak-tôr'i-dē), or Actoriones (-tôr-i-ō'nēz). Descendants of Actor. See Moliones.

Acusilaus (a-kū-si-lā'us). Called Acusilaus of Argos, although he was born in Boeotia, probably mid-6th century B.C. He was a Greek commentator and chronicler, who paraphrased the Theogony of Hesiod in prose. It was said that his father found the Theogony inscribed on bronze tablets buried in his garden, and that it was from these that Acusilaus rewrote the work in prose. He was regarded by some as one of the seven wise men.

Ada (ā'da). Sister and wife of Idrieus, ruler of Halicarnassus. When her husband died she succeeded him as ruler, but was driven out by her brother Pixodarus. Alexander the Great, having defeated the Persians at the Granicus River (334 B.C.), marched through Asia Minor, overthrowing the tyrannies established by the Persians in the Greek cities there. Ada sought his protection. He adopted her as his mother, and when he had taken Halicarnassus by force he restored Ada and made her ruler of the satrapy of Caria.

Adamas (ad'a-mas). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a son of the Trojan ally Asius. In his chariot he accompanied his father at the attack on the Greek fortifications. His attempt to kill Antilochus, Nestor's son, was foiled by Poseidon, who caused his spear to break off in the shield of Antilochus. As the unarmed Adamas retreated, Meriones followed and killed him.

Addaeus (a-dē'us). Greek epigrammatist of Macedonia, active c320 B.C.

Addua (ad'ō-a). [Modern name, Adda.] River in N Italy, which rises in the Rhaetian Alps, traverses Lacus Larius (Lake Como), and joins the Po River about eight miles W of Cremona.

Adige (ä'dē-jā). See Athesis.

Admete (ad-mē'tē). According to legend, a daughter of Eurystheus. Because she ardently desired to possess the golden girdle of Ares that belonged to the Amazon queen, Hippolyte, Heracles was commanded to fetch it as one of his 12 labors.

Admetus (ad-mē'tus). A legendary king of Phærae in Thessaly. He was a son of Pheres. He joined in the Calydonian Hunt and was also a member of the expedition of the Argonauts. When he returned from that expedition, Apollo was sent to labor for him for one year as a punishment for killing the Cyclopes. Apollo served him well and was his good friend. He helped Admetus to yoke a lion and a boar to a chariot, a condition which Pelias set for the suitors of his daughter, Alcestis, and thus Admetus won Alcestis for his bride. Admetus forgot to sacrifice to Artemis on the wedding day and in anger the goddess punished him. Apollo interceded and won her forgiveness, and also won a promise from Artemis that when Death came for Admetus he could win a reprieve on condition that some one else could be found to take his place. Too soon, Hermes came to take Admetus to the Underworld. Apollo made the Fates drunk so that they did not immediately snip the thread of his life. This gave Admetus time to search for a substitute. He asked his father and mother but, though very aged, they loved life and neither would give it up for Admetus. Only Alcestis, his devoted wife, was willing to cut short her life that Admetus might prolong his: she went with Hermes to the Underworld in his place. Admetus, grieving at her loss, let her go.

Adonia (a-dō'ni-a). A festival held in mid-summer in honor of Adonis. In the celebration of the festival small images of the dead Adonis were carried in procession and exposed to the public view, while the women who accompanied them beat their breasts and mourned, and imitated the burial rites. After this, the women rejoiced as at the resurrection of Adonis. As part of the festival pots of earth were sown with plants that grew quickly. These were tended carefully for eight days and then allowed to wither and die and were thrown into the sea with the images of the dead Adonis. They represented the rapid coming to youthful beauty of Adonis and his death in the bloom of youth.

Adonis (a-don'is, a-dō'nis). In mythology, a son of Myrrha and Cinyras, her own father.

Cinyras had not realized that the young girl with whom he was consorting was his own daughter. When he learned the truth, he was horrified and sought to kill her. She fled and was transformed into a myrrh tree. When it was time for her child to be born the birth goddess Lucina split the trunk of the tree and Adonis tumbled out. He was cared for by nymphs and grew to be a young man of surpassing beauty. According to another account, Aphrodite, repenting that she had caused Myrrha to fall in love with her father, saved the infant Adonis when he was born from the trunk of the tree and hid him in a chest which she gave to Persephone to guard, with admonitions not to look inside the chest. Persephone disobeyed her command and was so struck by the beauty of the child in the chest that she brought him up herself, and refused to give him up when Aphrodite demanded him. The muse Calliope, who was called on to judge the dispute between Aphrodite and Persephone, decided that Adonis, now a handsome youth and the lover of both, should spend a third of the year with Aphrodite, a third with Persephone, and should have a third for himself. But Aphrodite, with the aid of the magic girdle of love, persuaded him to spend most of his time with her thus violating the terms of the decision. She bore him a son Golgos and a daughter Beroë. Although she cautioned Adonis to avoid ferocious beasts when he followed his favorite pastime of hunting, he could not resist the thrill of the chase. His hunting dogs raised a wild boar from its lair and Adonis eagerly gave chase. He shot at the boar but his arrow only wounded and maddened the animal. It turned savagely on Adonis and tore him to pieces. A blood-red flower sprang from the drops of his blood that fell to the earth, the anemone, which flourishes briefly. Its handsome blossom grows swiftly to beauty and as rapidly dies, even as Adonis died in the full bloom of youth. Some say it was Ares in the shape of a boar who destroyed him, because he was jealous of Aphrodite's love for him. Aphrodite was heartbroken at the death of her youthful lover. She appealed to Zeus and persuaded him to allow Adonis to spend the summer months of the year with her. The rest of the time his shade lingers in the Underworld. Adonis has been considered by some scholars to have been originally an oriental deity of nature, typifying the withering of nature in winter and its revival in summer. By way of Asia Minor his cult came first to Greece, then passed to Egypt, and thence finally was brought to Rome. The yearly festival of Adonis in the spring was a special favorite with women. In the Old Testament reference is made to the weeping of the women over Tammuz, the Babylonian equivalent of Adonis (Ezek. viii. 14), a name which may be a form of the Semitic 'adon, "lord."

Adramyttium (ad-rā-mit'i-um) or Adramyti (-i). [Modern name, Edremit.] In ancient geography, a town in the Troad near the head of the Gulf of Adramyttium (Gulf of Edremit) NE of the island of Lesbos. It was one of the towns seized and sacked by Achilles during the Trojan War, according to legend.

Adramyttium, Gulf of. [Modern name, Gulf of Edremit.] In ancient geography, an arm of the Aegean Sea on the coast of Mysia. It separates the mainland from the island of Mytilene. Length, about 50 miles; width, about 15 miles.

Adraste (a-dras'tē). In Homeric legend (Odyssey), an attendant of Helen in the court of Menelaus.

Adrastea (ad-ras-tē'a) or Adrastia (ad-ras-ti'a). A Cretan nymph, daughter of Melisseus, to whom Rhea entrusted the infant Zeus to be reared in the Dictaeon grotto. According to some accounts, Zeus rewarded her by giving her the horn of the goat Amalthea, which thereafter was filled with whatever food or drink its possessor desired, and became known as the "Cornucopia" or "Horn of Plenty."

Adrastea. "Inescapable"; an epithet of Nemesis, goddess of divine vengeance.

Adrastus (a-dras'tus). [Also: Adrastos.] A mythical grandson of Bias. He was a king of Argos. His two daughters Aegia and Deipyle had so many powerful suitors that Adrastus hesitated to choose among them for fear the disappointed suitors would become his enemies. He consulted the oracle at Delphi and was told to yoke a boar and a lion that fought in his palace. Shortly thereafter Tydeus, son of Oeneus of Calydon, and Polynices, son of Oedipus of Thebes, came to Argos. When these two exiles began to quarrel in his palace Adrastus remembered the oracle, for the emblem of Calydon is a boar, and the emblem of Thebes is a lion. (Some say Tydeus was clad in a boar's hide and Polynices in a lion's skin.) He pacified their quarrel and gave his daughter Aegia to Polynices and his daughter Deipyle to Tydeus. Polynices had been refused the throne of Thebes when it was his turn to rule, by his brother Eteocles. Tydeus had been banished from Calydon for a murder. Adrastus promised to restore them both to their lands. He called his chieftains together for a march against Thebes to restore Polynices. The Seven against Thebes who assembled were Adrastus, Capaneus, Hippomedon, Parthenopaeus, Amphiarus, Polynices, and Tydeus. Amphiarus, brother-in-law of Adrastus, was unwilling to go. He was a seer and foresaw disaster. But some years previously he had quarreled with Adrastus and driven him to Sicyon. Their quarrel was later resolved and Amphiarus married Eriphyle, the sister of Adrastus, who made them both promise that in any future dispute they would abide by her decision. In this case, bribed by Polynices, she decided that Amphiarus should be one of the expedition. Amphiarus yielded to her decision though he knew it would cause his death. In the war against Thebes, the Seven met with disaster, as Amphiarus had foreseen. Every one of the champions was killed except Adrastus who escaped on the winged horse Arion, which had been given to him by Heracles. Some years later the sons of the Seven against Thebes, known as the Epigoni, again attacked Thebes to avenge their fathers. Aegialeus, the son of Adrastus, was among the Epigoni and was killed in the attack. When Adrastus learned of his death he died of grief. But some say Adrastus accompanied the Epigoni to Thebes and died of grief over his son's death at Megara, on his way home from the successful attack. He was worshiped as a hero at Athens, Sicyon, and Megara.

Adrastus of Aphrodisias. Greek philosopher; fl. at Aphrodisias, in Caria, about the beginning of the 2nd century B.C. He wrote commentaries on Aristotle (Ethics, Logic, Phys- ics), on Theophrastus (Ethics), and on Plato's Timaeus. His commentary on the Timaeus dealt with mathematical and astronomical questions. He also wrote a treatise on the order of the Aristotelian writings.

Adrestus (ă-dres'tus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of the seer Merops of Percote. He and his brother Amphius went to the aid of Troy, in spite of their father's prophecy that if they did so they would never return to their homeland. He was slain by Diomedes.

Adrestus. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan ally. He was captured by Menelaus when his horses, fleeing in terror, overturned his chariot. He begged Menelaus to spare his life, promising him a rich ransom. Menelaus agreed to do so, but Agamemnon then came upon the scene and reminded Menelaus that he had not been so kindly treated by the Trojans, and slew Adrestus himself.

Adria (ă'dri-ă). In ancient geography, the sea now called the Adriatic, and also (about the 1st century A.D.) that part of the Mediterranean which lies between Crète and Sicily.

Adriatic Sea (ă-dri-at'ik, ad-ri-at'ik). [Italian Mare Adriatico; Latin, Adria, Mare Adriaticum.] That part of the Mediterranean Sea which lies between Italy on the W and NW, and Yugoslavia and Albania on the E, and is connected with the Ionian Sea by the Strait of Otranto. Its chief arms are the Gulfs of Manfredonia, Venice, Trieste, and Quarnero (Velik Kvarner), and its largest tributaries are the rivers Po and Adige. Length, about 500 miles; area, about 51,000 square miles; average depth, about 795 feet; greatest known depth, 4590 feet.

Adymnus (ă-dim'nus). Name which the Cretans gave to the son Eos bore to Cephalus. Others called him Phaëthon. Aphrodite stole him while he was still a child and made him watchman of her most sacred shrines.

Adytum (ad'i-tum). In ancient worship, a sacred place which the worshipers might not enter, or which might be entered only by those who had performed certain rites, or only by males or by females, or only on certain appointed days, etc. Also, a secret sanctuary or shrine open only to the priests, or whence oracles were delivered, hence in general the most sacred or reserved part of any place of worship. In Greece an adytum was usually an inner recess or chamber in a temple as in that of Hera at Aegium; but it might be an entire temple as that of Poseidon at Mantinea, or a grove, inclosure, or cavern, as the sacred inclosure of Zeus on the Lycæan mount in Arcadia. The most famous adytum of Greece was the sanctuary of the Pythic oracle at Delphi.

Aea (ē'ă). In ancient geography, a city on the Phasis River in Colchis, where King Aeëtes lived and to which Jason and the Argonauts journeyed on the quest for the Golden Fleece. Some say it was named for a huntress who was transformed into an island of this name to save her from the pursuit of the river-god Phasis. Aea seems to mean "Land, the Mainland," and may be the same word as Asia. Aeëtes is "Man of the land, Lands-man." This whole tale is full of allegory: Argo "Swift," Jason "Healer," Medea "Wise girl," etc.

Aeaea (ē-ē'ă). A name applied to two homes of the enchantress Circe. One was an alder-fringed island at the head of the Adriatic Sea near the mouth of the Po River. It is described as gloomy and heavily wooded, but on the other hand was sometimes called the Island of the Dawn. The other was identified with a promontory or small rocky island (in ancient times an island, now connected to the mainland) off the west coast of Italy near Terracina. Jason and Medea went to Aeaea to be purified by Circe of the slaying of Apsyrtus on their way to Iolcus from Colchis. Odysseus also visited Circe in her island home of Aeaea and remained with her a year. The name Aeaea was sometimes applied to the enchantress herself.

Aeacides (ē-as'i-dēz). A term meaning "Descendant of Aeacus." It was applied especially to Peleus, Telamon, and Achilles.

Aeacus (ē-ă-kus). A mythological son of Zeus and Aegina, the daughter of the river-god Asopus. He was born on the island of Oenone, or Oenopia, whither Zeus had taken Aegina when he carried her from her father's land. Aeacus became king of the island and renamed it Aegina in his mother's honor. By his wife Endeïs, the daughter of Sciron, Aeacus was the father of Peleus and Telamon. By the sea-nymph Psamathe he was the father of Phocus. Phocus was his father's favorite and caused such jealousy on the part of his brothers that, with the encouragement of their mother, they murdered him. Telamon and Peleus fled but Telamon sent word to his father from Salamis that he was innocent, and asked permission to plead his case. Aeacus refused to let him land on the island. Telamon was forced to plead his case from a mole which he secretly constructed in the harbor. But Aeacus was unmoved by his plea and refused to permit Telamon to return. Some say that Aegina was an unpopulated island, and that Zeus transformed ants into men who became subjects of Aeacus, and that this was the origin of the famous Myrmidons. But others tell a different story: Hera, when she learned that Aeacus was the child of Zeus by one of her rivals, and that an island had been named for this rival, was infuriated as usual. She vowed to punish the inhabitants of the island. In pursuit of this vow she sent a plague of serpents to infest the rivers and springs of the land. She caused the hot south wind to blow across the island for four months, thus parching the fields and ruining the crops. The springs and fountains were poisoned by the serpents; men and beasts died of drinking the waters. In the towns men sickened and died. The people prayed for relief to Zeus, but the animals prepared for the altars collapsed and died before they could be sacrificed. Men became desperate under the dire pestilence, and a wave of crime and impiety broke out. Soon nearly all the inhabitants were dead. Aeacus continually prayed to Zeus for relief. One day his prayer was answered by a shattering thunderclap. He prayed that if he were really the son of Zeus, his father would either repopulate his land or let him die. Pointing to a nearby oak tree that had grown from the acorn of a sacred Dodonian oak, Aeacus asked Zeus to send him as many men as there were in the army of ants busily carrying grain up the trunk of the tree. When Aeacus made this request the oak trembled and the leaves rustled although there was no wind. In the night Aeacus dreamed that a shower of ants fell to the ground from the oak tree and were transformed into men. Next morning his son Telamon called to him that an army of men, all of the same age and size, had arrived. Aeacus recognized them from his dream as ants that had been transformed by Zeus into men in answer to his prayer. He called them Myrmidons, "ants," and they were ever after marked by the thrifty, energetic qualities of the ants from which they had sprung. At the same time, the plague of serpents was lifted, the south wind stopped blowing, and a heavy rain fell on the parched land. Aeacus divided his lands among his new people and gave thanks to Zeus.

According to some accounts, Apollo and Poseidon enlisted the aid of Aeacus when they built the wall of Troy, for they knew that unless a mortal assisted in the building of the wall it would be impregnable and the inhabitants within it could defy the gods. After they had finished building the wall, three serpents slithered up and tried to scale it. Two fell back and died. The third, making his attack on the part of the wall built by Aeacus, was successful. Apollo prophesied that the wall would be breached and the city destroyed by the descendants of Aeacus; as indeed it was, by Telamon and later by Ajax.

Aeacus was renowned as a pious and wise man and as the powerful ruler of a strong country. He was often appealed to in disputes, as when Sciron and Nisus quarreled over Megara. Aeacus was asked to decide; his judgment was that Nisus should be king but that Sciron should command the army. He was considered so powerful that many Spartans and Athenians wished to fight in his army. When the Athenians caused the death of Androgeus, son of Minos of Crete, Minos waged war on Athens and sought Aeacus as his ally. But Aeacus announced that he was closely allied to Athens and offered the Athenians his aid instead. He had made it nearly impossible for any power to attack his island by surrounding it with a sunken wall of rocks, and though Minos threatened, he did not dare attack. In the war that followed, all Greece was afflicted by a drought; or as some say, by earthquakes and famine. The oracle at Delphi, appealed to by the Greeks, advised them to ask Aeacus to pray to Zeus for relief. Aeacus heeded their request. He ascended Mount Panhel-lenius, the highest peak of the island. As he stretched out his hands to Zeus a loud

thunderclap was heard, a cloud settled on the mountain top, rain began to fall, and the drought was broken. The earthquakes ceased in all of Greece except Attica, which had to make amends to Minos in another manner. In gratitude, Aeacus built a sanctuary to Zeus on the mountain, which could be seen from the shores of the mainland. Ever after, a cloud hovering over the peak of Mount Panhellenius was a sign of rain. But some say the drought that afflicted Greece and which Aeacus caused to be broken with his prayers to Zeus had come because Pelops, in a war against Stymphalus, king of Arcadia, treacherously slew Stymphalus during a truce in which he pretended friendship, and scattered his mangled limbs.

Aeacus, greatly honored during his lifetime, was equally honored after death. Zeus made him one of the three judges in Tartarus. It is said that he makes decisions concerning the souls that come from Europe; and also that he is the keeper of the keys of Tartarus.

Aeanes (ē'a-nēz). In mythology, named as a son of Amphidamas and elsewhere named Clitonymus, who was killed by Patroclus in a childish quarrel over a game of jackstones. It was because of this murder that Patroclus fled to Phthia, where he became the beloved friend of Achilles.

Aeantis (ē-an'tis). An epithet of Athena, meaning "Ajacian." Telamonian Ajax dedicated an image of Athena Aeantis on the citadel at Megara when, as some say, he succeeded Alcathous as king of Megara.

Aechmagoras (ēk-mag'ō-ras). In Greek legend, a son of Heracles and Phialo. When he was born, his grandfather thrust him and his mother out on the mountainside to die. The child's crying was heard by a jay. The bird flew off to Heracles and, mimicking the infant's cries, led Heracles to the spot where Aechmagoras and his mother were dying of hunger. Heracles saved them. The spring near which he found them was named Cissa after the jay that had warned Heracles of their plight.

Aechmis (ēk'mis). King of Arcadia. He and his countrymen openly fought for Aristodemus, king of Messenia, in the First Messenian War between Messenia and Sparta.

Aedile (ē'dīl). In ancient Rome, a magistrate whose duty was originally the superintendence of public buildings and lands, out of which grew a large number of functions of administration and police. Among other duties, that of promoting the public games was incumbent on the aediles, and cost them large sums of money. Later, under the Empire, their functions were distributed among special officials, and their importance dwindled.

Aëdon (ā-ē'don). In legend, a daughter of Pandareus of Ephesus. According to Homer she was the wife of Zethus, king of Thebes, and the mother of Itylus. Inspired by envy of Niobe, the wife of Amphion, who had seven sons and seven daughters, she formed the design of killing Niobe's eldest son, but by mistake destroyed her own son Itylus. To relieve her grief she was changed by Zeus into a nightingale, and her song became one long lament for her lost son. According to another account which closely follows the story of Procne in some respects, Aëdon was the wife of Polytechnus. She and her husband so gloried in their happiness that she boasted they were a happier couple than Zeus and Hera. To punish her arrogance Hera sent Eris to cause strife between them, and Eris caused Aëdon to arrange a contest between herself and her husband: that whoever completed specified tasks first should be presented with a slave by the other. Aëdon won the contest. Polytechnus angrily went to Pandareus in Ephesus and carried off Chelidon, the sister of Aëdon, under the pretext that he was taking her on a visit to her sister, and on the journey he ravished her. He bound her to secrecy and gave her, disguised, as a slave to Aëdon. Aëdon learned that this was her sister and conspired with her to punish Polytechnus. Together the sisters slew Itylus, the son of Aëdon and Polytechnus, dismembered his body, cooked it, and gave it to his father to eat. When he had eaten, the nature of his meal was revealed to Polytechnus. He sought to kill the sisters, but as he pursued them, the gods transformed them into birds. Aëdon became a nightingale, Chelidon a swallow, and Polytechnus a pelican.

Aedui (ed'ū-ī). [Also: Haedui, Hedui.] Celtic people in C Gaul, W of the Sequani between what are now the Saône and the Loire rivers. Their capital was Bibracte (the Roman Augustodunum, modern Autun). They were allies of the Romans, but joined in the revolt of 52 B.C.

Æetes (ē-ē'tēz). In classical myth, a son of Helios and Persa, and the brother of Circe, Pasiphaë, and Perses. He was king of Aea in Colchis at the far end of the Euxine Sea. By the nymph Asterodia he was the father of Chalciopé. His second wife was Idyia, who bore him Medea and a son Apsyrtus. Phrixus, son of Athamas, landed on his shores when he fled from Orchomenus on the ram with the Golden Fleece. Æetes welcomed him hospitably, despite the reputation of the Colchians for hostility to strangers, and gave him his daughter Chalciopé for a wife. The ram, according to its own instructions, was sacrificed to Zeus. Its fleece was hung in a grove sacred to Ares in Colchis and was guarded by a dragon that never slept. Phrixus died after fathering several sons and his ghost was said to haunt Pelias, king of Iolcus, demanding that the fleece be restored to Hellas. For this reason, and also to get rid of him, Pelias sent Jason to Colchis to fetch the Golden Fleece. When Æetes learned the reason for Jason's arrival on his shores, he was enraged. Only the laws of hospitality prevented him from slaying Jason at once. He thought also that his grandsons, whom Jason had rescued at sea and brought with him to Colchis, were plotting to seize his throne with Jason's help. He schemed to bring about the death of Jason without actually being involved in it himself. He said he would give Jason the fleece if he could do what Æetes himself had done: yoke two fire-breathing bulls, plow a field, and sow in it the dragon's teeth which had been given to Æetes by Athena. With Medea's help Jason successfully performed this feat. Then, being warned by Medea of her father's intention to betray him, Jason fled, taking Medea with him. Æetes pursued the Argonauts with a great fleet but he was delayed, according to some accounts because he stopped to gather up the pieces of Apsyrtus' body which Medea had cut up and flung into the sea. Others say Apsyrtus did not go with the Argonauts but pursued them and was betrayed and slain by Jason. Æetes never did overtake the fleeing Argonauts and all his attempts to secure the return of Medea ended in failure. However, some years later when his throne was seized by his brother Perses, Medea returned to Colchis, killed Perses, and restored her father to his throne.

Aegae (ē'jē). In ancient geography, a town on the Crathis River, under the Crathis Mountains, situated on the south shore of the Gulf of Corinth, in Achaea. According to Homer it was one of Poseidon's cities. He had an underwater palace nearby, in the stables of which he kept his white horses with bronze hoofs and golden manes, and his golden chariot in which he rode to still storms at sea. The town later was abandoned and fell into ruin.

Aegae. In ancient geography, the fortified capital of Macedonia, situated in the foothills of mountains about 50 miles to the W and N of the Thermaic Gulf. Philip II who had moved his capital from Aegae to Pella, c356 B.C., was murdered at Aegae, 336 B.C. According to an ancient oracle the kingdom of Macedonia would approach its dissolution if any of its kings was buried anywhere but in the ancient capital. The oracle was confirmed when Alexander the Great died in Asia and his empire was divided by his generals. Throughout antiquity Aegae remained one of the most important cities of Macedonia. In Roman times the name was changed to Edessa, which it bears today.

Aegaeon (ē-jē'on). See Briareus.

Aegaeus (ē-jē'us). The god of the river of the same name in the land of the Phaeacians. He was the father of the nymph Melite, who became the mother, by Heracles, of Hyllus. This Hyllus is not to be confused with that Hyllus who was the son of Heracles and Deianira.

Aegaleos (ē-gā'lē-os), Mount. In ancient geography, a mountain in W Attica, W of Athens. It ended in a promontory (Amphiale), opposite the island of Salamis, from which Xerxes is said to have witnessed (480 B.C.) the defeat of his forces by the Greeks in the Battle of Salamis. Elevation, about 1534 feet.

Aegates (ē-gā'tēz) or Aegadian (ē-gā'di-an) Isles. [Modern name, Egadi Islands.] Group of small islands W of Sicily. The Romans defeated the Carthaginians in a naval battle near the islands in 241 B.C.

Name given to that part of the Mediterranean Sea which lies between Greece on the W and N, and Turkey on the E. It communicates with the Sea of Marmara (Propontis) and thence with the Black Sea (Pontus, Pontus Euxinus) by the strait of the Dardanelles (Hellespont). It contains many islands, of which the best known are Aegina, Euboea, the Cyclades, the Sporades, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, Samothrace, and Thasus. According to Greek legend, it received its name from the Athenian king Aegeus who threw himself into the sea believing that his son Theseus had been killed. The term Aegean has been used to designate the Bronze Age civilization of the Greek mainland, islands, and the mainland of Asia Minor, Thrace, and Macedonia. Length, about 400 miles; greatest width, over 200 miles; area, about 69,000 square miles; average depth, 1910 feet.

Aegestes (ē-jēs'tēz). See Acestes.

Aegeus (ē-jē-us, -jös). In mythology, a son of Pandion the Younger, king of Athens, and Pylia. His brothers were Pallas, Nisus, and Lycus. But some say Aegeus was an adopted son of Pandion and therefore was not a true descendant of Erechtheus. Pandion had been driven from Athens but after his death his sons marched against Athens, drove out their enemies and divided Attica into four parts. Aegeus, being the oldest, became king of Athens. Pallas claimed that Aegeus was not a true son of Pandion. He and his 50 sons were ever plotting to unseat Aegeus as king, and another brother, Lycus, became so threatening that Aegeus exiled him. Aegeus married twice, but neither of his wives bore him a child. He visited the oracle at Delphi to inquire what he should do to procure an heir. The oracle answered that he should not untie the neck of the bulging wine-skin until he came to the highest point of Athens or he would die of grief. Aegeus did not understand the meaning of this pronouncement. On his return from Delphi he stopped in Corinth. There he saw Medea, the sorceress Jason had brought back from Colchis, and promised her that if she ever needed help he would provide it for her. In return Medea promised to get him an heir by her magic. Aegeus visited his friend Pittheus in Troezen and told him of the oracle's warning. Pittheus, affected from afar by Medea's magic, entertained him lavishly, pressed wine on him, and when he was drunk sent his daughter Aethra in to lie with him. The next day Aegeus told Aethra if she should bear a son, she was to raise him in secret in Troezen, and when he grew up she was to send him to Athens if he could recover a sword and sandals that Aegeus now hid under a huge rock. Aegeus departed for Athens to celebrate the Athenian Festival. Some say that at these games Androgeus, son of Minos of Crete, won all the contests and that the Athenians were furious with jealousy. To get rid of Androgeus, Aegeus sent him to capture the Marathonian Bull, a fierce animal brought from Crete by Heracles. Androgeus was killed in his attempt to subdue the bull. But others say he was killed when he was ambushed by jealous Athenians, or that Aegeus ordered him ambushed and slain because he feared that Androgeus might persuade Minos to help the sons of Pallas who were plotting to seize the throne from Aegeus. Minos, king of Crete, waged war on Athens to avenge his son's death. He could not defeat the Athenians and prayed the gods to punish them. The gods sent famine and pestilence against Athens, and lifted these scourges only when the Athenians agreed to give Minos any amends he might demand. He demanded a tribute of seven youths and seven maidens to be sent to Crete every nine years to be devoured by the Minotaur.

In the meantime, Medea had fled from Corinth to Athens and reminded Aegeus of his promise to help her. He not only gave her asylum; he married her. She bore him a son, and Aegeus, not knowing that Aethra had already borne his son Theseus, thought this child, Medeus, was the heir that Medea had promised him. But Theseus, now grown to young manhood, took up the tokens Aegeus had hidden under the rock and, after many adventures, arrived in Athens. Medea, through her arts, instantly realized this was Aegeus' first-born and warned Aegeus that the young stranger was a threat to his kingdom. She induced Aegeus to hand him a cup of poisoned wine. But just as Theseus raised it to his lips, Aegeus noted the hilt of the young man's sword, recognized it as his own, and realized that this was his son whom he had never seen. He dashed the cup from his hand and welcomed his son with delight. Medea was obliged to flee from Athens for her plots, but Aegeus provided an escort for her and her son. Shortly after, the time for sending tribute to Minos arrived. In spite of the pleas of Aegeus, Theseus resolved to go as part of the tribute. He promised to return, however, and told his father that on the return journey he would substitute, for the black sail the ship customarily carried, a white sail to show that he had vanquished the Minotaur.

Theseus, however, forgot to change the sail on the return journey. Aegeus mounted to the top of the Acropolis, to a point where the little temple of Athena Nike later stood. Each day he scanned the horizon for a sail. When at last he saw the black sail from afar, he read in it a message of his son's death and hurled himself from the Acropolis, to his death in the vale below. The Latin writers say Aegeus hurled himself into the sea which henceforth bore his name. Theseus, returning safely, buried him and erected a shrine in his honor.

Aegia (ē-jī'ā) or Argia (ār-jī'ā). According to legend, a daughter of Adrastus, king of Argos. She and her sister had so many suitors Adrastus feared to give them in marriage to any of the young men lest he make enemies of the disappointed suitors. Upon consulting the oracle he was told to yoke his daughters in marriage to the boar and the lion that fought in his palace. He gave Aegia to Polynices of Thebes, who bore the device of a lion on his shield. She was the mother of Thersander.

Aegiae (ē'ji-ē). A town in Laconia, called Augiae by Homer. A temple of Poseidon with an image of the god was near a lake called "Poseidon's Lake." The people of Aegiae dared not fish in the waters of this lake because whoever fished in it was transformed into a fish called the fisher, a species that caught its prey with long feelers.

Aegialeus (ē-jī'ā-lūs). In Greek legend, a son of Adrastus and Demonassa. He was the only one of the Epigoni to be killed at the second expedition against Thebes, to avenge the original Seven against Thebes, all of whom were killed except Adrastus. According to a prophecy, Thebes would fall when all of the original Seven were dead. Adrastus, on learning of his son's death, died of grief and Thebes fell, thus fulfilling the prophecy.

Aegialia (ē''ji-ā-lī'ā) or Aegiale (ē-jī'ā-lē). Named by Homer (Iliad) as the daughter of Adrestus, king of Sicyon. While her husband Diomedes was away fighting in Troy she was persuaded by Nauplius, whose son had been put to death as a traitor by the Greeks, to believe that Diomedes had taken a Trojan concubine. She then took Cometes, son of Sthenelus, as her lover and when Diomedes returned from Troy she and her lover forced him to flee.

Aegialus (ē-jī'ā-lus) or Aegialea (ē''ji-ā-lē'ā). Original name of the ancient district of Achaea, in the Peloponnesus. According to tradition, the land was named Aegialus after Aegialeus, the son of the river-god Inachus and the nymph Melia.

Aegicores (ē-jī-kô'rēz). According to tradition, one of the four sons of Ion. One of the four ancient tribes of Athens was named for him. His brothers were Argades, Geleon, and Hoples.

Aegimius (ē-jim'i-us). According to tradition, a son of Dorus. He was a king of the Dorians. In a boundary dispute with Coronus, king of the Lapiths, Aegimius sought the aid of Heracles. In the war which followed, the Lapiths were defeated and their king was slain. Aegimius kept one-third of his kingdom, which he had promised to Heracles in return for his aid, in trust for the descendants of Heracles and later adopted Hyllus, the son of Heracles and Deianira.

Aegina (ē-jī'nā). In mythology, a daughter of the river-god Asopus and Metope. She was carried off by Zeus to Oenone, or Oenopia, an island in the Saronic Gulf which was subsequently renamed Aegina in her honor by Aeacus, the son she bore to Zeus.

Aegina. An island in SE Greece, in the Saronic Gulf, or the Gulf of Aegina. According to legend it was to this island, once known as Oenone or Oenopia, that Zeus brought Aegina, the daughter of the river-god Asopus. The island was renamed Aegina by Aeacus, the son of Aegina and Zeus, who became king of the island. Hera was infuriated when she learned that the island had been named in honor of one of her rivals. She sent a plague which poisoned the waters, and a hot south wind to parch the fields and pastures; the land was infested by serpents; animals collapsed and died; hopeless men relapsed into licentious behavior. At the end of four months Aeacus appealed to Zeus: if indeed Zeus was his father he should either lift the plague or let Aeacus die with his people. Zeus answered his prayer and the plague was ended, but Aegina had been nearly depopulated. Once again Zeus heeded the prayers of Aeacus: hordes of ants climbing the trunk of a sacred oak tree were transformed into men who became known as Myrmidons.

ATHENA

From the west pediment of the so-called Temple of Aphaea at Aegina, c510 B.C. Munich

Historically, Aegina was conquered and colonized in very ancient times by the Dorians, and it was an important Greek commercial state and center of art in the 6th and 5th centuries B.C. In 459 B.C. it was defeated for the first time by Athens, and some three decades later (431 B.C.) relegated to a position of comparative insignificance when the Athenians carried out a mass deportation of its population. The principal ancient remains are a late archaic (early 5th century B.C.) Doric temple of Aphaea, where the Aeginetan Marbles now in Munich were found, and scanty remains of a temple of Apollo. Aeginetan coins, bearing the image of a tortoise, were widely circulated in the Greek world and many Greek states adopted the Aeginetan standards of weights and measures.

Aegina, Gulf of. [Also: Saronic Gulf; Latin, Saronicus Sinus.] Arm of the Aegean Sea, lying SW of Attica and NE of Argolis, Greece. It contains the islands of Salamis and Aegina. Length, about 50 miles.

Aeginaea (ē-jī-nē'ā). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Goat-goddess." There was a sanctuary of Artemis Aeginaea at Taenarus.

Aeginetan Marbles (ej-i-nē'tan). Pediment sculptures and acroteria from the temple of Aphaea on the Greek island of Aegina, found in 1811 and now in the Glyptothek, Munich. Study of them is complicated by the fact that three sets of pediment sculptures survive, suggesting that perhaps one of the original sets was damaged and replaced. They were restored by the sculptor Thorwaldsen, who sawed off the broken stumps of limbs the more neatly to attach his restorations, with the result that when 20th-century excavators found additional fragments it proved impossible to refer them to their original positions. All three pediments show scenes of combat between Greeks and Trojans. They date from c510 B.C. and the period of 490–480 B.C. (JJ)

Aegiochus (ē-jī'ō-kus). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Aegis-bearing," from his goatskin aegis. Some say Zeus had this name in honor of the goat that suckled him in his infancy.

Aegipan (ē'ji-pan). In Greek mythology, a name sometimes used for the goatish god Pan. In some forms of the myth he is identified with Pan. He is variously called the son of Zeus and Aega, Pan's wife, and also the father of Pan. On one occasion together with Hermes he restored to Zeus the sinews taken from him by the giant Typhon.

Aegira (ē-jī'ra). Town on the coast of Achaea, named by Homer as Hyperesia. It was given the name Aegira (from aigos, goat) for the following reason: During a war with Sicyon the inhabitants of the town, knowing they were about to be invaded and that they were vastly outnumbered, gathered all the goats of the area together and tied torches on their horns. In the depths of the night they lighted the torches. The Sicyonians, seeing great numbers of blazing torches, thought that allies had come to help their enemy and withdrew. Henceforth the inhabitants called their town Aegira in honor of the goats, and where the handsomest goat, the leader, had crouched they raised a sanctuary of Artemis Agrotera (Huntress) in gratitude to the goddess for having inspired the trick that caused the Sicyonians to withdraw. In Aegira there was an oracle of Hera. Here the priestess drank bull's blood which was deadly poison to all other mortals but which was supposed to inspire the priestess of Hera with the gift of prophecy.

Aegis (ē'jis). The wondrous and terrifying breastplate of Zeus and Athena, sometimes loaned to Apollo. In the center of the breastplate was the head of the Gorgon Medusa, and in Homeric legend it is often spoken of as being encircled with flames.

Aegisthus (ē-jis'thus). In Greek legend, the son of Thyestes and Pelopia, his own daughter. As an infant he was exposed by his mother to die but was rescued by shepherds and brought up by Atreus, whom Pelopia had married, as his own son. When very young, he was ordered by Atreus to kill Thyestes as he slept, unaware that the latter was his true father. Thyestes escaped the blow and, recognizing the sword which Aegisthus had aimed at him as the one he had lost the night he ravished Pelopia, he asked Aegisthus where he had gotten it. When Aegisthus told him his mother had given it to him, Thyestes realized that this was indeed his son. He sent Aegisthus to fetch his mother, and when she came and learned that she was the mother of Aegisthus by her own father, she plunged the sword into her breast in horror. Thyestes next commanded Aegisthus to kill Atreus, king of Mycenae. Thyestes then became king and ruled until he was forced into exile by Atreus' son Agamemnon. Aegisthus fled from Mycenae at the same time but returned while Agamemnon and Menelaus were away at the Trojan War. To get revenge on the house of Atreus, because Atreus had served Aegisthus' brothers to Thyestes in a ghastly banquet and because Agamemnon had become king of Mycenae, he became Clytemnestra's paramour and plotted with her to kill her husband Agamemnon. When the latter returned from Troy he was welcomed by both Aegisthus and Clytemnestra, according to their plot. They prepared a banquet for him, and as he emerged from his bath, ready to enjoy the feast, he was struck down. According to some accounts it was Aegisthus who split his skull with a two-headed ax. According to other accounts Clytemnestra stabbed her husband. In the Odyssey Zeus complained of the wickedness of men citing Aegisthus' wickedness in wooing Clytemnestra and killing Agamemnon, in spite of the fact that he had been especially warned by Hermes not to do so. Clytemnestra and Aegisthus ruled in Mycenae for seven years after the death of Agamemnon. Clytemnestra was the real ruler while Aegisthus, on the whole a cowardly sort, lived in fear that her son Orestes would return to Mycenae, from which he had been sent before his father's death, and slay him. In the eighth year after the murder of Agamemnon Orestes did return and killed both Aegisthus and Clytemnestra, thus fulfilling the command of the oracle of Delphi and avenging his father's murder.

Aegium (ē'ji-um). [Modern name, Aiyion.] In ancient geography, a harbor town of Achaea, on the Gulf of Corinth. Men of Aegium went to the Trojan War under the command of Agamemnon. In later times the Achaean League met there, and the city was enlarged by absorbing the survivors of the earthquake and flood that destroyed the town of Helice.

Aegle (ēg'lē). In mythology, one of the Hesperides who guarded the Golden Apples. At the approach of the Argonauts she first became dust and earth, and then transformed herself into a willow tree. But when she learned the Argonauts were not hostile, she told them that Heracles the day before had slain the dragon that guarded the Golden Apples, and then told them where they could find a spring to quench their thirst after carrying the Argo for 12 days across the Libyan desert. See Hesperides.

Aegle. A naiad, sometimes said to have been the mother of the Charites (Graces) by Helius.

Aegle. In mythology, a daughter of Helius and the Oceanid Clymene. With her sisters she was one of the Heliades who was changed into a poplar tree that wept tears of amber because of grief over the death of their brother Phaëthon, who died driving the fiery chariot of Helius across the heavens to prove his divine parentage.

Aegleis (ēg-lē'is). A daughter of Hyacinthus the Spartan. See Hyacinthides.

Aegospotami (ē'gōs-pot'a-mī). [Also: Aegospotamos.] In ancient geography, a small river and a town in that part of ancient Thrace known as the Chersonesus Thracica (geographically identical with what is now called the Gallipoli Peninsula of Turkey in Europe). The area of the river's mouth is noted as the scene of the decisive naval victory of the Spartans under Lysander over the Athenians, in 405 B.C., which led to the close of the Peloponnesian War. The Athenians maintained that they were not honorably beaten in battle but had been betrayed by their commanders who they claimed had been bribed by Lysander. This was all in fulfillment of two oracles, they said. The oracles were:

"And then on the Athenians will be laid grievous troubles

By Zeus the high-thundered, whose might is the greatest,

On the war-ships battle and fighting,

As they are destroyed by treacherous tricks,
through the baseness of the captains."

And this oracle from the writings, so it was said, of Musaeus:

"For on the Athenians comes a wild rain Through the baseness of their leaders, but some consolation will there be

For the defeat; they shall not escape the notice of the city, but shall pay the penalty."

Nevertheless, the Athenian fleet was destroyed and but for the alert action of Conon, the commander in chief, against whom incidentally there was no accusation of having accepted a bribe, Athens herself would have been threatened. He knew that it was customary to remove the sails when the ships went into battle. He therefore, having escaped, swooped down on the Spartan ships and carried off their sails, so that they could not pursue him nor sail immediately against Athens.

Aegusa (ē-jō'sa) or Aethusa (ē-thō'sa). [Modern name, Favignana.]. Largest island of the Aegates, W of Sicily.

Aegyptus (ē-jip'tus). In classical myth, a son of Belus, king in Egypt, and Anchinoë, and the twin of Danaus. He became ruler of Arabia and conquered the land which, according to some accounts, he later named Egypt after himself. By various women he was the father of 50 sons, whom he wished to marry to the 50 daughters of his brother Danaus. Danaus refused his consent to the marriages and fled. Aegyptus sent his sons in pursuit of the Danaids with orders not to return without them. In Argos, whither Danaus and his daughters had fled, they ultimately compelled Danaus to give them his daughters, but all save one of the sons of Aegyptus were murdered on the wedding night. Aegyptus followed his sons to Argos, but when he learned of their murders he fled. He died and was buried in the Peloponnesus.

Aegyptus. The name which Homer used to indicate the Nile River.

Aegyptus. Latin name of Egypt.

Aelius Paetus (ē-li-us pē'tus), Sextus. Roman jurist; fl. 2nd century B.C. He was consul in 198 B.C., censor in 193. Author of the Tripartita (or Jus Aelianum) containing a recension of the Twelve Tables (450 B.C.) with commentary.

Aella (ā-el'a). In Greek legend, an Amazon. Her name, which means "Whirlwind," was given to her because she was so swift. She fought Heracles personally in his war against the Amazons and was slain by him.

Aello (ā-el'ō). In Greek mythology, one of the Harpies.

Aemilian Way (ē-mil'i-an). See Via Aemilia.

Aenaria (ē-nār'i-a). An ancient name of Ischia. See Pithecura.

Aeneades (ē-nē'a-dēz). A name meaning

"Descendant of Aeneas." It was applied especially to Ascanius and to the members of the Julian family of Rome, and was also applied to the Romans collectively.

Aeneas (ē-nē'ās). In classical myth, the son of Anchises and the goddess Aphrodite. Some say he was brought up for the first years of his life by the nymphs of Mount Ida in the Troad. Others say Alcatous, his sister's husband, reared him. Anchises, king of the Dardanians, was crippled by a thunderbolt from Zeus because he boasted of having lain with a goddess. Unable to rule his kingdom, he was succeeded by Aeneas. Some say Aeneas accompanied Paris when the latter went on his voyage to Sparta and abducted Helen. He did not immediately offer his aid when Troy was attacked by the Greeks to recover her. Some say he was on cool terms with his relative, King Priam of Troy, either because Priam did not accord him the honor Aeneas thought fitting, or because Priam feared fulfillment of the prophecy that Aeneas would rule the Trojans. However, in the ninth year of the war against Troy, when Achilles was raiding the surrounding country and sacking the cities in it, he made a raid on the cattle of Aeneas during which Aeneas barely escaped with his life. Thenceforth Aeneas allied himself and his Dardanians with the Trojans, and fought with great valor and skill. He was honored by the Trojans for his piety and his spirit. The gods protected him in battle because he was destined to found a new home for the Trojan race in Italy. In the course of the war, Diomedes flung a huge boulder at Aeneas and felled him, but Aphrodite swooped down to rescue her son. When she too was wounded by Diomedes, Apollo rescued Aeneas and bore him off to Pergamus where Leto healed him. He then returned to the battle and slew many of the enemy. At the attack on the Greek fortifications protecting their ships Aeneas was in the vanguard. Later, as the Trojans were being driven back in the struggle for the body of Patroclus, Apollo appeared to him in the guise of a herald and encouraged him to inspire the Trojans to new efforts. Again, encouraged by Apollo, he was the first to go out to meet Achilles, although his courage failed him at first as he remembered how

Achilles had driven him from Mount Ida and Lyrnessus when he sacked that town. But Apollo filled him with bravery and he pressed forward against Achilles. His spear, however, could not pierce Achilles' magic armor, and Aeneas found himself in deadly peril. To save him, Poseidon sent a mist to dim Achilles' eyes, then he spirited Aeneas away. Poseidon, who in all other respects favored the Greeks against the Trojans, saved Aeneas to preserve the line of Dardanus, from whom he had sprung, and because he pitied Aeneas, who was fighting another man's war. He promised Aeneas that no other Achæan would take his life and that he would live to fulfil his destiny. Aeneas rescued the body of the Lycian Glaucus when he was slain by Telamonian Ajax, and then was himself wounded by Ajax in the struggle for possession of Achilles' body. He withdrew into the city to nurse his wound. Later, Aeneas scorned the proposal of Polydamas to withdraw to the city and there to fight from the safety of its towers. He preferred, he said, death in the open, fighting bravely, to death like a trapped animal. As leader of the Trojans, Hector being dead, again and again Aeneas returned to the attack, aided by the gods. He slew many Greeks in engagements in which Penthesilea, Memnon, and Eurypylus, each of whom had come to help the Trojans, were killed. When Neoptolemus came to the aid of the Greeks, Thetis, out of respect for Aphrodite, prevented him from coming face to face with Aeneas. When Athena aided the Argives and they drove the Trojans back, Aphrodite snatched Aeneas away in a mist. But the bitter struggle was hopeless, and at last Zeus, though grieving, abandoned Troy to its long delayed fate. Various accounts are given of the fate of Aeneas in the sack of Troy. Some say he was captured by Neoptolemus, carried off to Greece as the most valuable of the spoils of the war and ultimately ransomed by the Dardanians. Others say he was spared by the Greeks because he had favored the return of Helen to Menelaus, and that he reigned, as did his descendants, in the Troad. Still others say he defended Troy bravely until the last then, seeing that the cause was to Mount Ida, taking his father, his son, the hopeless, retired with the aid of Aphrodite sacred images of Troy and a few followers with him. Later he went to Pellene (Pallene) in Thrace and died there, or in Orchomenus. The Romans say that after he retired to Mount Ida with his father, son, wife, and the sacred images (for they say Diomedes stole only a copy of the Palladium from the citadel of Troy), he fled from the Troad at the command of the gods and set out to found a new home for the Trojans in Italy. Having fulfilled his destiny, he fell in battle and was taken to heaven. His adventures in pursuing his destiny are described in Vergil's Aeneid (q.v.). In Homer, Aeneas is the greatest of the Trojans after Hector, a favorite of the gods, and a brave, reasonable, and pious man, whose piety and courage are leavened with a few human and endearing weaknesses. In the Aeneid the character of Aeneas suffers a great change; from a man of admirable but believably human traits, he becomes a symbol of the divinity which the Romans considered fitting in the founder of their nation. In the Aeneid, "pious Aeneas" is often insufferably conscious of his divine mission.

Aeneas Silvius (sil'vi-us). In Roman mythology, a king of Alba Longa. He was supposedly a direct descendant of Aeneas.

Aeneas Tacticus (tak'ti-kus). [The Tactician.] An Arcadian contemporary of Xenophon who flourished about 360 B.C. He had seen service in the Aegean and in Asia Minor and wrote on military tactics. In the fragment that has come down to us he explains how to conduct defensive warfare and how to resist a siege (Commentarius poliorceticus). This book, containing valuable historical information, was very probably composed in 357-356 B.C. The hydraulic telegraph which he invented was described by Polybius. Aeneas also explained a system of cryptography.

Aeneid (ē-nē'id). An epic poem in 12 books, by Vergil. It had been completed, but not corrected, at the time of Vergil's death in 19 B.C. The purpose of this national epic was to emphasize the divine origin of the Romans—as descendants of Venus through Aeneas—by portraying the historical background of the nation, and to glorify Augustus, who had suggested the theme to Vergil. In many passages the Aeneid obviously derives from the Iliad, but it holds its own as a classic through the beauty and grace of its language and the ingenuity of its literary devices in weaving actual history, legend, and mythology into a unified story. The plot of the Aeneid revolves around the continuing struggle of Aeneas, bitterly opposed by Juno, to reach his destined home in Italy after the Trojan War. According to Vergil, Juno's hatred was inspired by the insulting Judgment of Paris and her fear that Aeneas would raise up a nation that would destroy her beloved Carthage.

Book I: Juno harries Aeneas and his followers without mercy. In the seventh year of their wanderings a disastrous storm which she caused Aeolus to unleash, but which Neptune calmed, has driven Aeneas ashore near Carthage. Venus, mother of Aeneas, receives from Jove a renewal of his promise that Aeneas will found a great race in Italy. She appears to Aeneas in disguise and tells him to seek out Dido in whose kingdom he has landed. She then sends her son Cupid to take the place of Ascanius, son of Aeneas, so that he can practice his art on the unfortunate Dido, cause her to fall in love with Aeneas, and assure his safety as long as he remains in her realm. At a great feast Dido asks Aeneas to tell his story from the beginning.

Book II: Aeneas describes the end of the Trojan War. The Greeks had left a huge Wooden Horse on the beach before Troy, and Laocoön, a priest, suspected it and advised the Trojans not to accept it as a Greek offering. Just then Sinon, a captive, was brought forward. He said he was a Greek who had been persecuted by Ulysses, and that the Greeks had sailed for home and had left the Wooden Horse to propitiate Pallas Athena. When twin serpents glided out of the sea, seized Laocoön and his two sons in their mighty coils, and disappeared with them to the shrine of Pallas Athena, it was interpreted as a sign that the gods were angry at Laocoön for doubting the Wooden Horse. The Trojans immediately hauled it inside their walls. But Sinon was a spy sent by Ulysses. During the night he freed the Greeks hiding in the Horse. They opened the gates and the other Greeks swarmed into the city. Aeneas, warned in a dream by Hector, awoke to find the city in turmoil. He fought his way through the flames to Priam's palace and saw Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, kill Priam on his own altar. He found Helen hiding in the palace and would have killed her, but Venus appeared and stayed his hand. She urged him to leave Troy. As he fled, bearing his aged father on his back and holding Ascanius by the hand, his wife Creusa who was following got lost in the commotion. Her ghost later appeared to Aeneas and said that the gods did not intend for her to go with him. Heartbroken, he went to an appointed meeting place and found a number of people who had made up their minds to go into exile with him.

Book III: Aeneas built a fleet and sailed to Thrace, but he was warned by the ghost of a son of Priam not to settle there. At Delos, his next stop, the oracle told him to go to the land of his fathers. They sailed to Crete, but there the images of the gods of Troy told him in a dream that the oracle had meant Hesperia (Italy), where Dardanus, founder of the Trojan race, was born. Winds drove them to the Strophades, where they fought the Harpies and were warned by Celaeno that they would endure a famine that would compel them to devour their tables. On this gloomy note they proceeded along the coast of Greece to Buthrotum, where they found Andromache, Hector's wife, and Helenus, Hector's friend. They had settled on the Chaonian plains and had built a miniature Troy. Helenus prophesied that Aeneas would recognize his ultimate home as the spot where he found a white sow and 30 piglets, but that he would have troubles and wars beforehand. He warned Aeneas of places to avoid on his journey, urged him to be zealous in paying homage to Juno, and instructed him to consult the Cumaean sibyl in Italy. Through storm and hardship they made their way slowly around Italy and the coast of Sicily to Drepanum, where Anchises died. It was after this that the great storm inspired by Juno had driven them to Dido's kingdom.

Book IV: In the days following his arrival Dido, impelled by Venus and Cupid, falls desperately in love with Aeneas. Her sister Anna encourages her to stop mourning for Sychaeus, her murdered husband, and advises her that an alliance with Aeneas will strengthen her against her enemies. Juno and Venus, for different reasons, engineer a plot to throw Aeneas and Dido alone together and during the next winter their life is an open scandal. The story is spread throughout the land by Rumor who delights in tale-bearing. Jove sends Mercury to remind Aeneas that it is not so that he can dally with Dido that he has been saved from Troy. If he cares nothing for his own destiny, he should think of Ascanius, get on with his voyage and stop building a city to please a woman. Mercury finds Aeneas and delivers the message. Dido, made sensitive by her love, soon realizes that Aeneas is planning secretly to leave. She accuses him and he replies that he is compelled by the gods. When she sees that her love and her generosity cannot persuade him to stay, she tricks her sister into building a great funeral pyre. As Aeneas, warned again by Mercury, makes ready to sail, Dido places his armor on the funeral pyre. She calls for eternal enmity between her people and those of Aeneas to the last generation, then flings herself on his sword and dies in her sister's arms. Thus Vergil accounts for the hostility between Rome and Carthage in the Punic Wars.

Book V: The smoke from Dido's funeral pyre is the last sight Aeneas sees as he sails away. High winds then buffet his fleet and compel him to set a course for Sicily. There he is welcomed by the Trojan Acestes, who has established a kingdom near Mount Eryx. Aeneas holds funeral games in honor of Anchises, and as the boat race, foot race, boxing match, archery contests and cavalry maneuvers take place, Juno sends Iris to stir up the Trojan women. Iris, in the guise of a Trojan matron, reminds them of the ills they have endured and predicts worse to follow. She inspires them to set fire to the ships so that they can cease their endless voyaging. On discovering the fire, Aeneas prays to Jove and immediately a torrential rain smothers the flames. Aeneas is advised to leave with King Acestes those Trojans who are weary of wandering; he should repair the ships and proceed to Italy with those who still thirst for glory. Anchises' ghost instructs him to follow this advice and adds that Aeneas must visit Anchises in the Underworld to learn more of the future. In the heavens, Neptune promises Venus that he will give Aeneas calm seas to Cumae, asking in return that one life, in exchange for the safety of many, be given to him.

Book VI: At Cumae Aeneas visits the Sibyl and learns that he will successfully found a kingdom in Latium after bloody wars caused by marriage to a foreign bride. The Sibyl tells him he must find a Golden Bough—destined as a gift for Proserpina—if he wishes to visit Anchises in the Underworld. Led by a pair of doves, he discovers the Golden Bough in the woods and plucks it. He and the Sibyl then enter the Underworld through a cave at Avernus. In Hades he meets the fabulous monsters of mythology and sees the Tree of Dreams, images of War, pale Disease, and Sleep, brother of Death. Among those compelled to haunt the banks of the River of Death for a hundred years because they have not been properly buried, Aeneas recognizes Palinurus, his steersman, who had been lost at sea on the way to Cumae. His was the one life Neptune took in return for giving Aeneas calm seas. Charon ferries Aeneas and the Sibyl across the river, where they see Cerberus and the ghosts of infants and those who have been unjustly condemned. They see Minos, now a judge in the Underworld, and the unhappy souls who had died for love. Here is Dido, who refuses to answer to Aeneas' call and turns her back on him. Passing the entrance to Tartarus they see the courts of Rhadamanthys, a judge who metes out justice to those who had escaped punishment for their misdeeds in the upper world. This is the final home of the wicked and here are those who have offended the gods. In the Fields of the Blest Aeneas finds the shade of Anchises. His father foretells the future in definite detail, giving Aeneas the names of the rulers of Italy who will follow him, and describing the vast and peaceful empire that will belong to his descendants. When he has told him of the coming wars in Latium, he sends him away.

Book VII: The Trojans next sail to the mouth of the Tiber River and land in Latium. A meal is prepared and the hungry Trojans eat the flat cakes of meal on which their food was served, thus fulfilling Celaeno's prophecy that they would devour their tables. Aeneas sends messengers to the king, Latinus, who receives them kindly and informs them that his only daughter, Lavinia, is sought in marriage by Turnus, king of the Rutuli, but signs from Heaven warning Latinus to give his daughter to a stranger have held up this alliance. Latinus thinks that Aeneas must be that stranger. Juno, watching from Heaven, is enraged that Aeneas is about to achieve success in spite of her. She sends Alecto, a Fury, to delay the fulfillment of his destiny. Alecto first stirs up Amata, wife of King Latinus and a strong backer of Turnus, so that she foments a rebellion among the Latin women against Aeneas. Then Alecto taunts Turnus for tamely giving up Lavinia to Aeneas until, in a frenzy, he issues a call to arms. Finally Alecto causes Ascanius to kill a stag, unaware that it is a famous pet of the countryside. The aroused country folk seize clubs and stones to attack Ascanius and the war begins. Latinus, unable to restore order, blames Turnus, predicts an evil outcome, and gives up control of his government. The whole country is inflamed; men and their leaders flock from all Latium to join Turnus and drive the Trojans out.

Book VIII: Tiberinus, the god of the Tiber, now appears to Aeneas. He tells him he will find the white sow and 30 piglets, site of his future city, in an oak grove on the river bank and advises Aeneas to seek the aid of King Evander. Aeneas finds the sow, sacrifices her to Juno, and sets out for Evander, who had known Anchises and had promised to help Aeneas. Meanwhile, Venus reminds her husband Vulcan that he had once made arms for Achilles and asks him to make some for Aeneas. He agrees. Evander sends Aeneas to Tarchon, leader of the Etruscans. They are already clamoring for war against Turnus because he has refused to give them Mezentius, a tyrannical ruler whom they had driven out of their land and who had fled to Turnus. They will make enthusiastic allies, especially since a seer has told them they must await a foreign commander. In addition, Evander sends his only son Pallas to fight at Aeneas' side. That night Venus comes down from Heaven and presents

actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

Aeneas with the magic armor made by Vulcan.

Book IX: While Aeneas is away, Juno sends Iris to inform Turnus that this is an opportune time to attack and destroy the garrison that Aeneas has left behind in charge of Ascanius. Since the Trojans refuse to come out and fight on the plains when Turnus challenges them, he attacks their ships. These had been constructed of wood sacred to Cybele, and rather than see them destroyed by fire, she instantly transforms them into sea-goddesses, who swim away before the astounded gaze of Turnus. During the night, Nisus and Euryalus seek a way out of the besieged camp to go and warn Aeneas. They kill many of the sleeping enemy before they are discovered and slain. At daybreak, Turnus attacks again. Savage fighting ensues. Turnus gets inside the walls and kills many Trojans before the tide turns against him. He retreats and plunges into the river, whose waters buoy him up and return him to his friends.

Book X: Aeneas reaches Tarchon, makes a treaty with him, and sets off with a large number of Etruscan leaders and their men for his garrison. Cymodoce, one of his ships that had been changed into a sea-nymph, swims alongside his ship during the night, tells him what is happening at the encampment, then, to speed him back to his men, she gives his ship a mighty push and disappears. At daybreak Aeneas and his allies beach their ships at the garrison. Relentless fighting takes place. Evander's young son Pallas fights like a demon and kills many, but is finally slain by Turnus, who strips off the youth's armor and golden sword belt. Aeneas fights savagely to avenge the death of Pallas and to break the siege. Turnus is lured away from the danger by Juno, and Mezentius takes his place. He leads a counterattack against the Trojans. He meets Aeneas head on, is wounded, and is joined by his son Lausus, who saves his father's life at the cost of his own, for Aeneas kills Lausus. In pity for the brave youth, Aeneas does not strip him of his armor, but sends the fully armed body back to Mezentius. Mezentius is in a frenzy when he learns of his son's death. Death itself does not frighten him now that Lausus is dead. He calls for Aeneas, and after a furious struggle lies helpless, pinned beneath his fallen horse. He asks no mercy, offers his throat to Aeneas' sword and is killed.

Book XI: A truce is observed for the burial of the fallen. Aeneas declares he has no quarrel with the Latin people. He says his quarrel is with Turnus and challenges Turnus to meet him in single combat. Latinus calls a council, but his willingness to cede land to Aeneas and to make peace is scorned by Turnus, who calls for a renewal of the war. Camilla, a Volscian maiden skilled in cavalry warfare, is ordered to engage the Trojans on the plain while Turnus waits for Aeneas in a pass in the hills. In the battle on the plains Camilla is felled by a spear. Dying, she sends word to Turnus to come and defend the city. He leaves his ambush just before Aeneas arrives in the pass where he might have been cut off and destroyed. Instead, Aeneas and his men march safely forward and consolidate their position on the plain.

Book XII: Turnus still refuses to yield to Latinus' desire for peace. He agrees to fight Aeneas in single combat. Terms for the duel are arranged but Juno interferes and the truce is broken. Aeneas is treacherously wounded as he makes ready to fight Turnus. Fighting again breaks out. Juno sends Juturna, a deity and the sister of Turnus, to spirit him away from the fighting. In the meantime Aeneas, having been healed by Venus, decides to attack the city. He sets fire to the walls, and Amata, blaming herself for the war and despairing because she thinks Turnus is dead, hangs herself. Turnus sees the flames of the burning city, recognizes his sister and tells her to stop interfering. He wants to fight Aeneas and rushes to find him. Aeneas hurries to meet him. The soldiers lay down their arms as at last Turnus and Aeneas meet face to face. Jove watches the conflict from on high. He commands Juno to stop harrying Aeneas for he must fulfill his destiny. She agrees to desert Turnus on condition that the Trojan name and language be lost and that the race, name, and language of the Latins will prevail in Italy. In the battle between Aeneas and Turnus Aeneas gains the upper hand. Turnus, who knows he has been abandoned by the gods, is forced to his knees. Aeneas would have spared his life, but he catches sight of the sword belt Turnus had taken from young Pallas. This reminder of the loss of Pallas and all that he and his companions had suffered causes Aeneas to harden his heart. He plunges his sword into Turnus' breast. The death of Turnus ends the war with the Latins, and at last Aeneas can proceed with the founding of the Roman race and nation.

Aenesidemus (ē-nēs-i-dē'mus). Greek Skeptic philosopher, born at Cnossus on the island of Crete, and active in the 1st century B.C. He was notable for his teaching at Alexandria in Egypt, and was the author of Pyrhonian Principles and other works.

Aenius (ē'ni-us). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a Paeonian ally of the Trojans in the Trojan War. He was slain by Achilles when the latter was savagely avenging the death of Patroclus.

Aeolia (ē-ō'li-ā). The island home of Aeolus, the ruler of the winds. It was supposed to be one of the Lipari Islands which in ancient times were known as the Aeolian Islands.

Aeoliae Insulae (ē-ō'li-ē in'sū-lē). [Modern name, Lipari Islands.] Group of volcanic islands in the Tyrrhenian Sea, N of Sicily. The chief islands are Lipara, Strongyle, Didyme, Thermessa or Vulcania, and the small islands of Ericussa, Phoenicussa, and Euonymus or Hicesia. According to Greek legend, this was the island kingdom of Aeolus, keeper of the winds, and his wife Enarete. Lipara was said to be a floating island surrounded by a bronze wall. Its cliffs, rising sheer from the sea, confined the winds. When Aeolus, their master, wished to free one of the winds he pierced the side of the cliff and let it out; when he wished to stop the wind he stopped up the hole in the side of the cliff. According to tradition, in a war with the Etruscans the Liparaeans sent envoys to Delphi for advice. The priestess told them to engage the Etruscans with the smallest possible number of ships. The Liparaeans sent five ships against them. The Etruscans, not to be outdone in bravery, sent five ships to meet them. These were captured by the Liparaeans, as were succeeding groups of five Etruscan ships, and the Liparaeans were victorious. Accordingly, they dedicated as many statues to the god at Delphi as the number of Etruscan ships they had captured.

Aeolians (ē-ō'li-anz). [Also: Aeoles, Aeoli.] One of the four great divisions of the ancient Greeks (the Achaeans, Dorians, and Ionians were the other three).

Aeolides (ē-ō'li-dēz). Name applied to a son or descendant of Aeolus; it was applied particularly to Athamas, Idmon the Argonaut, Melampus, Minyas, and Phrixus.

Aeolis (ē'ō-lis). [Also: Aeolia.] In ancient geography, originally the W coast of Asia Minor between the river Hermus and Lectum, settled by Aeolians. Later it extended along Troas (the Aegean coastal territory in the vicinity of the ancient city of Troy).

Aeolus (ē'ō-lus, ē-ō'lus). In mythology, a son of Hellen and the nymph Orseïs, and a grandson of Deucalion and Pyrrha. He was the brother of Dorus and Xuthus, and succeeded his father as king of Magnesia in Thessaly. By Thea, a daughter of Chiron whom he seduced, he was the father of Arne and grandfather of the twins Aeolus and Boeotus; the former became keeper of the winds. He bequeathed part of his kingdom to his grandson Boeotus who became the ancestor of the Boeotians. By his wife Enarete, Aeolus had seven sons: Athamas, Cretheus, Deion, Magnes, Perieres, Salmoneus, and Sisyphus, and five daughters: Alcyone, Calyce, Canace, Pisidice, and Perimedes.

Aeolus. In mythology, a son of Poseidon and Arne, daughter of Aeolus, king of Magnesia in Thessaly. He and his twin brother, Boeotus, were exposed to die on Mount Pelion at the order of their mother's foster father. They were saved by a shepherd and handed over to Theano, the childless wife of Metapontus, king of Icaria. She presented them to her husband as her own children. Metapontus was delighted with them, thinking they were his own sons. Even when his wife later bore twins of her own, he preferred Aeolus and Boeotus. Grown, the twins frustrated a plot arranged by Theano in which they were to be killed by their foster brothers. Instead Aeolus and Boeotus killed Theano's sons with the aid of their father, Poseidon. They then fled. Poseidon came to them and revealed that he was their father and told them to free their mother, who had been imprisoned since their birth by her foster father. They freed Arne, who married Metapontus, Theano having killed herself, but after a time Metapontus put her aside in favor of a new wife. Aeolus and Boeotus took their mother's part and killed the new wife, after which they fled. Aeolus and some companions sailed to the Tyrrhenian Sea and there they established a kingdom on an island, usually thought to be one of the Aeoliae Insulae (Lipari Islands). He was on friendly terms with the gods and was entrusted with the task of guarding and controlling the winds. These were locked behind the sheer cliffs of the island. When he wanted to release any of the winds, he pierced the side of the cliff with his spear and the wind streamed through the opening. To shut off the wind he simply stopped the hole. Aeolus and his wife, whom some call Enarete, had six sons and six daughters. They all lived in great happiness and prosperity on their island until Aeolus discovered that his six sons and daughters had formed incestuous unions, unaware that such marriages were frowned upon by the gods. He broke up these combinations by requesting some of his sons to emigrate. Odysseus visited Aeolus on his wanderings at the end of the Trojan War, and was royally entertained. Aeolus gave him a skin in which all the winds were confined to help him on his journey home. The ship was in sight of Ithaca when his comrades, while Odysseus slept, thinking that the skin Aeolus had given him contained a rich treasure, opened it to take their share. All the winds flew out and raised a great storm. Odysseus was blown to sea again. He revisited Aeolus and told him what had happened. But Aeolus would not help him again, on the ground that a man who had such bad luck must be hated by the gods, and therefore there was nothing he could do to help such a man. (In the Aeneid, at Juno's behest, Aeolus sent winds to raise a storm at sea in an attempt to destroy Aeneas and his ships but the plan was thwarted by Neptune.) Aeolus fulfilled his duties as guardian of the winds so capably that Zeus did not permit him to die, but placed him on a throne in the Cave of the Winds where he continues to perform his duties faithfully.

Aepea (ē-pē'a). City on the Gulf of Messenia, in Messenia. It was one of the seven gift cities offered by Agamemnon to Achilles if he would give up his quarrel with Agamemnon and return to the battle in the Trojan War. Its name was later changed to Corone (q.v.).

Aepy (ē'pi). In ancient geography, a town in Nestor's realm in Elis. According to Herodotus, it was one of six cities founded by the Minyans who had come to Laconia from the island of Lemnos but who fled to this region and settled, to escape the threats of the Laconians. Men of Aepy accompanied Nestor to the Trojan War. The town, which was also called Aepium, Epium, or Epeum, was ultimately taken over by the Eleans and demolished. Among its ruins are remains of a theater and several temples.

Aepyus (ē'pi-tus). In mythology, a son of Elatus. He reared Evadne, daughter of the nymph Pitana and Poseidon. Although she tried to hide it from him, Aepyus knew that Evadne was about to bear a child. He consulted the oracle at Delphi and was reassured that the child, Iamus, was destined to become a famous seer.

Aepyus. According to legend, a son of Merope and Cresphontes, and the grandson of Heracles. Cresphontes, king of Messenia, and two of his sons were murdered in a rebellion. His mother sent Aepyus away to Arcadia for safe-keeping. Polyphontes seized the throne and married Merope, unaware that her third son was still alive. When Aepyus grew up he returned to Messenia. His mother mistook him for the murderer of Aepyus and would have killed him but he revealed his real identity to her and together they murdered Polyphontes. Aepyus then took the throne. The tomb of Aepyus was said to be in Arcadia.

Aepyus. A king of Arcadia and a descendant of Stymphalus. It is said that he entered the sanctuary of Poseidon at Mount Alesium near Mantinea, forbidden to mortals, and that he was struck blind for his presumption and shortly afterward died. Aepyus was the father of Cypselus who succeeded him as king of Arcadia.

Aequi (ē'kwī). Warlike tribe of Latium, neighbors of the Volscians and Latins. They joined Turnus in his war against Aeneas. In historic times they were often allied with the

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, Volscians and at war with the Romans. They were subdued at the end of the Second Samnite war in 304 B.C.

Aero (ē'rō). Another name for Merope, daughter of Oenopion, king of Chios. See Merope.

Aërope (ā-er'ō-pē). In Greek legend, the daughter of Catreus, king of Crete. Because her father had been told by an oracle that he would be killed by one of his own children, he sold Aërope and her sister Clymene as slaves to Nauplius. Aërope became the mother of Agamemnon, Menelaus and Anaxibia; according to some accounts Plisthenes was their father. According to other accounts, Atreus whom she married, was their father; in any case they were brought up as his own children. Aërope fell in love with Thyestes, Atreus' brother, and on learning of her unfaithfulness Atreus cast her into the sea.

Aërope. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cepheus, king of Tegea. Heracles sought the aid of Cepheus in his war to punish the sons of Hippocoön. To protect the city against attack while Cepheus was assisting him, Heracles gave Aërope a lock of the hair of the Gorgon Medusa which Athena had given to him, telling her if the city was attacked she should exhibit the lock of hair three times from the city walls and this would cause any enemy to flee.

Aesacus (ē'sā-kus). In classical myth, one of the 50 sons of Priam, king of Troy. His mother was Arisbe, the daughter of Merops the seer. After the birth of Aesacus Priam gave Arisbe to Hyrtacus for a wife, and Priam married Hecuba. From his grandfather Aesacus learned the art of prophecy. Hecuba, about to bear Paris, dreamed that she produced flames and fiery serpents, and awoke in terror under the impression that Troy was in flames. Aesacus interpreted the dream to mean that the child she was about to bear would bring ruin to the city and must be destroyed. The day Paris was actually born Aesacus again prophesied, saying that the son born to the royal house of Troy that day must be done away with. But Priam and Hecuba did not apply the prophecy to their own child, but to another princeling of Troy who was also born that day. Aesacus withdrew to the country where he fell desperately in love with Asterope, or Hesperie, a daughter of the river-god Cebren. She did not return his love immediately and fled from his ardent embraces. As he pursued her she stepped on a serpent, was bitten by it, and died. Aesacus, in a torment of remorse and grief, sought to kill himself by leaping into the sea but Thetis transformed him into a bird, and he continues to dive savagely into the sea in an attempt to destroy himself.

Aeschines (es'ki-nēz). Athenian philosopher who was active in the first half of the 4th century B.C. He became a disciple of Socrates and, like his master, tried to live without money, his few needs being supplied by gifts from his friends and pupils. After the death of Socrates he went to the court of Dionysius of Syracuse. Later he returned to Athens and supported himself by composing dialogues admired for their faithful descriptions of Socrates.

Aeschines. ["The Orator."] Athenian orator. He was born in 389 B.C., and died on the island of Samos in 314 B.C. He was a cultivated man of good family, but war had destroyed his family's fortunes and he was compelled to work. He was for a time an actor and then, through his association with Athenian statesmen, secured a post as a clerk in the public service. He yoked the legal training he received in the public service with his talents as an actor and became a public speaker and a political figure. He was one of ten commissioners sent to make peace with Philip of Macedon (346 B.C.). Demosthenes, also one of the commissioners, alone refused to accept the peace terms which he rightly considered dangerous to Athens and accused Aeschines of treason (345 B.C.). He defended himself of the charge in a brilliant speech and was acquitted. Subsequently he was again compelled to defend himself when Demosthenes, who had become his enemy, charged that he had accepted bribes from Philip of Macedon. In the end, his enmity for Demosthenes brought his downfall. He made a speech, Against Ctesiphon (330 B.C.) but really aimed at Demosthenes, charging that Ctesiphon had acted illegally in proposing a golden crown for Demosthenes. Demosthenes counterattacked strongly and brought suit against him in a speech, On the Crown. Aeschines lost the case, was compelled to pay a fine, and went into voluntary exile at Rhodes. From there he went to Samos, where he subsequently died. Three of his orations, Against Timarchus (an ally of Demosthenes who had joined him in the attack on Aeschines in 345 B.C.), On the False Embassy (a reply to an oration of the same name which Demosthenes made against him, 342 B.C.), and Against Ctesiphon, survive. The force and grace of the orations of Aeschines caused him to be ranked next after Demosthenes among the orators of his period.

Aeschines the Orator. Greek statue from Herculaneum, in the National Museum at Naples, of high rank among works of its class. The orator stands quietly, his arm wrapped in his mantle; the expression is pre-occupied but full of dignity.

Aeschylus (es'ki-lus). Athenian tragic dramatist. He was born at Eleusis, 525 B.C., the son of Euphorion, a member of the old nobility. In 490 B.C. he took part with his countrymen at the Battle of Marathon, in which his brother lost his life. To judge by his own epitaph which he wrote, this was the greatest moment of Aeschylus' life. The epitaph simply gives his name and lineage and adds the brief and proud comment, "His might the sacred grove of Marathon has witnessed, and the deep-tressed Mede has known." There is no mention of his life work as a tragic poet. Again with the Athenians, he retired to Salamis (480 B.C.) and took part in the great sea battle in which the Greeks defeated the Persians. Some say he fought also at Plataea and in Thrace. He made at least two visits to Sicily. On his first visit he wrote a play, Women of Aetna, honoring the town of Aetna that had only recently been founded (476-475 B.C.) on the slopes of that mountain. The play has been lost. About 456 B.C. he again went to Sicily. He died in that year, at Gela; some say an eagle flying overhead dropped a tortoise on his skull and killed him. The Gelans erected a splendid monument in his honor. Later, on the motion of Lycurgus the orator, the Athenians set a bronze statue of him in the theater. Euphorion, the son of Aeschylus, was also known as a tragic poet, as were several others of his descendants.

Aeschylus began to write in his youth, appearing as a rival of Pratinas and Choerilus.

Some date his first presentation in the year 499 B.C. He entered the annual Athenian competition of tragic drama more than 20 times, and won first prize 13 times. He won first prize in 484 B.C., and from that time forward was recognized as the leading figure in Attic drama. In 468 B.C. Sophocles took the first prize but the following year Aeschylus again won. He has been called the father of Greek drama and the first tragedian. To the choral lyric in honor of Dionysus which had existed up to his time and which consisted only of a chorus and leader, he added a second actor and thereby supplied the action and reaction between characters which is the essence of drama. He also designed costumes for his players, introduced stage settings and stage machinery, drilled his choruses in their songs and dances, invented dance figures, and took part in his own dramas, as was the custom. However valuable his innovations were, they were additions to an existing structure. But the addition of the second actor completely changed the shape of that structure and produced drama where before there had been only choral lyrics. The technique is of tremendous significance, but it is his approach to life of lofty, universal and compelling interest, all expressed in language of surpassing beauty, that has kept his work alive for nearly 2500 years. After his death a special law was passed governing the presentation of his works; by a decree of the people a chorus was granted for every performance; and he was awarded the prize as if he had been still living. By the time of Plato (428-348 B.C.) his work was numbered among the classics and has remained so since.

Aeschylus wrote approximately 90 plays. The titles of 82 are known; seven survive in their entirety, and others are known from papyrus fragments and quotations in later writings. Critics date The Suppliant Maidens as the earliest of the extant plays, because of its simple, archaic structure and because of the importance of the chorus. This concerns the 50 daughters of Danaus who fled from Egypt to escape marriage with their cousins, the sons of Aegyptus. They seek asylum with Pelasgus, king of Argos. Pelasgus, knowing it would bring war with the sons of Aegyptus, will not take the responsibility of sheltering them without consulting his people. The Argives vote to accept the suppliants and to defy the herald sent to demand their return. The maidens offer prayers of gratitude to Zeus and ask blessings on the people of Argos. However, they also vow to remain virgins, and lay the basis for future woes by thus offending Aphrodite. The Suppliant Maidens was followed by two other plays, now lost. They were: The Maker of the Bride Bed, in which Danaus, having been defeated by the sons of Aegyptus and compelled to deliver his daughters to them, orders his daughters to murder their husbands on the wedding night; and Danaides, about the one daughter Hypermnestra who defied her father's order and spared her husband. She was tried for defying him, defended by Aphrodite and acquitted. The earliest play of known date is The Persians (472 B.C.). It takes place in the Persian capital and is concerned with the defeat of the forces of Xerxes at Salamis. This is the first account by a great poet of a great historical event in which the poet himself had taken part. It memorializes the epic achievement of the Greeks in throwing back the vast host of the Persians, and it illustrates the thesis that the gods punish impiety. In 467 B.C. Aeschylus won the prize with his trilogy on Thebes. The first play was Laius, the second was Oedipus, the third—the only surviving one of the three—is Seven Against Thebes. It concerns the siege of Thebes, in which the two sons of Oedipus, fighting on opposite sides, kill each other and carry out the curse laid on them by their father, and it brings to an end the horrors of the house of Laius which began when Laius defied the gods. Some time after this came the Promethean trilogy, of which only the Prometheus Bound is extant. The other two were Prometheus Unbound, which obviously follows, and Prometheus the Fire-Bearer, which some name as the first of the trilogy and some as the last. In Prometheus Bound Prometheus appears as the unconquerable spirit, and as the champion of man as opposed to the tyranny of the new lord of the universe, Zeus. The scene of the drama lies in the furthest reaches of mythological time; all the actors (there were only two but one actor could take more than one part) and the chorus are immortals. In the drama Aeschylus set himself a formidable obstacle by keeping his protagonist completely immobilized and on the stage throughout. What action there is lies with the second actor who comes to plead with Prometheus to be expedient (Oceanus) or to threaten him for defying Zeus (Hermes), and in the chorus which comes to offer sympathy, fears his intransigence, but elects to share his fate. The chorus of Prometheus Bound "is perhaps in character and dramatic fitness the most beautiful and satisfying known to us on the Greek stage." (Gilbert Murray.) Aeschylus won his last victory (458 B.C.) with the great Oresteian trilogy, his own highest achievement and perhaps the greatest achievement of all Greek drama. The trilogy includes Agamemnon, on his murder, when he returns from Troy, by his wife Clytemnestra who had been grievously sinned against and in her turn sins grievously. Among other things, Agamemnon is marked by stunning psychological insight in the counterpoint provided by the characters of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. Second in the trilogy is the Choëphoroe, named for the chorus, which recounts the terrible dilemma of Orestes, son of Agamemnon, called on by Apollo to avenge his father by killing his mother, and thus outraging one of the most sacred laws of the Greeks and bringing on him the terrible persecution of the Furies. The trilogy ends with the Eumenides, which brings a halt to the endless involvement of the house of Atreus in blood guilt, and substitutes courts of law for vengeance. In the trilogy Aeschylus offers the view that it is not capricious fate that causes disaster, but the deeds of men. In the Oresteia every human act, stretching back to the time of Thyestes and Atreus, produces a new act of horror until at last, in the Eumenides, reconciliation between the blind avenging Furies and a rule of law is achieved through the divine will (Athena). This view—that previous acts and conditions and not irresistible fate bring suffering—appears often enough in the work of Aeschylus to be taken as a part of his basic approach to life. The trilogy taken as a whole also presents a clear example of one of the essential principles of Greek art, a principle which appears to a lesser degree actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; $\tau\eta\eta$, then; δ as d or j, ς as s or sh, τ as t or ch, ζ as z or zh.

in each of its individual parts; this is: to loosen the tension at the close. The "pity and terror" of the first two plays are maintained almost to the very last line. The Eumenides drifts to a relaxed and artistic close. By modern standards it collapses; for the Greeks a release from the high pitch of horror in the first two plays was considered a desirable necessity.

From his work it appears that Aeschylus was an enthusiastic theoretical democrat, using the last word as it would have been applied in his time. The principles of law and justice which appear in such grandeur in his plays express his own search for a law and a morality in the universe. That he conceived of a law of sublime wisdom and reason is apparent in his religious piety, which seems to question the idea of "gods" but to accept the idea of "god." His plays were based on cycles of myths, or woven of unrelated myths and legends. The gods appear in them with the greatest ease and frequency, but seldom in the role of "deus ex machina" to help the playwright out of a predicament that could be solved only by the help of the gods. Though they appear often, the role the gods play is subordinate to the suffering and epic struggle of man. Aeschylus seemed to see life as an exhilarating and terrible struggle against superior forces; a struggle that inevitably arises when a mighty will is aroused to action by intellect, emotion, or passion. The struggle, a noble one, causes suffering, whence comes wisdom.

Aesculapius (es-kū-lā'pi-us). See Asclepius.

Aeson (ē'son). In Greek legend, a son of Tyro and Cretheus, founder and king of Iolcus. He was the half-brother of Pelias and Neleus, Tyro's twin sons by Poseidon. After the death of Cretheus Pelias seized the throne of Iolcus and kept Aeson, the rightful heir, a prisoner. Aeson had a son by his wife who is variously known as Perimede, Amphinome, Alcimede, and Polymede. The child, who was first named Diomedes but is known as Jason, was brought up by Chiron the centaur on Mount Pelion. Aeson was still a virtual prisoner of Pelias when Jason arrived in Iolcus and claimed the throne. After Jason had departed on the quest for the Golden Fleece, Pelias believed that he would not return. He threatened to kill Aeson but allowed him to commit suicide by drinking bull's blood, which only the immortals could imbibe and survive. But some say Aeson did not commit suicide, that he still lived, an aged and broken man, when Jason returned from Colchis; and that Medea restored his youth with her magic arts learned from Hecate.

Aesonis (ē-sō'nis). A city of Magnesia, named for Aeson, the father of Jason. It was the home of Pelias.

Aesop (ē'sop). [Also: Esop.] According to tradition, a Greek fabulist of the 6th century B.C., represented as a dwarf and originally a slave. Samos and other places claimed the honor of being his birthplace. After obtaining his freedom, he visited Lydia and Greece. Of the so-called fables of Aesop there have been several editions, but they are all considered to be spurious. Indeed, Aesop was probably not an actual historical personage. Several of the fables which he is popularly supposed to have written have been traced to sources which considerably antedate his own alleged period of life; some, in fact, may be found in Egyptian materials dating from approximately the 14th century B.C. He was represented in later art as deformed, "perhaps to indicate his nearer approach to the lower animals and his peculiar sympathy for their habits."

Aeseopus (ē-sē'pus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Abarbarea, a fountain nymph, and Bucolion, and the twin of Pedasus. The brothers were slain by Euryalus in the Trojan War.

Aeseopus. A river of Mysia, passed by the Argonauts on their way to Colchis. Homer names it as one of the rivers of the Troad which was diverted from its course by Poseidon and Apollo and directed against the wall built by the Greeks to protect their ships during the Trojan War. After the war was over, Poseidon and Apollo with the help of Zeus sent the rivers against the wall and washed it into the sea. See Rhesus, river.

Aesernia (ē-sēr'ni-a). [Modern name, Isernia.] Town of SE Italy, situated on a tributary of the Volturnus River. It became a Roman colony in 265 B.C., and was conquered by Sulla in the Roman civil war (80 B.C.).

Aesyetes (ē-si-ē'tēz). Named by Homer (Iliad), as the father of Antenor. His grave-mound outside the walls of Troy was used as a lookout post by Polites, a Trojan sentinel and a son of Priam.

Aethalia (ē-thal'i-a). [Modern name, Elba.]

An island off the coast of northern Italy where the Argonauts stopped briefly on their roundabout journey home from Colchis.

Aethalides (ē-thal'i-dēz). In Greek legend, a son of Hermes by Eupolemeia, daughter of Myrmidon. He was born near the Amphrysus River in Thessaly. He joined Jason in the quest for the Golden Fleece, and served as herald of the Argonauts. Aethalides was given two remarkable gifts by his father: the ability to live either in the Underworld or on earth, and an infallible memory. Since he could remember everything, even in the Underworld, his soul remembered, even after death, that it had migrated from Aethalides to Euphorbus, to one Hermotimus, and then to the philosopher and mathematician Pythagoras.

Aether (ē-thēr). In Greek mythology, the son of Chaos and Darkness, and the brother of Night, Day, and Erebus; in the Orphic hymns, the soul of the world and source of life; later, the expanse of heaven or abode of the gods.

Aetheria (ē-ther'i-a). In mythology, a daughter of Helius and the Oceanid Clymene. With her sisters she was one of the Heliades, and like them she was changed into a poplar tree that wept tears of amber because of her grief over the death of her brother Phaëthon, who died driving the chariot of Helius across the heavens to prove his divine parentage.

Aethiopis (ē-thi'ō-pis). [Also: Lay of Aethiopia.] Greek epic poem of the Trojan cycle (by Arctinus of Miletus, the oldest [c776 B.C.] certainly known epic poet), so named from one of its heroes, Memnon the Aethiopian. It was a continuation of the Iliad, reaching "from the death of Hector to that of Achilles, and telling of the arrival of the Amazons and the Aethiopians to aid Troy."

Aëthlius (ā-eth'li-us). According to some accounts, a son of Hermes and the father, by Calyce, of Endymion. Others say he was a son of Zeus and Protogenia, the daughter of Deucalion. He was the first to rule in the land later known as Elis.

Aethra (ēth'ra). In Greek legend, a daughter of Pittheus, king of Troezen. She was the mother, by Aegeus, of Theseus. She cared for Helen when the latter was abducted as a child by Theseus, returned with her when she was rescued by the Dioscuri, and later went with her as a captive when Helen was carried off to Troy by Paris. In Troy she reared her great-grandson Munitus, and fled with him to the Greek camp when Troy fell. Her grandson, Acamas, recognized her and demanded of Agamemnon that he be allowed to take her home to Greece. Agamemnon agreed, but stipulated that in return Acamas should forego any other spoils of war.

Aethra. In mythology, one of the Oceanids, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She was the mother, by Atlas, of many daughters and one son, Hyas. Seven of the sisters died of grief over the death of their brother and were translated to the heavens where they became known as the Hyades, the rain stars.

Aethyia (ē-thwī'a). An epithet of Athena, meaning "Gannet" or "Diver-bird." Pandion of Athens was buried on the Rock of Athena Aethyia at Megara.

Aethylla (ē-thil'a). According to some accounts, a sister of King Priam of Troy. Some say that she was captured at Troy and carried off by Protesilaus who, according to this account, was not the first man killed at Troy, but on the contrary, survived the war. Aethylla and other Trojan women captives set fire to the ships in which they were carried from Troy when the fleet put in at a harbor. Some say the spot where the women burned the ships was at Pellene, in the Thracian Chersonese (Macedonia), and that Protesilaus founded the city of Scione on this site since he could proceed no farther without his ships. But others say it was the followers of Protesilaus, driven hither by storms on the way home from Troy, who founded the city. And still others say the ships were burned by the Trojan women in Italy, and that Protesilaus had nothing to do with their capture.

Aëtion (ā-ē'shi-on). Greek painter, mid-4th century B.C., probably a contemporary of Apelles. He is noted for his painting The Marriage of Alexander and Roxana.

Aetna (et'nä). A nymph of Sicily. Some say she was a daughter of Uranus and Gaea; others say Briareus was her father. In a dispute between Hephaestus and Demeter for control of Sicily, Aetna, according to some accounts, was the arbitrator. By Zeus or by Hephaestus she was the mother of the Palici. The volcanic mountain in Sicily was named for her. Some say that Hephaestus had one of his forges under this mountain, and that it was in this forge that the Cyclopes made the thunderbolts for Zeus. The mountain also figures in the stories of Enceladus the Giant, who was buried under it after he had been charred by the lightning of Zeus. They say that when Enceladus turns over to ease his aching sides, all Sicily quakes and rumbles. Typhon, the hideous monster who warred against Zeus and was defeated by him, is also buried under Mount Aetna. On the slope of the mountain, Hiero, tyrant of Syracuse, founded a city which he named Aetna (c476 B.C.).

Aetolia (ē-tō'li-ā). [Also: Aitolia.] In ancient geography, a district of Greece, bounded by Epirus and Thessaly on the N, Doris on the NE, Locris on the E and SE, the Corinthian Gulf on the S, and Acarnania on the W. According to tradition, it was the land of the Curetes but was invaded from the Peloponnesus by Aetolus, a son of Endymion, and renamed for him.

Aetolian League (ē-tō'li-ān). Confederation of Greek cities whose organization was copied from that of the Achaean League. It waged war against Macedon in 323 B.C., against the Gauls in 279 B.C., and against the Achaean League in 220 B.C. In the period 211-192 B.C. it was allied with Rome. It was dissolved in 167 B.C.

Aetolus (ē'tō-lus). In mythology, one of the sons of Endymion. He competed with his brothers for the throne of Elis, his father's kingdom, but lost. In the course of funeral games for Azan, son of Arcas, the first ever held in Greece according to some accounts, he accidentally killed Apis, the son of Phoroneus. He was banished and crossed the Gulf of Corinth to the land of the Curetes. There he killed his hosts, Dorus, Laodocus, and Polypoetes, the sons of Apollo and Phthia, and made himself ruler. He named the land Aetolia after himself. He married Pronoë, a daughter of Phorbas, who bore him two sons. Two cities he founded in Aetolia were named Pleuron and Calydon after these two sons.

Afranius (a-frā'ni-us), Lucius. Roman comic poet, active c100 B.C. He was an imitator of the Greek Menander. Extant fragments of his work, 40 titles of which survive, indicate that he dealt, like Menander, chiefly with middle-class life.

Afranius, Lucius. Roman general, died in Africa, 46 B.C. He was an adherent of Pompey who assisted him to become consul (60), he was defeated by Caesar at Ilerda, Spain, in 49 B.C. Despite a promise not to serve thereafter against Caesar, he joined Pompey's forces and was present at the defeats of Pompey at Pharsalus (48 B.C.) and Thapsus (46 B.C.). He was captured in the last-named battle and taken to Caesar, whose soldiers thereupon put him to death.

Africa (af'ri-kā). In ancient geography, the designation for either the entire continent, or for that portion of the northern coastal area along the Mediterranean comprising the Roman province of Africa, approximately coterminous with modern Tunisia. To the Greeks the continent was known as Libya. (JJ)

African War. Name sometimes applied to the war between Julius Caesar and the followers of Pompey who had collected in the Roman province of Africa after the defeat at Pharsalus in Greece, in 48 B.C., and were overthrown at Thapsus in 46 B.C.

Agacles (ag'a-klēz). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a king of the Myrmidons in Budeum. He was the father of Epigeus, a follower of Achilles.

Agamede (ag-a-mē'dē). In mythology, a daughter of Augeas, king in Elis and the owner of the famous stables. According to Homer she knew all the herbs that grew on the earth, and was skilled in the arts of using them for healing. Her husband, Mulius, was slain by Nestor when Augeas warred with Neleus, Nestor's father.

Agamedes (ag-a-mē'dēz). In mythology, a son of Erginus the Argonaut. He was the brother of Trophonius. The brothers were born in their father's old age, after he had taken the advice of an oracle and married a young wife. They were famous builders. With his brother Agamedes built the temple of Apollo at Delphi and the brothers were guardian spirits of its threshold until they were replaced by Neoptolemus. They also built a treasury for King Hyrieus of Boeotia.

In it they so placed a stone that it could be removed from the outside and thus they were able to rob the treasury at will. According to some accounts, Hyrieus arranged a trap and caught Agamedes stealing in this manner. Trophonius cut off his brother's head in order to save himself. The gods were angry with Trophonius and swallowed him up in the earth in a grove at Lebadia. The oracle of Trophonius at Lebadia thereafter became famous, and suppliants there, before entering the pit where the oracle gave answers, ate of a ram that had been sacrificed to the shade of Agamedes. According to other accounts, as a reward for building the temple of Apollo at Delphi the god granted them seven days of pleasure, at the end of that time they received their reward: they went peacefully to sleep and died.

Agamemnon (ag-a-mem'non). In Greek mythology, the son of Atreus and Aërope and the brother of Menelaus and Anaxibia. Following the murder of their father by Aegisthus, Agamemnon and Menelaus remained at the court of Oeneus, a king in Aetolia, until they were restored to their own kingdom by Tyndareus, king of Sparta. Agamemnon became king of Mycenae and, making war on Tantalus, king of Pisa, slew him and his infant, and compelled his widow to marry him. She was Clytemnestra, a daughter of Tyndareus, and she bore Agamemnon Orestes, Electra (sometimes known as Laodice), Iphigenia (sometimes known as Iphianassa), and Chrysothemis. When Paris abducted Helen, Menelaus reminded the Grecian princes who had been her suitors of their oath to assist whomever she married in case any ill came to him as a result of the marriage. A great expedition was organized to go to Troy and recapture Helen. Agamemnon, brave but vain and eager for glory, yearned to be made leader of the expedition, although he pretended with a great show of humility that he did not seek the honor. As he had planned, however, he was chosen captain of the Greek armies which gathered to go to Troy. The Greek fleet, assembled at Aulis, was prevented from sailing by violent storms or, according to another account, by a calm. Calchas the seer said that the storms were caused by the anger of Artemis, because Agamemnon had killed a stag, one of her creatures. Only the sacrifice of Agamemnon's daughter would appease the goddess and quiet the storms. Urged on by Menelaus, Agamemnon sent a message to Clytemnestra, telling her to send their daughter Iphigenia to Aulis to be married to Achilles. This scheme had been hatched by Odysseus to make sure that Clytemnestra would send Iphigenia. Agamemnon regretted his decision to sacrifice his own child and would have changed his order, in spite of his overwhelming desire to be the leader of the glorious expedition, but he was persuaded that events had moved too fast: the armies knew of Calchas' interpretations and demanded the sacrifice so that they could proceed. Menelaus taunted him with seeking power and glory but being unwilling to take the responsibilities that went with them if personal sacrifice was involved. When Iphigenia arrived, unexpectedly accompanied by Clytemnestra, the sacrifice was performed, despite the latter's pleas and Agamemnon's own misgivings. The fleet then sailed.

For nearly ten years the Greeks raided the allies of Troy and the cities of the Troad. In the tenth year they attacked the city itself, but were beset by a plague of arrows sent by Apollo. Calchas informed Agamemnon that Apollo was angry because Agamemnon had taken Chryseis, daughter of a priest of Apollo, as a captive and refused to return her to her father who had offered a rich ransom for her. Agamemnon agreed to give her up, but demanded Briseis, a captive who had been awarded to Achilles, in her place. This aroused the famous wrath of Achilles and caused that hero to withdraw from the war, and so it was that Agamemnon's arrogance and hasty temper brought great losses and near disaster to the Greeks. Brave, rash, and vain, Agamemnon wanted the glory of leadership but did not know how to exercise it. He therefore constantly sought advice from Nestor who encouraged him to remain and fight when, discouraged, he would have given up and sailed for home. Also he continually turned to Odysseus who was ever ready with some scheme to save the situation. In the last year of the war Agamemnon volunteered to fight Hector in single combat but was eliminated by the drawing of lots. As the battle went against the Greeks he regretted his arrogance toward Achilles and tried to lure him back into the struggle with the offer of rich rewards. Achilles refused, and Agamemnon threw himself into the fighting until he was compelled by a wound to withdraw. After the death of Patroclus he admitted his fault to Achilles, saying he was spurred on by Ate, the goddess of mischief, and returned Briseis, untouched, to her former master. When Achilles later was killed, Agamemnon, possibly jealous of Telamonian Ajax' glorious fame, voted to award the armor of Achilles to Odysseus, whereupon Ajax, divinely inspired with madness by Athena, committed suicide. It was only the persuasive intervention of Odysseus that prevented him from denying honorable burial to Ajax. It was Odysseus again who persuaded him to order Astyanax, young son of Hector, to be hurled from the towers of Troy when that city had fallen, lest at a later date he gather the Trojans and again make war on the Greeks. Agamemnon took Cassandra, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, as his captive from Troy and began preparations to return to Greece. Once again weather prevented the sailing and Calchas informed him that the spirit of Achilles demanded the sacrifice of Polyxena, youngest daughter of Priam and Hecuba, on his funeral pyre. He ordered the sacrifice and commanded that her body be returned to her mother for burial. However, when he went to Hecuba to learn why she had not claimed the body, she appealed to him at least to permit her to avenge herself on Polymnestor, a former ally of Troy who had murdered the young son of Priam and Hecuba left in his care for safe-keeping. He agreed to let her take whatever vengeance a captive woman could, but would give her no assistance. The Greeks then sailed for home. Agamemnon was one of the few Greek leaders who arrived home directly. When he landed, Clytemnestra, who had learned of his approach by an elaborate system of beacon fires, welcomed him so extravagantly that he was uneasy but yielded to her efforts to treat him almost as a god. She invited him and his captive Cassandra, who seemed to be in a frenzy and was raving of bloody baths, into the palace for purification rites. As he stepped out of the ceremonial bath, Clytemnestra wrapped him in a robe that immobilized him and, according to Aeschylus, stabbed him three times, and then killed Cassandra. According to Homer, it was Aegisthus, her paramour, who actually killed Agamemnon. After the murders, with wild elation, Clytemnestra told the stunned subjects of Agamemnon that she had taken vengeance on her husband for the sacrifice of her daughter and for bringing back Cassandra as a rival wife.

Agamemnon. A tragedy by Aeschylus, the first in the Oresteian trilogy with which Aeschylus won first prize in 458 B.C. The trilogy treats the curse on the House of Atreus, how it operated and how it was lifted. The tragedy Agamemnon deals with the murder of Agamemnon, who has returned victorious from Troy after an absence of ten years. The tragedy, marked by the psychological insight with which Aeschylus draws the character of Clytemnestra, the dramatic intensity of the Cassandra scene, and the powerful scene in which Clytemnestra stands triumphant over her husband's corpse, is considered by many to be Aeschylus' masterpiece.

The scene is the place before Agamemnon's palace at Argos. From the palace roof a watchman prays the gods to bring his vigil to an end. He has been stationed there for a year by Clytemnestra—in whose woman's breast, he says, beats a man's heart—to watch for the signal that will announce the fall of Troy. A beacon flashes and he shouts for joy, then immediately curbs his tongue as he thinks of the tales the house could tell its master of his wife. A chorus of Argive Elders enters. The Elders sing of the years, the ships, and the men lost since Agamemnon and Menelaus set out for Troy to recover Helen. With foreboding they recall the omens that seemed to promise victory for the Greeks, but a victory clouded with evil. Uneasily they remember the seer's prophecy that Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, must be sacrificed, and their fear that it would arouse a resentment that could be appeased only with blood. They state that Agamemnon chose the responsibility for sacrificing his innocent daughter in order to lead a war to regain a false wife. The burden of the choice was his. Through their song runs a thread of fear, caused by their knowledge of what Clytemnestra has done and the guilt that Agamemnon bears for the sacrifice of his daughter. Zeus, they say, has decreed that men must learn through suffering, and that Justice will not be denied. At the close of their ode they ask Clytemnestra, who has been lighting altar fires, what news has caused her to order sacrificial fires throughout Argos. She tells them Troy has fallen and explains the system of beacon fires she has caused to be set up to carry the message across the seas to her. She hopes the Greeks, in their joy at success, will risk no impiety to the gods of Troy lest the gods in their turn take revenge on the victorious Greeks. The Elders sing a paean of thanksgiving to Zeus for the victory which has brought retribution to Paris and which has proved again that there is no protection for the guilty. But many in Greece, they say, will grieve for the losses they have sustained in the war for a false wife, and resentment will rise against Agamemnon. A herald of Agamemnon enters. He bids the Argives prepare to welcome their king who has crushed Troy, overthrown its altars, and wiped out the race of the Trojans. He weeps for joy to be home again. Farewell to the woes they have suffered, he says, there is no profit in remembering the losses and hardships they endured in the war. Clytemnestra approaches. She plans how she may best honor Agamemnon, speaks extravagantly of her joy at his homecoming, and claims she has been a faithful watchdog over his interests in his absence. The herald applauds her speech but, as she withdraws, the Elders hint that her speech does not square with her actions. The herald tells of the hardships of the war and of the storms that scattered the Greek fleet on the voyage home. When he leaves the Elders sing a long ode on the beauty of Helen and of the evil it brought Troy, not for itself but because the gods were angered when Paris violated the laws of hospitality and the Trojans upheld him. Some hold that ease and security bring a curse on the children of those who possess them. The Elders say it was not beauty or wealth that brought Troy's downfall, but an evil deed. A past impiety or an old crime breeds a young curse, they say, which in the appointed time results in doom. This choral ode prepares the way for Agamemnon, who now enters in a chariot, followed by his captive Cassandra and a great company of Argives. The Elders welcome him, congratulate him on his victory, and suggest that time will tell who has been loyal and who faithless in his absence. He acknowledges their greeting, and arrogantly points out that it was he and the gods who meted out justice to Troy. Clytemnestra greets him. She speaks in the most extravagant language of her love for him, her loneliness in his absence, the agonizing rumors of his death; his presence now is as the return of the sun. She commands her maids to spread a purple carpet for Agamemnon, the conqueror of Troy. He rebukes her, reminding her that the purple is for gods, not for mortals. Clytemnestra insists. She plays on his vanity as a great conqueror, suggests that fear should not prevent him from setting foot on the purple, and finally says that a victor can also afford to yield in order to please his wife. He has his sandals removed by a slave and, uttering the hope that no god's jealousy will be aroused (by an act he knows to be impious), sets his feet on the carpet. He tells his servant to lead Cassandra into the palace and withdraws. The Elders, alone with Cassandra, are filled with a nameless fear. Clytemnestra comes from the palace to fetch Cassandra for the rites which warriors undergo to cleanse themselves of the blood of those they have slain, but the captive, who has been silent throughout, remains motionless and speechless. Clytemnestra impatiently withdraws.

The Elders pity Cassandra who begins a chant of woe and calls on Apollo, saying he has destroyed her again. Wildly she cries that the palace is cursed, that she sees blood-stained hands smiting their kin, and a strangling noose. When she refers to Thyestes and the horrible banquet at which he was caused to eat of his children's flesh, the Elders recognize her allusion. Now, she cries, a worse crime is plotted. It was a treacherous welcome, the bath is prepared, the snare is set. The Elders do not understand but they are chilled with terror. She predicts her own death. So that the chorus will believe her prophecies, she tells them that Apollo gave her the gift of prophecy in return for her promised love but that she refused to fulfill her promise and the god, though he respected her refusal of his suit, doomed her to be a true prophet who would never be believed. Apollo did not ravish her, but what the god left untouched, Agamemnon took for his own. When she again describes her own death and that of Agamemnon, the curse of Apollo operates and the Elders refuse to believe her. However, it does not matter, she says, as events will soon prove her tale is true. She warns that a son will avenge his father's blood, prays that her death will be swift, and enters the palace. Presently Agamemnon's cry for help is heard from within the palace. The Elders are confused. While they debate what should be done, the doors of the palace are flung open to reveal Clytemnestra standing over the corpses of Agamemnon and Cassandra. She exults as she describes to the horrified Elders how she entrapped Agamemnon in a netlike robe as he stepped from the ritual bath and then stabbed him three times. She makes no apologies and no appeals in justification of her deed. No one cried out, she reminds the Elders, when Agamemnon sacrificed Iphigenia, but that deed has now been atoned for by this murder. The chorus and Clytemnestra chant alternately. The Elders lament: he who slays today will die tomorrow, and the wage for woe is woe. Clytemnestra replies that her deed has ended the curse on the House of Atreus. Aegisthus enters. He describes the horrible crime Atreus, father of Agamemnon, wrought against Thyestes, his own father, and of the curse Thyestes laid on the sons of Atreus—Agamemnon and Menelaus. Agamemnon has suffered from the curse, and Aegisthus rejoices. The leader of the chorus heaps scorn on Aegisthus as a coward who did not join the war, an adulterer who seduced Agamemnon's wife, and a plotter who hid behind a woman. They predict the return of Orestes to slay both plotters. In answer to his claim that he is now their ruler, the Elders prepare to attack Aegisthus. Clytemnestra intervenes. Enough blood has been shed; it was necessary to kill Agamemnon but she hopes this will be the end. Aegisthus threatens the Argives. They mock him for appearing to be brave only when Clytemnestra is there to protect him. She persuades him to withdraw, saying together they will rule and that all will turn out well.

Aganippe (ag-a-nip'ē). According to some myths, the wife of Acrisius and the mother of Danaë. Others name Eurydice as the mother of Danaë.

Aganippe. In ancient geography, a fountain near Mount Helicon, in Boeotia, Greece, sacred to the Muses. It was believed to inspire those who drank of it, and it gave the name "Aganippides" to the Muses.

Aganus (ag'a-nus). Named by some mythographers as a son of Helen and Paris. He died in Troy in infancy when a house collapsed on him.

Agapenor (ag-a-pē'nor). In Greek mythology, a son of Ancaeus, the Arcadian Argonaut. He became king of Arcadia, as successor to Echemus. He was the leader of the Arcadians who accompanied the Greeks to Troy to secure the return of Helen. On the way home after the Trojan War, his ships were scattered by storms. Agapenor and his Arcadians landed in Cyprus, and founded the city of Paphos and built the sanctuary of Aphrodite at Palaepaphos (Old Paphos).

Agariste (ag-a-ris'tē). Daughter of Clisthenes of Sicyon (fl. 580 B.C.). Her father invited such of the young princes and heroes of Greece as desired to do so to come to his court and sue for the hand of Agariste. Many came from the wealthiest and noblest families. In Sicyon they stayed a year, and were there put through various tests so that Clisthenes could determine the one best fitted to become his son-in-law. After a year in which the suitors endured such athletic contests as foot racing and wrestling, and such social affairs as banquets where their deportment and prowess as trenchermen were observed, the field was narrowed to the Athenians Hippoclidēs, son of Tisander, and Megacles, son of Alcmaeon. In the end, Hippoclidēs frittered away his chances by making a spectacle of himself through excessive dancing at a banquet. Agariste was given to Megacles. One of her sons was Clisthenes the Athenian who divided the Athenians into ten tribes. Her granddaughter, another Agariste, married the Athenian nobleman Xanthippus. When she was expecting a child, she dreamed she had given birth to a lion. Soon afterwards she bore Xanthippus a son, Pericles.

Agasias (a-gā'shi-as). Name of two Greek sculptors of the Ephesian school who lived sometime during the 1st century B.C.: 1) Son of Dositheus. His name is inscribed on the base of the Borghese Gladiator in the Louvre in Paris. 2) Son of Menophilus. A military statue done by him is in the Athens national museum.

Agastrophus (a-gas'trō-fus). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a son of Paeon. He was a noted spearman. Diomedes killed him, and was himself wounded by an arrow from the bow of Paris as he stooped to strip Agastrophus of his armor.

Agatharchides of Cnidus (ag-a-thār'ki-dēz; nī'dus). [Also: Agatharcus.] Greek geographer and historian, born at Cnidus and active during the first half of the 2nd century B.C. at Alexandria. His On the Erythraean Sea, which has been preserved through Photius, contains valuable geographic and ethnographic information on Arabia and Ethiopia. He also wrote a geography and history of Asia in ten books, and a geography and history of Europe in 49 books.

Agatharchus (ag-a-thār'kus). Athenian painter; born on the island of Samos in the Aegean Sea; fl. c460-417 B.C. He is said by Vitruvius to have painted a scene for a tragedy by Aeschylus, and thus is sometimes credited with having been the inventor of scene-painting for the theater.

Agathocles or Agathokles (a-gath'ō-klēz). Sicilian despot, tyrant of Syracuse (317-289 B.C.), born at Thermae, Sicily, 361 B.C.; died 289 B.C. He seized power with an army of exiles and Campanian hirelings and shortly became involved in war with Carthage, traditional enemy of the Sicilian Greeks. He made his way through the Carthaginian forces around Syracuse and crossed the Mediterranean to attack Carthage in 310 B.C., but returned to find Syracuse rumbling with incipient revolt. He thereupon made peace with the Carthaginians and put down his opposition, but died before he could renew the attack on Carthage.

Agathon (ag'a-thon). Named by Homer (Iliad) as one of the 50 sons of Priam, king of Troy. He was slain in the Trojan War some time after the death of Hector.

Agathon. Athenian tragic poet. He was born c450 B.C. and died c400 B.C., probably in Macedonia whither he had gone with his friend Euripides. He was also a friend of Plato, and was noted for his culture and beauty. The banquet he gave to celebrate his first dramatic victory (416 B.C.) at the Lenaea is the scene of Plato's Symposium. He is considered to have been the first Athenian dramatist to devise an original plot, having abandoned the myths as source material for his works, and to sever the link between plot and choral odes.

Agathyrsi (a-ga-thir'si). A tribe dwelling near the Maris River on the border of Scythia. According to tradition, they were descendants of Heracles through their eponymous ancestor Agathysus, the son of Heracles and the Fish-maiden of Scythia. According to Herodotus, they were luxurious in their tastes and fond of wearing gold. Men and women lived together promiscuously to the end that all children would be brothers and thus cherish no hatred or envy toward one another. In other respects they were similar to the Thracians. When Darius attacked the Scythians, the latter called on the Agathyrsi for aid. The Agathyrsi refused to give it on the grounds that the Scythians had provoked the attack. If Darius attacked them they would resist, but they would not go to the aid of the Scythians. The Scythians developed a policy for resisting Darius and punishing those who had refused them aid at the same time. They kept a day's march in front of the Persians and led them through the lands of those who had refused them aid; thus those countries were invaded twice. But the Agathyrsi, having observed this maneuver of the Scythians, rushed to their borders and forbade the Scythians to enter their land. Their evident intention to resist passage by the Scythians, as well as by the Persians, caused the Scythians to deflect their course and the land of the Agathyrsi was spared invasion.

Agathysus (ag-a-thir'sus). According to legend, a son of Heracles and a fabulous serpent-tailed maiden of Scythia. His brothers were Scythes and Gelonus. Because he failed in a task which Heracles instructed his mother to set him, she sent him out of the land.

Agave (a-gā'vē.) In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia. She was the wife of Echion, one of the "Sown Men" of Thebes, and was the mother of Pentheus. When Dionysus made his appearance in Thebes, Pentheus denied the divinity of the god and sought to suppress his worship. Agave, who had been driven mad by Dionysus because she too denied his godhead, joined her sisters and other Theban women who were participating in the revels of Dionysus on Mount Cithaeron. There Pentheus, also inspired with madness by Dionysus as a punishment for his doubts, went to spy on the women. They seized him and, frenzied with wine and religious ecstasy, tore him to pieces. Agave herself, under the impression that she was subduing a lion, wrenched his head from his mangled body and bore it impaled on her thyrsus to the palace at Thebes. When she was restored to her senses, she was horrified and lamented the death of her son. Dionysus appeared to her and told her this was her punishment for her unbelief and sentenced her to exile from Thebes. She went to Illyria, as did her mother and father, and there married the king. When she later learned that her father had become commander of a force of Encheleans in Illyria, she murdered her new husband and turned his kingdom over to her father.

Ageladas (aj-e-lā'das). [Also: Hageladas, Hagelaidas.] Greek sculptor, a native of Argos; fl. c520-c460 B.C. He was noted for his statues of gods and athletes in bronze, of which no originals now exist, and is thought to have been the instructor of Myron, Phidias, and Polyclitus.

Agelaus (aj-e-lā'us). In Greek mythology, the chief herdsman of Priam, to whom Paris was given as an infant with instructions to kill him. Not having the heart to slay the babe, Agelaus left him on the mountain to die. A few days later Paris was found alive and well, having been suckled by a she-bear, and Agelaus, convinced that Paris had been saved by divine intervention, took him and brought him up with his own son.

Agelaus. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Phradmon. He was slain when Diomedes hurled his javelin into his back as he fled in his chariot, after Zeus had sent an omen favorable to the Greeks which inspired them to renew their struggle against the Trojans.

Agelaus. In Homeric legend (Odyssey), a son of Damastor. He was a suitor of Penelope and advised Telemachus that it was not right to delay the choice of a husband for Penelope any longer. It had been proper to wait some time after the end of the Trojan War for the return of Odysseus, but he had now been gone twenty years, and Agelaus considered that a more than sufficient interval of waiting.

Agelaus. According to some accounts, a son of Heracles and Omphale, queen of Lydia. Some say he was the ancestor of the Lydian king, Croesus.

Agenor (a-jē'nôr, -nôr). In mythology, a son of Poseidon and Libya, and the twin of Belus. He was a descendant of Io and Zeus, and was a king of Phoenicia. He left Egypt and went to Canaan (afterward Phoenicia). His wife Telephassa bore him Cadmus, Cilix, Phineus, Phoenix, Thasus, and Europa. When Europa was carried off by Zeus in the form of a bull, Agenor commanded his sons to find her, threatening them with exile if they were unsuccessful. His sons departed on their mission but, being unsuccessful, never returned. They became the ancestors of peoples in Greece and Asia.

Agenor. A Trojan, named by Homer (Iliad) as the "great-hearted" son of Antenor and Theano, and as one of the bravest of the Trojans. He led a group at the siege of the Greek fortifications, and later, when Achilles chased the Trojans to the walls and would have followed them and taken the city, Agenor did not flee before him. Inspired by Apollo, he concluded that even Achilles was a mortal whose flesh could be wounded with a spear, and he stood firm to fight Achilles. The magic armor of Achilles protected him from Agenor's spear thrust, however, and lest Achilles harm him, Apollo veiled Agenor in a thick cloud and spirited him away. But Agenor's courage in facing Achilles had given the Trojans time to get inside the walls of the city and close the gates after them.

Agesander (aj-e-san'dër) or Agesandros (-dros). Greek sculptor, a native of Rhodes, active

fat, fâte, fâr, fâre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nôr,

42-21 B.C. With Athenodorus and Polydorus of Rhodes he carved the famous sculptured group known as the Laocoön. This depicts the episode narrated by Aeneas in the second book of Vergil's Aeneid, when, following the priest Laocoön's bidding the Trojans to trust not the Wooden Horse ("I fear the Greeks even bearing gifts"), two great serpents emerge from the sea and attack Laocoön and his two sons. A copy of this sculpture (or possibly the original), is in the Vatican Museum, Rome. Fragments of sculpture recently found in a cave of Sperlonga, Italy, were at first assigned to a second Laocoön group, but some scholars prefer another interpretation. (JJ)

Agesilaus (ā-jes-i-lā'us) or Agesilaos (-os). King of Sparta (c399-c360 B.C.), born c444 B.C.; died in Libya, c360 B.C. He was a younger son of Archidamus II, of the Euryontid line of Spartan rulers, by his second wife Eupolia. Because his older half-brother Agis was the heir, Agesilaus was not trained for kingship, but shared in the regular training of Spartan youths. Archidamus had been fined by the Spartans when he married Eupolia, because she was a small woman and would bear, they said, "not kings but kinglets." To the extent that Agesilaus was of modest stature and lame, their prophecy was carried out. He did not let his lameness interfere with his activities; rather, he was the bolder in spirit to compensate for it. When Agis died (398 B.C.) Lysander, a Spartan general and intimate of Agesilaus, promoted Agesilaus for the throne on the grounds that Leotychidas, who passed as the son of Agis, was actually the son of Alcibiades who was rumored to have had a liaison with the wife of Agis when he deserted Athens for Sparta. However, an oracle stood in the way of the accession of Agesilaus; "Bethink thee now, O Sparta, though thou art very glorious, lest from thee, sound of foot, there spring a maimed royalty . . ." Diviners said the oracle forbade Sparta to take a lame king. Lysander countered by saying the "maimed royalty" of the oracle referred to the illegitimacy of Leotychidas, who was not a true descendant of Heracles. His view prevailed and Agesilaus became king (c399 B.C.). He won the respect of the ephors by his seeming deference, and won the love of the people by the simplicity of his personal life. Having done so, he had the essence rather than the appearance of power. He showed himself honorable in dealing with his enemies and supported his friends unreservedly, even when their actions were unjust or harmful to the state. His loyalty to his friends, in fact, sometimes led to disaster. When word came that the Persians were gathering their forces, Lysander persuaded Agesilaus to march against them and to help the friends he had established in power in Asia Minor. Agesilaus, who dreamed of conquering Persia, went to Aulis to assemble his forces, following in the path of Agamemnon, "king of men." At Aulis he was advised in a vision to sacrifice to Artemis as Agamemnon had done before sailing to Troy. Agesilaus promised a sacrifice that would be pleasing to the goddess but would not imitate the cruelty of Agamemnon's sacrifice of his daughter. He ordered a hind to be garlanded and offered up by his own priests. The Thebans, enraged that a foreign priest should sacrifice on their soil without their permission, disrupted the ceremony and carried off the thighs of the victim. Agesilaus was troubled by this unfavorable circumstance, and never forgave the Thebans. He went to Ephesus where he found that Lysander, who had been in the region before and had many friends, was the center of attention and was regarded as the real commander of the expedition. Up to this time, relations between Agesilaus and Lysander had been very close. Now Agesilaus found his own ambitions hindered by the respect in which Lysander was held, and feared that if he did succeed in Asia Lysander would win all the credit. He resolved to nullify Lysander's influence. He refused his advice. Then he denied those who were recommended by Lysander and came to him for help, and aided those known to be unfriendly to Lysander. Instead of giving Lysander a military post of command, he appointed him as his official meat-carver. Lysander, appreciating the situation, asked for and received permission to depart to a region where he could be of real service to his country. Agesilaus marched through Phrygia and conquered many cities. In the spring of 395 B.C. he defeated the Persians on the plain before Sardis. He followed his victory by ravaging Phrygia, the satrapy of Pharnabazus. Pharnabazus came to parley with him. With dignity, he remonstrated with Agésilas, saying he had been the faithful ally of Sparta in her wars against Athens and now he was rewarded by having his satrapy devastated. Was this justice, he asked, or gratitude? Agésilas answered that since he was at war with Persia, all satraps must be regarded as his enemies, and invited Pharnabazus to desert the Persian king and join him as an ally. Pharnabazus replied that while he held a post under the Persian king he would support him, and wage war against Sparta with all his power. Agésilas admired his loyalty. He promised to leave the satrapy and to respect it in the future. Before his interview with Pharnabazus he had received word from Sparta putting him in command of the fleet which was to be assembled. This was the first time the posts of general and admiral had been united in one person. He unwisely entrusted the command of the fleet to his brother-in-law Pisander, a man of no experience, in order to please his sister. This appointment is an extreme example of the extent to which Agésilas was at the mercy of his affections with disastrous results for Sparta. He restored order in Asia Minor and planned to pursue and capture the Persian king Artaxerxes II at Susa, in order to bring to an end the continual interference of Persia in Greek affairs, supporting now one now another of them in their internecine wars. Before he could embark on the project, he was called home to subdue the Corinthian League of Greek states that had formed an alliance against Sparta. He marched overland by the route Xerxes had taken when he invaded Greece (480 B.C.), asking permission of the tribes along the way to pass through their territory. Most gave it. One tribe, however, demanded 100 talents of silver and as many women as the price for passage through their land. Agésilas, retorting that they must come and get it, fought and defeated them. The king of Macedonia said he must deliberate before giving permission to the Spartans to cross his land. "Let him deliberate then," said Agésilas, "but we will march on." The Macedonian prudently refrained from interfering. The Spartans ravaged Thessaly in their passage because of ancient enmity with the Thessalians. On his homeward journey Agésilas learned of a battle near Corinth in which some Spartans and many of their enemies had fallen. "Alas for Hellas," he groaned, "which has by her own hands destroyed so many brave men. Had they lived, they could have conquered in battle all the barbarians in the world." On orders from Sparta he invaded Boeotia. At Chaeronea there was an eclipse of the sun. The unfavorable omen was followed by news that Pisander had been thoroughly defeated off Cnidus by a fleet under the command of Conon, the Athenian admiral, and Pharnabazus (394 B.C.). All his work in Asia Minor was now undone, and the Spartan fleet was destroyed. He concealed the news from his army and marched quickly to Coronea where he met the allies—Thebes, Athens, Corinth, and Argos—arrayed against him. He was badly wounded in the battle (394 B.C.) but was awarded the victory when the Thebans asked for a burial truce. The victory was fruitless, as he dared not stay in the area but withdrew to Sparta, where he was warmly welcomed. In 391 B.C. he captured Lechaeum, one of the ports of Corinth, and the following year marched again to the Isthmus and took over the presidency of the Isthmian Games, then being celebrated. The Corinthians nullified his presidency by holding the games all over again as soon as he left. He supported the King's Peace (386 B.C.), handed down by Artaxerxes II, under which the Greek cities of Asia Minor were abandoned to Persia and the Greek states were declared autonomous. However, he violated its terms by sanctioning the seizure of the Theban citadel (382 B.C.) by Phoebidas and the government friendly to Sparta that he set up in Thebes. When the Thebans expelled the Spartans (379 B.C.) he waged war on them, leading expeditions against Thebes in 378 and 377 B.C. The expeditions accomplished nothing and Agésilas was badly wounded. The wars against Thebes were provoked by Agésilas more from his hatred of the city than for strategic reasons, and were an open violation of the peace. Even Xenophon, a great admirer of Agésilas and Spartan institutions, was critical of these violations. He attributed the ultimate downfall of Sparta to retribution by the gods for her harsh and unjust actions toward other states. Agesilaus was rebuked by one of his generals, when he was wounded, who said to him, "Indeed, this is a fine tuition-fee which thou art getting from the Thebans, for teaching them how to fight when they did not wish to do it and did not even know how." The expeditions also caused discontent among the Spartan allies. In 371 B.C. an attempt was made to end the crippling warfare by the Peace of Callias. Agesilaus demanded of Epaminondas, the Theban envoy, that the Boeotian cities be permitted, as independent cities, to sign the peace treaty separately. Epaminondas retorted that it would be permitted if Agesilaus acknowledged the independence of the Laconian cities. Agesilaus had no intention of so doing, and Thebes was not a party to the treaty. In the same year the Thebans, under Epaminondas, defeated the Spartans at Leuctra. The following year they invaded the Peloponnesus and pushed into Laconia itself, the first time in 600 years that its borders had been violated. Agesilaus kept the Thebans out of the city of Sparta and withstood a series of attacks, culminating in a campaign by four armies against the unwalled city (369 B.C.) The Spartans, safe within their borders for centuries, were in despair when war touched their land. They longed for peace and began to plot against Agesilaus for preventing it. He seized the plotters and put them to death without trial. He again defended the city (362 B.C.) against a Theban army, and a few days later marched at the head of a force to take part in the battle of Mantinea in which Epaminondas was slain. Afterward, Agesilaus refused to take part in the general peace settlement. His countrymen, worn out by war, no longer honored and respected him; they considered his obstinacy dangerous to his country and his friends. Now in his eighties, he put himself at the head of a band of mercenaries and set out (361 B.C.) for Egypt. He agreed to help the Egyptian Tachos in return for money that he needed to carry on Sparta's wars. The Egyptians knew of Agesilaus by reputation. When they saw the simply clad, lame old man, they mocked him, and he did not receive supreme command of their expedition as he had expected. A revolt broke out against Tachos. Agesilaus joined the conspirators against him and helped them to gain control in Egypt. They begged him to remain, but he was anxious to return to Sparta. Loaded with honors, gifts, and 230 talents for the war at home, he set sail. On the return voyage he died (c360 B.C.) at a place called the Harbor of Menelaus, on the coast of Libya. His body was enclosed in melted wax and taken to Sparta for burial. He had been a dominating figure in Sparta for over 40 years. He had witnessed his country's triumph over Athens in the Peloponnesian War, and was its king during the period of its greatest power. A story goes that a visitor marveled that Sparta, with its many enemies, had no walls. Agesilaus is said to have pointed to the citizens in arms and replied, "These are the walls of Lacedaemon." He was still king when Sparta lost the rich land of Messenia and was compelled to defend its very citadel against invaders. Wrong-headed but indomitable, he made a final contribution to his country by serving as a mercenary to replenish its empty treasury.

Agger of Servius Tullius (ag'ér; sèr'vi-us tul'i-us). Name given to a stretch of the so-called Servian Wall of Rome, extending from the Colline Gate across the low ground to the Esquiline Gate, adjoining the existing Arch of Gallienus, at the foot of the Esquiline. In the middle of the Agger there was a third gate, the Porta Viminalis. The Agger consisted of a great mound of earth, in front of which there was a ditch 30 feet deep and 100 feet wide. The mound had a massive retaining wall in front, rising 30 feet above the top of the ditch, and a lighter wall at the back.

Agias (ā'ji-as). Greek cyclic poet of Troezen, in the Peloponnesus, fl. c740 B.C.; author of the Nostoi (Homeward Voyages) of the Achaean heroes after the siege and fall of Troy.

Agidae (ā'ji-dē) or Agids (ā'jidz). Descendants of Agis, the son of Eurysthenes, the senior of the two royal houses of Sparta.

Agis I (ā'jis). Traditionally, king of Sparta (c1032 B.C.). He was the reputed founder of the royal line known as the Agiadae, or Agidae.

Agis II. King of Sparta (c427–399 B.C.). He was the son of Archidamus II, of the Eurypon-tid line of Spartan kings. In 418 B.C. he defeated Athens and her allies in a great battle at Mantinea and restored the prestige to Sparta which it had lost by the surrender at Sphacteria (425 B.C.). In 413 he led an expedition that took and fortified Decelea, from which point the Spartans commanded all Attica. In 405 B.C. he moved his forces up to the walls of Athens, but finding them impregnable he withdrew. The Athenians, defeated at Aegospotami (405), asked for peace and the long Peloponnesian Wars came to an end (404 B.C.). Agis had been one of the two kings of Sparta for almost the entire duration of the wars. During the reign of Agis, Alcibiades, the Athenian general, repudiated at home, came to Sparta. Because of Alcibiades' notorious liaison with Timaea, wife of Agis, her son was not recognized by Agis as his heir on the grounds that he was actually the son of Alcibiades. However, in his last illness Agis was prevailed upon to declare this son, Leotychidas, as his legitimate heir. His earlier refusal to recognize him made it possible for Agesilaus, half-brother of Agis, to succeed him as king in place of Leotychidas.

Agis III. King of Sparta (338–331 B.C.). He was allied with Persia against Macedon. In an attempt to throw off Macedonian control, while Alexander the Great was in Asia, he was defeated by Antipater, Alexander's regent, at Megalopolis (331 B.C.), where he lost his life in battle.

Agis IV. King of Sparta (244–240 B.C.); son of Eudamidas II of the Eurypon-tid line of Spartan rulers. He proposed to recruit additions to the ranks of the Spartans from among the Perioeci, and advocated a redistribution of the landed property. In these measures of reform he was opposed by his colleague Leonidas II, of the royal line known as the Agidae, and after some transient successes he was captured and sentenced to death by the Spartan ephors.

Aglaia (ā-glā'i-ā). The youngest of the Char-ites (Graces). Some say she was the wife of Hephaestus. See Charites.

Aglaia. In classical legend, the mother, by Abas, of Acrisius and Proetus.

Aglauros (ā-glō'ros). Name used interchangeably with Agrauros, to indicate either the wife or the daughter of Cecrops. See Agrauros.

Aglaus (ā-glā'us). In mythology, a son of Thyestes and a naiad. With his brothers Callileon and Orchomenus he was dragged from the altar of Zeus where they had taken refuge, and dismembered by Atreus. The extremities of the three children were kept to one side; the rest of their bodies were cut up, boiled in a cauldron and served to their father at a feast given him by Atreus. This was to punish Thyestes for his adultery with the wife of Atreus. After Thyestes had eaten, the extremities of the children were brought in to prove to Thyestes that he had eaten the flesh of his own sons.

Agora (ag'ō-rā). The Greek term meaning "market-place," analogous to the forums of Roman cities. Essentially, it is a considerable open space within the walls; the political, social, and commercial focus of the community where farmers bring their produce for retail sale, businessmen meet their clients and associates, and popular assemblies may be convoked. It is often bordered by stoas (colonnades, porticoes), public offices, and a temple or two. One who speaks of "the Agora," without specifying which city's agora he means, presumably refers to that of Athens, most famous for its association with the city's intellectual and artistic, as well as political and economic, leadership of classical Greece. The Athenian Agora is a broad area extending from the northwest slopes of the Acropolis to the terrace on which the Temple of Hephaestus stands, revealed by extensive excavations conducted by an American mission from 1931 to the present. (JJ)

Agoracritus (ag-ō-rak'ri-tus) or Agorakritos (-tos). Greek sculptor, born on the island of Paros in the Aegean Sea, and active in the 5th century B.C. He was a favorite pupil of Phidias and a rival of Alcamenes. He is now remembered chiefly for his work on the Nemesis at Rhamnus, fragments of which are in the British Museum and Athens Museum. But some say this statue was by Phidias himself. The bronze image of Athena Itonia in the temple at Boeotia was made by Agoracritus.

Agoraea (ag-ō-rē'ā). An epithet of Athena, meaning "Of the Market-place."

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

Agoraeus (ag-o-rē'us). Epithet, meaning "Of the Market-place." It was applied especially to Zeus and to Hermes. There were sanctuaries of Zeus Agoraeus (among others) at Sparta, Olympia, and Thebes.

Agrae (ā'grē). Suburb of ancient Athens extending E from opposite the temple of Olympian Zeus over the hills of the S bank of the Ilissus. In it lies the Panathenaic Stadium. In this area, southeast of the Acropolis on the Ilissus River, the Lesser Mysteries, established by Demeter in honor of Heracles, were celebrated.

Agraeus (ag-rē'us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Hunter."

Agraulos (ā-grō'lus). In Greek mythology, the wife of Cecrops, the first king of Attica, and the mother of Agraulos the Younger, Herse, and Pandrosos. Athena entrusted her with a casket to guard, with orders not to look inside it. One day, overcome by curiosity, Agraulos and her daughters opened the casket and beheld in it the infant Erichthonius whose body ended in a serpent's tail. Agraulos and her daughters were so terrified they leaped to their deaths from the Acropolis. But some say Agraulos leaped from the Acropolis during an attack on Athens in response to an oracle which said the city would be saved by such a sacrifice. There was a sanctuary of Agraulos on the Acropolis, where young Athenian warriors took an oath "to regard wheat, barley, the vine, and the olive as the natural boundaries of Attica" and to defend those boundaries with their lives.

Agraulos the Younger. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, and Agraulos. She demanded much gold from Hermes in return for furthering his cause with her sister Herse. Having offended Athena, Agraulos was made to fall in love with Hermes, and in an attempt to bar him from seeing Herse she was turned to stone. Some say Agraulos was a daughter of Alcippe by Ares. See Herse. (AH)

Agreus (ā-grē'us). A name, meaning "Wild," which was given by the myrtle-nymphs to Aristaeus when they were rearing him.

Agricola (ā-grik'ō-lā), Cnaeus Julius. Roman soldier and politician; born at Forum Julii (now Frejus, France), 40 A.D.; died at Rome, 93 A.D. He was the father-in-law of Tacitus.

Quaestor in Asia (63) under Salvius Titianus; made commander (70) of the XXth Legion in Britain by Vespasian; governor of Aquitania (74-76); elected consul (77) and assigned to southern Britain, where in seven campaigns (78-84) he extended Roman law to the northern boundary of Perth and Argyll. He may have been poisoned by agents of the emperor. Tacitus' Agricola, an account of his life and accomplishments, is generally considered to be an outstanding example of good classical biography.

Agrigentum (ag-ri-jen'tum). See Acragas.

Agria (ag-ri-ō'ni-ā). An annual feast, held at Orchomenus, in which the sacrifice of Hippasus by his mother Leucippe and her sisters was ritually reenacted. The feast was to atone for the murder.

Agriope (ag-rī'ō-pē). A name sometimes given to Eurydice, wife of Orpheus.

Agrippa (ā-grip'ā), Marcus Vipsanius. Roman soldier and politician, born at Rome, 63 B.C.; died in Campania, 12 B.C. He rose from a humble birth to become son-in-law, friend, and counselor to Augustus. He put down the Aquitanian revolt (38 B.C.) in Gaul, was elected consul (37) and defeated (36) Sextus Pompeius Magnus (often called Pompey the Younger) at Mylae and Naulochus. He became aedile in 33, and defeated (31) Antony's fleet at Actium. Recalled from the governorship of Syria to become (23) Augustus' chief counselor, he shared the tribuneship with Augustus (18 B.C. et seq.). Agrippa was married to a daughter of Octavia the niece of Augustus but when Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was widowed, Augustus persuaded Agrippa to divorce his wife, the mother of his children, and marry Julia who was young enough to be his daughter and whose reputation for immoral living was to become the scandal of Rome. Julia bore three sons, Gaius, Lucius, and Agrippa Postumus, to Agrippa, and two daughters, Julia and Agrippina the Elder. Many of the military successes of the reign of Augustus were due to the capacity of Agrippa. He is also known for his geographical writings.

Agrippa Postumus (pos'tū-mus). Posthumous son of Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa by Julia, the daughter of Augustus. He was born 12 B.C. and died 14 A.D. He was adopted by Augustus in 4 B.C. Accused of plotting actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; ꝥꝥ, then; đ as d or j, ȝ as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z as z or zh.

against Augustus, he was exiled. On the accession of Tiberius, he was murdered, possibly by the order of Livia, widow of Augustus, who was determined that none of the heirs of Augustus' body should be left living as a possible threat to her own son Tiberius.

Agrippina (ag-ri-pī'na), Julia. [Called Agrippina the Younger.] Daughter of Germanicus and Vipsania Agrippina. She was born at Oppidum Ubiorum (later named, for her, Colonia Agrippina, now Cologne), c15 A.D. She was killed near Baiae (now Baia), on the Bay of Naples, 59 A.D. She married Domitius Ahenobarbus and by him was the mother of the future emperor Nero. She later married Crispus Passienus and in 49 A.D. her uncle, the emperor Claudius, whom she poisoned (54) after excluding his son Britannicus from the throne in favor of Nero. She was influential during the early part of Nero's reign, but was eventually murdered at his orders after she threatened to support the claims of Britannicus.

Agrippina, Vipsania. [Called Agrippina the Elder.] Roman matron, born c13 B.C.; died at Pandataria, 33 A.D. She was known for the loftiness of her character. She was the youngest daughter of Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, daughter of Augustus, and the wife of Germanicus and mother of Caligula. She accompanied her husband on his military campaigns and was with him at Antioch when he was poisoned (19 A.D.). She returned to Rome and publicly denounced the governor of Syria, Calpurnius Piso, as the poisoner. By implication, her accusation involved the emperor Tiberius himself. Her accusation, the popularity with which her husband had been regarded, and the popular feeling which his death aroused, promoted the jealous hatred of Tiberius and Sejanus. She was banished to the lonely island of Pandataria (Ventotene) off the Campanian coast, where she was flogged so savagely that she lost an eye. Her sons, the elder of them at least, were ordered starved to death. Agrippina, some say, starved herself to death, although Tiberius ordered her jaws pried apart for forcible feeding. But others say Tiberius himself ordered her to die by starvation.

Agrius (ā'gri-us). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle the Fates crushed his head with a brass pestle and Heracles dispatched him.

Agrius. In Greek mythology, a centaur who, aroused by the aroma of the wine of Dionysus, attacked Heracles when he was visiting Pholus on his way to capture the Erymanthian Boar. Heracles drove him off.

Agrius. In Greek mythology, one of the three sons Circe bore to Odysseus when he visited her on her island. The other two were Latinus and Telegonus.

Agrius. In Greek legend, an Aetolian, the father of Thersites. The latter was noted as the person with the foulest tongue and ugliest appearance of all the Greeks at Troy.

Agrotera (ag-rō'te-ra). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "the Huntress." Alcaeus, son of Pelops, raised a sanctuary of Artemis Agrotera at Megara in gratitude to the goddess for her help in killing the Cithaeronian Lion. Apollo Agraëus (Hunter) shared the sanctuary with her. There was a temple of Artemis Agrotera across the Ilissus, the river of Athens, in a district called Agraë. The image in the temple carried a bow, for they say that Artemis first hunted here when she came from Delos. Five hundred goats were annually sacrificed to Artemis Agrotera on the anniversary of the battle of Marathon. This was done because, before the battle, the Athenians had vowed to sacrifice to Artemis as many goats as would equal the number of Persians they slew. But they killed so many of their enemy that they did not have goats enough to fulfill the vow. Instead they resolved to sacrifice 500 goats every year.

Agyieus (a-gwī'ūs). An epithet of Apollo. As Apollo Agyieus he was "God of Streets," who kept out the bad and let in the good. Before each house was his symbol, a plain pillar with a conical top, or sometimes a pillar with a head or face painted on the top. This symbol was honored with offerings of wreaths and ribbons.

Agyieus. Named by some as a Hyperborean priest who established the worship of Apollo at Delphi.

Ahala (a-hā'la), Cnaeus Servilius Structus. Roman patrician, master of the horse in 439 B.C. (according to the common chronology), and slayer of the popular leader Spurius Maelius.

Ahasuerus (a-has-ū-ē'rus). In the Old Testament, a Persian shah, mentioned as the father of Darius the Mede (Dan. ix. 1). He has been variously identified as Astyages and Cyaxares.

Ahasuerus. In the Old Testament, a great ruler of Persia, and husband of Esther, probably identical with Xerxes I. He is mentioned in Ezra, iv. 6., and throughout the Book of Esther.

Ahenobarbus (a-hē-nō-bār'bus, a-hen-ō-), Cnaeus Domitius. Roman official, fl. 104-92 B.C. He was the father of Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus. A tribune (104 B.C.), pontifex maximus (103), consul (96), and censor (92), he framed the law, later repealed by Sulla, that priests of certain classes should be selected by the lay citizenry rather than by each other.

Ahenobarbus, Lucius Domitius. Roman official and political opportunist, fl. 54-48 B.C.; son of Cnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus. He was a consul in 54 B.C. and Caesar's successor as governor of Gaul in 49 B.C. He opposed both Caesar and Pompey, but later attached himself to Pompey and was slain after the defeat at Pharsalus.

Aidoneus (ā-i-dō'nūs, -nē-us). In Greek legend, a king in Thesprotia. Some say it was his wife whom Pirithous and Theseus tried to steal, and not Persephone the wife of Hades. Perhaps confusion was caused because Aidoneus is a poetic term meaning Hades. In any event, those who hold to this story say that Aidoneus captured the would-be abductors, hurled Pirithous to the dogs, and cast Theseus into a dungeon from which he was subsequently rescued by Heracles.

Aidos (ī'dos). In Greek mythology, the personification of Conscience, or the shame that is caused by conscience. Her altar was on the Acropolis at Athens, near the temple of Athena, whose nurse she was said to have been. Aidōs was thought to be a deity that ranged the earth, and did not live among the immortal gods in Olympus. At the theater of Dionysus a seat was reserved for the priestess of Aidōs.

Aigai (ī'gī). [Modern name, Nimrud-Kallessi.] In ancient geography, a town in Aeolia, Asia Minor. On its site are the ruins of various ancient structures.

Aigion (ē'yōn). [Also: Aiyion, Aegion.] See Aegium.

Aissa (ā-is'a). One of the names, meaning "Fleet," under which Achilles is said to have been known when, in order to avoid serving with the Greek forces at Troy, he lived at the court of Lycomedes in Scyros disguised as a girl.

Aius Locutius (ā'i-us lō-kū'shus). In Roman legend, a voice that was heard in the dead of night (c390 B.C.). Marcus Caedicius, a Roman citizen, was walking along the Via Nova on his way home when he heard a great voice. He turned but could see no one. Again he heard the voice, which said in loud, clear tones, "Harken, Marcus Caedicius; early in the morning go and tell the magistrates that within a little time they must expect the Gauls." The next day Marcus Caedicius went to the magistrates as he was bid, but the tribunes mocked him and paid no attention to the warning. Not long afterward (390 B.C.) the Gauls came and sacked Rome. When they were at last driven out, the warning voice was remembered and Camillus, the victorious Roman dictator, raised a temple and an altar to Aius Locutius (the Voice, or the Announcing Voice), on the exact spot where Marcus Caedicius stood when he heard it.

Ajax (ā'jaks), Telamonian or Great. In Greek legend, a son of Telamon of Salamis and Periboea. Before he was born, Heracles visited his parents in Salamis. Observing that Periboea was about to produce a child, he prayed to Zeus that she would bear a son whose skin was as tough as a lion's and whose courage would match it. Zeus sent an eagle to show that his prayer was heard. When Ajax was born, Heracles covered him with his own lion's skin, and made him invulnerable except in the neck and armpit that had not been covered by the skin. Ajax became king of Megara, and was a suitor of Helen. Like her other suitors, he took an oath to defend the man she chose as her husband if that man should ever suffer ill on account of his marriage. To carry out his oath, he joined Achilles, his beloved cousin, and the other Greek captains who sailed to Troy to recover Helen when she was carried off by Paris. Next to Achilles he was the handsomest and the bravest of the Greeks. He also stood head and shoulders above them in stature. In the tenth year of the Trojan War he accepted Hector's challenge to the Greeks to engage in single combat. They fought all day and when the contest ended with neither gaining the advantage the heroes exchanged gifts, each praising the other's prowess.

AJAX CARRYING THE BODY OF ACHILLES

seum, Florence

Hector gave Ajax his sword and Ajax gave Hector his gleaming belt. In the war Ajax fought side by side with his half-brother Teucer who was a skilled bowman. Teucer dodged out from the shelter of Ajax' shield to shoot his deadly arrows. Among his many deeds in the Trojan War he acted as one of the envoys who went to Scyros to fetch Achilles to the war; later he was one of the ambassadors who went to Achilles' tent to try to persuade him to return to the war after his quarrel with Agamemnon; with Menelaus he rescued Odysseus when the latter was cut off and surrounded by the Trojans; with the Lesser Ajax he held off the enemy from the Greek ships; he defended the body of Patroclus and fought off the Trojans until it could be rescued by his comrades. When Penthesilea the Amazon came to the aid of the Trojans after the death of Hector, she furiously drove the Greeks back. Ajax, mourning with Achilles over the death of Patroclus, heard the clamor and roused Achilles. They immediately joined the fray. Penthesilea sprang at them like a leopard. She hurled her lance at Ajax but it glanced off harmlessly, as fate had decreed that no enemy's blade would taste his blood. He drove the Trojans back and left Achilles to deal with Penthesilea. Together, Ajax and Achilles seemed irresistible, but Ajax' courage and skill were his undoing. As he left his home his father admonished him to go forth and win, but to win with the gods on his side. Ajax boasted that any fool could win with the help of the gods; he would gain honor and glory by himself. He refused to acknowledge Agamemnon as his commander on the grounds that he had come to Troy of his own free will, in fulfillment of his oath, and was not subject to anyone. In battle he rejected the aid of Athena and advised her to go and help those who needed it, for the line would not break where he was in command. The gods did not forget. After the death of Achilles, his mother Thetis commanded that her son's arms be given to the mightiest of the Argives. Only Odysseus and Ajax dared claim them, although it was Ajax who had borne the body of dead Achilles back to his comrades through the very ranks of the enemy. Ajax suggested that Idomeneus, Nestor, and Agamemnon should choose which of them had earned the arms. Nestor grieved; for he said that whoever was not selected would be lost to the Greeks. He suggested that they let the captive Trojans decide who had done them the most harm—Ajax or Odysseus. Ajax was insulted. He accused Odysseus of cowardice, reminding him that he had tried to escape coming to Troy in the first place. He scornfully pointed out that Odysseus had his ships in the center of the line where they would be protected, whereas Ajax had his own ships guarding the flank of the line. He challenged Odysseus to a duel to decide who should have the arms. Odysseus replied that strength was not wisdom, and that his wisdom had meant more to the Greeks than the strength of Ajax. The Trojan captives agreed with Odysseus that his cunning had harmed them more than Ajax' valor, and the armor was awarded to Odysseus. Ajax was infuriated, feeling that the armor was rightly his. Moreover, Odysseus was his ancient enemy and he scorned him as an intriguer who fought with words, not with weapons. Crazed with jealousy, he resolved to kill the Greeks who had been responsible for the award. Athena maddened him, so that through one long night he slaughtered innocent cattle under the impression that they were his Greek enemies. He seized a ram and hung it up in his tent and tortured it, thinking that it was Odysseus. Then in the midst of his frenzy Athena restored his sanity. He was appalled and humiliated to learn that he, the bravest of the Greeks, had so disgraced himself by the slaughter of animals. Too late he recognized that he was being punished for his pride. Bidding goodbye to his captive wife Tecmessa, who loved him dearly, and to their young son Eurysaces, he went off alone to wash himself clean in the salt sea and to pray to the gods. Finally he fixed his sword, which Hector had given him, in the foreign sands of Troy and hurled himself upon its point. From his blood was said to have sprung up a purple flower bearing on its leaves the letters ai, which were the first letters of his name in Greek, and also an exclamation of woe: alas! According to some accounts, Menelaus tried to prevent his heartbroken brother Teucer from giving honorable burial to his corpse, and Agamemnon agreed with him, but they were persuaded by Odysseus, who now acknowledged the great contributions and courage of his old enemy, and who even offered to help Teucer with the funeral rites. But others say Agamemnon grieved over the loss of Ajax, and that Odysseus did too, saying that he would never have taken the arms of Achilles if he had known how much they meant to Ajax. It is also said that Ajax' body was not burned as was the custom for warriors who fell in battle, but that he was buried on the headland of Cape Rhoeteum. The arms of Achilles were later given to Neoptolemus, Achilles' son. On the way home from Troy they were lost in the sea during a great storm. Thetis found them and, as recompense to Great Ajax in death, she caused them to be washed ashore on his tomb. Ajax was worshiped as a hero by the Athenians. Each year young men sailed from Athens to Salamis to sacrifice to him.

Ajax the Lesser, or Oilean Ajax. In Greek legend, a son of Oileus and Eriopis. He was a captain of Locrians who went with the Greeks to Troy, and although he was small and wore only a linen corselet, he surpassed all the Greeks in skill as a lancer. Also, next to Achilles he was the fleetest runner of the Greeks. As did others, he accepted Hector's challenge to single combat but was eliminated by the drawing of lots. Poseidon, in the guise of Calchas, came to encourage the Greeks after Hector had driven them back to their ships, and put divine strength into the two Ajaxes to stand firm. Ajax, a runner himself, could tell by the legs and ankles that it was not Calchas and realized it was a god who aided them. He fought savagely and, being so swift, slew more Trojans in that fight than any of the other Greeks. He cut off the head of Imbrius and hurled it into the Trojan camp, and when the Trojans at length breached the fortifications he and Telamonian Ajax held them off from the ships. After the fall of Troy the Greeks sacked the city. Ajax found Cassandra in the temple of Athena and dragged her away from the sacred image as his concubine. However, Agamemnon wanted Cassandra. To get her, Odysseus spread the tale that Ajax had committed sacrilege in Athena's shrine. This aroused the wrath of all the Greeks and Cassandra was taken away from him. On the way home from Troy Ajax' ship was wrecked on the Gyraean rocks. Ajax saved himself by climbing onto the rocks but, according to some accounts, was slain by a thunderbolt hurled by Athena to punish him for violating her shrine, in spite of the fact that he had expiated this crime. According to other accounts, it was Poseidon who sundered the rocks with his trident and drowned him. Thus did the gods easily change sides to bring disaster to those they had formerly aided. The spirit of Ajax went to the island of Leuce where it consorted with the spirits of Achilles and Helen. Thetis rescued his body and buried it on the island of Myconus, and for many years thereafter his countrymen annually launched a ship with black sails and burnt it in his honor. Ajax. Probably the earliest extant tragedy by Sophocles. It treats the death of Ajax, and the respect and compassion felt by Odysseus for the brave man who had been his bitter rival.

The scene is before the tent of Ajax in the Greek camp near Troy. Athena addresses Odysseus, who is seen furtively approaching the tent. She asks him why he is at the tent of Ajax, which guards the flank of the camp. He answers that in the night someone slaughtered the cattle and sheep the Greeks had taken as booty; Ajax is suspected of the butchery. It was indeed Ajax, the goddess informs him. He did it to punish the Greeks for awarding the arms of Achilles to Odysseus rather than to him. He intended to kill his fellow Greeks but the goddess inspired Ajax with madness. He slew cattle, roped many of them, and drove them to his tent as prisoners. Odysseus shall see for himself. She calls Ajax. Still under the spell of madness, he comes from his tent and greets Athena but does not see Odysseus whom the goddess has hidden from him. He has killed Agamemnon and Menelaus, he says, for taking away his prize and he has that crafty fox Odysseus trussed up in his tent. He will torture his ancient enemy and then kill him. So saying, he returns to his tent. Athena gloats over the power of the gods to punish those who in their pride of strength blaspheme them, as she has punished Ajax. Odysseus pities his old enemy for the awful fate which has him in its grip. They withdraw. A chorus of sailors, companions of Ajax, enter. They link their fate with that of Ajax. Odysseus has been spreading tales about Ajax, they say. If his tale is true it was the work of a man inspired with madness by some angry god. They appeal to Ajax to come out, to protect and command them. Tecmessa, Ajax' captive wife, comes out. Mighty Ajax has been brought low, she tells the sailors; in a fit of madness he killed cattle under the impression that they were his Greek enemies. But now Ajax has been restored to his senses and his state is even more grievous, for he knows what he has done. She describes his wild rage when the madness was on him, and his terrible anguish when his sanity was restored and he beheld his handiwork. In his present despair she fears he will do some dreadful thing. The sailors hear Ajax groaning and suggest it may calm him to look upon the faces of his friends. Tecmessa opens the tent door and Ajax, sitting among the slaughtered beasts, is revealed. He asks the sailors, his only friends, to put him out of his misery. He torments himself by picturing the scorn Odysseus and the Greeks will heap upon him—Ajax—the fearless fighter who has slaughtered innocent beasts. This is the end of Ajax, he cries. Well is he named Aias, which means "Alas!" He recalls the honor of his family and his own valor in battle. It was Athena's work that he was maddened as he was about to avenge himself on Odysseus and the Atridae for denying him the arms of Achilles, and that he slaughtered dumb beasts instead. And what is now left for him, hated alike by the gods, his fellow-Greeks, and the Trojans? He cannot go home to his father in disgrace. He will have honor in life or he will seek it in death. Tecmessa pleads with him to think what will happen to her if he dies. She loves him. Can he forget that and desert her and their son? He rejects her pleas, then in an address to the sailors he seems to change his mind. Nothing is impossible, he says. The most sacred oath is fallible, a will of iron may bend. He is loath to leave a widow and child among his enemies. He will go to the sea and wash himself clean. Discipline is necessary; henceforth he will obey his commanders, and he will remember that though he now hates his enemy, the time may come when he will have need of him. He asks Tecmessa to pray to the gods for him. Telling his sailors that when next they see him he will be safe, he withdraws.

Presently a messenger enters with the news that Ajax' brother Teucer has returned and has given orders that Ajax must not leave his tent. If he does so, Calchas the seer had warned Teucer that he would never see Ajax again. Calchas said the gods were angry with Ajax for blasphemous boasting, as when he had told his father that any fool could win with the gods beside him but he intended to win glory and honor on his own account. Again, when Athena came to help him in battle he told her to go help others, that he had no need of her assistance. Athena resolved to punish him. But if he could live through this day, he might be saved from the anger of the gods. This is the reason for Teucer's order. But Ajax has already gone. All scatter in alarm to look for him.

In a new scene Ajax appears on the sands. He plants his sword firmly in the earth by the hilt, with the point up. This is Hector's sword, he says, and he will die by it here on enemy soil. He prays to Zeus that Teucer will find his body, that death will come swiftly, and that the Furies will hound the Atridae for causing his death. He bids farewell to the bright day, to his dear and sacred land of Salamis, even to the soil of Troy, then hurls himself on his sword and dies. The sailors and Tecmessa come on the scene. All lament the loss of their leader and protector when Tecmessa finds his body. Teucer rushes in. He is heartbroken at the death of his beloved brother. He says he failed Ajax in his hour of need, and fears the reproaches of his father when he returns without him. He pulls out the sword on which Ajax is impaled, recognizes it as the one Hector had given to him after their duel, and notes sadly that Hector had slain Ajax from beyond the grave. As he prepares to bury Ajax, Menelaus approaches and forbids the burial on the grounds that Ajax was a traitor who would have killed them if it had not been for Athena. Therefore he must suffer the most horrible punishment—denial of the sacred rites of burial. They could not control Ajax while he lived but in his death they can put him in subjection. Teucer hotly defends Ajax. He and Menelaus exchange insults and the latter withdraws. Tecmessa approaches with her son Eurysaces. The sailors grieve. Ajax could protect them; now that he is gone, who knows what will happen to them? Agamemnon strides in and assails Teucer, and also forbids the burial. Teucer cannot believe that the man for whom Ajax fought so valiantly would forget so quickly. As Agamemnon and Teucer wrangle, Odysseus enters. The sailors appeal to him to resolve the quarrel. Odysseus is Agamemnon's most trusted adviser. He advises the latter not to anger the gods by denying this brave man, once his own enemy, the sacred rite of burial; not to let obstinacy betray him into an act of impiety. He is thinking not only of Ajax, he says, but of himself; for one day he will require these same rites. Agamemnon does not understand, but yields to Odysseus' advice and departs. Teucer, astonished that it should be Odysseus who would champion Ajax, thanks him warmly but politely declines the assistance Odysseus now offers in performing the rites, as he thinks it would be displeasing to Ajax even in death. Odysseus accepts this decision, and Teucer calls on the dead man's son Eurysaces to help prepare the rites for his father.

Alabanda (al-a-ban'da). Ancient city of Caria, Asia Minor, on the site of the modern Arap Hissar. It is said to have been founded by Alabandus, who was later regarded by the inhabitants as a deity. (JJ)

Alabastrum (al-a-bas'trum) or Alabastron (-tron). In ancient Greece, a small elongated vase for unguents or perfumes, rounded at the bottom and provided with a broad rim about a small orifice. Vases of this class were originally so called because made of alabaster; but the name was applied also to vessels of similar form and use in other materials, as metal, glass (sometimes richly ornamented in color), or pottery.

Alalcomenae (al-al-kō-mē'nē). In ancient geography, a village of Boeotia, named, some say, for the aboriginal Alalcomeneus who brought up Athena; others say it was named for Alalcomenia, a daughter of the aboriginal Boeotian king Ogygus. Nearby was a stream named Triton near which the inhabitants claimed Athena was born. The temple of Athena in the village housed an ivory image of the goddess. When the Roman Sulla was raging through Greece in the 1st century B.C., he is said to have stolen the ivory image.

Alalcomenean (al-al-kō-mē'nē-an) Athena. An epithet of Athena, with reference to the story that she was brought up in the home of Alalcomeneus in Boeotia, and was thereafter considered to be the guardian of Boeotia.

Alalcomeneus (al-al-kō-mē'nūs). According to legendary accounts, the first man. He appeared near Lake Copaïs in Boeotia. He was the founder of Alalcomenae in Boeotia, and was said to have brought up Athena in his house. He built a temple to Athena in Alalcomenae.

Alastor (a-las'tor). In Greek mythology, an actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; TH, then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

Alba Fucentia/Alcaeus

epithet of Zeus as the avenger; also applied to any avenging deity or demon.

Alba Fucentia (al'ba fu-sen'shi-a) or Alba Fucens (fu'senz). [Modern name, Alba Fucense, Albe.] Village near Avezzano, in C Italy, in the province of Aquila. It contains an ancient amphitheater of the usual Roman elliptical plan, 114 by 305 feet, estimated to have seated 20,000 people. The arena measures 68 by 159 feet. The site also preserves extensive polygonal limestone fortification walls of c300 B.C., and in recent years excavations have revealed a forum of unusual archaeological interest.

Alba Longa (al'ba long'ga). In ancient geography, a town in Latium, Italy, about 15 miles SE of Rome, the ancient center of the Latin League. Its foundation is traditionally ascribed to Ascanius, son of Aeneas, and its destruction (665 B.C.) to Tullus Hostilius.

Alban Hills (al'ban). [Italian, Monti Láziali, Monti Albani.] Mountain group SE of Rome, near Albano Laziale. Its highest point is Monte Cavo.

Albanus, Lacus (al-bā'nus lā'kus). [Italian, Lago (di) Albano, Lago di Castello.] Small lake in C Italy, noted for its picturesque scenery and occupying the crater of an extinct volcano. At the beginning of the 4th century B.C. the Romans were besieging the Etruscan city of Veii. According to the tale, in the course of the ten-year siege the waters of the Alban Lake, confined within their rocky walls, were observed to rise gently in an extremely dry summer. The waters rose steadily, overflowed the crater's rim and rushed down to flood the surrounding fields. News of this prodigy reached the enemy in Veii. An Etruscan soothsayer there laughed with glee when he heard of it. A Roman soldier who had become friendly with the soothsayer during the long siege lured him to the Roman camp, where he was imprisoned and compelled to interpret the prodigy concerning the waters of Albanus Lacus. He said there was an ancient oracle that Veii could never be captured until the waters of the Alban Lake overflowed and then were reconfined so that they did not mingle with the waters of the sea. The Roman Senate distrusted the enemy soothsayer, and sent to Delphi to inquire into the matter. The priestess told the Roman envoys that the Romans had neglected certain ceremonies in connection with the Latin feasts. She added that the waters must be confined; they must under no condition be allowed to flow to the sea. If the Romans could not force them back, they were instructed to dig ditches and canals to absorb the waters and thus prevent them from flowing to the sea. On receiving the instructions from Delphi the Roman priests offered sacrifices; the Romans set to work and dug canals and ditches to drain off the water. Shortly thereafter, under Camillus in 396 B.C., the Romans captured Veii. Another explanation for the construction of the canals and the channel bored through rock (still in existence) lies in the utilization of the water for purposes of irrigation.

Albinus (al-bī'nus), Spurius Postumius. Roman consul (334 and 321 B.C.); fl. late 4th century B.C. He was a commander at the defeat of the Romans by the Samnites at the Caudine Forks.

Albunea (al-bu'nē-a) or Albuna (al-bū'na). In Roman mythology, a fountain nymph who had the gift of prophecy. She was said to have inhabited a fountain near the grove of Faunus.

Alcaeus (al-sē'us). A legendary son of Perseus and Andromeda. He was the father of Amphitryon and Anaxo by Astydemia, daughter of Pelops; or by Laonome, or by Hipponome, daughter of Menoeceus. His grandson Heracles was called Alcaeus before he was given the more famous heroic name.

Alcaeus. In Greek mythology, a son of Androgeus, and a grandson of Minos, king of Crete. He was bequeathed the island of Paros by Rhadamanthys, his great-uncle. Heracles, on his way to fetch the girdle of the Amazon queen, stopped at Paros for water. Two of his crew were killed by the inhabitants. In retaliation he waged war on the Parians. At length they sued for peace and offered him any two men he might choose to atone for the two sailors they had killed. Heracles chose Alcaeus and his brother. They went aboard his ship and accompanied him to the land of the Amazons.

Alcaeus (al-sē'us) or Alkaios (-kī'os). Greek poet who flourished in Mytilene in Lesbos, c611-580 B.C. He fought against Athens for possession of Sigeum but was defeated and lost his shield to the enemy. Next, because he joined with the aristocrats of his native city in their struggle against the tyrants, he was banished, and spent many years traveling about as a soldier of fortune. Ultimately he was pardoned and invited to return to Mytilene. The lyrics of Alcaeus, in Aeolic dialect, are thought to be the prototype of Sappho's who was a contemporary of his. The existence of fragments of complimentary verses exchanged between the two poets has led some to believe that they were romantically attached to each other. Fragments of the hymns, political songs, drinking songs, and love songs, which made up ten books in the Library at Alexandria, survive. He was the probable inventor of the Alcaic verse, a metrical form much used by later classical poets.

Alcaids (al-kā'idz). A name meaning "Descendants of Alcaeus." It was applied especially to the children of Megara and Heracles as supposed descendants of Alcaeus.

Alcamenes or Alkamenes (al-kam'e-nēz). Greek sculptor, born at Lemnos 'or Athens and active c450-c400 B.C. According to Pausanias he was the most skillful pupil of Phidias and, like him, worked in gold, ivory, and bronze as well as in marble. He probably assisted Phidias in the decoration of the Parthenon. He is known to have done Aphrodite of the Gardens (a copy of which is now at Athens), which is considered a masterpiece of his period, and bronze cult statues of Athena and Hephaestus in the temple of Hephaestus overlooking the Athenian Agora. The famous caryatids of the Maiden Porch of the Erechtheum on the Athenian Acropolis have also been attributed to him, on stylistic grounds.

Alcandre (al-kan'drē). In Homeric legend (Odyssey), the wife of Polybus, king of Egyptian Thebes. She entertained Menelaus and Helen when they stopped there on their way home from Troy, and gave Helen rich gifts.

Alcathous (al-kath'ō-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia. He won Euachme, daughter of King Megareus, according to some accounts, by killing a lion that had slain Megareus' son. He succeeded Megareus as king of Megara and with the help of Apollo rebuilt the walls of the city. In the course of constructing the walls Apollo leaned his lyre against one of the stones and ever afterward that stone sounded a musical note when it was struck with a pebble.

Alcathous. In the Iliad, a Trojan chieftain who was married to Aeneas' sister, Hippodamia. He led a group at the siege of the Greek fortifications and was slain by Idomeneus.

Alcathous. In Greek legend, one of the last Trojans slain by Achilles. Achilles had been wounded and his life, but not his fighting spirit, was draining away when he flung his spear at Alcathous and killed him.

Alcathous. In Greek legend, one of the suitors of Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus. He was killed by Oenomaus after being overtaken in the race which Oenomaus required of all the suitors of Hippodamia. Some say that he was buried near the race-track at Olympia and that it was his ghost that ever after frightened the horses of charioteers, making them rear and overturn the chariots, unless the spirit was propitiated with appropriate sacrifices.

Alcestis (al-ses'tis). A legendary daughter of Pelias, king of Iolcus. According to some accounts, she refused to take part with her sisters in the spurious rites Medea proposed to prolong her father's life, but which resulted in his death. These accounts say that Jason then gave her as wife to Admetus, king of Pherae. Others say that Admetus won her by yoking a boar and a lion to a chariot and successfully driving them. In any event, she was the wife of Admetus, who had been promised by Artemis that when Death came for him, he would be spared if he could find a substitute to go in his place. When the time came all too soon, no one was willing to go in place of Admetus except his devoted wife Alcestis. She gave her life that Admetus might be spared. But she did not remain long in the Underworld. On learning of her sacrifice Admetus' friend Heracles went to the Underworld, wrestled with Death to secure her release, and restored her to Admetus. The story of Alcestis' nobility and unselfishness, contrasted with Admetus' willingness to give up what he most loved in order to live a little longer, is told by Euripides in his drama Alcestis (q.v.).

of King Admetus of Phærae, who consented to die in her husband's place.

The scene is at Phærae, outside the palace of King Admetus. Apollo, carrying a golden bow, comes from the palace. Angered because a thunderbolt had felled his son Asclepius, Apollo killed the Cyclopes who forged the thunderbolt. To punish him, Zeus commanded Apollo to serve Admetus as a herdsman. Admetus was kind and just. To reward him, Apollo secured a promise from the Fates that on the day Admetus was meant to die, he could escape his fate if another would consent to take his place. When that day came none could be found; not even his aged father and mother, who were almost at the end of their lives, would make this sacrifice. At last Alcestis, the loyal wife of Admetus, volunteered in order to save her husband. Now the day for her departure for the realm of death is here. Apollo must leave in order to escape pollution. Death enters with a drawn sword in his hand. He berates Apollo for cheating him of his true prey. Apollo jests with him, and attempts to dissuade him from taking Alcestis, but in vain. Death enters the palace to find his quarry and Apollo departs. A chorus of elders enters, mourning for Alcestis, and unsure whether she is dead or still alive. One of the handmaidens of Alcestis tells them that her mistress is already in her death robes. She has prepared herself for death, prayed for the welfare of her children, and said farewell to her marriage bed. All in the palace weep for her. The agony of Admetus will be worse than if he had died as fated. The chorus prays for a reprieve, for a rescuer who will save Alcestis.

A funeral procession comes from the palace. Admetus supports his fainting wife. Their children are with them. Alcestis calls out that death is near. She reminds Admetus, who begs her not to leave him, of the gift of life she gives him with her death, a gift not even his own parents would proffer. She begs him not to set another woman over her children. Admetus promises. He wishes he might charm the gods as Orpheus did; then he would recover Alcestis from Hades. He swears that when he dies, he will be put in the same tomb with her. Alcestis grows faint and dies. All mourn. Admetus swears to honor her above all, since she alone would die for him. Her body is carried back into the palace, with Admetus and his children in attendance. The elders sing an ode in praise of Alcestis.

Heracles, clad in a lion's skin, enters and addresses the elders. He is on his way to fetch the mares of Diomedes as one of his labors for Eurystheus. While he talks, Admetus, dressed in mourning, comes from the palace. He welcomes Heracles, but does not speak of his loss. He says merely that he must bury a corpse and answers Heracles' questions evasively, so that the latter does not know who has died. Heracles does not wish to intrude and prepares to leave, but Admetus insists that he remain and assures him that his visit will not be marred by the sound of lamentation, for he will put Heracles in a secluded part of the palace. Some attendants lead Heracles off to his quarters. The chorus cannot understand why Admetus has hidden from Heracles the news of Alcestis' death. Admetus tells them that if Heracles knew of his misfortune, he would never enter the palace. Rather than violate the laws of hospitality, Admetus has not exhibited his private grief and will not let it affect Heracles, although he knows some will criticize him for this. He enters the palace and returns, leading the funeral procession for Alcestis. Among the mourners is Phères, father of Admetus. He greets the body of Alcestis. Admetus berates him. If Phères had been a proper father, he would have died in Admetus' place and Alcestis would be alive. Each accuses the other of cowardice, the one on the ground that, though he is old, he would not die for his son; the other because he let his wife die for him. Admetus sends his father away, saying he is no true father, and leads the procession to the funeral pyre.

A servant in mourning hurries out of the palace and complains about the strange guest who has come. This guest does not honor the grief of the king. Instead he puts flowers on his head and is making merry with wine. Heracles reels out and chides them all for their gloomy faces. He would like to see a little gaiety. He urges them to take a drink and to cheer up. As he talks the servant realizes that Heracles does not know who it was that has died, and at last he tells him. Heracles is smitten with remorse for his levity. He resolves to rescue Alcestis from Hades. He will go down there, wrestle with Death and restore Alcestis to her husband. He departs.

Admetus returns from the funeral pyre, mourning the loss of Alcestis. The chorus tries to encourage him, but it is useless. He now knows it would have been better to have died himself than to permit the sacrifice Alcestis has made and so bring shame on himself as well as grief. He covers his head and weeps. Now Heracles returns, leading a veiled woman. He blames Admetus for not telling him Alcestis was dead, but to show he forgives him he offers Admetus the veiled woman whom he says he won in a wrestling match. He asks Admetus to take her into his house and care for her. Admetus protests that he will take no woman into his house. He will always honor Alcestis and keep his promise to her. He begs Heracles to take away this woman, whose form is so like that of Alcestis. The chorus says he must take a gift offered by the gods. Heracles tells him that he cannot mourn forever; it is true that he has lost a good wife but time will heal his wound. He persists and at last Admetus, protesting that he loves only Alcestis and always will, agrees to take the woman's hand and lead her into the palace. He puts out his hand but turns his head away. Heracles places the hand of the veiled woman in the hand of Admetus and snatches off the veil. Saying that Admetus will not deny that Heracles is a grateful guest, he commands Admetus to look at the woman and see if she is not like Alcestis. Admetus does so, and is startled, but is finally persuaded that this is his dear Alcestis, restored to him by Heracles. He welcomes her with rapture.

Alcibiades (al-si-bī'ā-dēz). Athenian general and politician, born c450 B.C. at Athens; killed at Melissa, Phrygia, 404 B.C. His father was Clinias, who claimed descent from Eurysaces, the son of Telamonian Ajax. On his mother's side he was a member of the wealthy Alcmaeonid family. His father, who had fought bravely at Artemisium (480 B.C.), was killed (447) fighting the Boeotians and Alcibiades was brought up as a ward of Pericles, one of his kinsmen. From childhood he loved rivalry and sought preëminence. A story is told that once as a youth he was wrestling, and to prevent his opponent from gaining a fall, he bit him. His opponent accused him of biting "as women do." "Not as women do," Alcibiades retorted, "but as lions do." He pursued his studies successfully but was not a docile scholar. He refused to play the flute on the ground that it made men look ridiculous when they puffed and blew out their cheeks. He justified his refusal to play it by citing the goddess Athena, who threw the flute away in disgust when she saw how it distorted her face, and the god Apollo, who flayed the flute-player Marsyas. He consented to play the lyre, which a gentleman could play with dignity, while at the same time he could converse or sing in company with it. As he grew up he drew many prominent and able men to him with his brilliant youthful beauty, and in the fashion of the time had many who sought his company. To them he displayed unparalleled insolence, which had the effect apparently of binding them even more securely to him. Once, it is said, Anytus, one of his most ardent admirers, invited him to a banquet. Alcibiades did not attend. He spent the evening drinking with his companions; then going to the house of Anytus and, observing the gold and silver cups on the banquet table, he sent in a servant to sweep up half of them and carried them away. Anytus refused to be insulted. On the contrary, he remarked that Alcibiades had shown great kindness in taking only half of his cups. On another occasion because of a wager he struck Hipponicus, the father of Callias, with his fist. The unwarranted assault aroused great indignation in the city. The next day Alcibiades went to the house of Hipponicus, took off his cloak, and invited Hipponicus to beat him. Hipponicus forgave him, refused to scourge him and later gave him his daughter Hipparete in marriage. Hipparete was a discreet and affectionate wife and bore his children. However, Alcibiades continued to carry on scandalous and public affairs with various courtesans. Hipparete left him and finally sued for divorce. When she appeared in court, Alcibiades strode in, seized her and carried her off through the agora to his home. She lived with him until her death, which occurred not long afterward. He had a famous stable of horses and once entered seven racing chariots in the games at Olympia—the only man ever to enter so many—and won first, second, and fourth (or third) prizes. Such an extravagant display made a great stir in Athens and in the other cities as well, and Nicias cited it as an instance of the arrogance of Alcibiades. Alcibiades justified his extravagance on the ground that it glorified Athens. The people were delighted with his retort. Along with his arrogance and lawlessness, he had such brilliance and excellent native qualities that he won the devoted friendship of Socrates, the only man he respected and loved. Socrates feared that Alcibiades would be ruined by those who pandered to him and had no hesitation in pointing out to him the many areas in which he fell short of excellence, and bent his efforts—unsuccessfully as it turned out—to developing his great native talents. When Alcibiades served in the campaign against Potidaea (432–431 B.C.), Socrates shared his tent and was his companion in arms. In a fierce action Alcibiades fought bravely and was wounded. Socrates with conspicuous bravery defended his fallen comrade and saved him together with his armor. At a later time Alcibiades returned the service. When Socrates was participating in the general retreat at Delium (424 B.C.), Alcibiades came by on horseback and protected him from the encompassing enemy.

Because of his birth, wealth, and courage in battle, his many friends and followers, and his personal magnetism, it was natural that he should enter public service. Fundamentally aristocratic in his views, having stated that democracy is “acknowledged folly,” he yet used the tools of democracy to further his ambitions which were without limit. His initial appearance in public life was the occasion on which he made the first of his many large contributions to the state. He soon became a leading figure and, as leader of the radical party, he was the rival of Nicias. Hyperbolus, a “base fellow” according to Thucydides, thought to take advantage of this rivalry for his own ends. He engineered a vote of ostracism with the idea that either Alcibiades or Nicias would be ostracized.

When Alcibiades became aware of it, he joined forces with Nicias and the result, astonishing to all, was that Hyperbolus himself was ostracized. However, the unity with Nicias was short-lived. Alcibiades schemed to break the peace with Sparta negotiated by Nicias (421 B.C.). He plotted with the Argives. He attacked Nicias in the assembly, accused him of treachery and raised a great outcry against him. When Spartan envoys came to negotiate, he secretly met with them, it is said, and persuaded them to say that they did not have full powers to negotiate, as in fact they had. When they then stated in the assembly that their powers were limited, Alcibiades accused them of lying. Nicias was confounded by their change and the negotiations collapsed. Alcibiades was then appointed general (420 B.C.), and urged the Athenians to extend their dominion on land, as was required by the oath young warriors took “to regard wheat, barley, the wine, and the olive as the natural boundaries of Attica.” He brought the Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans into alliance with Athens and persuaded Argos and Patrae to build walls to the sea. But after the Spartan victory at Mantinea (418 B.C.) he was not re-elected as general and Nicias took his place. Conservative and respectable men feared him for his influence and were indignant at his personal life, for all his public acts were accompanied, as Plutarch says, “with great luxuriousness, with wanton drunkenness and lewdness, with effeminacy in dress—he would trail long purple robes through the agora—and with prodigal expenditures.” He carried a golden shield the device of which was an Eros armed with a thunderbolt. But the people, though they feared his insolence, admired his military skill, were charmed by his discourse and looked indulgently on his excesses, excusing them as the high spirits of youth. According to Aristophanes, the public “yearns for him, and hates him too, but wants him back.” (Frogs.)

When the Eggestaeans of Sicily sent envoys to Athens (416 B.C.) and asked for aid against Selinus, Alcibiades was foremost in urging the Athenians to answer their appeal. By his eloquence, which even the comic poets acknowledged, he inspired the Athenians with the wildest hopes and dreams of conquest.

Some say his interest was to win glory for himself, and that Sicily was to be but the stepping stone for the conquest of Carthage and Libya. Nicias and some others, among them Socrates, opposed the expedition and on good grounds. But Alcibiades fanned the enthusiasm of the young men with extravagant hopes and set their elders to dreaming of past glories. The exercise grounds were crowded with men who daily drew maps of Sicily, Carthage, and Libya in the sand. Those who considered such an expedition to be folly found it prudent to say nothing of their doubts. An expedition was voted and a great armament was prepared. Alcibiades, Nicias (against his will), and Lamachus were named generals with full powers. Two unfavorable omens marred the carnival-like atmosphere in which the fleet made ready to sail. It was discovered that many of the Hermae—square stone figures surmounted by a head of the god Hermes which stood at the entrances to temples and before private houses—had been mutilated. This act of impiety greatly aroused and disturbed the Athenians and large rewards were offered for information concerning its authors, and of any other acts of impiety to the gods. Alcibiades was implicated in a charge of having taken part in a drunken mockery of the rites of Eleusinian Demeter. The two impieties were thought to be connected and his enemies claimed that they were part of a plot by which he planned to overthrow the democracy. He demanded a trial before he set out on the expedition for he understood how perilous it was to be starting off with such suspicions hanging over him, and he wanted at once either to be cleared of the charges, or to be executed for impiety. His enemies feared he would be acquitted by the people. They claimed that some of the allies in the expedition might withdraw if Alcibiades was not the commander; therefore he should sail and stand trial on his return. He could not persuade them otherwise. The day for the departure fell on the festival of Adonia, in which small images of the dead Adonis were carried in procession and were given burial rites. This was thought to be unfavorable as foretelling that the splendid armament would fade in its glory as had the youthful beauty of Adonis. Nevertheless, in the summer of 415 B.C. the splendid fleet sailed.

Hardly had the expedition arrived in Sicily when a galley came from Athens bearing news of Alcibiades' recall. He went aboard willingly, but when the galley put in at Thurii he went ashore and escaped. When news of his escape reached Athens, he was tried in absentia on a charge of impiety. His property was confiscated, priestesses were ordered to curse his name, and he was condemned to death. When he heard the sentence in the Peloponnesus whither he had gone, he exclaimed, "I'll show them that I'm alive!" He went to Sparta, where he asked for immunity and offered his aid. The Spartans were instantly charmed by him. All were amazed to see the luxury-loving Athenian adopt the rigid Spartan ways, even to sharing the simple diet of black pudding with the soldiers. He urged the Spartans to send help to Syracuse against the faltering Athenians under Nicias. He also persuaded them to renew the war against Athens at home and lastly, and most devastating for the Athenians, he advised them to fortify Decelea. This was a mountain fortress of Attica, about 14 miles from Athens, which commanded the Attic plain and the routes to Euboea and Boeotia. The Spartans adopted his advice and effectively removed from Athenian control all the farmland that had supplied Athens with food. Although the Spartans used the advice of Alcibiades to their advantage, he ultimately lost their good will. Their leaders became jealous of him. While King Agis was away, Alcibiades seduced his wife Timaea, and the child she subsequently bore was presumed to be his. He went to Ionia on a successful mission to stir up revolt against Athens. While there, he learned that the Spartans had sent orders demanding his death. He went (412 B.C.) to the Persian satrap Tissaphernes whom he advised to be less generous in his aid to Sparta. Rather, he suggested, Tissaphernes should encourage Athens and Sparta to exhaust themselves and then they would be easy prey for the Persian king. Athens was in straitened circumstances and desired the return of Alcibiades. In 412–411 B.C. he sent secret messages to the Athenian forces at Samos, hinting at aid from Tissaphernes

for Athens if the democracy was overthrown. However, he did not return to Athens when the Four Hundred seized control there in June, 411 B.C. He went to Samos and took command of a fleet. By his advice he prevented the Athenians at Samos from sailing to the Piraeus to overthrow the Four Hundred, for they would have left the Hellespont and Ionia defenseless before the Spartan fleet operating in nearby waters. When the Four Hundred were overthrown in Athens (Sept., 411 B.C.), he was invited to return. He wanted some military successes to take back with him. He defeated the Spartans at Abydos and then went to Tissaphernes, who had been his great friend. Tissaphernes, however, now feared Athens and cast him into prison. Within a month he escaped and joined the Athenians at Cardia in the Thracian Chersonese and led them to victory over the Spartan commander Mindarus at Cyzicus (410 B.C.). In the following year he routed both the Persian satrap Pharnabazus and the Spartan Hippocrates, plundered the satrapy of Pharnabazus, and captured Selymbria on the Hellespont. In 408 B.C. he took Byzantium and was now ready to return to Athens. He sailed back from Samos with a fleet decked with the trophies of his victories and was wildly acclaimed when he landed. His property was restored, he was crowned with a gold crown, and he was elected general with sole powers by land and by sea. In his prosperity he determined to celebrate the rites at Eleusis and clear away any lingering shadow as to his piety. Since the Spartans had occupied Decelea the procession had been carried to Eleusis from Athens by sea. He resolved to take it across the ancient sacred way and to protect it with his soldiers, and carried out his resolve. He became so popular that the people sought to make him their tyrant. There were others who feared him, however, and encouraged him to sail and pursue the Spartans. He assaulted Andros but failed to take the city (Oct., 408 B.C.). Plutarch says he was ruined by his own reputation for success, for when he failed it was thought he did so deliberately, and now his enemies renewed their attacks on him. But the truth was that the Athenians had voted him full power but no money, and he had to occupy himself sailing about to collect funds. While he was doing this he left the fleet at Notium in charge of Antiochus, with strict orders not to engage the Spartans. Antiochus disobeyed and was lost with the ships that went to his aid in an engagement with the Spartans at Ephesus (407 B.C.). When Alcibiades learned of it he set out against the Spartan commander Lysander but the latter refused to fight. This was held to be treachery on the part of Alcibiades. The fickle Athenians again turned against him. He fled to Thrace with some mercenaries and occupied a stronghold near Pactye. Before the battle of Aegospotami (405 B.C.) he saw the peril in which the Athenian fleet had placed itself vis-à-vis the Spartans, and rode down to the Athenian camp to warn the generals. They invited him to go away and were utterly defeated in the ensuing battle with Lysander. After the defeat of Athens, Alcibiades retired to Bithynia, then proceeded to the satrap Pharnabazus, a good friend of Sparta, and offered his services to the Persian king Artaxerxes. The Spartans sent orders to have him slain. It is said that when he was visiting the courtesan Timandra, he dreamed that he was lying in her arms and that she was robing him in women's clothing and painting his face. According to one account, when he was in his house with her, the minions of Pharnabazus set fire to his house. He rushed out unscathed to quell his attackers. But they dared not meet him hand to hand and slew him with javelins and arrows. Some say Timandra recovered his body, dressed it in her own sumptuous robes, and gave it as brilliant a burial as was possible.

Alcidamas (al-sid'a-mas). Greek rhetorician, born at Elaea, Asia Minor, who flourished in the 4th century B.C. He was a pupil of Gorgias. Alcidamas was the only one of the Sophists to propose the actual abolition of slavery as a practical matter. He was instructor in eloquence at Athens and last of the purely sophistical school of rhetoricians. Two extant declamations, one on composing written speeches and the other—the authenticity of which is questioned—an indictment of Palamedes by Odysseus, are ascribed to him.

Alcides (al-sī'dēz). An epithet applied to Heracles as a descendant of Alcaeus, father

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, of Amphitryon, who was Heracles' supposed father.

Alcidice (al-sid'i-sē). In legend, the wife of Salmoneus. She died when her daughter Tyro was born.

Alcimedē (al-sim'e-dē). According to some accounts, the mother of Jason. She was a daughter of Clymene, granddaughter of Minyas, and for this reason the Argonauts were often called "Minyans." She tried to persuade Jason not to go to Colchis.

Alcimedēs (al-si-mē'dēz). In Greek legend, one of the seven sons of Jason and Medea. The others were Medeus, who was sometimes called the son of Aegeus, Mermerus, Pheres, Tisander, Thessalus, and Argus. According to Euripides, when Jason deserted Medea for Glauce, a princess of Corinth, Medea sent two of her children with a poisoned robe to Glauce which burned her to ashes when she donned it and gave off such flames that the palace was set on fire and Creon, her father, was consumed in the flames. Then, according to the story, she murdered her two children. Others, however, claim that the Corinthians bribed Euripides to write that Medea destroyed her children. These claim that the Corinthians seized all Medea's children except Medeus from the altar of Hera's temple where they had gone for sanctuary, and stoned them to death to avenge the deaths of Glauce and King Creon by their mother's magic arts. The children's bodies were buried in the temple on instructions from the oracle at Delphi, and their souls became immortal. Ever after, the Corinthians expiated the crime of killing the children, including the seven daughters of Jason and Medea, by sending seven boys and seven girls, with shaven heads and clad in black garments, to spend a year in the temple where the murder of the children had taken place.

Alcimedon (al-sim'e-don). A legendary Arcadian hero whose daughter Phialo was ravished by Heracles. When she bore a son Alcimedon banished them from his mountain cave, bound and gagged Phialo, and left her and her baby on the mountain to die. Her child's cries were heard by a jay which, mimicking the infant's cries, flew off to Heracles. Thus he was led to the spot where Phialo and her child were lying and he rescued them.

Alcimedon. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Laertes. He was a captain of the Myrmidons under Patroclus. He took charge of the immortal horses Balius and Xanthus when Patroclus fell and Automedon, Patroclus' charioteer, remained to fight on foot.

Alcinous (al-sin'ō-us). In Homeric legend (Odyssey), a king of the Phaeacians. He was the husband of Arete and the father of Nausicaä. Odysseus managed to get ashore on the island kingdom of Alcinous after the raft on which he had sailed from Calypso's island broke up in a storm. Encountering Nausicaä on the shore, Odysseus prevailed upon her to conduct him to her father's court. Alcinous, encouraged by his wife, welcomed him as a stranger and promised to provide a ship to take him home. In the course of a feast Odysseus was called on to tell his name and history, and many of the adventures which he had experienced since leaving Troy are told for the first time during his stay with the Phaeacians. When Alcinous learned who he was, he wanted to keep Odysseus as a son-in-law, but refused to hold him against his will. He gave him many gifts and sent him in one of the Phaeacians' ships to Ithaca. In later legend it is said that Jason and Medea landed on the island of the Phaeacians in their flight from Colchis. Here the Colchians overtook them and claimed Medea. But Alcinous, advised by his wife, refused to surrender Medea if she was married to Jason. A marriage was hurriedly arranged and some of the disappointed Colchians, fearing to return to Colchis without Medea, settled among the Phaeacians.

Alciphron (al'si-fron). Greek writer; fl. 2nd century A.D. In particular, he was the writer of imaginary letters which, though models of Attic style, purported to be the work of contemporary lower-class Athenians. The approximately 124 letters extant constitute a valuable description of social conditions and manners of the period; those supposedly written by famous hetaerae reflect the work of New Comedy writers, especially Menander.

Alcippe (al-sip'pē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Ares and Aglauros (or Agrauros), the daughter of Cecrops and Agrauros. Halirrhothius, a son of Poseidon, tried to violate her and was killed by Ares. For this murder Ares was brought to trial at a place that came to be known as the Areopagus, meaning "Hill of Ares," and was acquitted by the Olympian gods sitting in judgment on him. This is said to have been the first murder trial.

Alcippe. In Greek mythology, the wife of Evenus and the mother of Marpessa who was won by Idas in a contest with Apollo.

Alcippe. Sometimes named as the legendary wife of Metion, son of Erechtheus, and the mother of Daedalus.

Alcippe. In Homeric legend (Odyssey), an attendant of Helen at the court of Menelaus in Sparta.

Alcis (al'sis). According to some accounts, a daughter of Antipoenus of Thebes, a descendant of the Sparti. When Heracles decided to resist Erginus, king of the Minyans who was attacking Thebes, an oracle foretold victory if a descendant of the Sparti voluntarily died for Thebes. Alcis and her sister Androclea gladly killed themselves for the good of their country, and were afterward worshiped as heroines in the temple of Artemis in Thebes.

Alcithoë (al-sith'ō-ē). In Greek legend, one of the three daughters of Minyas, king of Orchomenus. Her sisters were Arsippe and Leucippe. Dionysus invited them to participate in his revels. They denied the divinity of the god, and even after he had transformed himself successively into a lion, a bull, and a panther to demonstrate his powers, they continued to mock him and refused to join the revels. To punish them Dionysus inspired them with madness. In their frenzy the sisters seized Hippasus, son of Leucippe, tore him to pieces and devoured him. But some say they remained at home occupied with their weaving during the revels, and that their looms turned green and their thread was changed into twining ivy. In the end they were transformed by Dionysus into bats.

Alcmaeon (alk-mē'on). In Greek legend, a son of Amphiaraus the seer and Eriphyle. Ten years after the disastrous expedition of the Seven against Thebes, in which Amphiaraus disappeared into the earth, the Epigoni (sons of the original Seven) proposed to make war on Thebes and avenge their fathers.

They learned from an oracle that the expedition would be successful if Alcmaeon commanded it. According to some accounts, before Amphiaraus had departed on the first expedition, he had left orders commanding his sons to kill their mother Eriphyle and to march on Thebes when they grew up. Because he had not yet punished his mother, Alcmaeon was reluctant to lead the new expedition. Others say he thought it was unwise and disputed with his brother Amphilochus about the matter, and that they agreed to submit the question to their mother for a decision. She, bribed by Polynices' son Thersander, advised them to make war on Thebes. The expedition was successful, but Alcmaeon overheard Thersander boasting that he had brought about the success by bribing Eriphyle, as his father had bribed her before the first expedition. Alcmaeon was furious when he learned of this second bribe that might have caused his death as the first bribe had caused his father's. He consulted the oracle at Delphi and interpreted the answer to mean that he should kill his mother. This he did with the help, some say, of Amphilochus. As she was dying Eriphyle uttered a curse, praying that no land should offer shelter to her murderers. Alcmaeon, pursued by the Furies, first fled to his grandfather Oicles in Arcadia then went to Phegeus, king of Psophis. He took with him the necklace and robe with which his mother had been bribed. Phegeus purified him and gave to him in marriage his daughter Arsinoë. Alcmaeon gave the fatal necklace and robe to his new wife. But Eriphyle's curse was operating and he was hounded by the Furies. The land of Psophis became barren. An oracle advised him to go to the river-god Achelous. Achelous purified him and gave him his daughter Callirrhoe in marriage. Alcmaeon colonized the land that had been deposited as silt by the Achelous river; this land, not having been formed at the time of his mother's curse, was free to receive him and here he lived peacefully for some years. Callirrhoe bore him two sons, Acarnan and Amphoterus. Some time later Callirrhoe coveted the ill-omened necklace and robe of Eriphyle and commanded Alcmaeon to fetch them for her. He went to Phegeus and told him an oracle had instructed him to take the necklace and robe to Delphi and he would be cured of his madness. Phegeus, with Arsinoë's consent, gave him the robe and necklace but on learning that Alcmaeon had taken another wife for whom he sought the robe and necklace, Phegeus commanded his sons to kill Alcmaeon and take the robe and necklace to Delphi where they could bring no further disasters. The sons of Phegeus carried out their father's orders. Alcmaeon was killed. The robe and necklace were taken to Delphi where, according to Pausanias, they remained until the 4th century B.C. when they were stolen. According to Euripides, when Alcmaeon and the Epigoni took Thebes, Alcmaeon took Manto, a daughter of the seer Tiresias, and became the father of a son Amphiloehus and a daughter Tisiphone by her. He later sent Manto to Delphi as part of the booty from Thebes and gave his two children to be brought up by Creon, king of Corinth. Tisiphone grew to be so beautiful that Creon's wife, jealous of her beauty, sold her as a slave. The purchaser, unaware of her identity, was Alcmaeon.

Alcmaeon of Croton (krō'ton). Greek physician and philosopher, born at Croton, Italy, and active c500 B.C. He was a younger contemporary of Pythagoras and perhaps his disciple. He was the most famous of the Greek physicians preceding Hippocrates, and has been called "the father of Greek medicine." His book is lost and only a few fragments of his writings have remained, but it is known that he was one of the first to perform dissection, by means of which he discovered the optic nerve, distinguished in the cadaver empty veins and veins carrying blood, and knew the trachea. He gave explanations of sleep, of the origin of sperm, of sense impressions, and made physiological experiments. He was the first to recognize that the brain is the central organ of intellectual activity, and held that health and disease are respectively an equilibrium and a rupture of equilibrium of the organism.

Alcmaeonidae (alk-mē-on'i-dē). Noble family of Athens, a branch of the family of the Nelidae which, according to tradition, came from Pylus in Messenia to Athens about 1100 B.C. Among the more notable members of the family are Alcmaeon, an Athenian general in the Cirrhaean war; Megacles, a son of Alcmaeon and a rival of Pisistratus; Clisthenes the legislator and son of Megacles; Pericles, the celebrated Athenian statesman, great-grandson of Megacles; and the scarcely less-famous Alcibiades, cousin of Pericles. The family was banished for sacrilege about 596 B.C. on account of the action of the Alcmaeonid archon Megacles, who in 632 B.C. put to death the participants in the insurrection of Cylon while they clung for protection to the altars. They returned through an alliance with Lycurgus, carried on with varying fortunes a struggle with Pisistratus and the Pisistratidae, and were finally restored in 510 B.C.

Alcman or Alkman (alk'man) or Alcmaeon (alk-mē'on). Greek poet, founder of the Doric school; fl. in the middle of the 7th century B.C. Because of some references in one of his works to Lydia it was thought that he had been born in Lydia, had been captured in war, and taken as a slave to Sparta where his poetry caused the Spartans to free him and give him citizenship. This is legend; he was a Spartan from birth. His poetry, in a non-literary dialect, expresses his personal emotions and enthusiasm in clear and simple meters. For these reasons and for the personal feeling and simplicity of expression, he is often considered the inventor of love poetry. He wrote, especially for choral performance, hymns, paeans, processions, and parthenia (maidens' songs). In 1855 there was discovered on an Egyptian papyrus a parthenion which is one of the earliest poems to show a definite tendency toward intentional rhyme.

Alcmaon (alk'mā-on). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Greek, the son of Thestor. He was slain by Sarpedon, in revenge for having wounded Glaucus, the dear comrade of Sarpedon. With his death Sarpedon surmounted the Greek rampart, thus opening the way for many Trojans to follow him.

Alcmene (alk-mē'nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Electryon and the mother of Heracles. Her father promised her to Amphitryon but she would not allow the marriage to be consummated until the deaths of her eight brothers had been avenged. While Amphitryon was away fighting the Taphians for this purpose, Zeus visited Alcmene. He had decided to make her the mother of a mighty hero, and because he knew she was chaste he came to her disguised as her husband. Alcmene was the last mortal woman Zeus embraced. He told her that her brothers had been avenged and spent with her one night, which he caused to be prolonged to three times the usual length. Amphitryon returned the next day but Alcmene, having entertained Zeus in the belief that he was her husband, did not welcome the returned warrior with great enthusiasm. In due time she bore twin sons, Heracles and Iphicles. Heracles, who she learned from the seer Tiresias was the child of Zeus, she abandoned out of fear of Hera, but he was restored to her by Athena. Iphicles was the child of Amphitryon. Alcmene outlived her famous son and was the protectress of his children. She accompanied them to Athens, the only Greek city willing to defy Eurystheus' order to banish them, and when he made war on Athens and was defeated, Alcmene ordered his death. After the death of Amphitryon Alcmene married Rhadamanthys, who had fled from Crete to Greece, and lived with him at Ocalea. She died at a great age and a tomb at Haliartus was said to be the tomb of Alcmene and Rhadamanthys. But some say she died in Thebes, where she was worshiped as a goddess. These claim that when Alcmene died Zeus sent Hermes to steal her body from the coffin. Hermes substituted a stone for the body of Alcmene and carried her off to the Elysian Fields and it was there that she married Rhadamanthys. The Heraclidae, carrying the coffin in the funeral procession, were astonished at its great weight. After some discussion they set the coffin down, opened it, and found the stone Hermes had put inside. This they set up in a sacred grove at Thebes where there was later a shrine of Alcmene. But still others say she died in Megara where there was also a shrine of Alcmene.

Alcon (al'kon). In Greek legend, a skilled archer who accompanied Heracles on his mission to obtain the cattle of Geryon. He could shoot through rings on the helmets of soldiers standing in file, and could split arrows that were impaled on spear points. He was the father of Phalerus the Argonaut and once killed with an arrow, without harming the boy, a serpent that had coiled around his son's body.

Alcon. Known as a Trojan warrior, the son of Megacles. In the struggle for possession of Achilles' body, Alcon wounded Odysseus but was in turn slain by Odysseus.

Alcyone (al-sī'ō-nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Aeolus and the wife of Ceyx. After her husband's death she was changed into a kingfisher (alcyon); it was said that her father causes the winds to cease for seven days at the beginning of the winter solstice and seven days after it, so that the seas will be calm while the kingfishers nest. See Ceyx.

Alcyone. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pleione and Atlas; one of the Pleiades. By Poseidon she was the mother of Hyrieus (sometimes also called Anthas). With her sisters, her image was placed among the stars. See Pleiades.

Alcyone. A sister of King Eurystheus. In the legend, Homadus, a centaur, attacked her and attempted to ravish her. Heracles, hearing her cries, ran up, killed him, and won great praise for protecting the sister of his enemy.

Alcyone. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a name sometimes given to Cleopatra, wife of Meleager, because her mother Marpessa had cried like an alcyon (kingfisher) when she was carried off by Apollo.

Alcyoneus (al-sī'ō-nus). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. Heracles pierced him with his arrow and threw him to the ground but as it was his native soil Phlegra, he sprang up renewed. On the urgent advice of Athena Heracles then carried him into Boeotia which was not his native soil, and killed him with a club.

Alcyoneus. In Greek legend, a giant herdsman who twice stole the cattle of Helius. He won control of the Isthmus of Corinth and when Heracles sought to cross with the cattle he was driving back from Geryon's land, Alcyoneus flung a huge stone to prevent him from crossing. Heracles batted the stone back at Alcyoneus with his club; it struck and killed him.

Alea (ā'lē-ā). Epithet of Athena. The ancient sanctuary of Athena Alea in Tegea was said to have been founded by Aleus, great-grandson of Zeus and Callisto. An oracle predicted that a child of Auge, daughter of Aleus, would slay his uncles. Aleus determined, therefore, that she should bear no children and made her a priestess in the temple of Athena Alea. But Heracles, visiting Aleus, seized Auge near the fountain of the sacred precinct and ravished her. The land was smitten by a blight and was relieved only when the profanation of Athena Alea's temple was revealed and Auge was removed from it. Among the objects dedicated in the ancient temple were: a sacred couch of Athena, the tusks and hide of the Calydonian boar, the bronze manger taken from the camp of Mardonius after the Battle of Plataea (479 B.C.), and the fetters the Spartans had brought to bind the Tegeans. However, having defeated the Spartans in battle, the Tegeans used these to bind the Spartans. The sanctuary of Athena Alea at Tegea was respected by all in the Peloponnesus as a place of refuge for suppliants. To it Leoty-chides, the Spartan victor at Mycale (479) fled in 476 B.C., having been accused of bribery in his war against Thessaly. Nearly a century later (395 B.C.), the Spartan king Pausanias also sought refuge here, having been accused of cowardice in a war in Boeotia. The ancient sanctuary was destroyed by fire (c394 B.C.) and was replaced by a magnificent temple, of which Scopas was the architect and sculptor. The priest in the temple had to be a boy who had not yet reached puberty. The ancient image of Athena Alea (and some say, the tusks of the Calydonian boar also) was carried off by the Emperor Augustus (63 B.C.-14 A.D.) and set up in the Forum at Rome. Other images of Athena Alea were on the road from Amyclae to Therapne in Laconia, and at Alea in Arcadia.

Alea. In ancient geography, a city on the E border of Arcadia, near Argolis. According to tradition the city was founded by Aleus, grandson of Arcas and great-grandson of Zeus. The city was noted for its great sanctuaries of Ephesian Artemis and Athena Alea. A festival of Dionysus, the Scieria, was celebrated every other year here, at which time the women were flogged as the Spartan boys were flogged before the image of Artemis Orthia. Alea was abandoned shortly after 371 B.C. when its inhabitants went to live in the new city of Megalopolis.

Alebion (ā-lē'bi-on). [Also: Albion.] According to mythology, a son of Poseidon. He and his brother Dercynus attempted to steal some of the cattle which Heracles had taken from Geryon as Heracles was driving them through Liguria. Heracles fought them off until his supply of ammunition was exhausted. He then prayed to Zeus, who sent a shower of stones onto the plain. Heracles picked up the stones, flung them at Alebion and Dercynus and killed them. The spot where the shower of stones fell became known as the "Stony Plain." It is near Marseilles.

Alecto (ā-lek'tō). In mythology, one of the three Erinyes, or Eumenides, born of the blood of Uranus which fell on Gaea when Cronus mutilated him. Alecto was called the "unresting." Juno called on Alecto, as a maker of grief who revels in war, violence, and quarrels, to rouse the Latins against Aeneas when he had come peacefully to the kingdom of Latinus.

Alesia (ā-lē'zhā). A city founded, according to legend, by Heracles on his journey into Iberia to seize the cattle of Geryon. The name commemorated the wanderings of his companions and himself. The city remained free until Caesar took it by storm, 52 B.C., from Vercingetorix. The site is occupied by the modern village of Alise on the Côte d'Or in France.

Alesium (ā-lē'zhi-um), Mount. Mountain in Arcadia, on the road between Mantinea and Tegea. Its name, which means "wandering," was given to it because here Rhea wandered when she was looking for a place to bear Zeus. On the mountain was a grove sacred to Demeter. At the foot of the mountain was a sanctuary of Poseidon Hippius, the original of which was said to have been built by Agamedes and Trophonius. It was forbidden to mortals to enter the sanctuary and across its entrance the builders stretched no barrier but a thread of wool. Inside the sanctuary, according to ancient legend, was a fountain of sea water. Aepytus, king of Arcadia, disregarded the prohibition against entering the sanctuary, cut the woolen thread and went in. As he did so a wave of sea water swept into his face and blinded him. Centuries later when the ancient sanctuary was in ruins, the Roman Emperor Hadrian commanded that a new sanctuary be built over the ruins of the old one. Workmen detailed to complete the task were forbidden either to look into the old sanctuary or to move any of the ruins.

Aletes (a-lē'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Clytemnestra and her paramour Aegisthus. After Clytemnestra and Aegisthus were slain by Orestes, Aletes became ruler of Mycenae. Orestes, after great suffering and wandering, at length was purified of his crime. He returned to Mycenae, slew Aletes and regained his inheritance as ruler of Mycenae.

Aletes. In Greek legend, a son of Hippotes, and a descendant of Heracles. After the Heraclidae invaded the Peloponnesus, he learned that he could win the city of Corinth only if he was given a clod of earth. Later when he asked a Corinthian peasant for bread he was given a lump of earth instead. Outside the city walls he met the daughters of the king of Corinth. On his promise to marry the youngest daughter, he persuaded her to open the gates of the city so that he could conquer it. Thus 30 years after the invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Heraclidae, he took possession of Corinth. When he was waging war against Athens he was informed by an oracle that he would take the city if its king remained unharmed. Codrus, king of Athens at the time, also learned of the oracle and some say that he killed himself, or took measures that led to his death, in order to fulfill the oracle and save his country.

Alethia (al-ē-thī'a). In Greek mythology, the personification of Truth. She was supposedly a daughter of Zeus. Her Roman counterpart was called Veritas.

Aleus (ā'lē-us). In Greek legend, king of Tegea and the father of Amphidamas, Auge, Cepheus, and Lycurgus. The oracle at Delphi informed him that his wife's brothers would be slain by his daughter's son. To prevent the fulfillment of the prophecy Aleus made his daughter Auge a priestess of Athena and therefore dedicated to chastity. His attempts to prevent her from bearing sons were unsuccessful, as Heracles violated her and she bore him Telephus.

Alexander (al-eg-zan'dēr). Another name for Paris, son of Priam and Hecuba, brother of Hector, and abductor of Helen.

Alexander. [Called Alexander Lyncestes.] Fl. 4th century B.C. A native of Lyncestis in Macedonia (whence his surname "Lyncestes"), he was implicated with his brothers in the murder of Philip II of Macedon in 336 B.C. Because he was the first to do homage to Alexander the Great the latter pardoned him and raised him to a high position in the army, but afterward put him to death for treasonable correspondence with Darius III.

Alexander I (of Epirus). King of Epirus; died c330 B.C. He was the son of Neoptolemus and the brother of Olympias, mother of Alexander the Great. His youth was spent at the court of Philip II of Macedon who made him king of Epirus. Philip II gave him his daughter in marriage to strengthen his ties with Epirus and her king, whose sister Olympias he had recently cast aside. At the celebration of the marriage of Alexander and Philip's daughter, Philip was murdered. Alexander's aid against the barbarians of Italy was sought by Tarentum in 334 B.C. His arms met with such success in southern Italy that Rome thought it expedient to make an alliance with him. Subsequently, Tarentum came to fear the conqueror who had come to her aid, renounced her alliance with Alexander, and during a battle that ensued at Pandosia Alexander was stabbed in the back and killed.

Alexander II (of Epirus). King of Epirus, son of Pyrrhus and Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse. He succeeded his father in 272 B.C. He was dispossessed of Epirus and Macedonia by Demetrius, whose father, Antigonus Gonatas, had been deprived of Macedonia by Alexander. Epirus was recovered subsequently chiefly with the aid of the Acarnanians.

Alexander I (of Macedon). King of Macedon (c500-c454 B.C.). He was a son of Amyntas I, whom he succeeded. In the Persian Wars he was allied to Persia, both by ties of marriage and by force, for his father had given earth and water to Darius in token of his submission to the Great King. In the spring of 479 B.C. Mardonius sent him as an envoy to Athens because he was aware of Alexander's friendship for Athens. Alexander was authorized to tell the Athenians that Mardonius would forgive the wrong they had done to the Persians, restore their territory, and rebuild their temples if Athens would join an alliance with him. Alexander added his own words, as a known friend of Athens, to persuade them to make an alliance. For, he said, they could never overcome the power and might of the Persian Empire. To him the Athenians replied, "So long as the sun keeps his present course, we will never join alliance with Xerxes. Nay, we shall oppose him unceasingly." According to Herodotus, when the Greeks were encamped at Plataea, waiting favorable omens to engage Mardonius, a man rode up on horseback to their camp at night, and asked to speak to the generals, but would not give his name. He told the generals that out of friendship for Athens, and at great peril to himself, he had come to inform them that the Persians had been unable to obtain favorable omens for many days and had decided to attack without them on the next day. He also told them that Mardonius' supplies were running low. Then he asked them to do something for his freedom if they were successful. Finally, he announced to them that he was Alexander of Macedon, turned his horse and rode back to the Persian camp and took up the station assigned to him.

Alexander II (of Macedon). King of Macedon (369–368 B.C.). He was a son of Amyntas II, whom he succeeded. He was murdered by his mother's paramour, Ptolemy Alorus (368 B.C.).

Alexander III (of Macedon). See Alexander the Great.

Alexander Balas (bā'lās). Usurper of the Syrian throne. He was born at Smyrna and occupied the Syrian throne from 150–145 B.C. Of humble origin, he was the self-alleged son of Antiochus Epiphanes. He was the protégé of a coalition including Ptolemy Philometor of Egypt which seized the throne from the Seleucid king Demetrius Soter. He was murdered in 145 B.C. by an Arabian ruler to whose domain he had fled.

Alexander Cornelius (kôr-nē'li-us, -nē'l'yus). [Called Alexander Polyhistor.] Greek writer, fl. 1st century B.C. He was a native of either Ephesus or Cotiaeum in Lesser Phrygia. He wrote a geographical-historical account in 42 books of nearly all the countries of the ancient world, and many other works of which only the titles and fragments have been preserved.

Alexander the Great. [Also: Alexander III (of Macedon.)] Macedonian ruler and conqueror of the civilized world, born at Pella, Macedonia, 356 B.C.; died at Babylon, June 13, 323 B.C. Alexander claimed descent from Heracles and from Aeacus, the ancestor of his favorite hero, Achilles. He was the son of Philip II of Macedon and the Epirote princess Olympias, whom Philip met in Samothrace when he was initiated into the mysteries there. Some say he inherited his military ability from his father, a rough mountain king of genius, while from his mother came his mysticism and impetuosity. Before he was born there were potent omens of his future greatness: his mother dreamed a thunderbolt fell on her body from which great flames sprang, spread all about, and were then extinguished; his father dreamed he sealed up his wife's body with a seal bearing the impression of a lion, a portent that she would bear a son as courageous as a lion. On the day of his birth the great temple of Artemis at Ephesus burned—some said this was because the goddess was absent assisting at his birth—and seers mourned over the ruined temple, foretelling that the day brought forth the ruin of Asia. Philip, victorious at Potidaea, on the same day received news that his horse had won at the Olympic Games, that Parmenio, his general, had conquered the Illyrians, and that his wife had borne him a son. Born amid so many successes, Alexander was considered destined for spectacular success himself.

Among his earliest teachers was Leonidas, a kinsman of his mother who trained him for conquest. A story is told that once when the lad was preparing to sacrifice, he filled both hands with incense to pour on the altar fire. Leonidas rebuked him, advising Alexander to be more sparing of his offerings until he had conquered the lands that produced them. Later (332 B.C.), when Alexander had taken Tyre, he remembered his old tutor. He sent him 500 talents of frankincense and 100 talents of myrrh, accompanying his gift with a message that Leonidas would no longer need to be stingy in his offerings to the gods. It is said that as a boy Alexander was unhappy when he learned of any new success won by his father for the more Philip won, the less there would be for him to conquer. Philip had a handsome horse in his stables, so high-spirited none could ride him and Philip ordered the horse destroyed. Alexander begged to be allowed to try his skill, and Philip reluctantly gave his permission. Alexander had observed that the horse was terrified by its own shadow. He turned its eyes into the sun, stroked and talked to it, succeeded in mounting, and was the first, and from thereafter the only one, to ride Bucephalus. On this occasion Philip is said to have told him proudly that he must find a kingdom for himself, "For Macedonia is too small for thee." Bucephalus was the mount preferred above all others by Alexander when he went into battle. Once when the horse was captured, he threatened to put to the sword all the inhabitants of the town where Bucephalus had been taken unless his horse was restored. Bucephalus was returned and Alexander then showed great moderation to the city. When at last Bucephalus died of old age after the crossing of the Hydaspes River in India, Alexander grieved as for a dear companion and built a city on the banks of the river which he named Bucephalia in his honor.

Philip was a great admirer of the Greeks whom he had subdued, and of Greek culture, and wished to be identified with them. In 343 B.C. he sent for Aristotle to come as a tutor to Alexander. Alexander studied literature and languages with him, and learned something of medicine, but did not subscribe to the philosophy subsequently evolved by Aristotle, and in later years his affection for the philosopher cooled. He was a great reader. His favorite book was the Iliad which he kept under his pillow at night along with his dagger. When he had embarked on his conquests he came into possession of a magnificent jeweled casket. In it he placed his copy of the Iliad, the only article that he felt worthy of the precious box. Ambassadors from Greece and the East coming and going at Philip's court gave him an education in political and diplomatic affairs. At the age of 16, Philip left him in charge of Macedonia while he was absent. Alexander subdued the hill tribes on the northern border of the kingdom and founded the city of Alexandropolis in his father's absence. In 338 B.C. he accompanied his father in the expedition against the Greek allies and led the charge against the Sacred Band in their defeat at Chaeronea. This was the first time the Sacred Band had suffered defeat. Philip was proud of his son's bravery but intrigues in his court caused a breach between father and son. Olympias, no longer secure in the affections of Philip, sought his downfall. When Philip took another wife (the Macedonian rulers practised polygamy) Olympias encouraged Alexander to take her side against his father. In 336 B.C. Philip was murdered, perhaps at the instigation of Olympias and possibly with the knowledge of Alexander. His infant son by his new wife Cleopatra was murdered as was Alexander's cousin Amyntas, thus removing rival claimants to the throne. Supported by the army, Alexander disposed of other rivals for the throne. He became king of Macedonia and leader of the Greeks in war against the predatory Persian Empire that had never ceased to intrigue with one after another of the Greek states to bring ruin to all Greece. Alexander spent two years restoring order in his father's turbulent kingdom, first pacifying the tribes in his rear. With the death of Philip, the Greek cities he had defeated burst into rebellion. Believing Alexander to be in Macedonia, they rose up to throw off his rule. By a forced march, so rapid as to be unbelievable, he arrived at rebellious Thebes. He offered to spare Thebes the violence of attack if the city would submit. The Thebans refused. Alexander stormed the city and razed it to the ground. By his order the temples and the house of Pindar the poet were left standing. Six thousand Thebans were massacred in the city before Alexander put an end to the slaughter, and 30,000 were sold into slavery. The furious destruction of Thebes must be ascribed largely to his Phocian and Boeotian allies, who thus brought low the proud city that had lorded it over them for many years. Alexander later regretted the destruction of Thebes, and attributed whatever misfortunes later befell him to the anger of Dionysus for having ruined his city. Now, however, he was truly master of the Greece he admired so ardently. He forgave the Athenians for going into mourning and omitting the celebration of the mysteries on the fall of Thebes; he never wavered in his admiration and respect for their city, and continued to treat the Athenians with courtesy and to enrich them with gifts. Before he made his forced march from Macedonia to Thebes, Alexander had marched through Greece and had been named general of the league of Hellas to lead the invasion of Persia. In Corinth, where he had been elected general, he had his famous encounter with the Cynic philosopher Diogenes, in which the latter requested the young king and general to "stand from between me and the sun." Alexander expressed admiration for Diogenes, and said if he were not Alexander he would choose to be Diogenes. He had also gone to Delphi and sought an oracular response on a day when it was forbidden to give them. He seized the priestess to compel her, and her remark, "My son, you are invincible," was oracle enough for him.

With order restored in Macedonia and Greece submissive, he set out (334 B.C.) to reduce Persia. His highly professional army which was devoted to him consisted of 30,000 heavy- and light-armed infantry and 5000 cavalry, with a superior siege train, commissary, and intelligence service. Crossing the Hellespont, he stopped at Troy to visit the ancient battleground, sacrificed to Athena, and honored the heroes who had fallen in the Trojan War. He ran naked, as was the custom, around the tomb of Achilles to honor his favorite hero. From Troy he marched to the Granicus River where the Persian forces were encamped and there he defeated them (334 B.C.). Of the great spoils taken, he kept little for himself, sent some to the Athenians, and the rest to his mother. Following his victory at the Granicus many of the cities of Asia Minor, including Sardis, surrendered to him, and the object of the league, the liberation of the Greek cities of Asia Minor from Persia, was accomplished. The tyrannies favorable to Persia were overthrown and democracies were established. Halicarnassus and Miletus resisted him and were taken by force. In Caria he restored the princess Ada to the throne and adopted her as his mother. According to Plutarch, while Alexander was deliberating what to do next, a fountain in Lycia overflowed and washed up on its banks a copper plate on which was written, in ancient characters, a prophecy that the time would come when the Greeks would destroy the Persian Empire. Taking this as a sign, he marched by the sea through Cilicia and Phoenicia along the coast of Pamphylia where, some say, divine power held back the waves so that his army could make its way on the beach (others say his soldiers waded in water up to their armpits), to Phaselis, where he stopped and danced about a statue of Theodectes he found in the market-place to honor this philosopher he had once known. He subdued the Pisidians, conquered the Phrygians, and turned inland to Gordium where he was shown the famous knot on the yoke of the chariot of Gordius. Concerning the knot, an oracle had decreed that whoever untied it would rule the world. Some say Alexander looked at it and impatiently cut it through with his sword. Others say he unloosed it by withdrawing the pin in the yoke about which it was tied. He reduced Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, and now Darius III led his Persian forces against him. At Tarsus, Alexander became very ill. None of his physicians dared prescribe for him lest he die and they be accused. Alexander's friend Philip, an Acarnanian, anxious for his health, concocted a potion to cure him. Philip did not know that Alexander had received a letter which accused him of plotting against the young king's life. He took the medicinal draft to Alexander and handed it to him. Alexander drank it, then handed the letter of accusation to Philip, having already indicated his perfect trust in his friend by drinking the medicine. Whether it was by reason of Philip's medicine or of nature, Alexander was soon well again and advanced to meet Darius who had mocked his delay as cowardice. The armies met in the mountainous defiles near the town of Issus. In such cramped quarters the large armaments of the Persians could not act effectively; the terrain was of great advantage to Alexander. In the thick of the battle Alexander was wounded, some say by Darius himself, but his forces surged on and the Persians were overwhelmed. Darius saw that the battle was lost. He abandoned his war chariot and fled on horseback, leaving his mother, his wife and his children behind in his camp. When Alexander learned of their presence among his captives he sent word that they need not grieve for Darius who still lived, nor fear him, as he intended to accord them the honor and service due their royal estate. Alexander kept his promise. Though Statira, wife of Darius, was counted the most beautiful princess living, he did not seek her out but had all the women of Darius' household maintained according to their customary standard. From his victory at Issus (333 B.C.), he took great spoils, the largest share of which he gave to his Thessalian horsemen because they had fought most gallantly. After Issus he resolved to render the Persian fleet harmless by winning control of the ports on the coast. He conquered Phoenicia, except for Tyre. Without a fleet, it seemed an impossible task to conquer Tyre, a city on an island. Alexander accomplished it by building a mole from the mainland to the island and after a siege of seven months the city fell (332 B.C.). He scattered its inhabitants, selling vast numbers of them into slavery. He took Gaza after a siege, and went on to Egypt (332 B.C.), where he was welcomed as a deliverer of the Egyptians from Persian tyranny. In Egypt he founded the city of Alexandria on the mainland opposite the island of Pharos, a site chosen, it is said, because of a dream in which Homer appeared to him and named Pharos. Alexandria was the first of 70 communities founded by him which became powerful forces for the Hellenization of the non-Greek world. While the city was being erected he made the difficult and dangerous journey across the desert to the oracle of Ammon in Libya, though seers advised him not to go. On the way the gods protected him, it was said, by sending rain so that his band would not perish of thirst, and by sending ravens to lead him when he was lost in the desert. The priest of Ammon addressed him as the son of Zeus and predicted that he would conquer the world. His circle encouraged him to believe he was the son of a god and it appeared that he was frequently willing to do so.

With the eastern coasts of the Mediterranean now in his possession he turned inland (331 B.C.). Darius had earlier sent word to him asking that he be allowed to ransom his family, and offering to partition his empire with him, ceding to Alexander all the lands west of the Euphrates. Parmenio, a general in his army who had served under Philip, said if he were Alexander, he would accept the offer of Darius. Alexander replied, "So would I, if I were Parmenio." But being Alexander, he wrote Darius a letter worthy of a conqueror, informing him that if Darius would come and surrender himself, he would be treated with every courtesy. Otherwise, Alexander was prepared to go and fetch him. Darius could not accept such terms and prepared to march against him. When the Macedonians arrived before the camp of Darius at Gaugamela (for the battle sometimes called the Battle of Arbela, 331 B.C.), the fires from the Persian camp at night gave stunning evidence of the vast forces Darius had arrayed against them. Alexander's generals advised that the attack be made at night when darkness would conceal the dangers of the battle. Alexander answered that he would not "steal a victory," went to bed, and slept so soundly he had to be awakened when it was time to muster his army. Dressed in spectacularly rich armor and mounted on Bucephalus, he charged the enemy at the head of his cavalry, the phalanx of foot soldiers following. The Persians were overwhelmed. Again Darius left his chariot and fled on horseback. Alexander would have pursued, but Parmenio sent a message calling for help in his sector. Alexander went to his aid, but from that time on he suspected Parmenio, now an old man, if not of treachery, at least of incompetence. After the victory at Issus Alexander was proclaimed king of all Asia. Of the rich spoils taken he sent some to Greece, some to the Greek cities of Italy, and with the rest he rewarded his friends and followers. He now proceeded into the heart of the Persian empire, first putting to the sword the many prisoners who were an encumbrance. At Susa he found fabulous treasure. Going on to Persepolis, the royal city, he found untold riches and sat upon the Great King's throne. Some say that at a banquet in the Persian king's palace his generals and their mistresses were present. Thais, the Athenian mistress of his general Ptolemy, when the company was flushed with wine, proposed that the palace be burned in revenge for the burning of Athens by Xerxes (480 B.C.). Alexander gave his permission, and the diners with heads garlanded paraded through the palace putting it to the torch. But soon Alexander regretted the wanton destruction and ordered the fire quenched. From Persepolis, having subdued Persia, Alexander set out after Darius. He pursued him through Media, where he left Parmenio to guard the treasures taken at the Median capital Ecbatana. With a small band, by a series of tireless marches, he chased Darius past the Caspian Gates and overtook him near Thara south of the Caspian Sea. The Persian nobles accompanying Darius, chief of whom was his cousin Bessus, stabbed him when he refused to continue the flight and deserted him. When Alexander arrived, Darius had just died (330 B.C.). In pity, some say, Alexander threw his own cloak over the body of the Great King, and later sent it with great pomp to the dead king's mother for burial with his ancestors.

From here he took his army through Parthia, south to Seistan in Drangiana (modern Iran), swung north and passed through Arachosia and Bactria to Maracanda (Samarkand) in Sogdiana, fighting and conquering all the way. The wealth he won and distributed to his friends began to have its effect on them. Some of them soon acquired a taste for luxury and extravagant living. He feared they would become soft and vulnerable. "Have you not yet learned," he asked, "that the end and perfection of our victories is to avoid the vices and weaknesses of those we conquer?" For himself, he kept in good physical condition by violent sports and hunting. He ate with moderation and, contrary to legend, he rarely drank but did enjoy sitting long over the wine in conversation with his friends. His mother wrote to scold him for enriching his companions for, as she said, if they became the equal of kings in wealth, they might attack his own kingship. He showed the letters to his dear friend Hephaestion and then ensured the latter's silence on these matters by placing his seal ring against Hephaestion's lips. He continued to send his mother rich presents from his spoils, but did not let her advice interfere with his plans. When he went through Parthia, he adopted Persian dress, and it seemed to his men that he wished to be honored as a god. More and more he adopted barbarian (Persian) customs, but at the same time he attempted to introduce Greek ways. He had 30,000 Persian boys chosen to be educated in the Greek tongue and the Macedonian military discipline. He married Roxana, a Bactrian princess, some say to make a stronger bond between the Macedonians and the Persians. The changes in his personal life and habits made his Macedonians uneasy. Of his dearest friends, Hephaestion followed Alexander in adopting barbarian ways, and was used as his emissary in dealing with them. Craterus kept to the Macedonian customs. Alexander was said to have had affection for Hephaestion, whom he called "Alexander's friend," and to have respected Craterus, whom he named "the king's friend." Wealth and luxury brought enmity and envy in its train. Philotas, son of Parmenio, became arrogant in his display of riches. His father advised him to be "less great," for he knew Alexander had received complaints of him. Philotas took no heed, and boasted that it was he and his father who had won the great victories for which Alexander claimed the credit. His boasts were repeated to Alexander who at first disregarded them. But when an abortive plot to kill Alexander was wrongly ascribed to Philotas, Alexander had him tortured and put to death. Afterward, he sent men to kill his father Parmenio who had faithfully served Philip as well as himself. Now many of his friends began to fear him. The Macedonians resented what they considered to be Persian domination over him. Clitus, one of his companions, during a long evening in Maracanda (Samarkand) in which much wine was drunk, accused Alexander of preferring the Persians who bowed the knee to him to the company of free-born men who dared to speak their minds. Clitus had saved his life in battle at the Granicus and reminded Alexander of it. Friends of both at the gathering tried to quiet Clitus. Alexander himself tried to change the subject. But the resentment he had stored up drove Clitus on. When he was hustled out of the room by guards, he returned through another entrance and shouted a verse from Euripides' Andromache: "In Greece, alas! how ill things ordered are." The lines that follow in the play (which Clitus did not speak) contained the insult:

"When trophies rise for victories in war, Men count the praise not theirs who did the deed,
But to the one commander give the meed;
Who, sharing with ten thousand more the fight,
For one man's service takes the general right."

Infuriated, Alexander seized a spear and ran Clitus through. Instantly he came to his senses, drew the spear from the body of his friend, and would have killed himself but for the intervention of his guards. He mourned for days, but his grief was at last eased by the self-made philosopher Anaxarchus, who told him, "Zeus is represented to have Justice and Law on either hand, to signify that all the actions of a conqueror are lawful and just." Alexander was able to convince himself with this, that his acts as ruler were just, thus doing irreparable damage to the qualities of moderation and justice he had formerly possessed. He became convinced that Callisthenes, a philosopher in his train who had been brought up in Aristotle's household, was in a plot against him. He seized Callisthenes, and with no grounds at all cast him into prison. There he died (327 B.C.) or as some say, was killed by Alexander's order.

His march of conquest now carried him from Maracanda north to Tashkent, across the Jaxartes River. He then turned south again, went through Bactria and on to the Indus River, which he crossed, and entered India (326 B.C.). He marched to the Hydaspes River where he defeated King Porus. Porus, badly wounded, fell into his hands. When Alexander asked Porus how he expected to be treated, he replied, "Like a king," and he was treated so. Proceeding from the Hydaspes, the Macedonians rebelled at the proposal to cross the Ganges, and he was compelled to turn back. He returned by way of the Indus valley and at the mouth of the Indus sent his admiral Nearchus on a voyage to the mouth of the Euphrates. Part of his own overland journey was made through deserts with great privation, and his forces were enormously reduced by lack of supplies. On the way he was harassed by hostile tribes and impeded by the necessity of subduing their cities. At one city of the Malli he performed an exploit of personal valor and recklessness that was typical of him. He climbed the wall of the town with a few companions in his impatience to take the place, and leaped in among the hostile forces. He was badly wounded before his army could gain entrance to the city and rescue him. At Carmania he came upon abundance again and spent days feasting and resting his army. Nearchus had met him at Gedrosia and gave such reports of his voyage that Alexander resolved to make one himself, but various parts of his empire were in revolt. Olympias had seized Epirus and Cleopatra had taken control in Macedonia. Returning through Persepolis, he married Statira, a daughter of Darius III, at Susa, as well as a second Persian wife, and gave the noblest of the Persian ladies to his friends. These marriages were intended to cement the ties between the Persians and Macedonians. Great feasts and celebrations attended the weddings. His friends grieved, however, to see him become Persianized. In 324 B.C. an open rebellion broke out in his army when he discharged some of his Macedonian veterans. In the end he quelled it by the force of his personality and his threat to take a Persian guard. Then he forgave the dissidents, rewarded the veterans too old for combat and sent them home. When Hephaestion died of a fever at Ecbatana (324 B.C.), he ordered the manes and tails of all his horses and mules cropped in mourning, destroyed the fortifications of neighboring cities, crucified the physician who attended Hephaestion, and forbade the playing of music until at last word came from the oracle of Ammon in Libya instructing him to make sacrifices to Hephaestion and to worship him as a hero. He fell upon the Cossaeans and put the whole tribe to the sword, some say as a sacrifice to Hephaestion. Proposing to go to Babylon, he was told by Nearchus that Chaldean diviners ordered him not to go there. He ignored the warnings, but as he proceeded unfavorable omens occurred in rapid succession: a tame ass kicked the finest lion he had and killed it; a man appeared, clad in the king's clothes, and seated himself on the king's throne, saying he was sent by Serapis. Alexander had him put to death, but the incident depressed him. Embassies from all over the world came to Babylon to honor him as the acknowledged conqueror. He planned and prepared a voyage to explore a route from Babylonia around Arabia to Egypt. All was in readiness, and on the approach of the departure, Alexander and one of his favorites drank deep to celebrate the departure for two days and nights. On the third day he was afflicted with a fever which he at first disregarded, but it persisted and with the elapse of ten more days he had succumbed and lost his speech. The Macedonians were led through his tent to say farewell to their king and commander. The next day (June 13, 323 B.C.), not yet 33 years of age, weakened by his old wounds and disease, he died at Babylon. Napoleon called him the greatest general in history. Alexander strongly believed in the fusion of races; all his wives were eastern princesses. His life altered the course of history, for he created a new world-society based on a common Greek culture. He became after his death a legendary figure to medieval Europe and to the Orient of all periods.

Alexandra (al-eg-zan'dra). Another name for Cassandra.

Alexandretta (al'ig-zan-dret'a). [Modern name, Iskenderun or Iskanderun.] A seaport on the Gulf of Alexandretta (Issus, Iskenderun) near Antioch, in the NE extremity of the Mediterranean Sea. The town was founded by Alexander the Great in 333 B.C.

Alexandria (al-eg-zan'dri-a). Name given to a number of cities, newly founded, reorganized by, or in the name of Alexander the Great during his campaigns in Egypt and Asia (334-323 B.C.). Those of special historical interest are listed below.

Alexandria. [Arabic, Al-Iskandariyah, Iskanderiyeh.] Seaport in NE Africa, in Egypt, founded (332 B.C.) by Alexander the Great, from whom the city took its name. It is situated at the NW extremity of the Nile delta on the strip of land which lies between the Mediterranean Sea and Lake Mareotis, about 133 miles NW of Cairo. The modern city occupies what was anciently the island of Pharos, together with the isthmus now connecting it with the mainland where the ancient city stood. According to Plutarch, Alexander chose the site of the ancient city because of a dream in which Homer appeared to him and mentioned Pharos. Surveying the location, Alexander remarked that Homer was a good architect. The lines of the city, which were laid out with flour, were devoured by flocks of many kinds of birds that swooped down. Alexander feared that the erasure of the lines by the birds was an unfavorable omen. However, seers convinced him that it meant not only that his city would be great but that it would become the nurse and feeder of many nations because there were so many kinds of birds in the flocks that fed on the flour. Ancient Alexandria was the capital of Egypt during the Ptolemaic period and became an important seat of Greek culture and learning. In 30 B.C. it was annexed by Rome and long ranked as the second city of the Roman empire.

Alexandria Arachosiae (ar-a-kō'si-ē). In ancient geography, a city of Arachosia, C Asia, founded by Alexander the Great, 329 B.C. The ancient site is now occupied by the city of Kandahar, SE Afghanistan.

Alexandria Arian or Arion (ār'i-an, a-rī'on). In ancient geography, a city of Aria, in C Asia, so named by Alexander the Great (330 B.C.) who made it the capital of his province of Aria. The site of the ancient city is now occupied by Herat in NW Afghanistan.

Alexandria Eschata (es-kā'ta). In ancient geography, a city on the Jaxartes River where it crossed the borders of Sogdiana in C Asia. The city was founded by Alexander the Great, c328 B.C., and was named Eschata (Furthest) to indicate that it marked the northeastern limit of his empire. The site of the ancient city is now occupied by Leninabad (formerly Khodjend) in the Tadzhik Soviet Socialist Republic, U.S.S.R.

Alexandrine War (al-eg-zan'drin, -drēn). The name given to the episode of 48–47 B.C. when Julius Caesar, infatuated with Cleopatra and wishing to have her recognized as queen of Egypt, established himself with a small garrison in the royal quarter of Alexandria and found himself besieged by furious mobs aided by the royal troops of Ptolemy XIII, Cleopatra's elder brother. Mithridates of Pontus, a free-lance adventurer, raised a force of irregulars and broke the siege; Ptolemy XIII was defeated and killed; the crown was assumed by Cleopatra, then about 23, and her younger brother, then a child of ten or 11, who became Ptolemy XIV. A short historical account, On the Alexandrine War, of uncertain authorship, is extant. (JJ)

Alexiades (a-lek'si-ār'ēz). According to Greek legend, one of the sons born to Heracles after he had been apotheosized and had married Hebe.

Alexicacus (a-lek'si-kā'kus). An epithet of Apollo, which means "Averter of Evil." It is said that the epithet was given him in recognition of the fact that by an oracle of Delphi he stayed the plague that afflicted the Athenians in the Peloponnesian War in 430 B.C. Apollo Alexicacus was much invoked and greatly honored.

Alexis (a-lek'sis). Greek dramatist at Athens; born at Thurii, Magna Graecia, Italy; fl. 4th and 3rd centuries B.C. He was a master of the Middle Comedy. A prolific writer, he was the author of about 245 plays, including one on the emancipation of women, fragments of which are extant.

Alilat (ā'li'lat) or Alitta (a-lit'a). An Arabian goddess, later identified with Aphrodite, who came to be worshiped by the Persians. The Assyrians called her Mylitta. The name may mean "the Goddess."

Alkaios (al-kī'os). See Alcaeus.

Alkamenes (al-kam'e-nēz). See Alcamenes.

Alcmene (alk-mē'nē). See Alcmene.

Allia (al'i-a). [Also: Alia; modern name, Aga.] In ancient geography, a small river in Latium, Italy, joining the Tiber about ten miles N of Rome. On its banks in c390 B.C., the Gauls under Brennus defeated the Romans. The battle was followed by the capture and sack of Rome.

Allobroges (a-lob'rō-jēz) or Allobrogi (-jī). In ancient history, a Celtic people of SE

Gaul, dwelling between the Rhodanus (Rhône) and the Isara (Isère) rivers, northward to Lacus Lemmanus (Lake Geneva). They occupied also a tract on the W bank of the Rhodanus. The chief town of the tribe was Vienna, now Vienne. They were made subject to Rome in 121 B.C. by Cnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus and Quintus Fabius Maximus.

Aloeus (al-ō'ūs). Named by Homer as the father of the giants, Otus and Ephialtes. Other accounts say they were the sons of Poseidon and Iphimedia, or Canace, and that Aloeus married their mother and brought up her sons by Poseidon as his own. See Aloidae.

Aloidae (al-ō-ī'dē). Ephialtes and Otus, the sons of Poseidon and Iphimedia or Canace. In Greek mythology they were called the Aloidae, "sons of Aloeus," because he was their mother's husband and their foster father. The handsome children grew at an astonishing rate each year, and by the time they were nine years old they felt equal to waging war on the gods. They seized Ares in Thrace, bound him and imprisoned him in a bronze vessel. After 13 months Ares was freed by the cunning of Hermes. They then piled Mount Pelion on Mount Ossa and attacked Olympus itself. Poseidon persuaded them to cease their attack on Olympus in return for the promise of Zeus not to punish them for their arrogance. This armistice was easier to arrange because of a prophecy that no other men or gods could kill the Aloidae. They next decided to carry off two goddesses. Otus chose to abduct Hera and Ephialtes desired Artemis. They first sought Artemis, but that goddess, on the advice of Apollo, fled over the sea to Naxos. Like all the sons of Poseidon, the Aloidae could skim over the sea and they followed her. She disappeared in a wood on the island and a white hind appeared in her place. The brothers separated to pursue it and approached it from opposite sides of the wood. Unaware that his brother was on the other side of the hind, each hurled his spear at the same time and, as the hind vanished, the spear of each went unerringly into the heart of the other. Thus the prophecy that no other men or gods could kill them was fulfilled, and Artemis had her revenge on them for daring to desire a goddess by causing the devoted brothers to kill each other. The Alodidae were the first mortals to worship the Muses; they were also paid the honors due to heroes by the people of Naxos. Their bodies were carried back to Boeotia for burial but their souls descended to Tartarus and were tied to posts with ropes of writhing serpents.

Alope (al'ō-pē). A legendary daughter of Cercyon, king in Arcadia. She was violated by Poseidon and bore a son, Hippothous who, though twice exposed to die, was saved. She was imprisoned by her father who did not believe Poseidon was the father of her child, and died and was buried near the road between Eleusis and Megara. Poseidon transformed her body into a spring of the same name.

Alope. In ancient geography, a city of S Thessaly, near the Sinus Maliacus (Gulf of Lamia). It was named, some say, for Alope, the daughter of Cercyon.

Alopecus (al-ō'pē-kus). According to tradition, a Spartan prince who is said by some to have found the wooden image of Artemis that Orestes brought back from Tauris. It had been lost a long time, and when Alopecus and Astrabacus came upon it in a thicket where it was held upright by willow osiers twining around it, they went mad at the sight of the image.

Alphaea (al-fē'a). An epithet of Artemis at Letrini in Elis. According to legend, the river-god Alpheus fell in love with her. When he realized he could not win her by persuasion he resolved on a violent course of action. With the intention of seizing her he went to the revels the goddess was holding at Letrini with her nymphs. Artemis suspected his intentions and daubed her face and the faces of her nymphs with white clay, whence the epithet, Alphaea. The river-god could not distinguish the goddess among the mud-daubed nymyhs and went away disappointed. From this the custom thereafter arose that at the celebration for the goddess in Letrini the celebrants daubed their faces with white clay.

Alpheaea (al-fē-ē'a). See Alphaea.

Alphesiboea (al'fē-si-bē'a). An Indian nymph. When Dionysus traveled in India he met her and fell passionately in love with her but she rejected his advances. Dionysus, transforming himself into a tiger, some say, compelled her to ride across the Sollax River on his back, and from this incident the river was renamed the Tigris.

Alphesiboea. In legend, the mother, by Phoenix, son of Agenor, of Adonis. But the general account is that Adonis was the son of Cinyras by his own daughter Myrrha.

Alphesiboea. A variant name of Arsinoë, daughter of Phegeus who married Alcmaeon.

Alphesiboea. In Greek legend, a daughter of Bias and the wife of Pelias, but the name of the wife of Pelias is usually given as Anaxibia.

Alpheus (al-fē'us, al'fē-us). River-god of the Alpheus River in Elis. On one occasion Arethusa, one of the chaste companions of Artemis, was bathing in his waters, and was terrified to feel an embracing movement about her. She leaped to the bank and fled. Alpheus pursued her and she called on Artemis for help. Artemis took her away to Ortygia near Syracuse, rent the earth and transformed Arethusa into a fountain that flowed from the chasm. Alpheus dived under the sea and made his way to Ortygia, and there mingled his waters with those of the fountain of Arethusa. It was said that a flower thrown into the Alpheus River in Greece would ultimately turn up in the fountain of Arethusa at Ortygia, having followed the route under the sea that was taken by Alpheus. On another occasion Alpheus went to Letrini where Artemis was holding revels with her companions with the intention of seizing the goddess. But Artemis suspected him and disguised herself and her maidens with white clay. Alpheus was unable to distinguish the goddess and was compelled to retire, as the maidens laughed at his disappointment. See Alphaea.

Alpheus River. [Also (for parts of its course): Rousphias, Rufia, Ruphia; Greek Alpheios.] River in Greece, in the Peloponnesus, flowing generally NW from S Greece into the Ionian Sea. The plain of Olympia touches its N bank, and its name is mentioned repeatedly in the legend and history of Greece. In more modern times, it occurs in English literature as the original of Coleridge's river Alph, mentioned in Kubla Khan. In Greek mythology, it was the river diverted by Heracles in order to clean the Augean stables. It flows at one point under the ground, and was for this reason believed by the ancient Greeks actually to flow under the sea to Sicily.

Alps (alps). [Latin, Alpes.] The most extensive mountain system in Europe, comprising a part of what is now SE France, most of Switzerland, a part of N Italy, a part of S Germany, and parts of Austria and Yugoslavia, and consisting of a number of ranges separated by deep valleys. The system was divided in ancient times into: 1) the Maritime Alps (Alpes Maritimae), including the Ligurian Alps, highest peak, Punta Argentera (10,184 feet) in NW Italy; 2) the Cottian Alps (Alpes Cottiae or Cottianus), highest peak, Monte Viso (Mons Vesulus) (12,605 feet) SW of Turin, NW Italy, near the French border; 3) the Graian Alps (Alpes Graiae), which include the Little St. Bernard Pass (7177 feet) over which Hannibal is thought to have marched into Italy in 218 B.C., highest peaks, Gran Paradiso (13,324 feet) in NW Italy, and the Barre des Écrins (13,462 feet) in SE France; 4) the Pennine Alps (Alpes Penninae), the highest portion of the system, which includes the Great St. Bernard Pass (Mons Penninus) (8111 feet) between Switzerland and N Italy and the summits Mont Blanc (15,781 feet) in SE France on the Italian border, Monte Rosa (15,217 feet) on the border between Switzerland and Italy, and Mont Cervin or the Matterhorn (14,780 feet) on the border between Switzerland and Italy; 5) Rhaetian Alps (Alpes Raeticae), including Saint Gotthard Pass (6935 feet) and Finsteraarhorn (14,026 feet) in SC Switzerland, and Piz Bernina (13,295 feet) in the extreme SE corner of Switzerland; 6) the Noric Alps (Alpes Noricae), with Eisenhut (8006 feet) and Gross Glockner (12,461 feet) in the Tirol, S Austria; 7) the Carnic Alps (Alpes Carnicae), with the summit Kellerwand (9217 feet) on the border between Austria and Italy; 8) the Venetian Alps (Alpes Venetae), also called the Dolomites, with the summit Marmolada (10,965 feet) in NE Italy; and 9) the Julian Alps (Alpes Juliae) in NW Yugoslavia with the summit Triglav (9394 feet). Outlying ranges in Hungary and Yugoslavia are respectively: Karawanken (Caravanca Mons) and the Dinaric Alps (Alpes Dinaricae).

The length of the range from the Pass of Giovi (N of Genoa) to Semmering Pass (SW of Wiener Neustadt, Austria) is over 600 miles, and its width is from 90 to 180 miles. The average height of the system is about 7700 feet.

Altes (al'tēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a king of the warlike Leleges. He was the father of Laio who became Priam's concubine.

Althaea (al-thē'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Thestius. She was said to be the wife of Oeneus, king of Calydon in Aetolia, and the mother of Meleager, Tydeus, and Deianira. According to some accounts, Meleager was her son by Ares and Deianira was her daughter by Dionysus. Shortly after Meleager's birth the Fates prophesied that he would live only as long as a brand at that time burning in the fire was unconsumed. She seized the brand, quenched it and hid it away, thus saving his life. When, following the hunt for the Calydonian Boar, Meleager killed her brothers, Althaea recovered the partly burned brand and hurled it into the flames, thus causing Meleager's death. In despair at the violation of her maternal feelings she then hanged herself.

Althaemenes (al-thē'mē-nēz). In Greek mythology, a son of Catreus, king of Crete. His sisters were Aërope who married Atreus and became the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus, Clymene who married Nauplius and bore Palamedes and Oeax, and Apemosyne. On learning from an oracle that Catreus would perish by the hand of one of his own children, Althaemenes and Apemosyne left Crete so that they should not be the instrument to fulfill the oracle. They went to Rhodes and settled at Camirus. Althaemenes raised an altar to Zeus on a nearby mountain-top. He surrounded the altar with a ring of bronze bulls which roared whenever danger threatened Rhodes. His sister Apemosyne was ravished by Hermes and Althaemenes, mocking her story that Hermes had attacked her, killed her. Years later Catreus came to Rhodes in search of his son. He landed at night, was mistaken for a pirate, and killed by a spear flung by Althaemenes. When Althaemenes learned that he had killed his father and that the oracle had been fulfilled in spite of his self-imposed exile, he prayed to be swallowed up by the earth. The earth parted and he disappeared. He was honored as a hero in Rhodes.

Altilia (āl-tē'lya). See Saepinum.

Altis (al'tis). The sacred precinct of Zeus at Olympia. About the sacred grove rose the installations connected with the Olympic Games, including the temples of Zeus and Hera, treasuries, administrative buildings, and the stadium.

Alyattes (al-i-at'ēz). Son of Sadyattes, whom he succeeded as king of Lydia c617 B.C. and reigned until 560 B.C. He waged war on the Medes under Cyaxares, drove the Cimmerians out of Asia, and extended the conquests of the Lydian kings on the coast of Asia Minor by conquering Smyrna, a colony of Colophon, and attacking Clazomenae. He attempted to extend his empire by taking Miletus. Twice he defeated the Milesians in battle but did not take the strongly walled city which commanded the sea. Since siege under these circumstances was hopeless, each year he marched through the country surrounding the walled city and burned the standing crops but spared the houses of the farmers, as he wanted them to return and plant more crops for him to plunder. The sixth year that he did this flames from the burning grain were carried by a high wind to the temple of Athena Assesia and burned it to the ground. The army of Alyattes withdrew to Sardis and there, in a short while, Alyattes fell sick. As his illness could not be cured he sent messengers to Delphi for information but his messengers were told that no answer would be given him until he rebuilt the temple of Athena at Assesus. Alyattes now sought a truce that would give him time to rebuild the temple. But Thrasybulus, tyrant of Miletus, had been informed of the oracle by his friend Periander of Corinth and prepared a trick by which he hoped to bring the war to an end. He ordered all the meager supply of grain to be brought to the market-place, commanded the Milesians to dress in their finery and gather there, and to be ready at a signal to fall to feasting and revelry. When the herald of Alyattes arrived he found the Milesians feasting and making merry as if they had not a care in the world. On his return he reported the prosperity of the city to Alyattes who was astonished, for he had hoped to starve the city into submission by burning the crops. The news brought by the herald convinced Alyattes that it was fruitless to prosecute a war against a city that seemed to thrive on it. He made an alliance of friendship with Miletus and brought the war to an end. He then built two temples of Athena at Assesus to replace the one he had burned and shortly afterward recovered from his illness. Alyattes was the father of Croesus who succeeded him as king. The tomb of Alyattes north of Sardis, his capital, was an outstanding monument of antiquity.

Amalthea (am-ā-thē'a). In Greek mythology, a goat-nymph who provided milk for the infant Zeus when he was reared by nymphs in a cave in Crete. According to some accounts, Zeus borrowed one of her horns and gave it to the nymphs. This horn, the "Cornucopia," had the property of being filled with whatever food or drink its possessor required. In gratitude to Amalthea, Zeus set her image among the stars as the constellation Capricorn.

Amalthea. In Roman legend, the Sibyl who sold the Sibylline books to Tarquin.

Amanus (ā-mā'nus). [Modern name, Alma Dag (or Dağ).] In ancient geography, a mountain group, a branch of the Taurus range on the borders of Cilicia and Syria.

Amaranth (am'a-ranth). A flower (the word means "unfading" or "everlasting"), often planted on graves and therefore poetically associated with death. (JJ)

Amarynceus (ā-mar'in-kus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a king in Messene who shared the rule of Elis with Augeas. He was slain by Nestor in a war that the Eleans waged on the Pylians and was buried at Buprasium. Nestor won all the contests except the chariot race in the funeral games held in honor of Amarynceus. Diore, son of Amarynceus, led a company against Troy in the Trojan War.

Amarynthia (ā-mar-in'thi-a) or Amarysia (-is'i-a). Epithet of Artemis. It comes from the town of Amarynthus in Euboea, which was named for a hunter of Artemis by that name. Artemis Amarynthia was also worshiped in Attica.

Amasis II (ā-mā'sis). [Also: Amosis, Aahmes, Ahmes.] Egyptian king, the fifth of the XXVIth dynasty, fl. c569-525 B.C. According to Herodotus, Amasis was sent by Apries, king of Egypt, to quell a rebellion of the soldiers after they had been defeated by the Cyrenaeans. As Amasis was exhorting the soldiers one came up behind him and placed a helmet on his head, saying he thereby crowned him king. The soldiers acclaimed him and instead of quashing the revolt in the army, Amasis marched at the head of it to seize power from Apries. Apries sent a man of high rank to go and bring Amasis back with him. The envoy soon saw what Amasis planned and hastened back to tell Apries. But the latter was so enraged with his envoy for returning without Amasis that he cut off his ears and nose. This barbarous act to a man of high rank caused the Egyptians, who up to now had supported Apries, to go over to the side of Amasis to whom they now offered their aid. Apries, at the head of a force of mercenaries, marched against Amasis and was defeated. Amasis took Apries captive and returned with him to Saïs, where he took over the palace of Apries. He treated Apries kindly until criticism of his kindness to an enemy caused him to turn Apries over to his former subjects, who strangled him. Amasis now became king. At first he was somewhat despised by his subjects because he had been a mere private citizen before seizing the throne but he won their respect by diplomacy rather than force. He caused a golden vessel in which he had habitually washed his feet to be melted down. From this he made a golden image of one of the gods and set it up in the city. The Egyptians immediately began to worship it. Amasis called his people together and revealed that the image had been made of a vessel formerly used for bathing the king's feet yet now it was given unquestioning worship. He compared himself to the vessel. Once he had been a private person and nobody paid much attention to him; now he was king and he ordered them to honor and obey him. His lesson was not lost on his subjects. Herodotus says of Amasis that from dawn to noon he carried on the public business with great earnestness. But from noon on he joked, feasted, and drank wine, enjoying himself as much as he might. Criticized for his light-hearted manner after carrying on affairs of state all morning, Amasis replied with an analogy. Bow-men, he said, string and bend their bows when they want to shoot; when shooting is over, they unstring the bows for if the bow was kept always tautly strung it would break and in time of need would fail the bowman. For the same reason, he divided his own time between business and pleasure. It is said that before Amasis became king he was in the habit of stealing when he needed funds to carry on his pleasures. When discovered on various occasions if he denied that he was a thief he was brought before the nearest oracle. Sometimes the oracle would say he was guilty, sometimes it would declare he was not a thief. When he became king, he neglected the temples of the oracles that had pronounced him innocent of his thefts because he judged them to be utterly unreliable and worthless. But those that had rightly judged him guilty he honored with great reverence.

Amasis had treaties of alliance and friendship with Polycrates of Samos and with Croesus, king of Lydia. He extended his kingdom by conquering Cyprus and he exerted great influence in Cyrene. Egypt was immensely prosperous during his reign. He erected many monuments and made gifts to the temples. He built a gateway to the temple of Isis at Saïs, added a number of colossal statues and sphinxes and a recumbent colossus. At Memphis also he gave a recumbent colossus to the temple and built a temple of Isis. Remains of his monuments still exist. He welcomed Greeks to his kingdom (Solon was one of his visitors), established them in the port city of Naukratis and allowed them to set up temples and altars to their gods. He contributed the very large sum of 1000 talents to the rebuilding of the temple of Delphi that had burned in 548 B.C.; and also gave rich gifts to the temple of Athena in Cyrene, the home of his wife Ladice, daughter of King Battus; to the temple of Athena at Lindus in Rhodes, because the daughters of Danaus stopped there on their flight from Egypt; and to the temple of Hera at Samos, because he was a bond friend of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. Later Amasis dissolved the bond of friendship with Polycrates because, according to Herodotus, Polycrates enjoyed too good fortune. Amasis said he knew that such uninterrupted good fortune would surely bring down the envy and wrath of the gods on Polycrates. He therefore no longer wished to be his bond friend so that he would not be obliged to grieve on his account when the inevitable doom overtook him. This is the story Herodotus gives for the dissolution of the alliance between Amasis and Polycrates. Others, however, say that the alliance may have been weakened when Amasis learned that Polycrates was intriguing with the Persians against Egypt when Cambyses, son of Cyrus, proposed a campaign against Egypt. It was supposedly because of anger against Amasis that Cambyses resolved to make war on Egypt, but by the time Cambyses reached Egypt with his army Amasis had died and been succeeded by his son Psammenitus (Psammetichus III), 525 B.C. When he came to Saïs Cambyses ordered that the body of Amasis should be brought from its tomb. His tomb was in the sacred precinct of Isis at Saïs near the tomb of the king he had deposed. Cambyses commanded his soldiers to stab Amasis' body and pull out the hair, but since the body had been embalmed it did not fall apart under this treatment and Cambyses ordered it to be burned, an act of the most frightful impiety to the Egyptians. But some say that Amasis, having been warned by an oracle of what would happen to him after his death, had given orders for his body to be entombed in a secret place in the sanctuary and another body substituted in his tomb so that Cambyses did not, after all, defile his body. However, Herodotus, who tells this story, does not believe it and thinks the Egyptians made it up to preserve the dignity of their king.

Amasis. Attic potter of the 6th century B.C. Eight vessels signed "Amasis made me" are extant. They date from c555-525 B.C. The decorator of his vessels worked in the black-figure style and is called the Amasis Painter. Among his extant works an amphora (Paris) shows Dionysus holding a cantharus. Two maenads, an arm of each about the other's neck, approach to offer him small animals. An amphora (Metropolitan Museum, New York), c550 B.C., attributed to the Amasis Painter, shows warriors departing for battle.

Amata (ā-mā'ta). In Roman legend, the wife of King Latinus and the mother of Lavinia.

She promised Lavinia in marriage to Turnus, leader of the Rutuli. When Latinus, in obedience to the command of an oracle, gave Lavinia to Aeneas, Juno sent the Fury Alecto to inspire Amata with madness. Under this spell, Amata stirred up the Latin women to rebellion which led to war between the forces of Aeneas and those of Turnus. After two disastrous defeats by Aeneas, Amata begged Turnus not to meet Aeneas in single combat as Aeneas proposed. He agreed. Aeneas and his forces made another violent attack on the city and set it afire. Amata, fearing that Turnus had died in the attack, blamed herself for the war and destruction and hanged herself.

Amathus (am'a-thus). In ancient geography, a city of Phoenician origin on the S coast of Cyprus near the site of the modern Limassol. It contained a sanctuary of Aphrodite. According to some accounts, when Theseus fled from Crete, having killed the Minotaur, his ship, bearing him and Ariadne, daughter of King Minos, was caught in a great storm. As they neared Cyprus Ariadne, who was suffering from seasickness, asked to be put ashore at Amathus. Theseus reboarded his ship which was caught up in a gale and driven to sea again, and he never returned for Ariadne. The women of Amathus were very kind to Ariadne and took good care of her as she was soon to bear Theseus' child. These accounts say she died giving birth to the child and that the people of Amathus gave her a splendid funeral. They say Ariadne's tomb is in Amathus in a grove sacred to her, and on Cyprus an annual festival of Ariadne was celebrated in which a youth groaned and writhed in imitation of a woman in labor. Because Amathus refused to join the other Cyprians in the revolt against Persia (c499 B.C.), Onesilus who had seized the throne of Cyprian Salamis laid siege to Amathus. While he was so occupied a Persian force landed and gave battle to Onesilus. The Cyprians were defeated and Onesilus was slain. Because he had besieged their city the people of Amathus cut off his head and set it up over their gates. The skull was eventually reduced to bone by the passage of time, and a swarm of bees settled in it and filled it with a honeycomb. The Amathusians observed the prodigy and consulted the oracle. The advice they received was to take down the head, bury it, and sacrifice to Onesilus as to a hero and their affairs would prosper. This they did, and they continued to sacrifice to Onesilus annually.

AMAZONOMACHIA
Sarcophagus. Louvre

Amazonomachia (am''a-zon-ō-mak'i-a). In Greek antiquity, a battle of Amazons. There were several of these mythical battles: 1) the invasion of Lycia by the Amazons; 2) the invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons; 3) the battle with Heracles, his ninth labor, in which Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons, was slain; 4) the battle with Theseus to liberate Antiope; 5) the battle at the close of the Trojan War when the Amazons came to the assistance of Priam; 6) the Amazons' invasion of the island of Leuce at the mouth of the Ister. Since it furnished many interesting arrangements of men, women, and horses in action, the Amazonomachia was a favorite subject with Greek artists. One of the finest representations is a series of bas-reliefs in the British Museum which was found in the ruins of the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus.

Amazons (am'a-zonz). In Greek legend, a race of warrior women supposed to have dwelt near the Thermodon River on the coast of the Euxine Sea, and in the Caucasus Mountains. They are represented as forming a state from which men were excluded. They were governed by a queen. Girl children had their right breasts cut off (the name Amazon has been said by some to mean "breastless") so as not to interfere with the bow arm. Male children were slain in infancy. The Amazons devoted themselves to war and hunting. Bellerophon fought them. Heracles, as one of his labors for Eurystheus, went to their country to fetch the girdle of the Amazon queen Hippolyte. By a misunderstanding inspired by Hera he made war on the Amazons, who had been inclined to be friendly, killed many and took some prisoners. According to Herodotus the Amazons who were being shipped back to Greece rose up and massacred the Greek crews. Unfamiliar with the ways of ships, they then were carried by the winds to the shores of Lake Maeotis. Here they went ashore, fell among the Scythians and seized their horses. After some time, these Amazons mingled with the Scythians and formed a new race. The new race, ancestors of the Sauromatae according to Herodotus, moved to lands north of the Tanais River and settled there. The women continued to hunt and make war and it was one of their laws that no girl should marry until she had killed a man in battle.

During the reign of Theseus, the Amazons remaining about the Thermodon River marched to Athens and attacked it. Some say this was done because Theseus had accompanied Heracles on his raid and had carried off the Amazon Antiope, who became the mother of his son Hippolytus. The Amazons were defeated by the Athenians and were driven off. In the Trojan War the Amazons under their queen Penthesilea came to the aid of the Trojans. They were defeated by the Greeks and Penthesilea was slain by Achilles. Plutarch reports of the Amazons that they annually met with the Albanians on the banks of the Thermodon River for two months, after which they withdrew again to their own country and lived without the company of men. The wars between the Amazons and Greeks were a favorite subject with Greek painters and sculptors. Many friezes of temples, vase paintings, and metopes were devoted to this subject.

Amber Islands (am'bér). [Also: Electrides.] In ancient geography, a name given by the Greeks in later times to the islands in the North Sea off what is now Denmark, Germany, and the Netherlands. See also Glesariae.

Ambiorix (am-bī'ō-riks). Gallic chief; fl. 1st century B.C., leader of the Eburones. He is famous for his campaigns against the Romans (54-53 B.C.) in which he twice defeated them in what is now Belgium but fled across the Rhine at the approach of Julius Caesar.

Ambracia (am-brā'shi-ā). [Modern name, Arta.] In ancient geography, a city in NW Greece situated on the Arachthus River, N of the Ambracian Gulf. It was founded as a colony by the Cypselids of Corinth in the 7th century B.C., but following the death of Periander of Corinth (585 B.C.) Ambracia detached itself from the mother city and set up a democracy. In the Peloponnesian War the city appealed to Sparta for aid against Athens and her allies, the Amphilocheians and Acarnanians. The Peloponnesians sent a force but in 426 B.C. betrayed the Ambracians by a secret agreement with the Athenian general Demosthenes, under which the Peloponnesians stole away without the knowledge of the Ambracian allies and left them to the mercy of Demosthenes. Demosthenes and the Amphilocheians inflicted a stunning defeat on the Ambracians at Idomene. Of such magnitude was the disaster, according to Thucydides, that he did not record the number of the dead "because the amount stated seems so out of proportion to the size of the city as to be incredible." Following the defeat the Ambracians made a 100-year treaty with the Amphilocheians and Acarnanians and withdrew from the war. Philip II of Macedon placed a garrison in the city after defeating the Greeks at Chaeronea (338 B.C.). This garrison was expelled after his death (336). Under Pyrrhus, the city became the capital of Epirus, 294 B.C.

Ambracian Gulf (am-brā'shi-ān). [Also: Gulf of Arta.] Inlet of the Ionian Sea in W Greece. Length, about 25 miles, greatest breadth, about ten miles.

Ambrosia (am-brō'zi-ā). Literally, "immortality." A celestial substance, commonly represented as the food of the gods, sometimes as their drink, and also as a richly perfumed unguent. When eaten by mortals it conferred immortality on them. It was also supposed to preserve against decay and corruption. In the Iliad the bodies of Hector, Patroclus, and Sarpedon were preserved and made whole by applications of ambrosia by the gods.

Ameipsias (ā-mēp'si-as). A Greek poet of the Old Comedy who was contemporary with Aristophanes and flourished toward the end of the 5th century B.C. His Connus, in which Socrates was the hero, won first prize over Aristophanes' first version of Clouds in 423 B.C. In 414 B.C. he again won with his Revellers over Aristophanes who presented his Birds. Only fragments of his work survive.

Amestratus (a-mes-trā'tus). [Modern name, Mistretta.] Town on the island of Sicily, situated near the N coast between Messina and Panormus.

Amestris (ā-mes'tris). Daughter of Otanes, according to Herodotus, but daughter of Onophas, according to Ctesias, and the favorite wife of Xerxes, to whom she bore at least five children. Her crimes and cruelties are related by Ctesias at some length, and are mentioned by Herodotus. She is believed by some to be the Vashti of the Book of Esther.

Amisodarus (ā-mi-sō'da-rus). Named by actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; ҃H, then; ǰ as d or j, ǰ as s or sh, ʈ as t or ch, ʐ as z or zh.

Homer (Iliad) as a king of Caria who reared the Chimaera. His sons Atymnius and Maris were comrades of Sarpedon in the Trojan War. They were slain, the one by Antiochus, the other by Thrasymedes, sons of Nestor.

Ammon (am'ōn). The Greek and Roman conception of the Egyptian sun-god, Amon (Amon-Re), Amen (Amen-Ra). The Greeks called him Zeus-Ammon to identify him with Zeus. The Romans called him Jupiter-Ammon. According to the Greeks, when Typhon attacked the gods Zeus transformed himself into a ram and fled to Egypt. Later when Heracles was in Libya in quest of the Apples of the Hesperides, he visited the oracle of Ammon and demanded to see Zeus. The god did not wish to show himself but when Heracles persisted, Zeus killed a ram, flayed it, and cut off its head. The god then held the ram's head before him, covered himself with the ram's fleece and in this guise he presented himself to Heracles. It is for this reason, according to Herodotus, that the Egyptians show their images of Zeus-Ammon with the face and horns of a ram, and it is for this reason that rams are held sacred by the Thebans of Egypt and are not sacrificed except on the one day of the year when the festival of Zeus-Ammon is celebrated. On this day they kill one ram and flay it. They cover the image of Zeus with the fleece and then present to the fleece-covered statue of Zeus an image of Heracles, after which they mourn the ram and bury it in a sacred spot. The oracle of Zeus-Ammon in Libya (situated at what is now the Oasis of Siwa in NW Egypt) was greatly venerated and was consulted by seekers from all over the ancient world. Laomedon, king of Troy, sent to the oracle of Ammon to learn how he could rid his land of the plague and sea monster that Apollo and Poseidon had sent against his land because he did not pay them as he had promised for their help in building the walls of Troy. The oracle told him to sacrifice his daughter Hesione to the monster. Cepheus, father of Andromeda, consulted the oracle to learn how he could be delivered from a monster that was ravaging his land and received similar advice. Croesus, king of Lydia, consulted the oracle of Ammon among others, when he was considering a war against Cyrus and the Persians. This oracle was founded, according to some accounts, in obedience to the command of a black dove that flew from the temple of Egyptian Thebes to this place, and ordered the inhabitants to establish an oracle of Zeus. Remains of the ancient temple of Zeus-Ammon on the site are still to be seen. The Spartans, who consulted the oracle of Ammon more frequently than the other Greeks, had their own sanctuary and oracle of Ammon in Sparta.

Ammonia (a-mō'ni-a). Epithet of Hera as the wife of Zeus-Ammon; these names were given to them by the Libyans. The Eleans poured libations and sang hymns to Hera Ammonia at Olympia once a month.

Amopaon (a-mō'pā-ōn). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan warrior, the son of Polyammon. He was slain by Teucer, who used the shield of his brother Ajax as a bastion from behind which he shot his arrow and killed Amopaon.

Amor (ā'môr). The Roman counterpart of the Greek god of love, Eros.

Amorgos (ä-môr-gôs'). Island in the Aegean Sea, one of the Cyclades, about 16 miles SE of Naxos. It was the birthplace of the Greek poet Simonides. Area, about 50 square miles.

Ampelius (am-pē'li-us), Lucius. Roman author who was active probably sometime after 100 A.D. He is best known for a concise history, Liber Memorialis, which contains also a number of geographical and mythological entries. Although much of the material is not trustworthy, it includes the only known classical reference to the sculptures at Pergamum.

Ampelos (am'pe-los). A beautiful satyr who fell and was killed when plucking grapes from a vine that grew up an elm tree. He was a favorite of Dionysus, who placed him among the stars. A genus of singing birds that haunt vines, among them the Carolina waxwing, was named for him.

Amphiale (am-fi'a-lē). Promontory on Mount Aegaleos opposite the island of Salamis. From this spot Xerxes is said to have witnessed the Persian defeat at the Battle of Salamis (480 B.C.).

Amphianax (am-fi'a-naks). Another name for Iobates, king of Lycia, who received Proetus

and gave him his daughter Antia (Stheneboea) in marriage.

Amphiaraus (am'fi-ā-rā'us). In Greek legend, an Argive seer and hero; he was the son of Oicles and was married to Eriphyle, sister of Adrastus, king of Argos. He took part in the Calydonian Hunt and accompanied Jason as an Argonaut on the voyage to Colchis to secure the Golden Fleece. When Adrastus proposed to march against Thebes to restore his son-in-law Polynices to the throne, he asked Amphiaraus to accompany him on the expedition as one of the leaders. Amphiaraus, who foresaw that all except Adrastus would perish, was reluctant to go and tried to discourage the others. His wife Eriphyle, however, had once settled a quarrel between him and Adrastus and had extracted a promise from each that they would abide by her decision in any future difference of opinion. Polynices now bribed her to compel Amphiaraus to march with Adrastus. She reminded him of his promise and he consented to go, but he left orders with his sons Alcmaeon and Amphilocheus to kill their mother and march against Thebes when they grew up. Amphiaraus saw an omen of disaster in the death of the child Opheltes at Nemea who was killed by a serpent while his nurse showed the Argives where they could get water. At the assault on Thebes all the champions were killed except Adrastus. Amphiaraus fled in his chariot. Before Periclymenus who was pursuing him could cast his spear into his back, Zeus cleft the earth with his thunderbolt and Amphiaraus, his chariot, and his charioteer vanished into the chasm. The spot where he disappeared into the earth was shown not far from Thebes on the road to Potniae. Zeus made Amphiaraus, the one upright man in a lawless company, immortal. He was deified and worshiped as a divine, oracular hero at various places. He had a temple at Oropus in Attica and a famous oracle of Amphiaraus there was noted for the interpretation of dreams. Some say Amphiaraus, by means of an oracle, proposed to the Thebans that they make a choice: either to take him as their prophet or as their helper in war. The Thebans decided to take him as their helper in war. For this reason it was unlawful for the Thebans to consult him as an oracle; it was therefore forbidden to them to sleep in his temple and receive his prophecies in dreams.

Amphiareum (am'fi-ar'e-um). Sanctuary and oracle of Amphiaraus, near Oropus, in Boeotia, Greece. In Greek legend, Amphiaraus was one of the Seven who marched against Thebes, and was here swallowed up by the earth at the will of Zeus, to save him in his flight. The sanctuary occupies a narrow area on the bank of a torrent; it includes a temple and altar, a large portico, a long range of bases for votive statues, and a theater. All the existing ruins are of Hellenistic date. The oracle enjoyed great renown, and the deified seer had a high reputation for healing sickness. Excavations were made (1884 et seq.) here by the Archaeological Society of Athens.

Amphictyon (am-fik'ti-on). According to some accounts, a son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, but others say he sprang from the soil. He rose against Cranaus, king of Attica, and seized the throne. He entertained Dionysus and is said to have been the first man to mix water with wine, a wise precaution for preventing disputes at the meetings of the Amphictyonic Council. After a reign of 12 years Amphictyon in his turn was driven from the throne by Erichthonius, the earthborn son of the spilled seed of Hephaestus.

Amphictyony (am-fik'ti-o-ni) or Amphictyonic League (am-fik-ti-on'ik). In Greek history, a league of peoples inhabiting neighboring territories or drawn together by a community of origin or interests, for mutual protection and the guardianship in common of a central sanctuary and its rites. There were several such confederations, but the name is specially appropriated to the most famous of them, that of Delphi. This was composed of 12 tribes, and its deputies met twice each year, alternately at Delphi and at Thermopylae. Its origin dates back to the beginnings of Greek history. It exercised paramount authority over the famous oracular sanctuary of the Pythian Apollo and over the surrounding region, and conducted the Pythian games; and it constituted, though in an imperfect way, a national congress of the many comparatively small and often opposed states into which Greece was divided. The 12 members of the Delphic Amphictyonic League were the Thessalians, the Boeotians, the Dorians, the Ionians, the Perrhabeans, the Magnetes, the Locrians, the Oeteans, the Phlytiots, the Malians, the Phocians, and the Dolopians.

Amphidamas (am-fid'a-mas). In Greek legend, a son of Aleus. He and his brother Cepheus left their home in Tegea in Arcadia and joined the Argonauts on the quest for the Golden Fleece. When the Argonauts approached the island of Ares they were afraid to land because of the birds of Ares that dropped iron feathers and attacked with bronze bills and claws. Amphidamas suggested that the Argonauts should cover their heads with their shields and clash their weapons together to frighten the birds away. This ruse was successful and the Argonauts landed on the island of Ares as they had been advised to do by Phineus.

Amphidamas. Named by Homer (Iliad) as a king of Cythera to whom Autolycus gave a tusk-covered helmet. He gave it to Molus, father of Meriones, as a guest-gift and the latter carried it with him to the Trojan War.

Amphilochia (am-fi-lō'ki-a). In ancient geography, a region on the eastern shore of the Ambracian Gulf, inhabited by a tribe from Epirus.

Amphilochus (am-fil'ō-kus). In Greek legend, a son of Amphiaraus and Eriphyle, and the brother of Alcmaeon. Like his father, he was a seer. Some say he accompanied the Epigoni on their expedition against Thebes and that he helped Alcmaeon kill Eriphyle when they learned that she, by being bribed, had caused the death of their father by urging him to go as one of the original Seven Against Thebes. He accompanied the Greeks to Troy and after the war he traveled overland with Calchas and Podalirius to Colophon where they met the seer Mopsus, and where Calchas died. Amphilochus did not return to Argos immediately but remained in Cilicia where he founded the city of Mallus with Mopsus. After some time he departed for Argos, leaving Mopsus as ruler of Mallus but later he returned from Argos and sought to resume his former role as joint ruler of Mallus. He and Mopsus quarreled bitterly when Mopsus refused to share the powers. They attempted to resolve their quarrel in a duel, in the course of which they killed each other. After their bodies had been consumed to ashes on funeral pyres, the ghosts of Amphilochus and Mopsus became intimate friends. An oracle was established in their names which came to be regarded as most infallible. Questions were written on wax tablets and the answers were revealed in dreams.

Amphimachus (am-fim'a-kus). In the Iliad, a grandson of Cteatus. He was a chief of the Epeans in the Trojan War and was slain by Hector.

Amphimarus (am-fim'a-rus). A son of Poseidon. According to some accounts he was the father of the poet Linus by the muse Urania.

Amphinome (am-fin'ō-me). In Greek legend, a daughter of Pelias, king of Iolcus. Deceived by Medea, she and her sister Evadne cut their sleeping father into small pieces and boiled these in a cauldron. They did this under the impression that Pelias would be rejuvenated, as Medea had promised would be the case if they followed her instructions. Pelias, however, was not restored to life. When Jason regained control of Iolcus he overlooked Amphinome's crime, which was committed in innocence, and found a husband for her. But some say that Amphinome, in horror, committed suicide.

Amphinomus (am-fin'ō-mus). In Homeric legend (Odyssey), a son of Nisus of Dulichium. Of all the suitors of Penelope he was the most pleasing to her, and according to some accounts, was the father by Penelope of Pan. In general, he was kinder and more sympathetic than Penelope's other suitors. He protested against the plan of Antinous to ambush and kill Telemachus as he returned from Sparta. Because he was a good man, Odysseus, when he returned to Ithaca disguised as a beggar, advised Amphinomus to leave Ithaca. He warned him that death awaited the wooers. But Amphinomus did not follow this advice. He remained and was slain by Telemachus during the slaughter of the suitors.

Amphion (am-fi'on, am'fi-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Antiope and Zeus and twin brother of Zethus. The twins were exposed on Mount Cithaeron to die when they were born but were found and raised by a herdsman. As young men they slew Dirce, who had mistreated their mother, by causing her to be dragged to death by a bull. They made themselves masters of Thebes and built part of the city. Amphion, a gifted musician, played so beautifully on the lyre which Hermes had given him, while the walls were being constructed, that the stones slid into place by themselves. He married Niobe and became the father of seven sons and seven daughters. When his children were slain by Artemis and Apollo because of Niobe's boasting, Amphion, in grief, killed himself. According to other accounts Amphion was killed by Apollo and was punished in the Underworld for attacking the priests of Delphi in revenge for the slaying of his children by Apollo.

Amphion. In Greek legend, a son of Hyperasius. He and his brother Asterius left their home in Achaea and joined the Argonauts in the quest for the Golden Fleece.

Amphipolis (am-fip'ō-lis). In ancient geography, a city in Macedonia, on the Strymon River, about three miles from the Aegean Sea. Originally a Thracian town, it was colonized by Athens c436 B.C., and was captured (424 B.C.) by Sparta. Near it the Spartans under Brasidas defeated (422 B.C.) the Athenians under Cleon. It later became a Macedonian and then a Roman possession.

Amphiprostylus (am-fi-prō-stī'lus). A Greek or Roman rectangular temple with a portico at both front and rear, but no columns on the flanks.

Amphis (am'fis). A Greek poet and writer of Middle Comedy. He was one of the earliest to write a play with the emancipation of women as the subject.

Amphissa (am-fis'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of King Echetus of Epirus. She was ravished by Aechmodicus and bore a child. To punish her, her father blinded her. He promised to restore her sight when she had ground barley corns that were made of iron into real flour. Amphissa was also sometimes known as Metope.

Amphissa. According to some accounts, a granddaughter of Aeolus. She was the offspring of Macareus and Canache, the son and daughter respectively, of King Aeolus, and she was loved by Apollo.

Amphissa. Town in Phocis, C Greece, N of the Gulf of Corinth, situated at the foot of the W slope of Mount Parnassus. In ancient times it was a Locrian city whose people claimed to be Aetolians, as they were ashamed to be thought of as Ozolian Locrians. According to tradition, it was named for Amphissa, beloved by Apollo. She was a daughter of Macareus and a descendant of Aeolus. On the citadel of the ancient city was a temple of Athena, in which was a bronze image said to have been brought from Troy. The Amphissians celebrated mysteries in honor of the Boy Kings, but no one could say who the Boy Kings were. Some said they were the Dioscuri, others that they were the Curetes, and still others claimed they were of the Cabiri. The Amphissians went to the aid of Delphi in the Sacred War of 356 B.C., but arrived too late and were repulsed by the Phocian general Philomelus. In 340 B.C., Amphissa was accused by Aeschines of Athens of cultivating the sacred plain of Crissa. The Amphictyonic League marched against Amphissa, imposed a fine on the city, but being unable to collect it, invited Philip of Macedon to come to the aid of the League. Philip captured and destroyed Amphissa. The rivalry and jealousy of the Greek city-states led some of them to invite Philip in; once in, they could not get him out. Athens and Thebes, however, alarmed at his rapid progress into Greece banded together to oppose him. They were completely defeated at the battle of Chaeronea (338 B.C.).

Amphissus (am-fis'us). In Greek mythology, a son of the nymph Dryope and Apollo. He was brought up by his foster father Andraemon, and was said to have founded the city of Oeta, where he built a temple to Apollo.

Amphithemis (am-fith'e-mis). In Greek mythology, a son of Apollo by Acacallis, daughter of King Minos of Crete. He was born in Libya whither his mother had been banished by Minos. Amphithemis is also known as Garamas.

Amphitrite (am-fi-trī'tē). In early mythology, the personification of the sea; the goddess who sends the waves and governs the inhabitants of the sea. In later mythology she is a Nereid, the daughter of Nereus and Doris. Some say Poseidon saw her dancing on the island of Naxos and carried her off to be his wife. Others say she fled to Atlas from his advances. He sent Delphinus as an ambassador to plead his cause, and this he did so successfully that Amphitrite consented to marry Poseidon. She bore him Triton, Rhode, and Benthescyme. She was jealous of her many rivals for Poseidon's affections. She punished Scylla, a daughter of Phorcys whom Poseidon loved, by changing her into a hideous monster with six heads and twelve feet. Amphitrite is represented with a net about her hair and with crab claws on the top of her head. As queen of the sea she rides over the waves in a chariot made of shells and drawn by Tritons or dolphins, or sometimes she simply rides on the backs of the creatures of her domain. The Romans identified Amphitrite with their Salacia.

Amphitryon (am-fit'ri-on). In Greek legend, a descendant of Perseus. When Electryon, king of Mycenae, warred against the Taphians and the Teleboans because they had made a raid on his cattle and killed his eight sons, he left Amphitryon to rule in his place, and promised him his daughter Alcmena if he ruled well. Amphitryon learned that the Eleans had Electryon's cattle and bought them back. On learning that he was expected to pay for his own cattle Electryon was furious, and charged Amphitryon with incompetence. In the course of the dispute, Amphitryon hurled a club at one of the cattle and accidentally struck and killed Electryon. He was then banished from Mycenae and went with Alcmena to Thebes. However, she would not allow the marriage to be consummated until the murder of her eight brothers by the Taphians was avenged. Amphitryon was permitted by Creon, king of Thebes, to raise an army for that purpose on condition that he catch a ravaging fox, the Teumessian vixen, which by a decree of fate could not be caught. Amphitryon borrowed Laelaps, a dog which fate had decreed should catch whatever animal it might pursue, and went after the fox. Under these conditions the gods resolved the problem posed by these two animals by turning them both into stone. Amphitryon now attacked the Taphians but could not overcome them so long as the chief Pterelaus, who was rendered immortal by one golden hair, continued to live. Comaetho, daughter of Pterelaus, cut off this hair for love of Am-phitryon, and Pterelaus perished. Amphitryon was successful, but he killed Comaetho for her betrayal of her father. While Amphitryon was away at the war Zeus, disguised as her husband, embraced Alcmena, telling her the deaths of her brothers had been avenged. When Amphitryon returned, he learned from a seer that Alcmena had been loved by a god. Later twin sons, Heracles and Iphicles, were born a day apart, to Alcmena. According to some accounts, Amphitryon put two harmless serpents into the children's cradle while they were yet babes in order to find out which child was his. Heracles seized the serpents in his bare hands and strangled them gleefully. Iphicles screamed, and Amphitryon knew this was his son. But others say it was Hera who sent the serpents in order to destroy Heracles. In the war between Thebes and Erginus, leader of the Minyans, Amphitryon was killed and was buried in Thebes.

Amphius (am'fi-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan ally. He was the son of Merops, a seer who exceeded all others in divining. Merops tried to persuade his two sons not to march to war in Troy as he knew they would never return if they did. But he could not preserve them from their fate and Amphius accompanied his brother Adrestus to Troy where both were slain.

Amphora (am'fō-ra). A tall, slender vessel, having two handles or ears, a narrow neck, and generally a sharp-pointed base for insertion into a stand or into the ground: used by the Greeks and Romans for transporting and storing wine, oil, honey, grain, etc. They were commonly made of hard-baked, unglazed clay, but Homer mentions amphorae of gold. Amphorae with painted decoration, having lids and provided with bases enabling them to stand independently, served commonly as ornaments among the Greeks and were given as prizes in racing and athletic contests. The Panathenaic amphorae were large vases of this class, bearing designs relating to the worship of Athena. Filled with oil from the sacred olives, they were given at Athens as prizes to the victors in the Panathenaic games.

Amphoterus (am-fō'te-rus). In Greek mythology, a son of Alemaeon and Callirrhoe, and a brother of Acarnan. Their mother prayed that her infant sons might grow to manhood overnight and avenge the murder of their father by the sons of Phegeus. Her prayer was answered. Amphoterus and Acarnan met Phegeus and his family as they were going to Delphi, slew them, and took the robe and necklace of Harmonia, which Phegeus had intended to dedicate to Apollo, and carried them to Delphi.

Ampsactus, Lacus (amp-sank'tus, lā'kus) or Amsactus Lacus (am-sank'tus). [Modern: Amsancti.] Small lake in a valley of the same name in Samnium (modern province of Avelino), SW Italy, E of Naples, noted for its sulfurous vapors and cave.

Ampycides (am-pi'si-dēz). A name, meaning "Son of Ampycus," applied to Mopsus, a seer who accompanied the Argonauts.

Amulius (a-mu'li-us). In Roman legend, a son of Proca and a younger brother of Numitor, ruler of Alba Longa. Amulius revolted against Numitor, drove him out, killed his sons, and seized the throne. To make sure that there would be no legitimate heirs of Numitor, Amulius made his niece Rhea, Numitor's daughter, a vestal virgin, which automatically compelled her to chastity. However, Mars is said to have visited and embraced Rhea, and she bore him twin sons, Romulus and Remus. Amulius seized and bound her, and cast her into prison. He ordered the infants committed to the Tiber River. The twins were saved. When they reached manhood, Remus, some say, was seized by brigands and handed over to Amulius, who recognized him as one of the infants he had ordered to be destroyed so many years before. Romulus gathered his followers, stormed the house of Amulius, and freed his brother. He killed Amulius and restored Numitor to the throne.

Amyclae (a-mī'klē). In ancient geography, a town on the Eurotas River in Laconia, Greece, about three miles S of Sparta. According to tradition, it was founded by Amyclas, a son of Lacedaemon, and it was the legendary seat of Tyndareus. The town was sacred to Apollo, and contained the most famous precinct of the god in Laconia. In it was a magnificent throne, made by the Magnesian sculptor Bathycles. The reliefs on the throne depicted a large number of figures of mythology as well as a band of dancers who represented the Magnesian assistants of Bathycles. The throne, as described by Pausanias, consisted of several seats, the center one of which was reserved for the image of the god. The Spartans used gold sent by Croesus to adorn the image and each year the women wove a tunic for it. The tomb of Hyacinthus, son of Amyclas, was under the throne. There was a sanctuary of Cassandra at Amyclae as well as what was supposed to be a tomb of Agamemnon. The Amyclaeans worshiped Dionysus as "Psilax," the Doric word for "wings," because wine uplifts men and lightens their spirits. Amyclae was laid waste by the Dorians and never recovered. According to a legend, the inhabitants of Amyclae had been so often alarmed by false reports of the hostile approach of the Spartans that all mention of the subject was forbidden; hence when they did come no one dared announce the fact and the town was captured. "Amyclae silence" thus became a proverb.

Amyclas (a-mī'klas). According to Spartan legend, a son of Lacedaemon and Sparte (or Sparta), the daughter of Eurotas. He built a town in Laconia and named it Amyclae for himself. Amyclas was the father of Hyacinthus.

Amyclas. In Greek mythology, a son of Niobe and Amphion. According to some accounts, when Apollo slew the other sons of Niobe he was spared because he offered up a propitiatory prayer to Leto.

Amycus (am'i-kus). In Greek legend, a son of Poseidon and the nymph Melia. He succeeded his brother as king of the Bebryces. He was very proud of his skill as a boxer and challenged all travelers who came his way to box with him. If they refused, he hurled them into the sea; if they accepted, he killed them in the match. When the Argonauts landed on his shores he refused to give them water and supplies unless they would send their best man to box with him. Polydeuces accepted his challenge and according to one tale, although he was older and smaller than Amycus, he defeated and killed him. The Argonauts then sacrificed 20 red bulls to appease Poseidon for the slaying of his son.

Amymone (a-mi-mō'nē). In Greek mythology, one of the 50 daughters of Danaus. Danaus instructed his daughters to appease Poseidon who had dried up the streams of Argolis in anger. Amymone, while searching for water, disturbed a satyr who attempted to ravish her. She called for help. Poseidon appeared and hurled his trident at the satyr, but the satyr avoided the blow and fled. The trident was implanted in the rock. Poseidon fell in love with Amymone and embraced her. When he learned that she was searching for water, he caused a spring to gush from the rock where the three prongs of his trident had struck it. This spring, known as the fountain of Amymone, became the source of the Lerna River and never dries up, even in midsummer when the other streams of Argolis are dry. The Hydra of Lerna, child of Echidna, was born under a plane tree near this fountain of Amymone. Amymone bore Nauplius, the famous navigator, by Poseidon.

Amyntas I (a-min'tas). King of Macedonia; died c498 B.C. He was a son of Alcetas and fifth in descent from Perdiccas, the founder of the dynasty. He presented earth and water as a token of his submission to the Persian commander Megabazus, whom

Amyntas II. King of Macedonia (394-370 B.C.); nephew of Perdiccas II. He obtained the crown of Macedonia proper in 394 B.C. by the murder of Pausanias, son of the usurper Aëropus. He was forced to flee from his kingdom (385 B.C.) when Argæus, the son of Pausanias and supported by the Illyrians, invaded it. He left the southern districts of Macedonia and the cities on the Thermaic Gulf to the Chalcidian League, a federation of some of the cities of Chalcidice under the leadership of Olynthus. When he was restored to his throne by the Thessalians with whom he had taken refuge, Olynthus refused to give up the cities he had handed over. Amyntas asked the aid of Sparta. The Spartans answered his appeal, defeated the Olynthians, broke up the Chalcidian League, and restored his coastal cities to Amyntas. Amyntas died in 370 B.C. and was succeeded by his son Alexander II, the oldest brother of Philip II.

Amyntas III. King of Macedonia (360-359 B.C.); died 336 B.C. He was the grandson of Amyntas II. He was an infant at the death of his father in 360 B.C., and was excluded (359) from the throne by the regent, his uncle Philip of Macedon, at whose court he was brought up and whose daughter he married. He was executed by Alexander the Great for a conspiracy against the king's life (336 B.C.).

Amyntor (am'in-tôr). In Greek mythology, a king of Ormenium, at the foot of Mount Pelion. Heracles sought his daughter, Astydamia, and when Amyntor refused to give her to him on the ground that Heracles already had a wife, Heracles attacked his city, killed Amyntor, and carried off Astydamia. She, according to some accounts, bore him Tlepolemus. But others say her son was Ctesippus.

Amyntor. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Ormenus. He was the father of Phoenix, tutor of Achilles, by his wife Cleobule. Cleobule asked Phoenix to seduce the mistress of Amyntor. When Amyntor learned that Phoenix had done so, he cursed him, praying that Phoenix should never have a son of his own. Amyntor was the owner of a famous tusk-covered helmet, the Casque of Amyntor. It was stolen from him by Autolycus, from whose hands it eventually passed and came to those of Meriones, the squire of Idomeneus of Crete. Meriones loaned the helmet to Odysseus when he went with Diomedes to spy on the Trojan camp.

Amythaon (a-mi-thā'on). In Greek legend a son of Cretheus of Thessaly and Tyro. He was a brother of Aeson and strongly supported Jason in his claim to the throne of Iolcus. Amythaon lived in Pylus where he was noted for his wisdom, and by his wife Idomene, the daughter of his brother Pheres, he was the father of Bias and of the seer Melampus.

Anabasis (a-nab'a-sis). Account by the Greek soldier-historian Xenophon, in seven books (original number uncertain) of the campaign of the Persian prince Cyrus the Younger against his brother Artaxerxes II, and of the retreat of the 10,000 Greek mercenaries after Cyrus' death in the battle of Cunaxa near Babylon. The events cover the years 401–399 B.C. After the death of Cyrus the Greeks were faced with the problem of withdrawing from a hostile country. Although the title strictly applies only to the inland march, the major portion of the work is devoted to the famous retreat. Xenophon, at first present merely as a guest and observer, assumed command after most of the Greek commanders had fallen victim to Persian treachery. He does not hesitate to emphasize his own good judgment and ability in conducting the Greek force to the Black Sea at Trapezus, from which point the Greeks finally returned to Byzantium. (AH)

Anabasis of Alexander. Important historical work by Arrian, in seven books, all of which, with the exception of a few pages, has survived. It begins with the accession of Alexander the Great, and describes his campaigns and victories.

Anacharsis (an-a-kār'sis). Scythian prince, brother of Saulius, king of Thrace, active c600 B.C., and a contemporary of Solon. He traveled widely and visited Athens, where he obtained a great reputation for wisdom. By some he was reckoned among the legendary seven great sages of ancient times. On his way back to Thrace he stopped at Cyzicus. There he found the inhabitants celebrating a festival to Cybele, the Great Mother. He was so impressed by the magnificence of the festival that he vowed to create a similar festival if he returned safely to his homeland. On his arrival in Thrace he went to a sequestered place and performed the rites. Some Scythians, who observed him in the course of the ritual, informed his brother, King Saulius, of what they had seen and Saulius went to see for himself. Such was the hatred of the Scythians for foreign customs and rituals that when he beheld Anacharsis carrying out the rites for Cybele, Saulius shot Anacharsis with an arrow and killed him.

Anacreon (a-nak'rē-on). Greek lyric poet; born at Teos, in Asia Minor, c570 B.C.; died there, c478 B.C. His work concerns itself chiefly with love and wine. He was widely imitated in the Alexandrian period, and later, in a form of verse called, from him, Anacreontics. He is supposed to have been driven from Teos by the invasion (545 B.C.) of Cyrus the Great, to have fought briefly in the resisting army, and to have been tutor to Polycrates of Samos, at whose court he became a favorite. He was called to Athens on Polycrates' death by Hipparchus, the patron of Simonides and other literary figures; he probably returned to Teos after Hipparchus was assassinated (514 B.C.). Valerius Maximus' account, probably mythical, of his death by choking on a grape seed, gives the key to his reputation as a celebrator of the gay and leisurely life, though various writers attest to his sobriety. Although only fragments of his work are now extant, imitations, from the pseudocollection by Stephens (1554) to Thomas Moore (1800), demonstrate the popularity of his short, facile lyrics.

Anadyomene (an''a-dī-om'e-nē). An epithet of Aphrodite, in allusion to her origin from the sea.

Anaitis (a-nī'tis). [Also: Anait, 'Anat; Egyptian, Anta.] Syrian goddess whose worship was introduced into Egypt in the 15th century B.C. She was a war goddess, and is usually depicted with helmet, shield, and battle-ax. The Greeks identified her with Athena.

Ananias (a-nā'ni-us). A satirical writer of classical times.

Anaphe (ä-nä'fē). [Modern name, Anafi or Anaphi.] An island, seven miles long, in the SE Cyclades. Its name means "revealing" actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; ͲH, then; Ͳ as d or j, Ͳ as s or sh, Ͳ as t or ch, Ͳ as z or zh.

and was given to it for the following reasons: When the Argonauts were returning from Colchis with the Golden Fleece they were overtaken by a great storm and were lost in pitch darkness. Jason called on Apollo to save them and at once there was a flash of light from the silver bow of Apollo. The flash of light revealed the island; Ancaeus, helmsman of the Argo, was able to beach the ship there. The Argonauts landed and gave thanks to the god and named the island for the flash of revealing light which saved them.

Anaurus (a-nou'rus) River. In ancient geography, a small river of Thessaly. According to legend, Jason, on his way to Iolcus, was stopped on the bank of the river by a crone who asked him to carry her across. He courteously agreed to do so and won the good will of the goddess, Hera, who had thus disguised herself to test him. On the way across the river Jason lost one of his sandals in the mud and did not bother to replace it before he appeared at the court of Pelias in Iolcus. Pelias had been warned concerning a man wearing one sandal; it was for this reason that he sent Jason off to Colchis to fetch the Golden Fleece.

Anax (a'naks). In Greek mythology, a giant son of Uranus and Gaea who was ruler of the land later known as Caria. His son, also a giant, named Asterius, succeeded him as ruler of the land.

Anaxagoras (an-aks-ag'ō-ras). Greek philosopher, born at Clazomenae, in Ionia, c500 B.C.; died at Lampsacus in Mysia, c428 B.C. He was born of a noble family but gave up his inheritance to devote himself to science, and went to Athens. He was the first philosopher to settle permanently at Athens (c464–c434 B.C.), thus establishing Athens as a home of philosophy. There he became the teacher of Pericles, Thucydides, Euripides, and perhaps of Socrates. His theory of the universe, based on astronomical observation (which among other things led him to the correct explanation of eclipses) and the teachings of Anaximander, brought a charge of impiety against him because it denied the gods which were recognized by the state. Pericles, his good friend, defended him against the charge which was largely an expression of political hostility to Pericles himself, and he was acquitted. However, he felt compelled to emigrate and went to Lampsacus where he died soon after. Anaxagoras introduced a dualistic explanation of the universe as deriving from a chaotic and inextricable mass in which infinitely small particles (or "seeds"), existing in larger or smaller numbers and of varying taste, color, and size, constitute the distinction between different kinds of matter; on these the controlling function of mind (nous) is exercised to bring order via motion. The first half of this concept (which is fundamental to the atomic theory) and his description of the sun as a mass of molten metal, of heavenly bodies as rocks torn from earth, and of men and animals as being born from moist clay, to which they ultimately returned, were abhorrent to the pantheism of his time; the second half, through Aristotle and Averroës, became an absorbing topic of medieval speculation. His doctrine was expressed in a work in the Ionic dialect, On Nature, fragments of which survive.

Anaxandrides (an-aks-an'dri-dēz). Co-king of Sparta, with Ariston, in the time when Croesus was king of Lydia. According to tradition, during his reign Anaxandrides consulted the oracle at Delphi to learn how the Spartans might achieve success in their wars against Tegea, for of all the peoples the Spartans fought, only the Tegeans were invariably successful against them. The priestess at Delphi told the messengers of Anaxandrides that if Sparta wished to be successful against the Tegeans the bones of Orestes must be recovered from their Tegean grave. Once this was accomplished, through the cleverness of the Spartan Lichas, Sparta had the advantage in future engagements with the Tegeans.

Anaxandrides. Greek poet of Middle Comedy; fl. first half of the 4th century B.C. He went to Athens from Rhodes (or perhaps from Colophon) and won his first victory there in 376 B.C. Titles of 42 of his works as well as some fragments, survive.

Anaxarchus (an-aks-är'kus). Greek philosopher of Abdera, who was active c350 B.C. He was a disciple of Democritus. He attended Alexander in his Asiatic campaigns, and is said to have consoled the king after the murder of Clitus by maintaining that a king can do no wrong. Plutarch called him a self-made philosopher and deplored the means by which he consoled Alexander and encouraged him to depart from the principles of morality and justice he had once admired and practised. According to Plutarch, Anaxarchus had not been highly regarded as a philosopher before he attached himself to Alexander. He tells that once Anaxarchus and Callisthenes, a philosopher who was brought up in Aristotle's household, were discussing whether the climate of Greece or of Persia was the milder. Anaxarchus maintained that Persia was warmer. Callisthenes affected surprise, and pointed out that whereas in Greece Anaxarchus wore but one threadbare cloak, here in Persia in Alexander's train he was covered with three thick warm coats. Either Persia was colder or the fortunes of Anaxarchus had changed considerably.

Anaxarete (an'ak-sar'ē-tē). In Greek mythology, a Grecian princess who was beloved by Iphis, a man of humble birth. He sent messages of love to her and adorned the doorposts of her house with garlands and wreaths of flowers. Anaxarete mocked him and scorned his love. In despair, Iphis resolved to place one final testimonial of his love on the doors of her house. He fixed a noose to the lintel and hanged himself. His funeral procession passed by Anaxarete's house, and as she watched it without compassion, the gods turned her to stone. The stone statue was placed in a temple in Salamis as a warning to hard-hearted maidens who mocked their lovers.

Anaxibia (an-ak-si'bi-ā). In Greek legend, a daughter of Atreus and Aërope, and the sister of Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Anaxibia. In Greek legend, the wife of Nestor and mother of his sons. Her name is sometimes given as Eurydice.

Anaxilaus (a-nak-si-lā'us) or Anaxilas (-nak'si-las). Tyrant of Rhegium (494-476 B.C.); died 476 B.C. He won control of Zancle, which thereafter was known as Messina (Messina), and thus controlled both sides of the straits between Sicily and Italy.

Anaxilaus. Pythagorean philosopher and physician of the 1st century B.C. He was banished as a magician from Italy by Augustus in 28 B.C.

Anaximander (a-nak-si-man'dēr). Greek philosopher (the second of the Ionian or Milesian school) and mathematician; born at Miletus, 610 B.C.; died c547 B.C. He was a friend and pupil of Thales. He taught that the principle of all things is a substance of indeterminate quality and limitless quantity, "immortal and imperishable," out of which all things arise and to which all return; eternal motion creates opposites, conflict between which brings about order and destroys it, in a continuing cycle. This substance, according to some accounts, he regarded as having a nature intermediate between that of water and air. He was probably the author of the first philosophical treatise in Greek prose. He is said to have discovered obliquity of the ecliptic, to have introduced the sundial and gnomon to Greece, and to have made the first map of the earth. His teachings had, after his death, some considerable influence on the theories of Anaxagoras.

Anaximenes of Lampsacus (an-ak-sim'ē-nēz; lamp'sa-kus). Greek rhetorician and historian; born at Lampsacus in Mysia, c380 B.C., died c320 B.C. He was a companion of Alexander the Great on his Persian campaigns. Author of histories of Greece, and biographies of Philip of Macedon and of Alexander, the latter in epic form, he is also the probable author of a treatise on rhetoric, Rhetorica ad Alexandrum, the only existing work on the subject prior to Aristotle (and formerly attributed to him).

Anaximenes of Miletus (mī-lē'tus, mi-). Greek philosopher; born at Miletus, in Asia Minor; fl. c546 B.C. He was the third of the Ionian or Milesian school, a contemporary and friend of Thales and Anaximander, usually reckoned a disciple of the latter. He regarded air as the principle of all things, various kinds of matter being created by its expansion with heat and contraction with cold.

Anaxo (a-nak'sō). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Alcaeus, son of Perseus. She was the sister of Amphitryon and married Electryon, her uncle, and became the mother of Alcmene. Alcmene married Amphitryon and Anaxo became her brother's mother-in-law.

Ancaeus (an-sē'us). In Greek legend, a son of Poseidon. He left his palace in Tegea and joined the Argonauts on the voyage in quest of the Golden Fleece. From his father

he had great skill in navigation, and after the death of Tiphys in the land of the Mariandyni Ancaeus became the helmsman of the Argo. He guided the ship to the Phasis River in Colchis and acted as steersman on the voyage of return from Colchis. After the many perils of the voyage Ancaeus returned safely to his home in Tegea. He had been told by a seer that he would not survive to taste wine from recently planted grape vines. On his return the vines had flourished, grapes had been harvested, and wine pressed. Ancaeus, about to set a cup of the wine to his lips, reminded the seer of his old prophecy and accused him of being a false prophet. The seer replied that "there is many a slip between the cup and the lip." At that instant a tumult arose over a wild boar that had been discovered in the vineyard. Ancaeus set down the cup, the wine untasted, and rushed off to slay the boar but the animal charged him and gored him to death.

Ancaeus. According to some accounts, a son or grandson of Lycurgus. Others say he was a son of Aleus and the brother of Amphidamas and Cepheus. He left his home in Arcadia and joined the Argonauts in the quest for the Golden Fleece. He wore a bearskin and carried a two-edged battle-ax because his grandfather had hidden his armor in an effort to prevent him from joining Jason. Next to Heracles, he was the strongest of the Argonauts and rowed on the same bench with Heracles. He was killed by the boar in the Calydonian Hunt.

Anchesmius (an-kes'mi-us). Epithet of Zeus, from his image on the low hill near Athens called Mount Anchesmus.

Anchiale (an-ki'a-lē). A nymph. According to some accounts, she produced the Dactyls in the Dictaeon cave as she grasped the land of Oaxus.

Anchinoë (an-kin'ō-ē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the river-god Nilus. She was the wife of Belus, a king in Egypt, and bore him the twin sons Aegyptus and Danaus.

Anchises (an-kī'sēz, ang-). In mythology, a son of Capys and Themiste, and a descendant of Dardanus and Ilus, founders of the Trojan race. While he was tending his flocks Aphrodite came to him, disguised as the daughter of a Phrygian king. The goddess, who became the mother of Aeneas by An-chises, later revealed her true identity to him, and made him vow that he would never reveal it. However, Anchises, having overindulged in wine, boasted that he had lain with a goddess. For this he was struck by a shaft of lightning and crippled in his limbs. After the fall of Troy he expressed his determination to remain and end his days in the city. He said he was old and useless and did not wish to flee with his son Aeneas. He was persuaded to go by a sign—a curl of flame settled on his young grandson's hair but didn't burn it—and a falling star confirmed the favorable omen. Carrying the gods of Troy, he rode out of the city on Aeneas' shoulders. When the oracle of Delos told the Trojans to seek out their mother country, Anchises took this to mean Crete, but a dream informed Aeneas that the oracle meant Italy, whither they then journeyed. Anchises died, according to Vergil, in Drepanum in Sicily, after having been a bulwark of advice and counsel to Aeneas. Even after his death he continued to aid his son. When the Trojan women, despairing that their journeying never ceased, burnt the ships in Italy, Anchises' shade appeared to Aeneas and advised him to leave those who were weary of wandering where they were, and to proceed to carry out his destiny with those who still had a love of glory. He also told Aeneas that he must visit him in Hades to find out what the future held. In accordance with these instructions, Aeneas entered the Underworld near Cumae. Anchises welcomed him and pointed out the souls in the Underworld that were waiting to be reborn and to win honor in Rome. He also gave Aeneas a very wide look at the future history of the empire he was destined to found.

Anchisia (an-kī'si-a), Mount. Mountain in Arcadia. Some say that Anchises, father of Aeneas, died here on the way to Italy after leaving Troy, and that this mountain, where he was buried, was named for him.

Ancile (an-sī'lē). The sacred shield of Mars, said to have fallen from heaven in the reign of Numa, and declared by the seers to be the palladium of Rome so long as it should be kept in the city. With 11 other ancilia, made in imitation of the original, it was given into the care of the Salii, or priests of Mars, who carried it annually in solemn procession through Rome during the festival of Mars in the beginning of March.

Ancius (an'shi-us, -shus). According to legend, one of the centaurs who, aroused by the aroma of the wine of Dionysus, attacked Heracles when he was visiting Pholus on his way to capture the Erymanthian Boar. Heracles drove him off.

Ancus Marcius (ang'kus mär'shi-us, -shus). According to Roman legend, the fourth king of Rome, who succeeded Tullus Hostilius and was said to have reigned from 640-616 B.C. He was a grandson of Numa Pompilius. If we are to believe the legends, it was in his reign that the Janiculum was added to Rome and fortified; the first bridge was built across the Tiber (this was the Pons Sublicius, "Pile Bridge," so-named because it was made of wooden piles, that was destroyed by the Romans while Horatius held the Etruscans at bay); a prison, the Carcer, was built; Rome's boundaries were extended and its seaport, Ostia, was founded. Ancus conquered the Latian village of Politorium and moved its people to Rome where he settled them on the Aventine Hill. He also defeated the Latins in one of the many wars the Romans had with their neighbors.

Andania (an-dā'ni-ā). Ancient city in C Mesenia, founded, according to tradition, by Polycaon, the Lelegian who conquered the country. Polycaon and his wife Messene had their palace here, and to this place the mysteries of Demeter were first brought into the country. Generations later, when Cresphontes secured control of the country by guile, in the return of the Heraclidae, the king's palace was at Stenyclarus. Andania was the center of the revolt against the Spartans which was inspired by Aristomenes and led to the Second Messenian war. The Messenians moved from Andania to Mount Eira to continue their defense, and after their sufferings and defeat in the war never wanted to return to Andania. When the Messenians returned to their country, nearly three hundred years later, Epaminondas, the Theban, helped them to build a new city near Ithome, which was named Messene.

Andocides (an-dos'i-dēz). Attic potter, active at the end of the 6th century B.C. Seven vessels signed by him as potter are extant. Four of these were decorated by the same painter, who for this reason and because his own name is not known, is known as the Andocides Painter. Twenty-six other works have been attributed to the Andocides Painter. He was one of the first and most important of the vase painters to use the red-figure technique. He also used the black-figure style to decorate the craters and cups he painted. An amphora (Munich) has on one side Heracles feasting, attended by Athena, Hermes and a cupbearer, in the black-figure style. On the other side Heracles feasting, attended by Athena, appears in the red-figure style (c510 B.C.). Works signed by Andocides as potter and decorated by the Andocides Painter include: an amphora (Louvre) with a man playing the cithara, and a combat; an amphora (Louvre) with women bathing; a kylix (Palermo) with archers and a trumpeter; and an amphora (Berlin) with Heracles and Apollo struggling for the Delphic tripod. Other works include an amphora (Boston) c520 B.C., with Heracles driving a bull, and an amphora (Louvre) with Heracles dragging Cerberus from Hades.

Andocides. Athenian orator and politician, born c440 B.C. at Athens; died c390 B.C. He was a member of a distinguished aristocratic family. In 415 B.C. he was accused of mutilating the statues of Hermes. The defacing of the sacred images before the start of the Athenian expedition to Sicily caused a near panic in Athens. Three hundred people were denounced for the act of impiety, which was probably committed in a spirit of skepticism and youthful exuberance (see Alcibiades). To save himself and others who might be innocent, Andocides agreed to give information about his aristocratic accomplices under a promise of amnesty. In spite of the promise he was deprived of some of his civic rights. He went to Cyprus and became a trader, in which occupation he made many shrewd deals for the benefit of Athens to show his patriotism. Twice he sought to have his status restored, and at last in 403 B.C., he was readmitted to Athens under a general amnesty which followed the establishment of the democracy. On his return he was active in public life, successfully defending himself against charges of impiety based on the old scandal of 415 B.C. In 391 B.C. he was sent as an ambassador to negotiate peace with Sparta. One of his orations, still extant, was made in behalf of the treaty

he brought back on this occasion. The treaty was rejected and he went into exile. Of two other orations which are preserved, About Returning Home pleaded for the restoration of his status as an Athenian, and was made in 410 B.C. In another he defended himself again against the old charges of impiety which were resurrected in 399 B.C.

Andraemon (an-drē'mon). In Homeric legend (Iliad), the husband of Gorge and son-in-law of Oeneus, king of Calydon. Diomedes made Andraemon king of Calydon in Aetolia after Oeneus, whom Diomedes had protected from his nephews, became too old to rule. He was the father of Thoas, a captain of Aetolians in the Trojan War.

Andraemon. According to mythology, he married the nymph Dryope after she had been ravished by Apollo and had borne a son to the god. Andraemon came upon his wife as she was being turned into a lotus tree because she had plucked the lotus blossoms, and heard her last instructions for the upbringing of her infant son just before the bark which was enclosing her whole body grew up over her face.

Androclea (an-drō-klē'ā). In Greek legend, a daughter of Antipoenus of Thebes, a descendant of the Sparti. See Alcis.

Androcrates (an-drok'ra-tēz). According to legend, a mythical hero who founded Plataea in Greece. On the eve of the Battle of Plataea (479 B.C.), the Greeks drew up their battle array against the Persians in or near the sacred precinct of Androcrates.

Androgeus (an-droj'ē-us). In Greek legend, a son of Minos, king of Crete, and Pasiphaë. On a visit to Athens he defeated all competitors in the Panathenean games. According to some accounts, King Aegeus, to get rid of him, then sent him on a mission to kill the Marathonian Bull, which Heracles had brought back from Crete as one of his labors. It was now roaming the plains of Marathon, destroying men and cattle. Androgeus found the bull, but was killed by it. Others say that King Aegeus, fearing Androgeus would support a rebellion against him, had Androgeus ambushed and though he fought valiantly he was killed. In revenge for his son's death, Minos waged war on the Athenians, and compelled them to send a tribute of seven maidens and seven youths to Crete every nine years. These youths and maidens were given to the Minotaur.

Andromache (an-drom'ā-kē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Eëtion, king of Thebes in Cilicia. She was the wife of Hector and the mother of Astyanax. In the tenth year of the Trojan War when the city was besieged by the Greeks, she tried to persuade Hector not to engage in the battle on the plain. Since her father and her seven brothers had been killed by Achilles when he took Thebes, and her mother, though ransomed, had died, she told Hector that he was father, mother, and brother to her as well as husband. She warned him that his courage would be his undoing as the Greeks would certainly make him their prime target. She asked him to take pity on her and on their infant son and to remain within the walls of the city. With great compassion and nobility of spirit Hector refused her request to keep apart from the battle. Weeping, Andromache returned to the palace as Hector put on his war helmet and set out for the battlefield. She never again saw him alive. When his body was ransomed and returned to Troy she clasped dead Hector's head in her arms and mourned, grieving bitterly that he had not been able to give her any word in farewell. With Hector dead she foresaw doom for herself, her son, and for Troy. Penthesilea the Amazon came to the aid of Troy and boasted that she would kill Achilles. Andromache doubted her good sense in speaking so recklessly of the man who had killed Hector. After the fall of Troy, Astyanax was taken from Andromache's arms and hurled to his death from the towers of the city. Andromache was taken as the captive and concubine of Neoptolemus. He took her to Thessaly and she bore him sons: Molossus, Pergamus, and Pielus. For ten years Neoptolemus treated her with kindness. At the end of that time he married Hermione, the daughter of Helen and Menelaus, but he did not abandon Andromache and her children. However Hermione, who remained childless, jealously persecuted Andromache and with the help of her father would have slain her and her sons during Neoptolemus' absence. Peleus arrived in time to save Andromache and her children. Neoptolemus, who was slain at Delphi, bequeathed Andromache to Helenus. She married him and accompanied him to Epirus where he built a miniature Troy at Buthrotum. There Aeneas, on his way to Italy, found her as she was performing rites for Hector. She had never stopped mourning for him and told Aeneas that the women who died at Troy were fortunate; they had been spared the life of slavery and humiliation which had been her fate. Following the death of Helenus Andromache returned to Asia with her son Pergamus.

Andromache. A drama by Euripides, concerning the misfortunes of Andromache and the son she bore to Neoptolemus (son of Achilles), whose captive she became after the fall of Troy, and of the sorrows of Peleus, father of Achilles.

The scene is at the temple of Thetis beside the palace of Neoptolemus in Phthia. Andromache, alone on the altar steps, weeps for her past life as the wife of Hector and bemoans her present evil state. Neoptolemus has married Hermione, daughter of Helen and Menelaus. Now he is away at Delphi to inquire why his wife bears him no children. Hermione has taken advantage of his absence to persecute Andromache because she is jealous of the son Andromache has born to Neoptolemus. Andromache instructs a captive Trojan handmaid loyal to her to go to Peleus and ask his help. A chorus of Phthian maidens sympathizes with the woes of Andromache but as they fear Hermione's wrath they are unwilling to help her. Hermione enters and accuses Andromache of putting a spell on her that prevents her from bearing children. She threatens Andromache with death. Her proud spirit has been brought low, she says, and now there is no one to protect her. Only a barbarian, Hermione adds, would consent to live with the man who had slain her husband. Andromache replies that as a slave she can do nothing else. Moreover, Hermione need not fear that her slave sons will ever be allowed to rule. She has put no spell on Hermione; it is her own proud and arrogant nature, that does not match that of Neoptolemus, that causes her barrenness. If Hermione did not set her father above her husband she would win her husband's love. Hermione again actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ġ as d or j, ſ as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z̃ as z or zh.

taunts Andromache with Trojan barbarianism. She tries to force Andromache to leave the altar, for she dares not contrive her death on the sacred steps. When she fails, she threatens Andromache. Andromache spirit-edly tells her that the Trojans were not responsible for the death of Achilles; Helen caused it. The chorus sings of the Judgment of Paris who, in awarding the prize to Aphrodite and winning Helen as a reward, incurred the hatred of Hera and Athena for Troy. Menelaus now enters with Molossus, son of Andromache and Neoptolemus. He threatens to kill Molossus unless Andromache leaves the altar. Andromache first scorns him and then tries to reason with him. If he kills her Hermione will not escape pollution. If he kills Molossus he will have to face the anger of Neoptolemus. Murder will not draw Neoptolemus and Hermione together, and no one will want Hermione if Neoptolemus abandons her. Andromache is the more fearful because it was also a woman's quarrel that brought disaster to Troy. Menelaus speaks arrogantly of his royal state. He insists that he will champion his daughter: either Andromache or Molossus must die to satisfy Hermione. Andromache argues that she has been the concubine of Neoptolemus against her will. She recalls her wretched history. All she has left is this one child, and he has now become a new source of suffering and danger. To save him, she agrees to leave the altar. The chorus chides Menelaus for his cruelty. Unmoved, he orders Andromache bound and then announces that he will let Hermione decide what to do about Molossus. To the outcry against this gross treachery Menelaus is indifferent. Andromache again tries to reason with him. Death is not grievous for her, for her death came when Hector was slain. However, she will never fawn on Menelaus. If he is great in Sparta, she was great in Troy. As she has been brought low, so he will be too. But Menelaus ignores her and takes her away.

The chorus grieves for the evils of a divided house that lead to a divided state. They predict that Andromache will be avenged. Menelaus now returns, dragging Andromache and Molossus. Peleus follows. He commands Menelaus to cease his lawless plots and orders the bonds removed from Andromache. Menelaus countermands his order. Peleus accuses him of cowardice in binding a woman and defying an old man. Andromache is the captive of Neoptolemus, not of Menelaus. The Spartan women are loose, he says, and the men careless. Helen was a wanton, but it was the fault of Menelaus. He had warned his grandson Neoptolemus not to link himself with a wanton's daughter. He remembers that Menelaus caused Agamemnon, "poor fool," to sacrifice his daughter for Menelaus' worthless wife, and that Menelaus, who said he would kill Helen when Troy was taken instead saw her bosom and forgave her everything. Peleus removes the bonds that have been put on Molossus and scornfully asks Menelaus if he thought he was binding a lion that he put such heavy fetters on a child. Menelaus, finding his plans set at naught, leaves to return to Sparta. Andromache and Molossus depart with Peleus.

A nurse comes from the palace and tells the chorus Hermione is trying to commit suicide. As she speaks Hermione rushes in. She fears the wrath of Neoptolemus when he learns how she has persecuted Andromache, feels abandoned by her father, and longs to die. While the nurse tries to calm her Orestes approaches. He inquires solicitously about his dear kinswoman Hermione. She falls at his feet as a suppliant. In justification of her cruel conduct, she says her jealousy of Andromache was incited by women's talk. She begs Orestes to take her away from Phthia. Orestes reminds her that Menelaus had betrothed her to him. Menelaus betrayed his promise and gave her to Neoptolemus in order to win him from Scyros to help the Greeks take Troy. Now Orestes will take his revenge on Neoptolemus and make Hermione his wife. He departs with her to carry out his plans.

The chorus mourns the evils that have come to Greece. On the arrival of Peleus they tell him that Orestes is planning the death of Neoptolemus. Peleus sends a messenger to warn him, but almost immediately a second messenger enters and announces that Orestes has stabbed Neoptolemus at Delphi. The second messenger is followed by bearers with the corpse of Neoptolemus. Peleus mourns; he lost his son Achilles at Troy; now his grandson is dead. He is an old man, alone in his empty halls. As he grieves Thetis, mother of Achilles, appears to him. She instructs him to bury Neoptolemus under the threshold of the temple of Apollo at Delphi; to send Andromache and Molossus to Helenus in Molossia for from Molossus will spring a line of kings, descendants of Peleus and Thetis. Finally, she assures Peleus that he will dwell with her in the palace of Nereus under the sea and that he will again see Achilles. After burying Neoptolemus, Peleus must go to the Rock of Sepias where he first met her. There she will come for him. Peleus departs to carry out her wishes.

Andromeda (an-drom'ē-dā). In Greek legend, the daughter of Cepheus, king of Joppa in Ethiopia, and Cassiopea. She was betrothed to Phineus, the brother of Cepheus according to some accounts. Her mother boasted that she and her daughter were more beautiful than the Nereids of the sea. This boast angered Poseidon. He sent a savage sea monster to devastate the land as a punishment for the foolish arrogance of Cassiopea. Cepheus, on appealing to the oracle of Ammon, was told that only the sacrifice of Andromeda to the monster would appease Poseidon and cause him to relieve the country of the depredations of the beast he had sent. Cepheus had no choice; he chained Andromeda, naked except for her jewels, to a rocky cliff at the edge of the sea. Phineus felt unable to take any steps to save her. Perseus, returning with the head of Medusa, flew over the shores of Ethiopia and saw the beautiful maiden chained to a rock. Instantly he fell in love with her and flew down to learn the reason for her unhappy state. He learned the story from Cepheus and promised to slay the monster if Cepheus would reward him with Andromeda's hand in marriage. Cepheus willingly promised. When the monster emerged from the sea Perseus cut off its head with one stroke and freed his bride. The marks made by her chains on the rocks were visible for generations afterwards. At the wedding festivities for Perseus and Andromeda, Phineus and a company of his followers burst in and asserted that he was betrothed to Andromeda and she could not marry Perseus. Andromeda insisted that her father's promise be fulfilled. Cepheus weakened, now that all danger was past. Phineus attacked Perseus, but he exhibited the head of Medusa and turned them all to stone. Andromeda departed for Greece with Perseus. She bore him six sons and a daughter, and during their life together she enjoyed the knowledge, unusual for the wife of a Greek hero, that her lord was constant in his affection for her. After she died Athena placed her image among the stars.

Andromeda. A northern constellation surrounded by Pegasus, Cassiopea, Perseus, Pisces, Aries, and others, and supposed to represent the figure of a woman chained. The constellation contains three stars of the second magnitude, of which the brightest is Alpheratz.

Andron (an'dron) or Andrus (an'drus). In Greek mythology, a son of Anius, priest of Apollo and king of Delos, and the brother of Elaïs, Spermo, and Oeno. He was given the gift of augury by Apollo. According to some accounts, Rhadamanthys bequeathed to him the island of which he became king and which was named Andros in his honor. Agamemnon sought to capture his sisters because of their miraculous powers of turning whatever they wished into wine, grain, and oil. Two of the sisters fled to Andron on his island, but he, fearing the power of Agamemnon, surrendered them. Some say that as the fetters were about to be placed on the maidens to convey them to Agamemnon, they were transformed into doves and flew away.

Andronicus (an-drō-nī'kus, an-dron'i-kus), Livius. See Livius Andronicus.

Andronicus of Cyrrhus (sir'us). [Called Cyrrhestes.] Greek astronomer, born at Cyrrhus; fl. 1st century B.C. He was the builder, at Athens, of the "tower of the winds," still standing; it is an octagonal tower decorated with sculptured figures of the winds, and was surmounted by a bronze Triton which turned with the wind. It was perhaps the first weather-vane in history.

Andronicus of Rhodes (rōdz). Greek philosopher, fl. in the middle of the 1st century B.C. He was head of the Peripatetic school at Rome, and was the author of commentaries on, and paraphrases of, Aristotle, and editor of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus.

Androphagi (an-drō-fā'jī, an-drof'a-jī). According to Herodotus, a cannibal tribe dwelling on the upper Borysthenes (Dnieper) River. They were nomads who lived without justice or law and, unlike other tribes bordering Scythia, they were man-eaters. In dress they were like the Scyths but their language was peculiarly their own. They refused to give aid to the Scythians when the latter were attacked by Darius. To punish them, the Scythians, according to their plan of never coming in contact with the Persian forces, led the Persians into the land of the Androphagi and caused great disturbance among them with two successive invasions—that of the Scyths followed by the Persians in pursuit.

Androphonos (an-drof'ō-nos). An epithet of Aphrodite meaning "Man-slayer."

Andros (an'dros). Northernmost island of the Cyclades, E Greece, situated in the Aegean Sea, about six miles SE of Euboea. According to legend, the island was named for Andron, the son of Anius, priest of Apollo and king of Delos. Andron, who had the gift of prophecy, became king of the island and named it for himself. In the Persian War the people of Andros joined forces with Xerxes for the invasion of Greece. After the defeat of the Persians at Salamis the Greeks pursued their fleet as far as Andros. There they stopped and held a council to decide if they should sail to the Hellespont and destroy the bridges, the exit route of the Persian army. Having decided against this plan, they besieged Andros because the islanders refused to pay a tribute required of them by Themistocles. The Andrians said their gods were Poverty and Helplessness, and they did not have the money to pay, siege or no siege. Under the circumstances, the Greeks lifted the siege and sailed away. The island was anciently a possession successively of Athens, Macedon, Pergamum, and Rome. It is a mountainous island, about 25 miles long and ten miles wide in its greatest width.

Androtion (an-drō'shi-on). Athenian orator, fl. c350 B.C., a contemporary of Demosthenes and pupil of Isocrates. He was a chronicler of Attica, whose work was probably contained in ten books, only fragments of which survive. He is known chiefly as a subject of

Anemone (a-nem'ō-nē). The blood-red flower that sprang up from the drops of blood spilled by Adonis when he was gored and slain by a boar while hunting. The flower blooms quickly and as quickly perishes, just as Adonis perished, in the full bloom of youth. The traditional derivation from Greek anemos, "wind," which has provided the popular name Windflower, is not accepted by modern philologists, who prefer to derive it from the Semitic na 'aman, "the handsome," an epithet of Adonis. (JJ)

Anemotis (a-nem'ō-tis). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Of the Winds." In the temple of Athena Anemotis in Messenia an image of Athena Anemotis was dedicated. This was in gratitude to the goddess, for when the land was being damaged by violent and unseasonable winds prayers to the goddess caused them to cease.

Anesidora (a-nes-i-dōr'a). Epithet of Demeter; altars to Demeter Anesidora (Sender-up of Gifts) were raised in various places throughout Greece.

Angerona (an-je-rō'na) or Angeronia (-ni-a). In Roman mythology, a goddess whose attributes and powers are not definitely known. She was, perhaps, the goddess connected with anguish and secret grief. Her statue stood in the Sacellum Volupiae, and she was represented with her finger upon her bound and sealed lips.

Angitia (an-ji'shi-a, -sha). After Medea's plot to poison Theseus was exposed, she was forced to flee. According to some accounts, she went to Italy and, having taught the inhabitants the art of snake-charming, was afterward worshiped by them as a goddess under the name Angitia. The name is more likely that of a diety of the Marsi in C Italy, whose native name was Anagtia. She seems to have been a goddess of healing.

Anicetus (a-ni-sē'tus). In Greek legend, one of the children born to Heracles after he had been apotheosized and married Hebe.

Anigrus (a-nī'grus). River in Elis, in Greece, which gave off a very unpleasant odor and in whose waters no fish lived. It is said that Chiron, when accidentally wounded by an arrow of Heracles, bathed his wound in its waters. The water of the river stank horribly ever after because of the Hydra's blood on the arrow. But others say the extremely disagreeable odor of the river was caused by Melampus, who cast into its waters the means by which he had purified the daughters of Proetus. In a cave nearby, persons suffering from certain diseases could go to pray to the nymphs of the river. They promised certain sacrifices, wiped the affected parts of their bodies, then swam in the river. The disease was left in the water and the sufferer emerged from it cleansed and healthy. Another cave nearby is said to have been sacred to the daughters of Atlas and was the site where Dardanus was born to Electra. In the Iliad, the Anigrus is called the Minyeius River.

Anio (än'yō). [Modern name, Aniene, and also, in its lower course, Teverone.] River in C Italy that flows into the Tiber just above Rome. It is the source of a famous waterfall, about 330 feet high, at a point just below Tivoli. It has been since ancient times a source of water for the city of Rome. Camillus, as general and dictator of the Romans, defeated the Gauls at the Anio, c366 B.C., when they marched against Rome a second time.

Anius (an'i-us). In classical mythology, a son of Apollo. He and his mother Rhoëo were put into a chest and cast onto the sea. The chest floated to Delos, where Anius later became king as well as a priest of Apollo. His son Andron was taught augury by Apollo and became king of Andros. Anius and his wife Dorippe also had three daughters: Elaïs, Oeno, and Spermo. They were given the power by Dionysus, to whom their father had dedicated them, of turning whatever they wished into oil, wine, and grain. Because of their gifts Anius was able to supply the Greek fleet, anchored at Aulis, with provisions. He invited the Greeks to remain with him on Delos for nine years, since he knew of the oracle that Troy would not fall until the tenth year but they refused his offer and instead carried off his three daughters (see Elaïs). Anius, as an old friend of Anchises, welcomed Aeneas and the Trojan exiles when they stopped in Delos after the Trojan War to consult the oracle in the temple of Apollo.

Anna (an'ä). In Roman legend, Dido's sister. She advised Dido to stop mourning for her dead husband and to yield to her love for Aeneas. She went to Italy after Dido's death and was hospitably received by Aeneas. Lavinia, wife of Aeneas, became jealous and Dido warned Anna in a dream of her jealousy. Anna drowned herself in the river Numicius, and was later worshiped as the river-nymph Anna Perenna.

Ansedonia (an-sā-dō'nyä). Promontory on the coast of Etruria, in Italy, south of the lagoon of Orbetello, on which in 273 B.C. was established the Latin colony of Cosa (q.v.), recently identified and in part excavated by an American mission. (JJ)

Antaea (an-tē'ä). Epithet signifying the goddesses to whom men may pray. It was applied to Rhea, Demeter, and Cybele.

Antaeus (an-tē'us). In Greek mythology, a Libyan giant and wrestler, son of Poseidon, god of the sea, and Gaea, the earth. He was invincible so long as he remained in contact with his mother. He compelled strangers in his country to wrestle with him, and built a house to Poseidon of their skulls. Heracles discovered the source of his strength, and, lifting him into the air, crushed him.

Antagoras (an-tag'ō-ras). In Greek legend, a shepherd on the island of Cos. When Heracles was on his way home after having punished Laomedon of Troy, Hera caused him to be shipwrecked by storms. His vessel landed on Cos and there he met Antagoras and asked him for a ram. Antagoras offered to give him the ram as a prize if Heracles could defeat him in a wrestling match. Antagoras and Heracles wrestled, but they were interfered with by assistants on both sides. The countrymen of Antagoras rushed in to help him, while shipmates came to the aid of Heracles. But Heracles and his men were outnumbered. Heracles fled to the home of a countrywoman of Cos, who disguised him in woman's clothes and helped him escape.

Antalcidas (an-tal'si-das). Spartan diplomat, politician, and warrior; fl. in the first half of the 4th century B.C. He was sent (c393 B.C.) to undermine Athenian relations with the Persian satrap in Asia Minor. He proceeded (388 B.C.) to the Persian court, where aid against Athens was finally obtained, and shortly thereafter he defeated the Athenian fleet near the Hellespont. He prevented the grain ships from reaching Athens and was thus able to compel Athens to accept the "Peace of Antalcidas" (or "King's Peace") in 386 B.C., which provided that all of Asia Minor as well as Cyprus and Clazomenae would be abandoned to Persia, while all remaining Greek city-states would be independent except for Imbrus, Lemnos, and Scyros, which remained Athenian.

Antalya (än-täl-yä') Gulf of. [Former name, Gulf of Adalia; ancient name, Pamphylian Gulf; Latin, Pamphylicus Sinus.] Arm of the Mediterranean Sea, on the S coast of Turkey, on which the city of Antalya, founded by Attalus II of Pergamum, is located. Length, about 100 miles; width, about 40 miles.

Antandrus (an-tan'drus). In ancient geography, a city in the Troad, in Asia Minor. It was one of the cities attacked, taken, and sacked as an ally of Troy by Achilles in the Trojan War. In the time of Cambyses II it fell to Persia. Subsequently it belonged to Mytilene, and in the Peloponnesian Wars it was a battleground for the forces of Lesbos, Athens, and Sparta, falling now to one now to another. It was especially desirable because of its location near the Hellespont.

Antefix (an'tē-fiks). In classical architecture, an upright ornament, generally of marble or terra-cotta, placed at the eaves of a tiled roof, at the end of the last tile of each ridge of tiling, to conceal the joining of the tiles. Antefixes were also often placed at the junction of the tiles along the ridge of a roof, forming a cresting. In some Roman examples the antefixes were so disposed and combined with water channels as to serve as gargoyles.

Antenor (an-tē'nor). In Greek legend, a Trojan, husband of the priestess Theano. As one of Priam's counselors he advised the Trojans, after the duel between Hector and Ajax in the tenth year of the war, to return Helen and all her possessions to Menelaus. His advice was disregarded. In the closing days of the war he was sent to negotiate peace with Agamemnon but instead, according to some accounts, because of his hatred of Deiphobus, son of Priam, he plotted with Agamemnon to help Odysseus enter the city secretly and steal the Palladium, the sacred image of Athena which protected the city as long as it remained within the walls. When Troy was taken by the device of the Wooden Horse, Menelaus hung a leopard's skin over the door of Antenor's house as a sign that it should not be plundered in the sack of the city. Antenor, Theano, and his remaining sons, slipped through the Greek lines and crossed over to Thrace. At length he sailed up the Illyrian Gulf and founded a city at the head of the Adriatic which was called "New Troy." Its inhabitants were afterward known as Venetians. Antenor is also said to have founded Padua, shortly before the arrival of Aeneas in Latium.

Antenor. Athenian sculptor of the 6th century B.C. He executed the first bronze statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton which the Athenians set up in the Agora and which were carried off to Susa by Xerxes I. After his conquest of Persia, Alexander the Great is said to have sent the statues back to Athens. A statue-base found on the Athenian Acropolis bears the signature of Antenor, and to this has been joined a marble Kore, also found on the Acropolis and plausibly ascribed to him.

Antenorid (an-tē'no-rid). A name applied to any of the sons of Antenor.

Anteros (an'tēr-os). In Greek mythology, a son of Aphrodite and Ares, and brother of Eros. He was sometimes represented as the avenger of unrequited affection and sometimes as the symbol of mutual love and tenderness.

Antevorta (an-te-vôr'ta). [Also: Porrima (pôr'i-ma) or Prorsa (prôr'sa).] In Roman mythology, with Postvorta, described as sisters or companions of Carmenta. Antevorta knew the future, Postvorta knew the past. Originally, they were perhaps two attributes of Carmenta, but later they came to be regarded as separate from, and companions of, Carmenta. They had two altars at Rome. Pregnant women invoked them to avert the dangers of childbirth.

Anthas (an'thas). In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon and Alcyone. He founded the cities of Anthaea and Hyperea which were afterwards united into Troezen. He is also said to have sailed to Caria where he founded the city of Halicarnassus.

Anthea (an-thē'a). Epithet of Hera, meaning "Flowery." The women of the Pelopon-nesus annually celebrated a flower festival in honor of Hera Anthea. Before the temple of Hera Anthea at Argos was the common grave of women who had come from the Aegean islands to help Dionysus in a war. Because they had come from the islands the women were called Haliae (Women of the Sea).

Anthedon (an'thē-don). In ancient geography, a harbor town of Boeotia. Some say it was named for a nymph. Others say it was named for Anthas, son of Poseidon and Alcyone, who was despot here. There was a sanctuary and grove of the Cabiri at Anthedon, and a temple of Demeter and Core. Glaucus, the fisherman who ate grass and was transformed into a sea god, was said to have come from Anthedon. Some say the Alodidae who killed each other were buried here.

Antheia (an-thē'a). City in Messenia, near the Gulf of Messenia. It was one of the seven gift cities offered by Agamemnon to Achilles if he would give up his quarrel with Agamemnon and return to the battle in the Trojan War. Its name was later changed to Thuria and in the time of Augustus it was given to the Spartans because the inhabitants of the city lent aid to Antony.

Antheis (an-thē'is). A daughter of Hyacinthus the Spartan. See Hyacinthides.

Anthela (an-thē'la). In ancient geography, a place near the pass of Thermopylae, in Greece. It was the original seat of the Amphictyonic Council which was composed of representatives of the "dwellers around" the shrine of Demeter at Anthela. The meetings of the Council were held there, and later at Delphi also.

Anthemion (an-thē'mi-on). In art and archaeology, a characteristic palmette or honeysuckle ornament, varying in detail but constant in type, of frequent occurrence both in single examples and in series, in vase-painting, in architectural sculpture, in jewelry and dress fabrics, and in all other decorative work of Greek origin from very early times, and later in ornament derived from the Greek. This ornament in its original shape was borrowed by Greek artists from the Orient, and was probably first adopted by the Ionians. It was much used upon antefixes, both sculptured and terra-cotta, and in the composition of acroteria, particularly those of the tall and slender Greek funeral slabs.

Anthemion frieze or molding. A molding or frieze ornamented with a series of anthemion, usually in graceful alternation of two forms. Sometimes the effect is diversified by the introduction of flowers or tendrils more literally expressed, and occasionally birds are represented perching on the tendrils, as in examples at Athens and Argos. The most elegant examples of anthemion molding are those beneath the capitals of the north porch columns, and forming one of the friezes, of the Erechtheum at Athens.

Anthesteria (an-thes-tē'ri-a). In ancient Greece, the third in order of the Attic feasts in honor of Dionysus. It was held in the spring on the 11th, 12th, and 13th days of the spring month Anthesterion (the beginning of March). The people wore garlands of the brilliant anemones which deck the Attic plain at that season, and certain mystic ceremonies and sacrifices were performed by priestesses in the guise of bacchantes. The festival was a time of merrymaking, and also a time for sacrifices to the forces of the Underworld and for the laying of ghosts. The first day of the festival was called Pithoigia, from pithos a large pottery jar for the storing of wine and wheat that was set into the ground. These pithoi were also used from time to time as burial jars, and as such, the Pithoigia may also have represented a day in which the ghosts of the grave-jars were banished. On Pithoigia the jars of wine made the previous season were tapped, a libation was poured to Dionysus and the celebrants of the festival at Athens also partook of the wine. Among the Boeotians the first day of the festival was called the Day of the Good Spirit. The broaching and drinking of the new wine set off a day of revel and feasting. The second day was called Choes (Cups). The merrymaking continued on this day. A drinking contest was held in which the winner deposited his victory wreath at the temple of Dionysus in the Marshes. The only day in the year that this temple was opened was on Choes. On this day also, the wife of the chief Archon was ritually married to Dionysus. According to some accounts, the people believed that the spirits of the dead rose up on Choes, and to protect themselves from the shades they chewed buckthorn all day and covered their doors with pitch. The latter had the quality of repelling evil by its own purity. On Choes each man drank by himself. Some say this custom arose because Orestes, after the murder of his mother, arrived in Attica at the time of Choes. Since it would have violated religious custom to drink with a man polluted by his mother's blood, the order was given for each man to drink separately, so that none should be polluted, and the custom continued. The third day was Chytroi (Pots). The word chytroi was also applied to natural holes, or "pots," in the ground, that were sometimes used as burying places. Chytroi was marked by a dramatic contest and the revel continued. In addition, sacrifices were made to Hermes of the Underworld. Dishes of seeds and beans were prepared, but no one tasted them, as they were offerings to the dead in the Underworld. The Anthesteria ("The festival of flowers") was thus a festival of the spring, of the opening of the new wine and rejoicing at the flowering of the earth. It was also a festival of purification after the evils of winter when the ghosts of the dead were appeased.

Anthesterion (an-thes-tē'ri-on). The eighth month of the Attic year, containing 29 days and corresponding to the last part of February and the beginning of March.

Antheus (an'thē-us). In Greek legend, a son of the Trojan Antenor. He was accidentally killed by Paris.

Anthium (an'thi-um). A place on the road from Eleusis to Megara where Demeter, disguised as an old woman, sat and rested in her search for her daughter Persephone. Here, at this place whose name means "Flowery Well," the daughters of Celeus found her and took her to their father's house.

Anthology, The. Collection of several thousand short Greek poems by many authors, written for the most in the elegiac meter. In it every period of Greek literature is represented, from the Persian war to the decadence of Byzantium. The first Anthology was compiled by Meleager of Gadara in the 1st century B.C., and to this additions were made by Philippus of Thessalonica about 40 A.D. In the collection by Agathias of Myrina (6th century) the poems are (for the first time) arranged by subjects. The so-called Palatine Anthology, a version compiled probably in the 10th century by Constantinus Cephalas, is the oldest one still extant.

Anthus (an'thus). In mythology, a son of Antinous and Hippodamia. He was killed by his father's horses and was changed into a bird that imitates the sound of horses and flies in front of them.

Antia (an-ti'ā). In Greek legend, the daughter of Iobates, king of Lycia, and the wife of Proetus, king of Tiryns in Argos. Bellerophon, a guest in her husband's house with whom she fell in love, honorably spurned her advances. As a woman scorned she accused him falsely to her husband of making the very advances he had repelled, and urged that he be put to death. She is also known as Stheneboea.

Antianeira (an'ti-a-nī'ra). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Menetes. She was the mother by Hermes of the Argonauts Erytus and Echion.

Anticlea (an-ti-klē'ā). A daughter of Autolycus. She was the wife of Laertes the Argive but was seduced by Sisyphus and some say Sisyphus was the father of her son Odysseus, although Laertes passed as his father. Odysseus, who had not known of her death, met her shade when he visited the Underworld to consult the seer Tiresias on his way home from Troy. Although she assured him that Penelope was faithful to him she discreetly refrained from telling him of the number of suitors who were besieging Penelope. She told Odysseus that his father had retired to the country and was grieving for him, and that she had died, not from illness or a shaft from the gods, but because of her longing for his return from Troy.

Anticlus (an'ti-klus). In Greek legend, one of the Greeks who entered Troy in the Wooden Horse. Helen, inspired by Aphrodite to see if the Wooden Horse was a trap, imitated the voices of the Greeks' wives and called to the Greek heroes by name. When Anticlus heard what he thought was his wife's voice, he tried to answer but Odysseus choked him so that he could not give them away, and Anticlus perished in one of the hollow legs of the horse.

Anticyra (an-tis'i-ra). In ancient geography,

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

a city in Locris, Greece, situated near Nau-pactus.

Anticyra. In ancient geography, a city in Phocis, Greece, situated on the Corinthian Gulf. It was noted for the medicinal plant hellebore (the ancient remedy for madness) obtained in its neighborhood.

Anticyra. In ancient geography, a city in Thessaly, Greece, situated on the Sperchius. Like Anticyra in Phocis, it was noted for hellebore, the ancient remedy for madness.

Anticythera (an-ti-si-thir'a). Small island in the Sea of Crete, NW of Crete. The Ephebe of Anticythera and other antiquities that had been lying at the bottom of the sea as a result of ancient shipwrecks were found near here by divers from Syme.

Antigone (an-tig'ō-nē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Oedipus by his mother Jocasta. She was the sister of Eteocles, Polynices, and Ismene. According to some accounts, she faithfully accompanied Oedipus as he fled through Greece pursued by the Furies because he had killed his father and sired children by his own mother. They came at last to Colonus in Attica where Oedipus died and there, with the aid of Theseus, Antigone buried him. She returned to Thebes where her brother Eteocles was now on the throne. By agreement with Polynices, Eteocles was to rule for a year and then yield to Polynices for a year. However, at the end of his term Eteocles refused to give up the throne. Polynices enlisted the aid of Adrastus, king of Argos. The latter, accompanied by the Argive chieftains who made up the Seven against Thebes, marched with Polynices against Thebes and waged an ill-fated war to restore Polynices to the throne. In the battle Eteocles and Polynices met in single combat and slew each other. Creon, uncle of Antigone, now became king. He ordered funeral honors for Eteocles, the valiant defender of the city, but gave orders that the body of Polynices should be cast outside the walls to become the prey of scavenger birds because he had treacherously attacked his own city. Antigone, moved by the claims of blood loyalty, resolved to bury Polynices in defiance of Creon. She attempted to enlist her sister's aid in the project but Ismene dared not risk rousing Creon's anger. Antigone succeeded in giving Polynices the minimum rites of burial by sprinkling dust over his body. Some say that she heaped a burial mound over his body or burned it on a pyre. When Creon learned that his order had been defied he demanded death for the person who had disobeyed him, and was not deterred even when he learned that the culprit was his own niece. He ordered her to be buried alive. Some say Antigone was entombed alive in a cave, or in the family tomb, and hanged herself, and that Haemon, the son of Creon, to whom she was betrothed, slew himself on her tomb. Others say that Creon handed Antigone over to Haemon with orders to destroy her. Haemon pretended to carry out his father's order but he secretly married Antigone and sent her away to live among his shepherds. She bore him a son. Years later the son returned to Thebes to take part in funeral games. Creon recognized him as a son of Antigone by the birthmark which all the descendants of the Sparti bore on their bodies. He charged Haemon with having disobeyed his orders, and in spite of the pleas of Heracles for clemency, ordered punishment for Antigone and Haemon. Haemon, to forestall Creon's vengeance, killed Antigone and then slew himself.

Antigone. A tragedy by Sophocles, of uncertain date. It treats a part of the Theban saga and describes how Antigone, daughter of Oedipus, defied her uncle, Creon, who assumed the throne after the death of her brothers Eteocles and Polynices. Her defiance, in the name of a divine law and of loyalty to her own blood, is pitted against the man-made law of Creon.

The scene is before the royal palace of Thebes, in the early morning of the day following the deaths of Eteocles and Polynices and the defeat of the Seven Argive chieftains who marched against Thebes. Antigone calls her sister Ismene from the palace and informs her of Creon's order: that Eteocles, the defender of the city, is to be honorably buried, but that Polynices shall be denied burial and left as prey for the birds; moreover, whoever disobeys the order is doomed to death. She asks Ismene to help her to bury their brother in defiance of the order. Ismene reminds her of the fate of their father, self-blinded when his obstinate search revealed his own sins; of their mother's suicide by hanging; and of the mutual doom their brothers wrought on each other. Now they will both perish more miserably than the rest if they disobey Creon. Ismene says that she, a weak woman, will bow before the superior strength of Creon. Antigone tells her to do as she likes, but for her part she intends to obey the divine law and bury the dead brother she loves. Ismene cannot persuade her that such defiance is impractical and inexpedient. The sisters retire into the palace. A chorus of Theban elders enters and sings of the army which Polynices led against Thebes. Zeus drove the attackers back and the two brothers killed each other. Creon enters. He says he has called the elders together to assure them he will guard Thebes' greatness. He makes known his order forbidding the burial of Polynices, whom he accuses of having sought to destroy the city and his own kin. This is his justification for denying him the burial sanctioned by the gods. A guard comes to Creon. He makes sure that he will not be blamed for the news he brings, then tells Creon that someone has buried Polynices in defiance of the order. The guard does not know who did it, and all the guards are ready to give their oath that they did not sprinkle dust on the body, nor had they seen anyone else do it. They decided that Creon should be informed and the lot fell on him to carry the message. He is most unhappy about it for no man likes to be the bearer of bad news. The leader of the chorus suggests that this burial may be the work of the gods. This angers Creon, who says the gods do not honor the wicked. He remembers that from the first there have been some in Thebes who disapproved his order, and decides that someone has been bribed to bury Polynices. He orders the guard to find the culprit on pain of death, and withdraws to the palace. The guard, relieved that he has not suffered for bringing bad news, departs. The chorus sings of the wonders man has accomplished, and of the skill that brings him now to evil, now to good. The guard reënters, leading Antigone. Creon approaches and learns that Antigone is the one who has defied him. The guard is regretful concerning Antigone, but the ill he brings to his friends is much less important to him than his own safety. Antigone one freely admits that she disobeyed Creon's order in full knowledge of it and of the consequences. She says she fulfilled a law of Zeus in breaking a law of Creon. Her life is so full of sorrow and evil, she says, that if she must die for it death will be a gain. Creon accuses her of adding insolence to her crime. If he does not now punish her as he said he would punish the culprit, she will have gained a victory over him. Antigone asks him not to delay. She claims glory for having buried her brother and says the others would agree with her if they dared speak. Creon insists on his view that Eteocles, being good, deserved honorable burial, but that Polynices, having evilly attacked his own city, must be punished even in death. Antigone holds to her view that she loves her brothers equally and has done right in obeying the divine law and burying Polynices. Creon declares that no woman is going to rule him; she must die.

Ismene is now brought forward. She wishes to share Antigone's fate but Antigone scorns her. Since she had no part in the deed, and did not wish to, Antigone does not want her company now; Ismene chose to live, now she must live. Ismene reminds Creon that his son Haemon is betrothed to Antigone, but he retorts that there are other women his son can marry. He orders the servants to take the sisters away. The chorus sings of the evils that have ever attended the house of Labdacus, and now when it seemed that peace would come, the gods, foolish speech, and frenzied emotions have brought more trouble. The gods can cause men to make evil seem good. Haemon enters. He assures his father that no marriage is worth more to him than his father's good opinion. Creon is gratified, and repeats his intention to kill whoever disobeyed his command, rather than to break his word to the city even though the culprit happens to be one of his own kin. For a ruler, he says, must be obeyed; disobedience ruins cities and makes homes desolate; the cause of order must be served; and above all a woman must not be allowed to get the better of the king. Haemon modestly says it is not for him to question his father, but he feels it is right to point out that many disapprove of his order to slay Antigone. They even say her deed in burying her brother was glorious. He declares that no treasure is so precious as his father's welfare, but suggests that perhaps in this instance his father's word is not the only word that is right; no man should think that he alone is wise; all must learn to bend sometimes, even as the tree gives way before the wintry wind. He tries to persuade his father to change his mind. The leader of the chorus, representing the Thebans, adds his agreement with Haemon. Creon refuses to be guided by one so young as Haemon and he also denies the Thebans a voice in this matter. If he is to rule he is going to rule by his own judgment. The words between Creon and Haemon become hotter as Haemon accuses him of injustice and adds that the death of Antigone will bring another death. Haemon flees before his father's threat to have Antigone killed before his eyes. Creon tells the chorus he will entomb Antigone alive. She is brought out. When she laments that she is looking her last on the sunlight the chorus reminds her that she has chosen her own course; they suggest that she is paying for her father's sins. As the servants lead her away Antigone's proud defiance wavers and she cries out to know what law of heaven she has broken that she must now die. The blind seer Tiresias now approaches Creon. All the omens say, he tells him, that it is a mistake not to bury Polynices. He should admit his error and change his order; there is no profit in slaying the slain anew. He gives this counsel to Creon because he is interested in Creon's welfare. Creon is angered. He threatens Tiresias and accuses him of having accepted a bribe. Tiresias is unable to convince him of his high purpose. He predicts the death of Haemon, because Creon has hidden one who belongs in the sunlight, and put in the sun one who should be hidden in the shade. He leaves, prophesying a wave of hatred against Creon. Creon is shaken by these warnings. He decides to take the advice of the leader of the chorus and release Antigone; he will free her himself for he had caused her to be entombed. He hurries off, and the chorus appeals to the gods to bring peace to Thebes.

A messenger enters. Creon, he says, who once had everything has now lost all; his son Haemon is dead. Eurydice, wife of Creon, comes from the palace. The messenger tells her that Creon, having changed his mind, found the body of Polynices and buried it, then went to the vault where Antigone was entombed to free her. He found that Antigone had hanged herself. Haemon, who was embracing her dead body, thrust himself through with his sword when his father called to him. Without saying a word, Eurydice reënters the palace, followed by the messenger who is disturbed by her silence. Now Creon returns, carrying the shrouded body of Haemon. He mourns his son and blames his own stubborn folly. It was the gods, he cries, who made him so cruel. The messenger, running from the palace, tells Creon that Eurydice has stabbed herself. Creon mourns. At last he knows that these deaths can be laid at his door. He wishes to die. As he is led into the palace the chorus sings that wisdom is the supreme happiness, and that the sins of the proud are punished with great blows. Perhaps with time wisdom is achieved.

Antigonidae (an-ti-gon'i-dē). The descendants of Antigonus I of Macedonia (died 301 B.C.), one of the generals of Alexander the Great. The principal members of the family were Demetrius I (Poliocetes), king of Macedonia (died 283 B.C.), son of Antigonus I; Antigonus II (Gonatas), king of Macedonia (died 239), son of Demetrius I; Demetrius of Cyrene (died 250), son of Demetrius I; Demetrius II, king of Macedonia (died 229), son of Antigonus II; Antigonus III (Doson), king of Macedonia (died 221), son of Demetrius of Cyrene; Philip V, king of Macedonia (died 179 B.C.), son of Demetrius II; and Perseus, king of Macedonia, conquered by the Romans in 168 B.C.

Antigonus I (an-tig'ō-nus) (of Macedonia). [Surnamed Cyclops or Monophthalmos, meaning the "One-Eyed."] King of Macedonia (306–301 B.C.), born c382 B.C.; killed at the battle of Ipsus, 301 B.C. He was one of the generals of Alexander the Great. After the latter's death he received the provinces of Greater Phrygia, Lycia, and Pamphylia. He carried on war against Perdiccas and Eumenes, made extensive conquests in Asia, assumed the title of king in 306 B.C., and was

Antigonus II (of Macedonia). [Called Antigonus Gonatus.] King of Macedonia (283–239 B.C.), son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, born c320 B.C.; died 239 B.C. He assumed the title in 283, after the death of his father, but did not actually reign until 276. He suppressed the Celtic invasion and was temporarily driven from his land by Pyrrhus in 273 B.C.

Antigonus III (of Macedonia). [Called Antigonus Doson.] King of Macedonia (229–221 B.C.), nephew of Antigonus II and a great-grandson of Antigonus I, Alexander's general. He died 221 B.C. He was appointed guardian of Philip, son of Demetrius II, and on the death of Demetrius (229 B.C.) he married his widow and ascended the throne. He successfully supported Aratus and the Achaean League against Cleomenes, king of Sparta, and the Aetolians, and defeated the former at Sellasia in 222 B.C. He is said to have been dubbed "Doson" because "he was always about to give, and never did."

Antigonus of Carystus (ka-ris'tus) or Antigonus Carystius (-ti-us). Greek writer and bronze worker of the middle of the 3rd century B.C., who worked chiefly at Pergamum although he was a native of Carystus, Euboea. He was the author of biographical works on the philosophers and of a natural-history work entitled Collection of Wonderful Tales, portions of which are still extant. He helped fashion the statues which celebrated Attalus' Gallic victory.

Antilochus (an-ti'lō-kus). In Greek legend, a son of Nestor, who had been exposed by his mother to die on Mount Ida but was nursed by a bitch until found and saved. He had been left at home as too young to accompany his father when the latter sailed off to the Trojan War. A few years later he followed the Greeks to Troy and appealed to Achilles to soften his father's wrath because he had defied him and joined the fighting. He became a great friend of Achilles. Though he was one of the youngest Greeks at Troy the handsome lad was a brave fighter. He slew many Trojans and on occasion was protected by Poseidon from the spears of the enemy. Because of his friendship with Achilles and his fleetness of foot he was sent to tell Achilles of the death of Patroclus. At Troy one of Nestor's horses was pierced by an arrow. The other horse became frenzied. As Antilochus hurried to his father's assistance, Memnon the Ethiopian killed him. Achilles avenged the death of his friend Antilochus as he did that of Patroclus. The three friends were buried in the same mound, and were seen by Odysseus walking together over the asphodel meadows of the lower world.

Antimachides (an-ti-mā'ki-dēz). Sixth century B.C. Greek architect associated with Antistates, Callaeschus, and Porinus in preparing the original plans for the Olympieum, the colossal temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens projected by the Pisistratids. (JJ)

Antimachus (an-tim'a-kus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan chieftain who advised the Trojans not to return Helen to Menelaus. His sons were slain by Agamemnon.

Antimachus. [Called the Colophonian.] Greek epic and elegiac poet of Clarus, a part of the dominion of Colophon, who flourished c410 B.C. His chief work was the Thebais, a voluminous epic poem on the first expedition against Thebes. His elegy on Lyde, his wife (or mistress), which tells of famous lovers separated by death, was much admired in antiquity. He also published a critical edition of Homer. The Alexandrians admired him as a learned poet and for this reason placed him next after Homer among the epic poets, but as a critic remarked, "next" does not necessarily mean "near." His style, preserved only in fragments, became rigid and artificial in his attempts to attain dignity of language and to avoid common or popular expressions.

Antinous (an-tin'ō-us). In the Odyssey, the most arrogant of the suitors of Penelope during Odysseus' long absence. He complained to her son Telemachus that Penelope would not make up her mind which of her suitors to choose and he accused her of guile in weaving a web, supposedly a shroud for her father-in-law, which she unraveled each night. Antinous assured Telemachus that the wooers would camp on him until she chose a husband. He was enraged when he learned that Telemachus had gotten a ship and set out for Pylus for news of his father, and resolved to ambush and kill Telemachus on his way home. He was most abusive when Odysseus returned to his own house disguised as a beggar, and he was the first one Odysseus killed.

Antiochus (an-ti'ō-kus). A legendary son of Heracles and Meda, daughter of a Dryopian king. Antiochus was said to have founded the Attic deme which bore his name.

Antiochus. Athenian sea captain; died 407 B.C. He chanced to be in the assembly at Athens when contributions were being made to the state. Alcibiades, passing by, heard the applause and inquired the reason for it. When he was told, he entered the assembly and offered a large contribution himself. In the applause that followed he forgot that he was carrying a quail in his cloak. The bird escaped, and all took part in the scramble to retrieve it. Antiochus caught it and restored it to Alcibiades. Henceforth he became a great favorite with Alcibiades and served loyally under him. In 407 B.C. when Alcibiades, general in command on land and sea, sailed to collect money for his operations, he left the main body of the fleet at Notium under the command of Antiochus with strict orders not to engage the Spartan fleet under Lysander at Ephesus. Antiochus disobeyed his orders, sailed out and taunted the Spartans. Lysander sailed out against him and destroyed his ship and the Athenian ships that had come to his aid. Fifteen ships were lost in all.

Antiochus I (of Commagene). King of Commagene, a petty principality between the Euphrates and Mount Taurus, whose capital was Samosata, at one time a part of the Syrian kingdom of the Seleucidae. He concluded (64 B.C.) a peace with Pompey, and later (49) supported him in the civil war with Caesar. He died c30 B.C.

Antiochus II (of Commagene). King of Commagene; fl. late 1st century B.C. He was the successor to Mithridates I. He was summoned to Rome and executed (29 B.C.) for having caused the murder of an ambassador sent to Rome by his brother.

Antiochus III (of Commagene). King of Commagene; fl. early 1st century A.D.; died 17 A.D. He was probably the father of Antiochus IV of Commagene. Very little is known about either his accomplishments or dates of rule.

Antiochus IV (of Commagene). [Called An-tiuchus IV Epiphanes.] King of Commagene; fl. middle of 1st century A.D. He was probably a son of Antiochus III of Commagene. He was a friend of Caligula, who restored (38 A.D.) to him the kingdom of Commagene, which had been made a Roman province at the death of his father in 17. Subsequently, however, he was deposed by Caligula, but was restored (41) on the accession of Claudius. He was finally deprived (72 A.D.) of his kingdom by Vespasian who incorporated it in Syria.

Antiochus I (of Syria). [Called Antiochus I Soter.] King of Syria (280–261 B.C.), born 324 B.C.; killed c261 B.C. He was a son of Seleucus I Nicator. It is said that when he fell sick from love of Stratonice, the young wife of his father, Seleucus, on the advice of the physician Erasistratus, allowed Stratonice to marry his son, and invested him with the government of Upper Asia giving him the title of king. On the death of his father Antiochus succeeded to all his dominions, but relinquished his claims to Macedonia on the marriage of Antigonus II of Macedonia to Phila, the daughter of Seleucus and Stratonice. He was the greatest founder of cities after Alexander the Great.

Antiochus II (of Syria). [Called Antiochus II Theos.] King of Syria; killed 247 B.C. He was the second son of Antiochus I, whom he succeeded in 261 B.C. He became involved in a ruinous war with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, during which Syria was further weakened by the revolt of the provinces of Parthia and Bactria, Arsaces establishing the Parthian empire in c250 B.C., and Theodotus the independent kingdom of Bactria about the same time. Peace was concluded with Egypt in 250 B.C. Antiochus was obliged to reject his wife Laodice and to marry Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy. On the death of Ptolemy (247 B.C.), he recalled Laodice (who, it is thought, caused Ptolemy's murder) and also Berenice and her son. The connection between Syria and Egypt is referred to in Daniel, xi. 6.

Antiochus III (of Syria). [Called Antiochus the Great.] King of Syria (223–187 B.C.), the most famous of the Seleucidae. He was born c241 B.C.; died 187 B.C. He was the second son of Seleucus II and grandson of Antiochus II, and succeeded his brother actor; up, lūte, pūll; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; đ as d or j, š as s or sh, t̄ as t or ch, z̄ as z or zh.

Seleucus Ceraunus at the age of 15. His epithet "the Great" was earned by the magnitude of his enterprises rather than by what he accomplished. He subdued (220 B.C.) his rebellious brothers Molo and Alexander, satraps of Media and Persia, and was forced (after having undertaken an aggressive war against Ptolemy Philopator) by the battle of Raphia, near Gaza, to relinquish (217 B.C.) his claims to Coele-Syria and Palestine. He defeated and killed (214) Achaeus, the rebellious governor of Asia Minor; attempted (212–205 B.C.) to regain the former provinces Parthia and Bactria; and was compelled to recognize (205) the independence of Parthia. The victory of Paneas (198) gave him back the Egyptian provinces of Coele-Syria and Palestine. He made peace, however, with Ptolemy Epiphanes to whom he betrothed his daughter Cleopatra, promising Coele-Syria and Palestine as a dowry. He conquered (196 B.C.) the Thracian Chersonese from Macedonia; received (195) Hannibal at his court; carried on (192–189) a war with the Romans who demanded the restoration of the Egyptian provinces and the Thracian Chersonese; was defeated at Thermopylae in 191, and at Magnesia in 190; and sustained naval losses at Chios (191) and at Myonnesus (190 B.C.). He purchased peace by consenting to the surrender of all his European possessions, and his Asiatic possessions as far as the Taurus, and the surrender of Hannibal, who escaped, and by giving up his elephants and ships of war. Antiochus was killed by his subjects in an attempt to plunder the rich temple of Elymais in order to pay the Romans, an event which, like his defeat by the Romans, is supposed by some to be referred to in Daniel, xi. 18, 19.

Antiochus IV (of Syria). [Called Antiochus IV Epiphanes.] King of Syria (175–c163 B.C.); third son of Antiochus III; died 163 B.C. He reconquered Armenia, which had been lost by his father, and made war on Egypt in the period 171–168 B.C., recovering Coele-Syria and Palestine. His policy of destroying the Jewish religion, in pursuance of which he took Jerusalem by storm in 170 B.C. (when he desecrated the temple) and again in 168, led to the successful revolt under Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees (167 B.C.).

Antiochus V (of Syria). [Called Antiochus V Eupator.] King of Syria (163–162 B.C.); son of Antiochus IV, whom he succeeded at the age of nine years, under the guardianship of Lysias. He was born c173 B.C.; died 162 B.C. He concluded a peace with the Jews who had revolted under his father, and was defeated and killed by Demetrius Soter (the son of Seleucus Philopator) who laid claim to the throne.

Antiochus VII (of Syria). [Called Antiochus VII Sidetes.] King of Syria (c139–c129 B.C.); born c159 B.C.; died c129 B.C. He was the second son of Demetrius Soter. He carried on war with the Jews, taking Jerusalem in 133 B.C., after which he concluded peace with them on favorable terms. He was killed in a war with the Parthians.

Antiochus VIII (of Syria). [Called Antiochus VIII Grypus, meaning "the Hook-nosed."] King of Syria (125–96 B.C.); died 96 B.C. He was the second son of Demetrius Nicator.

Antiochus XIII (of Syria). [Called Antiochus XIII Asiaticus.] King of Syria, the last of the Seleucidae. He took refuge in Rome during the mastery of Tigranes in Syria in the period 83–69 B.C. Given (69) possession of the kingdom by Lucullus, he was deprived (64 B.C.) of it by Pompey.

Antiochus of Ascalon (as'ka-lon). Greek eclectic philosopher, born in Palestine; early in the 1st century B.C. He was the founder of the so-called Fifth Academy. He sought to reconcile the philosophies of the Stoic Mnesarchus and the Skeptic Philo, each of whom had been his teacher.

Antiochus of Syracuse (sir'a-kūs). Greek historian; fl. in the 5th century B.C. His History of Syracuse provided a record to 424 B.C. and was used as a source by Thucydides. He also wrote an account of the Greek colonization of Italy which is referred to by Strabo and Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

Antiope (an-tī'ō-pē). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Nycteus of Thebes. She was seduced by Zeus in the form of a satyr and fled from her father's wrath to the king of Sicyon. Her father secured a promise from his brother Lycus to help him capture and punish Antiope and she was brought back from Sicyon by force, her father having died. The twin sons she bore to Zeus, Amphion and Zethus, were left on Mount Cithaeron

to die, but were saved by a herdsman. Antiope was cruelly treated by Lycus and his wife Dirce. She fled to the hut where her sons, now grown up, were living. Dirce pursued and told the twins to put the runaway to death by tying her by the hair to the horns of a wild bull. As they were about to do so the herdsman informed them that Antiope was their mother. Thereupon they seized Dirce and put her to death in the manner she had suggested for Antiope. According to other accounts, Antiope was the daughter of the river-god Asopus and was married to Lycus who divorced her to marry Dirce. In both accounts she was persecuted by Dirce and avenged by her Zeus-fathered sons.

Antiope. In Greek mythology, an Amazon queen, sister of Hippolyte. She became Theseus' captive and bore a son, Hippolytus, to him. In the war which the Amazons and Scythians waged against Athens she fought loyally at Theseus' side against her own countrywomen. According to some accounts she was killed in the battle. Others say Theseus killed her when she tried to prevent his marriage to Phaedra.

Antiparos (an-tip'ā-ro-s). See Oliarus.

Antipater (an-tip'ā-tēr). Macedonian general and diplomat, born c398 B.C.; died 319 B.C. He was one of the ablest and most trusted of the ministers of Philip II of Macedon. Philip sent him (346 B.C.) to Athens as an ambassador to receive the oaths by which the Athenians accepted the peace imposed by Philip after the fall of Olynthus. He also acted in the peace negotiations after the defeat of the Athenians and Thebans at Chaeronea (338 B.C.). After the death of Philip, Antipater served Alexander the Great as regent of Macedonia while the king was in Asia. As regent he suppressed a Spartan revolt under Agis III through a victory at Megalopolis (330 B.C.). Olympias, mother of Alexander, constantly sent letters of accusation against Antipater to her son. In his turn he constantly complained to Alexander of her intrigues. On Alexander's death (323 B.C.) the partition of the empire left Macedonia under Antipater's control as joint ruler with Craterus; he defeated a Greek attempt (322 B.C.) to throw off Macedonian rule in the Lamian war. As conditions for peace with Athens following this war, he ordered modifications in the democratic constitution, placed a Macedonian garrison in Munychia at the Piraeus, and demanded the surrender of Demosthenes and Hyperides, the orators who agitated for revolt against Macedonia. Demosthenes fled to Calauria and committed suicide. Hyperides fled to the temple of Aeacus in Aegina. He was captured, taken to Antipater, and put to death. Antipater is said by some authors to have died of illness and by others to have been killed in battle.

Antiphanes (an-tif'ā-nēz.) Greek comic poet, outstanding writer of the so-called Middle Comedy. He was born c388 B.C., and died c311 B.C. He is believed not to have been a native Athenian, but to have migrated there from Larissa in Thessaly. He was a most prolific author. Titles of about 120 of his plays are known, and more than 300 fragments of text survive. He won first prize 13 times with his comedies.

Antiphas (an'ti-fas). In mythology, one of the twin sons of the priest Laocoön. He and his brother Thymbraeus were crushed to death by a serpent which Apollo sent from the sea to punish Laocoön for defaming his temple. But the Trojans thought the serpent was sent as a punishment because Laocoön doubted the divinity of the Wooden Horse the Greeks left before the walls of Troy.

Antiphates (an-tif'ā-tēz). In mythology, a son of Melampus the seer. He was the father of Oicles who was the companion of Heracles and was killed when he went to Troy with him.

Antiphates. In Homeric legend (Odyssey), a chieftain of the Laestrygonians, man-eating giants of Italy. His followers destroyed all but Odysseus' own ship when his fleet anchored in their harbor. Odysseus anchored his ship outside the harbor and escaped when the cannibals attacked the other ships and devoured the crews.

Antiphates. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan warrior who was slain by Leonteus in the battle at the Greek ships in the Trojan War.

Antiphellos (an-ti-fel'os). In ancient geography, a town on the SW coast of Lycia, Asia Minor. Its site contains a Lycian necropolis of rock-cut tombs, which are architecturally important because the façades are in exact reproduction of a framed construction of square wooden beams, with doors and windows of paneled work, and ceilings of round poles laid closely together. These tombs evidently represent ancient dwellings, and the imitation is carried out in some of the interiors. There is also an ancient theater, the cavea of which is well preserved, with 26 tiers of seats.

Antiphilus (an-tif'i-lus). Greek painter of the second half of the 4th century B.C. His work included portraits of Philip of Macedonia, Alexander the Great, and others.

Antiphon (an'ti-fon). Athenian orator and politician, the oldest of the "ten Attic orators." He was born at Rhamnus, Attica, c480 B.C. He taught political eloquence in his own school of rhetoric and also prepared speeches which he sold to others to deliver. He trained his aristocratic friends for legal practice in the democracy with exercises in speech-craft. His method was to take an imaginary case and prepare two speeches for the prosecution and two speeches for the defense. Three of these so-called tetralogies are extant. In addition, there are three extant speeches which were delivered in actual murder cases. These, though written by Antiphon, were delivered by others. As a member of the aristocratic party, he was brought to trial (411 B.C.) for his share in establishing government by the Four Hundred. This revolution was the death-blow to the democracy. He had spent all his life preparing for this revolution to restore the aristocrats and an oligarchy, and the speech he made in defense of his actions (the only instance of his delivering publicly one of his own speeches) was considered by Thucydides to be the greatest speech in the world. In spite of it he was condemned to death and executed (411 B.C.)

Antiphus (an'ti-fus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Talaemenes and the nymph of the lake of Gygaea. He and his brother Mesthles captained the Maeonians who came from Mount Tmolus as allies of Troy. Homer says their mother was "the lake of Gygaea."

Antiphus. Named by Homer (Iliad) as one of Priam's 50 sons. His mother was Hecuba. In the early days of the war he and his half-brother Isus were captured by Achilles but were released for ransom. He joined the battle against the Greeks and, in an attempt to kill Telamonian Ajax, killed Leucus, a valiant companion of Odysseus, and was later slain himself by Agamemnon.

Antiphus. In Greek legend, a Greek chieftain who fought at Troy. Eurypylus, a descendant of Heracles, tried to kill him but he fled as it was his fate to die in Sicily. He sailed from Troy with Odysseus and was one of the Greeks devoured by Polyphemus when Odysseus and his companions were trapped in Polyphemus' cave in Sicily.

Antipoenus (an-ti-pē-nus). In Greek legend, a Theban descendant of the Sparti. When Heracles decided to resist Erginus, king of the Minyans who was attacking Thebes, an oracle foretold victory if a descendant of the Sparti voluntarily died for Thebes. Antipoenus was unwilling to give up his life for his city but his daughters, Alcis and Androclea, gladly did so.

Antissa (an-tis'a). Cave on the island of Lesbos where, according to tradition, the head of Orpheus was laid to rest but where it continued to prophesy. At last Apollo, fearful for the reputation of his own oracles at Delphi, Gryneum, and Clarus, ordered the head of Orpheus to cease prophesying, and it fell silent.

Antistates (an-tis'ta-tēz). Greek architect, 6th century B.C., associated with Callaeschrus, Antimachides, and Porinus in preparing the original plans for the Olympieum, the colossal Doric dipteral temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens, construction of which was begun about 530 B.C. by the Pisistratids. Work on the temple was abandoned on the expulsion of Hippias, c510, resumed in 174 B.C. under the direction of the Roman architect Cossutius, and completed in the reign of the emperor Hadrian. (JJ)

Antisthenes (an-tis'thē-nēz). Athenian philosopher, born at Athens, c455 B.C.; died there c360 B.C. His mother was a Thracian. He was a pupil of Gorgias in his youth. In later life he became a follower and intimate friend of Socrates. He founded a school in Athens which admitted those who were not full citizens of Athens. His followers were known as Cynici and the school he founded was the Cynic School. The doctrine he taught was that Virtue is the only good, that it can be taught, that the essence of virtue is self-control, and that pleasure is an evil if sought for its own sake. He regarded riches, fame, ease, and enjoyment as worthless. Two works on the contest for the arms of Achilles survive but the attribution of them to Antisthenes is disputed. He is said to have written dialogues, interpretations of Homer, and fictitious orations but save for some fragments, none of these has survived.

Antium (an'shum, -shi-um). [Modern name, Anzio.] Town in C Italy, situated on the Tyrrhenian Sea, about 32 miles S of Rome, at one time part of the nearby community of Nettuno: a seaside resort already known to the Romans. In ancient times a Volscian stronghold, it was incorporated into Rome in 338 B.C. It was the birthplace of Nero and of Caligula who later patronized the town. The statue known as the Apollo Belvedere was discovered here in 1485.

Antoninus Liberalis (an-tō-nī'nus lib-ē-rā'lis). Greek grammarian of the middle of the 2nd century A.D. He was the author of a collection of mythical metamorphoses based on Hellenistic sources.

Antonius (an-tō'ni-us), Marcus. Roman politician and orator, born 143 B.C.; killed at Rome, 87 B.C. He was consul (99), and censor (97 B.C.), and was put to death by the Marian party.

Antony (an'tō-ni), Mark. [Also: Marc Antony; Latin, Marcus Antonius.] Roman triumvir and general, born c82 B.C.; died at Alexandria, in August, 30 B.C. He was the grandson of Marcus Antonius the orator. He served in Palestine and Egypt; was quaestor in 52 and tribune in 49 B.C. He became a prominent adherent of Caesar, and when he was expelled from Rome he fled to Caesar, who thereupon commenced the civil war. He commanded the left wing at the battle of Pharsalus, was master of the horse in 47 and became consul in 44 B.C. He engaged in intrigues after Caesar's death, and was denounced by Cicero. After having fled from Rome, he formed with Octavian (the future Augustus) and Lepidus the Second Triumvirate in 43. He defeated Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in 42 B.C., summoned Cleopatra to Asia and later followed her to Alexandria, and renewed the triumvirate in 40 and 37 B.C. From c40 B.C. he lived chiefly at Alexandria with Cleopatra, abandoning his wife Octavia, the sister of Octavian. He conducted an unsuccessful expedition against Parthia in 36. He was defeated by Octavian at Actium in 31 B.C., returned to Egypt and committed suicide before Octavian's entry into Alexandria.

Anubis (a-nū'bis). In Egyptian mythology, the son of Osiris often identified by the Greeks with Hermes. He is represented with a jackal's head and was the ruler of graves and supervisor of the burial of the dead.

Anyte (ä'ni-tē). Greek epic poetess of Tegea in Arcadia of whom little is known except from mention of her by other writers. She was active c290 B.C. and was once called "the feminine Homer." Twenty Doric epigrams are preserved in the Anthology.

Anytus (a'ni-tus). Athenian politician; fl. end of the 5th century B.C. He was an ardent admirer of Alcibiades who treated him with the utmost insolence. He was a democrat and fled to Thebes when the government of Athens was in the control of the Thirty Tyrants (404 B.C.). With Thrasybulus and other exiles from Athens he seized the fortress of Phyle in Attica and took part in the overthrow of the Tyrants, 403 B.C. Anytus was among those who brought the charge of impiety against Socrates that resulted in the death of the aged philosopher. Part of the charge against Socrates was that he corrupted the young men by his teachings. Some say this was a particular reference to the influence of Socrates on Alcibiades, who had been a pupil and friend of the philosopher and had insulted Anytus, and who had brought disaster to Athens by his military advice to Sparta.

Aonia (ā-ō'ni-ā). In ancient geography, a district in Boeotia, Greece. The name is often used as synonymous with Boeotia.

Aornis (ā-ōr'nis). In Greek mythology, one of the five tributaries of the river Styx in the Underworld. The others were Acheron, Phlegethon, Cocytus, and Lethe.

Aornum (ā-ōr'nūm). A place in Thesprotia where there was said to be a passage to Hades. Some say Orpheus used this entrance when he descended to Hades in search of Eurydice.

Aornus (ā-ōr'nus). [Also: Aornos.] In ancient geography, a rock stronghold situated between the Indus and Swat rivers, taken Apamea (ap-ā-mē'ā). [Also: Apamea Cibotus.] In ancient geography, a city in Phrygia, Asia Minor, near the modern Dinar, Turkey.

Apamea. [Also: Apamea ad Orontem.] In ancient geography, a city in Syria, situated on the Orontes River about 50 miles SE of Antioch; the medieval Famieh, and the modern Qal'at el Mudiq, originally called Pharnake.

Apaturia (ap-ā-tū'ri-ā). An epithet of Athena, meaning, in this sense, "Deceitful." Aethra, before she became the mother of Theseus, in obedience to a dream sent to her by Athena, waded across from Troezen to the island of Sphaeria to offer libations to Sphaerus, the charioteer of Pelops who was buried there. On the island Poseidon overpowered her and violated her. (For this reason, Theseus sometimes claimed he was the son of Poseidon.) Aethra changed the name of the island to Hieria (Sacred Isle), and raised a temple to Athena Apaturia. Henceforth it was decreed that Troezenian maidens must dedicate their girdles to Athena Apaturia before their wedding day.

Apaturia. In Greek antiquity, the solemn annual meeting of the phratrides (family brotherhoods) for the purpose of registering the children of the preceding year whose birth entitled them to citizenship. It took place in the month Pyanepsion (falling variously in October or November), and lasted three days. The registration took place on the third day.

Apelles (ā-pel'ēz). Greek painter, born in Ionia, and active in the 4th century B.C. He is considered one of the great ancient artists. He is said to have been a pupil first of an otherwise unknown Ephorus of Ephesus, later of Pamphilus of Sicyon, and his style is described as a blend of Ionian and Dorian elements. He was celebrated particularly for his portraits, including one of Alexander the Great with the thunderbolts of Zeus, for the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and those of such other Macedonian notables as Archelaus, Clitus, and Antigonos. He also painted a procession of the high priest of Artemis, Artemis and her nymphs, and the Aphrodite Anadyomene (Aphrodite wringing out her hair as she rises from the sea) painted for the temple of Asclepius at Cos. This last was probably his most noted work. It was taken to Rome by Augustus and set up in the temple of Caesar.

Apemius (a-pē'mi-us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Averter of Ills." There was an altar of Zeus Apemius on Mount Parnes near Athens.

Apemosyne (a-pe-moz'i-nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Catreus, king of Crete. She left Crete with her brother, Althaemenes, to avoid fulfilling an oracle which said Catreus would die at the hands of one of his own children. She and Althaemenes went to Rhodes and settled in Camirus. Hermes fell in love with her but she fled from his advances. One evening he cornered her, and when she tried to flee she fell on wet hides that he had placed across her path. He caught her and ravished her. Althaemenes did not believe her story that she had tried to escape. He killed her for what he thought were her immoral ways.

Apennines (ap'e-nīnz). [Latin, Appenninus.] Central mountain system of Italy. It forms the backbone of the peninsula and extends from the Ligurian Alps in the neighborhood of Savona SE to the extremity of the peninsula. The highest point is Monte Corno (9585 feet), in the Gran Sasso d'Italia. Length, about 800 miles; average elevation, about 4000 feet.

Apesantius (a-pe-sān'shi-us, -shus). Epithet of Zeus, from Mount Apesas near Nemea in Argolis where some say Perseus first sacrificed to Zeus of Apesas.

Aphaea (a-fē'ā). Name under which Britomartis was worshiped on the island of Aegina, because she "vanished" when pursued by King Minos of Crete. The well-preserved Doric temple on Aegina, first thought to have been dedicated to Athena, is now known to have been the temple of Aphaea. At the site were found the much-admired late archaic pediment sculptures, the Aeginetan Marbles now in Munich. (JJ)

Aphareus (af'ār-yūs). In Greek mythology, the son of Gorgophone and Perieres, and the grandson of Perseus. He married his half-sister Arene, and by her was the father of Lynceus. He acted as foster father to Idas, Arene's son by Poseidon. According to tradition, Aphareus founded the city of Arene,

named for his wife, and with his brother Leucippus succeeded to the throne of Messenia on the death of Perieres. When Neleus was driven out of Iolcus by Pelias, Aphareus received him kindly and gave him Pylus. Lycus, son of Pandion, also came to Aphareus and, some say, revealed the rites of Demeter to the Messenians.

Aphesius (a-fē'shi-us, -shus). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Releaser." At a time when all Greece was afflicted by a prolonged drought the oracle advised the Greeks to ask Aeacus to pray to Zeus for them. Aeacus went to the top of a mountain on the island of Aegina and sacrificed to Zeus Panhellenius (God of all the Greeks). In answer to the prayers of Aeacus Zeus sent a torrent of rain and released the land from the drought, hence the epithet "Releaser." Near the Molurian rock in Argolis, where Sciron was in the habit of tossing passers-by into the sea, the Greeks raised a temple of Zeus Aphesius.

Apheta (af'ē-tā) or Aphetae (-tē). A name meaning "Starting place," attached to several places. 1) It was the name of a street in Argos because it was from here that suitors for the hands of the Danaids were to start their race. The race was arranged by Danaus to marry off his daughters after they had all, at his request, slain their husbands, the sons of Aegyptus, on the wedding night. The winner of the race, in which there were few contestants, was to have first choice of a bride, the others were to choose brides in the order in which they finished the race. 2) Apheta was also the name of a place in Sparta which was said to have been the starting point of a race in which Odysseus won Penelope as a bride. 3) The name was also given to a place in Magnesia from which the Argo sailed on the expedition for the Golden Fleece.

Aphidas (a-fi'das). In Greek mythology, a son of Arcas and either Meganira, the nymph Chrysopelia, or the dryad Erato. He became the ruler of Tegea in Arcadia, and was the father of Aleus, who founded the famous temple of Athena Alea in Tegea, and of Antia who married Proetus.

Aphidna (a-fid'na). In ancient geography, a city of Attica. According to legend, here Theseus hid Helen after abducting her from Sparta. He left her here (she was ten years old at the time) because he feared the Athenians disapproved of his deed.

Aphidnus (a-fid'nus). In mythology, a friend of Theseus who with Theseus' mother Aethra took care of Helen when Theseus abducted her. When Helen was rescued by her brothers, Castor and Polydeuces, Aphidnus adopted them as his sons. In Roman legend, a friend of Aeneas, killed by Turnus.

Aphneius (af'nē-ūs). Epithet of Ares. Some say that Ares embraced Aërope, daughter of Cepheus, king of Tegea, and that she died in giving birth to her child. The child clung to its mother even though she was dead, and through the will of Ares sucked great quantities of milk from her breasts and lived. For this reason the name Aphneius (Abundant) was given to Ares. There was a sanctuary of Ares Aphneius on Mount Cresius near Tegea in Arcadia where all this took place.

Aphrodisias (af-rō-diz'i-as). In ancient geography, a town in Caria, Asia Minor, situated on the Maeander River (modern, Menderes) in what is now SW Turkey. The site contains the remains of an ancient hippodrome which coincide on one side with the city walls. Both ends are semicircular. The length is 919 feet, the breadth 270; the arena is 747 by 98 feet. There are 26 tiers of seats, divided into sections by flights of steps and bordered above by an arcaded gallery. There is also a comparatively well preserved Roman temple of Venus. It is Ionic, octastyle, pseudodipteral, with 15 columns on the flanks, in plan 60 by 119 feet. The peristyle columns are 35¾ feet high.

Aphrodite (af-rō-dī'tē). One of the 12 Olympian deities, goddess of love and beauty who ruled the hearts of gods and men and symbolized the irresistible generative powers of nature operating on land, in the sea, and in the air. Only Artemis, Athena, and Hestia among the goddesses were successful in denying the power of the great goddess of love. All others, including Zeus himself, were under her sway. Conscious of her power to give beauty and love, Aphrodite punishes those who fail to honor her or who attempt to deny her, and willingly aids those who honor and seek her.

Some say that Aphrodite was the daughter of Zeus and the Titaness Dione. But others say that when Cronus emasculated his father

Uranus with a sickle and flung his dismembered parts into the sea, foam gathered about them; and from this sea foam Aphrodite rose and was borne to land on a sea-shell, whence her epithets Aphrogeneia (Foam-born), and Anadyomene (Risen from the Sea). She first stepped ashore on the island of Cythera, and then went to Paphos on Cyprus. Paphos was the most ancient seat of her worship, and every spring the priestess of her temple renewed herself by bathing in the sea. From these two islands, Aphrodite has the names Cytherea and Cypris. Wherever she treads, according to the ancient Greeks, flowers spring up, and doves and sparrows murmur in the air about her. She possesses a magic girdle which imparts surpassing grace and charm to whomever wears it and compels all who behold it to fall in love with the wearer. Some say Eros and Himeros (God of Longing), her constant companions, along with the Horae and the Charites, were born with her.

She was given in marriage by Zeus to the lame god Hephaestus, to whom she was notoriously unfaithful, especially with the magnificent war god Ares. To Ares she bore Phobus (Fear), Deimos (Terror), and Harmonia, who married Cadmus, and some say Eros and Anteros (Unrequited Love) were also her children by Ares. Helios, who saw everything in his circuit across the heavens reported to Hephaestus that Aphrodite was entertaining Ares in his absence. Hephaestus laid a trap for them. He pretended that he was going to Lemnos but secretly spied on them. He found Aphrodite and Ares together and cast a great bronze net he had forged over them, from which they could not escape. He then called the gods to witness their disgrace and his own dishonor. He demanded that the gifts he had given Zeus on his marriage to Aphrodite be returned as a condition for releasing the lovers from the net. Zeus was disgusted by the public spectacle Hephaestus had made of his private affairs and refused to return the marriage gifts. Poseidon, who was in love with Aphrodite, guaranteed that Ares would pay the equivalent of the marriage gifts to Hephaestus in return for his freedom from the net, and if Ares failed to do so Poseidon promised that he himself would pay Hephaestus and take Aphrodite as his wife. Ares was freed, but never did pay, as he claimed that since Zeus had refused he could do the same. Aphrodite renewed herself by bathing in the sea. Afterward she rewarded Poseidon for his good offices and bore him two sons, Rhodus and Herophilus. Hermes, who had expressed his admiration for her as she struggled in Hephaestus' bronze net, received her favors. She bore him Hermaphroditus, who had the features of both sexes. But Eos, who seduced her lover Ares, she punished. She caused Eos to have a fatal weakness for young and beautiful mortal boys. In the end, Hephaestus took Aphrodite back as his wife on her own terms, as he was madly in love with her. In later myth she is the wife of Ares. She subsequently bore the fertility god Priapus to Dionysus.

By her power to rule the hearts of gods as well as men, Aphrodite many times caused Zeus to fall in love with mortal maidens. To make her understand what it was like to love a mortal, Zeus caused her to fall in love with

Anchises, son of Capys. She went to the herdsman's hut of Anchises, on the "cloud-kissing" peaks of Mount Ida near Troy, and appeared to him when he came in from tending his flocks. Anchises was stunned by her loveliness, and instantly took her for a goddess. But she told him she was a mortal, the daughter of the Phrygian King Otreus, and that she had been brought to Mount Ida by Hermes to become Anchises' wife. Anchises was enchanted and at once embraced her. Afterward he fell into a deep sleep. As he slept Aphrodite donned her immortal robes, and then woke him, and revealed to him that he had embraced a goddess. Anchises was terrified, for he knew what terrible punishments were visited on mortals who embraced gods. However, Aphrodite reassured him. She said she would bear him a son who would be named Aeneas, "the Terrible," because of the terrible pain she suffered in loving a mortal. This son would be brought up by the nymphs of Mount Ida for five years. At the end of that time he would return to Anchises, who must say that he was the son of a mountain nymph. Aphrodite promised Anchises a long and prosperous life on condition that he never mention that he had lain with a goddess. Anchises readily agreed but later, either bemused by wine or for some other reason, he revealed that he had embraced Aphrodite. Instantly Zeus struck him with the lightning, and though he was saved through the intervention of Aphrodite his strong straight body was permanently crippled. Some say that before this happened, Aphrodite bore him not only Aeneas but another son Lyrus who died childless.

For all her grace and charm, Aphrodite is an exacting goddess. Smyrna, daughter of Cinyras, scorned her power or, as some say, Smyrna incurred her wrath because her mother boasted that Smyrna was more beautiful than Aphrodite. Aphrodite caused her to fall in love with her own father, to meet him in darkness so that he didn't know what maiden he was embracing, and to conceive a son by him. When Cinyras learned that the maiden who visited him was his own daughter he was horrified, and sought to kill her. Smyrna fled, and Aphrodite transformed her into a myrrh tree. From the trunk of the tree Smyrna's son Adonis was born. Aphrodite rescued him and gave him to Persephone to rear. Persephone fell in love with him as he grew to be a handsome youth, and refused to give him up to Aphrodite. The muse Calliope was called on to judge the case. She divided the year into three parts—Adonis was to spend one third of it with Persephone, one third with Aphrodite, and the last third by himself. In the end, Aphrodite persuaded him, by means of her magic girdle, to give her the third he was supposed to have by himself. Some say that Aphrodite grieves so during the time Adonis spends with Persephone that she withdraws her generative powers, and vegetation withers, and this is the winter. At her joy over his return she causes the earth to flower in the spring. Some say, however, that Aphrodite was so enraged by Calliope's decision that it was she who caused the Thracian maenads to go mad and tear Calliope's son Orpheus to pieces. The muse Clio, who mocked her love for Adonis, she caused to fall in love with Pierus and to bear him a son who some say was Hyacinthus. Again, Aphrodite inflicted a most terrible punishment on Hippolytus, son of Theseus, because he scorned her powers and denied her due honor. She caused his stepmother Phaedra to fall in love with him and brought about the catastrophe which cost the lives of Phaedra and Hippolytus. Aphrodite aided Melanion (or as some name him, Hippomenes) to win Atalanta by giving him three golden apples. But some say the pair forgot her help in their happiness and were transformed into beasts as a punishment. It was Aphrodite who caused the men of Lemnos to prefer their captive women to their own wives, because the Lemnian women denied her power. This led to the slaughter of all the males of Lemnos by the women to avenge the insults the men had directed toward them.

But for Theseus, who took Aphrodite as his guide on the advice of the Delphic oracle when he set out on his mission to Crete, she caused Ariadne to fall in love with him and to make possible his escape from the labyrinth of the Minotaur and from Crete. And at the request of Hera and Athena, she furnished a love charm to insure that Medea's passion for Jason would endure and that she would help him in his trial at Colchis and to secure the Golden Fleece. This love charm consisted of a wryneck (a fish-eating bird) stretched to a fire-wheel, and was considered by the Greeks to be a potent love charm. To Paris who awarded her the Apple of Discord (prize of beauty thrown among the wedding guests at the marriage of Peleus and Thetis) she promised the most beautiful woman in the world. She helped him to win Helen, although she was the wife of Menelaus, and carry her off to Troy. This interference by Aphrodite led to the Trojan War, disastrous for Troy. In the course of the war Aphrodite aided the Trojans, saved Paris when he was about to be slain by Menelaus in a duel, and rescued her son Aeneas when he was wounded by Diomedes. Diomedes also wounded the goddess, who fled to Olympus to be cured by her mother Dione. Hera and Athena scorned her when she arrived in Olympus, but Zeus smiled, and advised her to "busy herself with the gladsome duties of wedlock" and leave war to the gods and goddesses who were suited to it. Dione comforted her, healed the wound, and promised that Diomedes would be punished for his temerity in attacking an immortal. At the sack of Troy some say it was Aphrodite who interposed and prevented Aeneas from killing Helen, and some say that it was she who caused love to surge anew in the heart of Menelaus when he saw Helen again, so that instead of killing her, as he had said he would do, he forgave her and lovingly carried her off to his tent.

When the Argonauts sailed by the island of the Sirens on their way home from Colchis, Orpheus played so sweetly that their music was unheard except by Butes who leaped into the sea, maddened by the strains of the Sirens. Aphrodite rescued him and bore him to Lilybaeum in Sicily where she bore him a son, Eryx.

The myrtle, rose, apple, and poppy were sacred to Aphrodite, as were the dove, sparrow, swan, swallow, hare, goat, and ram. Incense and flowers were offered to her in sacrifice. The principal seats of her worship were at Amathus, Idalion, and Paphos on the island of Cyprus, in the latter of which was the most ancient temple of Aphrodite in the Greek world; on the island of Cythera; at Cnidus, where her temple held the famous statue of her by Praxiteles; at Mount Ida in the Troad; Cos; Abydos; Athens; Thespieae; Megara; Sparta; Sicyon; and Corinth; and at Eryx in Sicily.

Many epithets signified her varied aspects. She was Aphrodite Acraea (Of the Height), Doritis (Bountiful), and Epistrophia (She who turns men to love). Having sprung from the sea, she was regarded as a goddess of the sea who protected sailors and navigation and was named Euploia (Fair Voyage), Limenia (Of the Harbor), and Pontia (Of the Deep Sea); when Zeus and Typhon struggled and all the gods were forced to flee, Aphrodite escaped by transforming herself into a fish, a symbol of the fertility of the sea. She was a goddess who gave victory and was worshiped in Sparta as Area (War-like), possibly because of her connection with Ares. Hypermnestra, daughter of Danaus, dedicated an image to Aphrodite Bringer of Victory, after she was acquitted by the Argives for defying her father and refusing to murder her husband. When Theseus, some time after his safe return from Crete, federated the demes of Attica he instituted the worship of Federal Aphrodite and Persuasion, another aspect of the goddess. Most of all she was the goddess of love. As goddess of the physical love that unites men and women there was a sanctuary of Aphrodite Migonitis (Uniter) opposite the island of Cranaë, raised by Paris to commemorate his first embrace of Helen. In Memphis in Egypt, whither some say Paris and Helen were blown by storms on the way to Troy, there was a temple of Aphrodite the Stranger, said to have been dedicated by Helen herself. Theseus raised a sanctuary of Aphrodite Nymphaea (Bridal) when he abducted the youthful Helen and made her his wife. She was Aphrodite Melaenis (Black), some say because men invoke her at night for love-making, but others say it was because of her role as a goddess of the Underworld, in which role she was also called Scotia (Dark One), Androphonos (Man-slayer), and Epitymbria (Of the Tombs). As a goddess of marriage and family life she was Aphrodite Pandemos (Common to All). This aspect was perverted in the time of Solon, so that Aphrodite Pandemos came to be a goddess of prostitution, with temple prostitutes. As a goddess of the spiritual love of mankind she was worshiped widely as Aphrodite Urania (Heavenly), and had many temples. In this aspect she was also goddess of the heavens and the winds and many of her temples were on elevated headlands, as at Eryx in Sicily. As a goddess of the heavens she was also Pasiphaë (Shining on all) and Asteria (Starry). At Thebes the ancient temple originally contained three wooden images made from the figureheads of the ships that brought Cadmus to Greece, that were dedicated by Harmonia. The images represented Aphrodite Urania (Heavenly) of the pure love of mankind, Aphrodite Pandemos (Common), to represent the goddess of the family and community life for all the people, and Aphrodite Apostrophia (Rejecter), the goddess who helps men to reject unlawful passion and sinful acts. Tyndareus dedicated an image of Aphrodite Morpho (Shapely), representing the goddess veiled and with fetters on her ankles. Some say this represented the bonds of faithfulness and modesty in marriage. Under the special circumstances surrounding the daughters of Tyndareus, however, it could have been an ironic reminder to the goddess.

Some say that Aphrodite was originally the Assyrian goddess Ishtar, and that her worship was brought to Paphos in Cyprus by the Phoenicians of Ascalon, who called her Astarte, and from whose ancient temple the Paphians copied their temple. And they say that the Phoenician traders who came to Cythera taught worship of her to the Cytheraeans. Among the Syrians, a goddess similar to her was called Derceto. The Babylonians worshiped Mylitta and the Arabians Alilat, who were equivalent to Aphrodite in some respects. Whatever the origin of her worship, the Greeks evolved the worship of Aphrodite, in all its aspects, into a purely Greek conception. The Romans who claimed Aphrodite as their ancestress through her son Aeneas, worshiped her as Venus. Aphrodite was one of the favorite subjects in art. Of her representations in classical art the most famous are the replica of her statue of Cnidus by Praxiteles, the original statutes of Melos in the Louvre, of Capua at

Aphrogeneia (af-rō-je-nī'ā). An epithet of Aphrodite, meaning "Foam-born" and referring to the circumstances of her birth from the foam that gathered around the dismembered parts of Uranus which were flung into the sea by Cronus.

Apis (ā'pis). In Greek legend, a son of Phoroneus. He was accidentally killed by the chariot of Aetolus, son of Endymion, at the funeral games for Azan, son of Arcas. Because of this Salmoneus banished Aetolus from Elis.

Apis. In Greek legend, a son of Apollo. He went from Naupactus to Argos, where he drove all the serpents out of the land, for which reason Argos was sometimes called "Apian" land.

Apis. In Egyptian mythology, the sacred bull of Memphis, worshiped by the ancient Egyptians. He was believed to be the incarnation of Osiris, and was the sacred emblem of that god. Sometimes he is portrayed as a man with a bull's head. The Greeks sometimes identified Apis with Epaphus, the son of Io and Zeus, born on the banks of the Nile after the long wanderings of Io. According to Herodotus, Apis is the calf of a cow that becomes barren after his birth. Apis, in the form of a bull, is black, with a square white spot on his forehead, the figure of an eagle on his back, and a beetle on his tongue. The hairs in his tail are double. Apis in the form of a bull appeared from time to time in Egypt, and when he did so it was a time of great rejoicing.

Apocolocyntosis (a-po''ko-lō-sin'tō-sis). Mock-serious title (it may be translated as "Pumpkinification") of a ruthless satirical sketch of the reception, by the Olympian Gods, of the emperor Claudius, i.e., his deification; composed in Latin in a medley of prose and verse, shortly after Claudius' death (54 A.D.) and attributed to L. Annaeus Seneca the Younger, statesman, orator, philosopher, essayist, dramatist, and court wit. (JJ)

Apollino (ä-pōl-lē'nō). Statue in the collection of the Uffizi, Florence. It is an antique copy from a Greek original, probably of the 4th century B.C., representing a delicately built type of the youthful Apollo, standing easily and gracefully.

Apollo/

Apollo (a-pol'ō). "Lord of the Silver Bow," one of the great Olympian gods. He was the god of music, poetry, and the dance, and in classical times came to be regarded also as god of the plastic arts and of science and philosophy, the god of the intellect and the enemy of barbarism. He was the protector of flocks and herds, the patron of the founding of towns and colonies who helped build the walls of Troy and Megara, and to whose oracle all went before setting out to found colonies. He was the god of healing, Alexicacus (Averter of Evil), who was called on to dispel plagues and heal sickness; and he was the god of prophecy. Above all, he was the god of light: of the physical light that dispels darkness, of the light of spring and summer that puts the winter to flight, and of the spiritual and moral light that dispels the darkness of ignorance from men's minds and evil from their hearts. The worship of Apollo was one of the most potent of the forces that brought Greek civilization to full flower.

When Leto was about to bear her children by Zeus she fled throughout the world. No place would receive her, for jealous Hera had decreed that Leto could not bear her children in any place where the sun shone. At last she came to the tiny floating island of Delos. Delos gladly received Leto, but feared that her future son, "the Archer-king," would scorn the modest island and would thrust it under the sea. Leto swore an oath that her son would build his first temple there, and would honor it above all other places, whereupon Delos welcomed her warmly. Some say Leto first bore Artemis on the neighboring island of Ortygia, and that when she was born Artemis helped her mother across to Delos where her twin was to be born. Even here Hera's jealousy afflicted her for she kept Ilithyia, the goddess who helps women in childbirth, on Mount Olympus by guile. Leto's labor lasted nine days and nights. Then the goddesses—Dione, Rhea, Themis, Amphitrite—who were all present, sent Iris to Olympus to fetch Ilithyia. That goddess, informed of the circumstances, hurried to Delos at once. Leto knelt on the ground, clasped a palm tree in the shadow of Mount Cynthus, and gave birth to Apollo. The goddesses washed him and clothed him. Themis fed him on nectar and ambrosia. He was born on the seventh of the month, and ever after the number seven was sacred to him, and sacrifices were made to him on the seventh of every month. The palm tree beneath which he was born was one of the sights of antiquity from the time of Homer to the time of Pliny. Other places in the Greek world claimed to be his birthplace, as the grove of Ortygia in Ephesus, Tegyra in Boeotia, and Zoster in Attica, but Delos in generally honored as the birthplace of Apollo, and it was there that his universal sovereignty began. After his birth the island was covered with golden flowers in its joy, and as a reward for its kindness to Leto it was anchored in the sea and ceased to float about. Four days after he was born Apollo sundered the golden bands of his swaddling clothes, leaped up, and proclaimed that he would in future announce the will of Zeus to men. Some say at this time he called for bow and arrows, which Hephaestus at once gave him, and declared them and the lyre sacred to him. And some say that when he was four years old he built an altar at Delos entirely composed of the horns of goats shot by his sister Artemis. In search of a place to found his oracle he left Olympus, where clad in royal raiment he had given a concert to the delighted gods, and passed through Pieria to Euboea. He then crossed the Euripus and went by Teumessus and the site where the city of Thebes would one day stand, passed Onchestus, crossed the Cephissus River on the border of Phocis, and so arrived at Haliartus. There he thought to found his oracle, but the fountain nymph, Telphusa, advised him not to found an oracle in her domain because she did not want to share the honors with him, and suggested that he go on to Crisa (Delphi). There he slew with his arrows the dragon that guarded the spring. Some say this dragon had, at Hera's orders, pursued Leto across the world before her children were born, and it was for this reason that Apollo killed it. Others say the dragon was slain because it tried to prevent Apollo from approaching the chasm of an ancient oracle. In any event, the world was rid of a murderous pest and the place where the creature's body was left to rot was named Pythos, "the place of the rotting," and Apollo acquired the epithet Pythian. But some say the dragon was named Python, and this was the reason for Apollo's epithet, and the reason why his priestesses at Delphi were called Pythonesses. He laid the foundations for his temple, for which Trophonius and Agamedes paved the floor with marble and scores of laborers raised the structure, and founded his oracle. But some say there was formerly an oracle of Gaëa there, and then one of Themis, and that it was from the latter that Apollo took the oracle. And some say Apollo was compelled to go to Tempe to do penance and to be purified for the slaughter of the dragon, which they say was Hera's earthborn child or was the guardian of an ancient oracle. The killing of the dragon and the purification of Apollo were memorialized every eighth year (for he was in Tempe seven years atoning for the murder) in a festival at Delphi, and the Pythian Games held at this time were instituted to propitiate the dead dragon. Because he had endured penance and purification himself, Apollo could purify others, and in this function the worship of Apollo encouraged the substitution of law and penance for blood vengeance. After slaying the dragon Apollo remembered that Telphusa had advised him to come to this spot but had not warned him of the serpent. To punish her, he sealed up her fountain in Haliartus with a huge stone. On the spot he erected an altar, and thereafter Apollo was worshiped and Telphusa was forgotten. Having built his temple near Crisa (at Delphi) Apollo pondered how he should choose priests to serve in it. He gazed far out to sea and beheld a Cretan vessel on its way to Alphaean Pylus. Instantly he changed himself into a dolphin, swam out to the vessel and leaped aboard. The Cretan crew tried to hurl the dolphin into the sea, but he shook the ship so that they were afraid and dared not even man the tiller. Under Apollo's unseen guidance the ship sailed around the Peloponnesus to the Gulf of Crisa (an inlet in the Gulf of Corinth) where a strong wind blew it ashore. Apollo went to his shrine and lit an altar fire, as all the people acclaimed him. He returned to the Cretan ship and invited the crew to stow their tackle and come ashore for food and rest. The captain replied that he did not know what land they were in, that his vessel had been brought there by a god, and that he wished to go home. Apollo revealed himself as a god and announced that they would never return to Crete, but would become his priests and be the most honored among men. He instructed them to build an altar there by the sea and to worship him as the Delphian god, because he had first appeared to them as a dolphin. As Delphian Apollo, or Apollo Delphinus, he was the patron of sailors and ports, and at Athens was worshiped as the patron of the founding of colonies. Jason sacrificed a yoke of oxen to Apollo Embasius (Apollo of Embarkations), before setting out on his journey to Colchis. And as a god of sailors and sailing he was worshiped as Apollo Ecbasion (Apollo of Disembarkations), who assures successful landings. Diomedes raised a temple of Apollo Epibaterius (Seafaring), in gratitude for his having weathered the storms that scattered the Greeks at sea on their way home from Troy.

Apollo, "Lord of the Silver Bow," received his bow and arrows from Hephaestus, who forged them for him, and used them to punish the wicked and arrogant. He slew Tityus, the monstrous son of Zeus and Elara, because he attacked Leto as she was going to Delphi. Again, for the greater honor of his mother, he and his sister Artemis killed the children of arrogant Niobe who had boasted that she was at least equal to Leto who had only two children. It was Apollo who sent the plague of arrows on the Greeks encamped before Troy, because Agamemnon haughtily denied the plea of Apollo's priest Chryse to accept ransom for his daughter Chryseis. In the battle with the Giants, Apollo shot Ephialtes in the left eye, and Heracles dispatched him by shooting him in the right eye. Apollo was a helpful god, as when he appeared to the Argonauts, caught in a black and raging storm on their way home from Colchis, and by a flash of light revealed an island where they could find haven. The Argonauts built an altar to Radiant Apollo, and named the island Anaphe (Revealed, or Unexpected). As Apollo Parnopius (Locust-god) he lifted a plague of locusts that infested Attica. He was also Acesius (Healer), Patroüs (Paternal), Archegetes (Founder), Prostaterius (Protecting), and Boëdromius (Rescuer). In the Trojan War he rescued Hector many times, and abandoned him to death only at the command of Fate.

Under the leadership of Hera, Apollo took part in the conspiracy of the gods to bind Zeus. Zeus was freed by the intervention of Thetis. To punish Apollo, Zeus ordered him to work with Poseidon to build the walls of Troy for Laomedon. (But some say the gods labored on the walls to prove the wickedness of Laomedon; and some say Apollo served as the herdsman of Laomedon.) When the walls were completed Laomedon not only refused to pay as he had promised, but threatened to cut off the ears of the gods and sell them as slaves. Apollo sent a pestilence to afflict Troy, and Poseidon sent a sea monster. Both afflictions were removed when Heracles came and killed the monster. In the Trojan War Apollo aided the city whose walls he had helped to build. When the gods who actively participated in the conflict fell to quarreling and attacking each other, Apollo refused to quarrel with Poseidon although the latter taunted him for aiding the descendants of the man who had tricked them over the building of the walls. In this case it was beneath his dignity to fight. On another occasion he showed his willingness to take vigorous action to protect his property. Heracles came to the shrine at Delphi to inquire how he could cure himself of a sickness. The priestess refused to give him an answer. Enraged, Heracles seized the tripod and said he would found his own oracle. Apollo sprang to the defense of his priestess and wrestled with Heracles. Zeus parted them with a thunderbolt and compelled them to make friends, and the two went off together and founded the town of Gythium.

Apollo had many loves. He was the father of Linus by the muse Calliope, according to some accounts. Some say he was the father of the Corybantes by the muse Thalia. By Phthia he was the father of Dorus, Laodocus, and Polypoetes who were killed by Aetolus, who took their land and named it Aetolia after himself. Aria bore him Miletus who afterward fled from Crete to Caria and founded the city of Miletus. His son Amphissus by the nymph Dryope founded the city of Oeta and raised a temple of Apollo there. Anius, king of Delos and Apollo's priest there, was his son by Rhoeo. Some say that Hector and Troilus, reputed sons of Priam, were Apollo's children. By Creusa he was the father of Ion, founder of the Ionian race. Again, it is said that Apollo was the father of Tenes, king of Tenedos. When the Greeks landed on Tenedos on their way to Troy Achilles killed Tenes. It had been foretold that if Achilles killed a son of Apollo he would die by Apollo's hand. According to some accounts, when Achilles fell at the Scaean Gate of Troy the arrow that killed him, though shot by Paris, was guided by Apollo and was wafted back to Apollo when Achilles pulled it from his ankle. Others say Achilles was killed in the sanctuary of Thymbraean Apollo in the Troad. On one occasion Apollo saw the huntress Cyrene struggling with a boar, fell in love with her, and asked Chiron the centaur if he should woo Cyrene. Chiron said Apollo would take Cyrene to a luxuriant land and that she would bear him a son. Apollo carried her off to Libya, where she bore him Aristaeus and Idmon the seer. Another of his loves was Coronis. She was unfaithful to him while she was carrying his child and the news was brought to the god by a white raven he had set to guard her. Apollo turned the raven's feathers black for bringing him the news (which he already knew by divination) instead of pecking out the eyes of Coronis' lover. He went to Coronis and caused her death. But as she was lying on the pyre he regretted his harsh act; he commanded Hermes to snatch the unborn child from her womb, and sent it to Chiron to be reared. This son was Asclepius who inherited his father's skill in healing and was so successful in his art that he raised men from the dead. Some say Zeus feared he would teach his skill to others; others say Hades complained to Zeus that owing to the ministrations of Asclepius the population of his realm was decreasing, and Zeus struck Asclepius dead with his thunderbolt. In anger at the loss of his son, Apollo killed the Cyclopes who had forged the thunderbolt of Zeus. Zeus would have banished him to Tartarus, but yielded to the pleas of Leto to spare her son and sentenced Apollo to serve Admetus, king of Pherae, for a year. While in his service as a herdsman Apollo caused all his flocks to bear twins. He also helped Admetus to win Alcestis for a bride by yoking a boar and a lion to a chariot for a race, one of the conditions her successful suitor must fulfill. Admetus forgot to honor Artemis properly at his marriage ceremonies, and in anger Artemis declared he must die. Apollo went to the Fates, who control the span of life, got them drunk, and exacted a promise from them that they would spare Admetus' life, but only on condition that someone who loved him would consent to die in his place. When he had completed his term of penance by serving Admetus, Apollo never again defied Zeus, but learned to control himself and became a force for moderation in all things.

Apollo did not enjoy unvarying success in his love affairs. Idas, the only mortal who dared to struggle with him, vied with him for the affections of Marpessa. Marpessa, given the choice by Zeus, chose Idas, for she feared that as she aged she might lose the love of the god and would have a better chance of happiness with Idas, who would grow old and lose his beauty even as she would. Apollo pursued the nymph Daphne, daughter of the river-god Peneus in Thessaly. Leucippus was his rival in this case, and disguised himself as a girl that he might be in the company of the chaste nymph. Apollo learned of his ruse by divination and revealed the disguise when he advised the nymphs to bathe naked. He now sought Daphne but she fled, and when she was about to be overtaken prayed to her father to so transform her beauty that Apollo would cease his pursuit. Her prayer was answered: as Apollo was about to clasp her to him she was changed into a laurel tree. Even transformed, Apollo still loved her and made the laurel (or bay) his sacred tree and gave it never-fading leaves. Wreaths of laurel crowned the victors at the Pythian Games, and leaves of laurel were chewed by the priestesses of Apollo to inspire them with prophetic powers. Another of Apollo's loves was Hyacinthus. Thamyris the musician and Zephyrus (West Wind) were Apollo's rivals. Thamyris was deprived by the Muses of his sight and of his gift for song because he had boasted of his art. Zephyrus, a jealous rival, came one day when Apollo was teaching Hyacinthus how to throw the quoit, seized the quoit in a gust of wind and hurled it back with such force that it struck Hyacinthus on the head and killed him. Others say that Hyacinthus was killed when the quoit ricocheted from the ground and struck him on the forehead.

APOLLO
Red-figured Greek psykter, Pan Painter, c490
B.C. Munich

Apollo was the god of prophecy and divination, an attribute which some say he had received as a gift from Zeus, and others say he learned from Pan. In his role as seer he passed on to men the will of Zeus, but men did not always interpret his prophecies correctly; for that reason he was called Loxias (Crooked, or Ambiguous). Some hold this epithet to mean Interpreter. Many famous seers claimed to have received their powers from Apollo. He taught the art of divination to Melampus, Helenus, Epimenides, and the Cumaeen Sibyl; and Idmon, the Argive Argonaut, and Mopsus, son of Manto, inherited the gift as Apollo's sons. He could give the gift to others. When he fell in love with Cassandra he gave her the gift of prophecy in return for the promise of her favors. She refused to honor her promise, however, and since the god would not take back what he had given he turned her gift into a curse by decreeing that, although she would make true prophecies, no one would believe her.

Apollo was the god of flocks and herds. One day some of his cattle were missing from their pasture in Pieria. By his powers of divination, or as some say, by watching the flight of a long-winged bird, he knew that Hermes, a new-born infant, had stolen the cattle. He went to the cave on Cyllene where Hermes was lying in his cradle and accused him of the theft. Hermes protested his innocence of a crime that would be, he claimed, impossible for one of his tender age. Nevertheless, Apollo took him off to appear before Zeus, and Hermes was compelled to admit the theft and led Apollo to where he had set them to graze. Arrived at the spot, Hermes played on the lyre which he had just invented, and so charmed Apollo that he agreed to give up the cattle to Hermes in exchange for the lyre. Hermes gave it to him, and immediately invented a shepherd's pipe, made of reeds, on which he played so artfully while the cattle grazed that Apollo demanded the new instrument also, and offered Hermes the golden wand he used when herding cattle in exchange for it. Hermes agreed to give him the pipe if Apollo would throw in the art of divining as well as the wand. As protector of flocks, Apollo was Lycius (Wolf-god) who destroys the wolves that prey on flocks.

As the god of music, poetry, and the dance, he influenced the Muses to leave their frenzies on Mount Helicon and join him in stately dances, and so earned the epithet Musagetes (Leader of the Muses). As god of music he brooked no rivals. Marsyas challenged him to a musical contest, contending that his instrument, the flute, was superior to Apollo's lyre, and was defeated in the contest of which the Muses were the judges. To punish him for his presumption Apollo flayed him and hung up his skin on a pine tree. On another occasion, he took part in a contest with Pan. Midas, the Phrygian king, and Tmolus, the mountain god, acted as judges. Tmolus awarded the prize to Apollo, but Midas stubbornly clung to his opinion that Pan was the better player. Apollo caused asses' ears to grow from Midas' head, as being worthy ears for one who was such a donkey as to prefer the music of Pan to that of Apollo.

Apollo had many epithets. He was Phoebus (Bright, or Pure god), and the "Fardarter." In his role as a god of agriculture he was "Ruler of the Seasons," and was accompanied by the Horae. As "Rearer of Boys" he fostered young men and was patron of their athletic training grounds, and to him they sacrificed the first clippings of their hair. He was Apollo Smintheus (Mouse-god), an epithet which may have applied to his role as god of healing, for mice were associated with disease and its cure, and white mice were kept in Apollo's temples to protect against plague and against plagues of mice. He was Apollo Agyieus (God of Streets), who let in the good and kept out evil, and whose symbol, a pillar with a pointed top, stood before the doorways of houses and was honored with offerings of wreaths and ribbons. He was also Agraesus (Hunter), Platanistius (God of the Plane-tree Grove), Theoxenius (Strangers' God), Spodius (God of Ashes—of victims), and Moeragetes (Guide of the Fates). The Spartans worshiped him as Apollo Carneus and held a splendid festival for him in August, the Carnea. In addition to the epithets celebrating a particular role or incident concerning him, he had numerous epithets which associated him with places, as Apollo Actius (of Actium), Apollo Acritas (of Acritas), Apollo Ismenius (of Ismenium).

Some among the ancients considered Apollo to be a god of the Hyperboreans, who were all priests of Apollo and who lived in a land of perpetual light and happiness far to the North. The center of their cult was at Delos, and to it the Hyperboreans sent offerings wrapped in wheaten straw. Although most anciently he was a Dorian or a non-Greek deity, his worship became panhellenic. In later times he came to be identified with and worshiped as the Sun. Among the Greek colonists of Asia Minor the golden cicada was his emblem as the Sun-god. But earlier Apollo and the Sun-god, Helios, had been regarded as two separate deities. His most sacred oracles were at Delphi, the most influential oracle of the ancient world, and at Tempe. Other oracles were at the Lyceum and on the Acropolis at Argos; at Ismenium in Boeotia, where oracles were derived from the inspection of entrails by priests; at Clarus near Colophon, where the priests drank the waters of a secret well and gave the oracles in verse; at Telmessus in Asia Minor, where the oracles were revealed in dreams; and in many other places.

The attributes of Apollo were the bow, the lyre, and the tripod. Sacred to him were the laurel, commemorating Daphne, and the palm tree, under which he had been born. The wolf, swan, hawk, raven, snake, mouse, and grasshopper, were also sacred to him. His festivals were the Delphinia, held at Athens in April to celebrate the end of winter storms and the opening of the seas to navigation; the Thargelia, held in the spring as a fertility rite; in midsummer the Athenians offered him sacrifices of hecatombs, so that the hot sun would not destroy their crops. At this time the Spartans held the Hyacinthia. In the autumn when the crops were harvested first fruits were offered to Apollo at the Pyanepsia. In addition there were the Carnea, Daphnephoria, Delia, Stepteria, Apollonia, and Pythia.

By the Romans, who derived all their ideas of Apollo from the Greeks, he was worshiped primarily as a god of healing. They raised a temple to him in 430 B.C., in obedience to an oracular command and in order to arrest a plague. A second temple was erected in 350 B.C. Augustus greatly furthered the worship of Apollo. He dedicated a portion of the spoils of his victory at Actium to him, reconstructed and beautified the temple of Apollo Actius, and instituted the Actian Games. He also built a new temple at Rome.

Apollo was one of the favorite subjects in ancient art, and was represented in the full majesty of youthful manhood, usually unclothed or only lightly draped, and usually characterized by the bow and arrows, the lyre, the oracular tripod, the serpent, or the dolphin.

Apollo Belvedere (bel-ve-dir'; Italian, ä-pól'lō bel-vā-dā'rā). Most famous extant statue of Apollo, a marble figure carved during the early Roman empire, now in the collection of the Belvedere, Vatican, Rome, discovered (1485) at Antium (now Anzio, Italy). It was copied from a Greek original in bronze. Just over life size, it depicts a vigorous, youthful god wearing a chlamys around the neck and over the extended left arm. The left hand, one of the parts restored by Montorsoli, a pupil of Michelangelo, holds part of an object variously thought to have been an aegis, a bow from which he has shot an arrow, or another weapon. The original may have been a commemorative figure erected at Delphi to celebrate the expulsion of the Gauls (279 B.C.) from the temple of Apollo.

Apollodorus (a-pol-ō-dō'rus). Athenian grammarian and historian, who flourished in the second century B.C. He wrote on grammar, mythology, geography, and history. Of his work which has survived, the Bibliotheca (Library) is an important source of mythological material, covering the gods and the Age of the Heroes. It is thought to be an abridgement of a larger work.

Apollodorus. [Surnamed Sciagraphus, meaning "Shadow Painter" or "Shadower."] Greek painter, contemporary of Zeuxis and Parrhasius. He was born at Athens and flourished in the late 5th century B.C. He seems to have been the first important painter to abandon the old schematic arrangements for shading by gradation of color and foreshortening observed from nature.

Apollodorus of Carystus (ka-ris'tus). Greek comic poet of the new Attic comedy. He was born at Carystus, in Euboea, and flourished at Athens 300-260 B.C. He was the author of 47 plays, and was five times a prizewinner. He supplied Terence with models for his Hecyra and Phormio.

Apollonia (ap-ō-lō'ni-ā). [Modern name, Marsa Susa.] In ancient geography, the port of Cyrene, a Greek city in N Africa, in what is now E Libya.

Apollonia. In ancient geography, a city in Illyria, in what is now W Yugoslavia.

Apollonia. [Modern name, Arsuf.] In ancient geography, a town in Palestine, situated on the Mediterranean between Joppa (modern Jaffa) and Caesarea.

Apollonia. [Modern name, Sozopol.] In ancient geography, a city in Thrace, situated on the Euxine Sea. It is now only a small village in Bulgaria.

Apollonius (ap-ō-lō'ni-us). [Called the Sophist.] Alexandrian grammarian who flourished in the late 1st century A.D. He was the author of a Homeric lexicon (still extant in an abridged form) based on Aristarchus and Apion.

Apollonius Dyscolus/Apomysius

Apollonius Dyscolus (dis'kō-lus). Greek scholar, born at Alexandria, active 2nd century A.D. He was educated in Alexandria and, after having served as a teacher in Rome under Antoninus Pius, returned to Alexandria and became a member of the Museum. As the first critical student of Greek syntax his great contribution was to reduce grammar to a system. His only extant works are On Syntax and three treatises on adverbs, pronouns, and conjunctions.

Apollonius Molon (mō'lon). Greek rhetorician at Rhodes, born at Alabanda, Caria; fl. 1st century B.C. He was the instructor of Cicero and Caesar. He advocated "Atticizing," or moderating, the florid Asiatic style.

Apollonius of Perga (pēr'gā). [Also: Apollonius Pergaeus.] Greek geometrician, born at Perga, Asia Minor; fl. 247-205 B.C. He was educated at Alexandria and was the author of a treatise on Conic Sections in eight books, of which four are extant in Greek and three others in Arabic. His work includes the theories of Euclid and others, as well as new deductions.

Apollonius Rhodius (rō'di-us). [Also: Apollonius of Rhodes.] Greek epic poet who flourished at Alexandria and Rhodes in the 3rd century B.C. He was a pupil of Callimachus in Alexandria but did not follow the brilliant epigrammatic style of his teacher. He wrote the Argonautica, a long poem in four books, in the epic style. This work, which celebrates the adventures of Jason and the Argonauts in the quest for the Golden Fleece, was not enthusiastically received at Alexandria. Apollonius blamed Callimachus for its poor reception, and left Alexandria in disgust. He went to Rhodes. There he wrote a second version of his poem which was acclaimed by the Rhodians. He became a citizen of Rhodes, hence his surname. His Argonautica, in simple epic style, was much admired by the Romans and was imitated by Vergil, whose Dido and Aeneas are somewhat stately copies of Jason and Medea, as well as by Varro, Marianus, and others. Apollonius was also a librarian of the famous Alexandrian Library.

Apollonius of Tralles (tral'ēz). Greek sculptor, born at Tralles, in Caria, who was active probably in the 1st century B.C. With his brother Tauriscus he carved the so-called Farnese Bull, representing the death of Dirce. Apollonius of Tyana (ti'a-nā). [Also: Apollonius Tyanaeus.] Greek Neo-Pythagorean philosopher, reputed magician and wonder-worker. He was born at Tyana, Asia Minor, and was active in the 1st century A.D. He was educated and lived in the temple of Asclepius at Aegae until he was 20 years old. He then gave away his property and devoted himself to travel and learning. He studied in Greek schools at Tarsus, traveled in Babylonia, Persia, and India, where he absorbed Eastern mysticism, and set up a school at Ephesus. His biography by Philostratus is largely fabulous and untrustworthy. Hierocles of Nicomedia, an anti-Christian writer, compared the miracles of Apollonius with those of Jesus. He was considered divine by some for his supposed miracles, and his bust was placed by Alexander Severus in his lararium with those of Abraham, Orpheus, and Christ. Eighty-five letters attributed to him survive.

Apollo Sauroktonos (a-pol'ō sō-rok'tō-nos). [Also: Sauroctonus; Eng. trans., "the Lizard-slayer."] Name of two copies, one in bronze (Vatican, Rome) and one in marble (Paris), of a lost bronze statue by the Greek sculptor Praxiteles. The god leans against a tree and is apparently about to strike with an arrow, possibly as a method of divination, the lizard which climbs up the trunk. The relaxed, curving figure is typical of Praxiteles' choice of youthful subjects and his graceful, humanizing treatment of the gods.

Apology of Socrates (sok'ra-tēz). The unconciliatory speech delivered by the Athenian philosopher Socrates in his own defense at his trial in 399 B.C. on capital charges of introducing strange gods and of corrupting the youth of Athens, following which the jury found him guilty and sentenced him to death. A version by Plato and an inferior one attributed to Xenophon are extant. (JJ)

Apomyus (ap-ō-mī'i-us). An epithet of Zeus, in Elis, meaning "Averter of Flies." The Eleians sacrificed to Zeus Apomyus because the flies brought pestilence, and no sooner was the sacrifice offered than the flies disappeared. It was said that during the Olympic festival the flies voluntarily disappeared across the Alpheus River, and after the festival was over they swarmed back.

Apostrophia (a-pos-trō-fī'a, -trō'fē-a). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect of goddess of love, meaning "Rejecter." In this aspect the goddess helps men to reject unlawful passion and sinful acts.

Appian (ap'i-an). [Latin, Appianus; Greek Appianos.] Greek historian, born in Alexandria; flourished about the middle of the 2nd century A.D. In early life he went to Rome and pursued a career in the legal field. Later he was sent to Egypt as procurator by the emperor Antoninus Pius. He was the author (in Greek) of an ambitious work in 24 books on the development of the Roman empire from earliest times to the time of Trajan. Eleven books survive. Chiefly a compilation from earlier writers and marred by errors in chronology and by omissions, nevertheless the work has a special value for the use Appian made of authorities whose writings have since been lost, and for the history of the Civil Wars.

Appian Way. [Latin, Via Appia.] Most famous of the ancient Roman highways. It ran from Rome to Brundisium (now called Brindisi), and is probably the first great Roman road which was formally undertaken as a public work. It was begun in 312 B.C. by Appius Claudius Caecus, the censor, who carried it as far as Capua. The next stage of the work extended it to Beneventum (Benevento), and it probably did not reach Brundisium until 244 B.C., when a Roman colony was inaugurated there. At present the Appian Way, for a long distance after it leaves Rome, forms one of the most notable memorials of antiquity in or near Rome, bordered as it is by tombs and the ruins of monumental buildings. Long stretches of the pavement remain perfect, and show that the width of the roadway proper was only 15 feet. Length, about 350 miles.

Apple of Discord. A golden apple, inscribed "To the Fairest," thrown into an assembly of the gods (at the marriage of Thetis and Peleus) by Eris, goddess of Discord, who had not been invited to the feast. Aphrodite, Hera, and Athena claimed it, and its award to Aphrodite by Paris of Troy, selected by Zeus as judge, so inflamed the jealousy of Hera and her hatred toward all the Trojan race that she did not cease her machinations till Troy was destroyed.

Apples of the Hesperides (hes-per'i-dēz). According to mythology, Mother Earth gave Hera, as a wedding gift when she married Zeus, a tree which bore golden apples. Hera planted the tree in her own orchard. Some say the orchard was located in the land of the Hyperboreans, some say it lay on the slopes of Mount Atlas in Mauretania, others say it was in a region beyond the western ocean, or on two islands near Ethiopia. Atlas was the gardener in the orchard, and the tree was guarded by his daughters, the Hesperides, and by Ladon, a never-sleeping dragon. As his eleventh labor for Eurystheus, Heracles fetched the Golden Apples. He took them to Eurystheus, but as the apples were sacred Eurystheus returned them to Heracles who then gave them to Athena. She restored them to the orchard of the Hesperides.

Apries (ap'ri-ēz). [Called in the Bible, Hophra.] Egyptian ruler, fourth Pharaoh of the Saite XXVIth dynasty; reigned 589-570 B.C. as successor to his father, Psamtik II. Rivalry with Babylon's Nebuchadnezzar led him to attack Tyre and Sidon, as well as to attempt the relief of Jerusalem which was besieged by the Babylonians. He failed (586 B.C.) to save Jerusalem or to overthrow Babylonian rule in Syria despite a series of military and naval victories, and was finally himself overthrown and killed by his former ally, Amasis II.

Apsyrtus (ap-sēr'tus) or Absyrtus (ab-). In Greek legend, a son of Aeëtes, king of Colchis, and, according to some accounts, of the Caucasian nymph Asterodia. Others say his mother was Idyia. He commanded a fleet of ships in pursuit of his sister Medea who had fled with Jason after the latter stole the Golden Fleece. According to some accounts, Medea tricked him into meeting her in an isolated spot to arrange for her own return to Colchis and he was slain by Jason who was hiding nearby. His leaderless men then gave up the pursuit of the Argonauts. Others say that he fled with Medea and Jason from Colchis and that Medea, to delay the pursuit of her father Aeëtes, killed him and cast the pieces of his body into the sea. Aeëtes, stopping to recover them to give his son proper burial, was left behind.

Apuleius/Aquila

Apuleius (ap-ū-lē'us), Lucius. [Also: Lucius Appuleius.] Roman rhetorician and Platonic sophist, born in Numidia (or, according to some authorities, at what is now Bône, Algeria), c123 A.D., and active chiefly at Carthage. He was notable as a clever and versatile writer with an encyclopedic range of interests. In completion of his education he went to Athens to study the philosophy of Plato. He then traveled widely in Greece and was everywhere initiated into the mysteries. He spent some time in Rome as an advocate then returned to Africa and settled in Carthage. He is probably now best known for his Metamorphoses, or The Golden Ass, the sole Latin novel that survives entire. The extraordinary adventures (including metamorphosis into the shape of an ass) attributed by Apuleius to the hero of this fictional work were later freely adapted and used by Fielding, Smollett, Boccaccio, and Cervantes. Among the episodes woven into the story of the man who was metamorphosed into an ass is the tale of Cupid and Psyche. As an ass, the hero of the romance had ample opportunity to observe the absurdities of human kind and commented freely and satirically on them, thus preserving a picture of his age. Apuleius is also of some considerable importance, although less well known, for his scientific writings. His most important work in this field (particularly for the historian of medicine) was his book on magic (De magia or Apologia) which dealt with various matters not unrelated to those which were the concern of the first alchemists, and thus historically linked to what was later to emerge as modern science. In this work Apuleius also defended himself on the charge that he had bewitched a rich woman, much older than he, into marrying him. All the other scientific writings of Apuleius, including a translation of an early text on arithmetic, have now been lost except for De mundo (On the World), and some scholars have questioned the authenticity of this.

Apulia (ā-pū'li-ā). In ancient geography, a region of S Italy, lying S of the Frentani and E of Samnium. It was conquered by Rome in the 4th century B.C. Later it included the Messapian Peninsula. The ancient inhabitants were the Dauni, Peucetii, and Salentini or Messapians. Throughout the centuries, Apulia was a place of entrance for Greek and Oriental influences. The region saw bitter fighting in the Punic Wars.

Aquarius (ā-kwā'ri-us). The eleventh sign of the zodiac—the Water-bearer—which the sun enters about the 21st of January. Also, a zodiacal constellation, supposed to represent a man standing with his left hand extended upward, and with his right pouring out of a vase a stream of water which flows into the mouth of Piscis Australis (the Southern Fish).

Aqueus (ā'kwē-us). Epithet applied to Zeus at Dodona, meaning "Watery" or "Flowing." At Dodona a spring welled from the roots of the sacred oracular oak. The murmuring of the water of the spring was heard as the voice of the god and the sounds were interpreted to pilgrims by the ancient priestess as oracles of the god.

Aquila (ak'wi-lā). A northern constellation situated in the Milky Way nearly south of Lyra, and containing the bright star Altair. It has for its outline the figure of a flying eagle carrying in its talons the boy Antinous, the favorite of the emperor Hadrian. It is also called Aquila et Antinous.

Aquileia (ä-kwa-lä'ya). Town in NE Italy, situated at the head of the Adriatic Sea, near what is now Trieste. Founded by the Romans in 181 B.C., it became one of the chief market cities of the Empire, the strategic key to Italy on the NE. It was destroyed by Attila in 452 A.D., but rebuilt.

Aquilius (ä-kwil'i-us). Latin writer; fl. 2nd century B.C. He is mentioned as a writer of comedies. Two fragments are attributed to him.

Aquilo (ak'wi-lō). The Roman name for Boreas, the north wind.

Ara (ā'ra). An ancient southern constellation—the Altar. It is situated south of Scorpio.

Arabia Deserta (ä-rā'bi-ä dē-zēr'tä). [Eng. trans., "desert," or "uninhabited," Arabia.] In ancient geography, the N and C portions of Arabia.

Arabia Felix (fē'liks). [Eng. trans., "flourishing," or "happy," Arabia.] In ancient geography, the comparatively fertile region in the SE and S parts of Arabia, contrasted with the uninhabited and barren N and C portions.

Arachne (ä-rak'nē). In Greek legend, a maiden of Colophon in Lydia. She was so skilled in spinning and weaving that her reputation spread throughout Lydia. Admirers of her work suggested that she must have been taught by Athena. Arachne scorned the suggestion and boasted that she could compete with Athena. The goddess, jealous of Arachne's fame in an art that was considered peculiarly her own, learned of her boast and appeared to her disguised as an old woman. She advised Arachne that it was unwise to vie with the gods, that it was enough to excel all mortals. Arachne repeated her boast and demanded that Athena come to her in person and meet her challenge. Athena then revealed herself and agreed to a contest which was begun at once. Athena's work portrayed the Olympian gods in all their majesty. Arachne wove into her work scenes of the more scandalous love affairs of the gods, but so delicately and beautifully that no flaw could be found in her work. It was evident that the goddess had not surpassed the maiden, and in a frenzy of jealousy Athena destroyed her rival's work, then touched the girl on her forehead and made her conscious of her presumption and impiety. Arachne hanged herself from a rafter, and as she was hanging there Athena condemned her to hang on a thread and spin eternally by transforming her into a spider.

Arachosia (ar-ä-kō'zhä, -zhi-ä). In ancient geography, a region in ancient Persia corresponding to part of modern Afghanistan.

Arachthus (ä-rak'thus). River in NW Greece, in Epirus, which flows into the Ambracian Gulf about eight miles below Ambracia.

Araethyrea (a-rē-thē'rē-ä). In ancient geography, the former name of Phlius. It was named for the daughter of the aboriginal king, Aras. Phlias changed the name to Phlius. The place was known as Araethyrea in the time of Homer, who listed it as one of the places that sent men to the Trojan War under the command of Agamemnon.

Araros (ar'ä-ros). Athenian comic poet of the early 4th century B.C. He was the son of Aristophanes and brought out his father's Plutus in 388 B.C. He appeared as an original poet c375 B.C.

Aras (a'ras). According to legend, an earth-born man who in the time of Prometheus became the first king of the land later known as Phlissia.

Aratus of Sicyon (ä-rä'tus; sish'i-on, sis'i-). Greek general, born at Sicyon, near Corinth, Greece, 271; died 213 B.C. He was the leader of the second Achaean League. He liberated (251 B.C.) Sicyon from the usurper Nicocles and set up a democracy; elected (245 B.C.) strategus (military leader) of the Achaean League, he took the citadel of Corinth in 243 B.C., and brought Athens and Argos into the League. Defeated in a succession of campaigns by the Spartans under Cleomenes III, he formed an alliance with Antigonos III of Macedonia (Antigonos Doson), who defeated Cleomenes at the battle of Sellasia near the city of Sparta in 222 B.C., but thus brought the League under Macedonian domination. He carried on an unsuccessful defensive war (221-219 B.C.) against the Aetolians.

the court of Antigonus II of Macedonia (Antigonus Gonatas) and Antiochus I of Syria; born at Soli, in Cilicia, c315 B.C.; died in Macedonia, 240 B.C. He was the author of Phenomena (or Phaenomena or Phainomena), a work in 1154 verses on astronomy, later very popular with Roman writers. It contained a section on weather signs (Prognostica or Diosemeia) used by Cicero, Vergil, and others, and an invocation to Zeus quoted by Saint Paul in his address to the Athenians on the Areopagus (Mars' Hill). Acts, xvii. 28.

Arbela (är-bē'la). [Also: Arbailu: modern name, Erbil.] In ancient geography, a town in Assyria. It was an early seat of the worship of Ishtar, and a place of considerable importance. Sixty miles from here at Gaugamela, a Macedonian force said to have numbered 47,000 under Alexander the Great defeated a much larger Persian army (some estimates have run as high as one million) under Darius III, in 331 B.C. This battle, often called the Battle of Arbela, led to the final overthrow of the Persian empire.

Arcadia (är-kā'di-a). In ancient geography, a region in Greece, in the heart of the Peloponnesus, bounded by Achaea on the N, by Argolis on the E, by Laconia and Messenia on the S, and by Elis on the W. All but isolated by mountains and intersected by them, it was proverbial for its rural simplicity. It was the favorite haunt of the pastoral god Pan, who was born on Mount Maenalus within its borders and whose worship was especially strong throughout the region: caves, springs, blasted trees, mountains, etc., were sacred to him. The Arcadians also claimed that Athena was born in their country. They said that near Aliphera in western Arcadia is a stream called Tritonis and that near here Athena was born from the head of Zeus. For this reason they set up an altar of Zeus Lecheates (In Childbed) at Aliphera. The mountains and forests of Arcadia were a favorite hunting ground of Artemis, and Arcadia was one of the strongest centers of her worship. The mountains and woods also abounded in nymphs. The Arcadians are aboriginal to their region (they say they have lived in their land since before the birth of the moon), and they were never driven out, as were the inhabitants of the other states of the Peloponnesus. According to their own account, the first man in Arcadia was Pelasgus, a son of earth, who was the first king and who named the land Pelasgia after himself. When Arcas, son of Zeus and Callisto and a descendant of Pelasgus on his mother's side, ascended the throne he changed the name of the land to Arcadia, after himself, and this was the name by which it was known ever afterward. When the sons of Heracles under Hyllus attempted to return to the Peloponnesus, Echemus, king of Arcadia, accepted the challenge of Hyllus to decide the control of the Peloponnesus by single combat. Echemus killed Hyllus and the Heraclidae withdrew as they had agreed to do if Hyllus lost in the duel. In the second Dorian invasion by the sons of Aristomachus, the Arcadian king Cypselus gave his daughter to Cresphontes, son of Aristomachus, in marriage, and so made an ally of Cresphontes. For this reason the Arcadians were not disturbed nor dislodged from their country by the Dorian invasion. The Arcadians played an active role in the Trojan War, to which they journeyed in ships loaned them by Agamemnon as they had no fleet of their own. In the wars between Messenia and Sparta the Arcadians allied themselves with the Messenians. Aechmis, king of Arcadia, and his countrymen fought openly on the side of Aristodemus, king of Messenia, in the First Messenian War. In the Second Messenian War the Arcadians were again allied with Messenia, and when they learned that their own leader Aristocrates had accepted bribes from the Lacedaemonians to betray their allies the Arcadians stoned him to death. Arcadians took part in the Persian War, especially at Thermopylae (480 B.C.) and Plataea (479 B.C.). Under compulsion, they joined with the Spartans to fight against Athens in the Peloponnesian Wars (431-404 B.C.). As Spartan allies, they were defeated at Leuctra (371 B.C.) by the Theban Epaminondas, and as their alliance with Sparta was an unwilling one, after this defeat the Arcadians broke away from their Spartan alliance. The cities of Arcadia, Tegea, Mantinea, and others, formed a confederation c370-360 B.C.

Arcas (är'kas). In Greek mythology, a son of the nymph Callisto and Zeus. His mother was transformed into a bear through the jealousy of Hera, and Arcas was brought up by Maia in Arcadia. When, as a youth, he was hunting wild beasts in the forest, he came face to face with his mother in her guise as a bear. She recognized him and approached him, but he did not know her and would have killed her as the wild animal he thought she was. Zeus lifted her to the heavens in a whirlwind and set her among the stars as the constellation of the Great Bear. A common account also has Arcas translated to the heavens as the Little Bear. Arcas succeeded his uncle, Nyctimus, son of Lycaon, on the throne of the land that was then known as Pelasgia. He changed its name to Arcadia after himself, and is said to be the ancestor of the Arcadians. Some say that Arcas was taught how to cultivate crops by Triptolemus, and that he in turn taught the arts of agriculture to the Arcadians and also taught them how to bake bread and the crafts of spinning and weaving. Some say Arcas had two sons—Elatus and Aphidas—and that their mother was either Meganira or the nymph Chrysopelia. Others say the dryad Erato bore him three sons—Azan, Aphidas, and Elatus. Azan became ruler of Azania in Arcadia; Aphidas became ruler of Tegea; Elatus inherited the region of Mount Cyllene. Arcas was buried on Mount Maenalus in Arcadia, but his bones were removed and placed near an altar of Hera at Mantinea in obedience to the following command of an oracle:

"Maenalia is storm-swept, where lies Arcas, from whom all Arcadians are named,

In a place where meet three, four, even five roads;

Thither I bid you go, and with kind heart Take up Arcas and bring him back to your lovely city.

There make Arcas a precinct and sacrifices."

The place of his grave was called the Altars of the Sun. The image of Arcas was translated to the heavens, where it was known as Arcturus. Located behind the Great Bear, Arcturus is the guardian or watcher of the Great Bear, his mother.

Arce (är'sē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Thaumias, and the sister of Iris and the Harpies. Because she aided the Titans in their war against Zeus, he took away the wings of Arce, after the Titans had been defeated and banished, and gave them to Thetis as a wedding present when she married Peleus. Some say Thetis gave the wings to her son Achilles, and this accounted for his fleetness. After Zeus had taken away her wings he banished Arce to Tartarus.

Arcesilaus (är-ses-i-lā'us). According to some accounts, a son of Odysseus and Penelope.

Arcesilaus or Arcesilas. Name of several kings of Cyrene, of the Battiadae dynasty. Arcesilaus I (590–574 B.C.) was the son of Battus, founder of the Greek city of Cyrene and of the dynasty. In the reign of Arcesilaus II (c560–c550 B.C.), grandson of Arcesilaus I, the city of Barca was founded by dissidents from Cyrene. A black-figure cup of Cyrene shows Arcesilaus II overseeing the weighing out and packing of silphion, a medicinal plant. The sale of the plant, which was widely exported, was the monopoly of the king and brought him great wealth. See Battiadae.

Arcesilaus or Arcesilas (är-ses'i-las). Greek Skeptic philosopher, born at Pitane, in Aeolis, c315 B.C.; died c241 B.C. He was the founder of the so-called Second Academy, an opponent of Stoicism and exponent of the Socratic method. Holding that both senses and reason are untrustworthy, he based his system of ethics on assumption of probability.

Arcesius (är-ses'i-us). In mythology, a son of Zeus and Euryodia, according to some accounts. Others say he was the son of Cephalus and Procris, and still others say he was the son of Cephalus and a she-bear. He was the father, by Chalcomedusa, of Laertes, and the grandfather of Odysseus.

Archegetes (är-kē'jē-tēz). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Founder." An altar of Apollo Archegetes was set up at Naxos, in Sicily, whither winds had blown the first Greek colonists who sailed to that island. It became the custom for envoys thereafter arriving from Greece to offer sacrifices on this altar as soon as they arrived in Sicily.

Archelaus (är-kē-lā'us). In Greek legend, a son of Temenus and a descendant of Heracles. When he arrived at the kingdom of Cisseus in Macedonia after fleeing from his brothers in Argos, he was promised the throne and the hand of Cisseus' daughter if he overcame the enemies of Cisseus. Archelaus was successful but instead of fulfilling his promise Cisseus plotted to kill him. However, a slave warned him of the pit of hot coals Cisseus had concealed in his path, and Archelaus hurled Cisseus into it and fled. Archelaus is the traditional founder of the Macedonian royal house.

Archelaus. Greek sculptor of the 1st century A.D. A bas-relief, the Apotheosis of Homer, carved by him, is in the British Museum.

Archelaus (of Athens). [Surnamed Physicus, meaning "the Physicist."] Greek philosopher of the Ionian (or Milesian) school, active c450 B.C. He was a pupil of Anaxagoras, and was said to have been an instructor of Socrates and Euripides. He regarded heat and cold (derived by condensation and rarefaction of "primitive matter" or "original substance," which he took to be air), mixed with mind, as the basic principles of generation.

Archelaus (of Cappadocia). Cappadocian general under Mithridates VI; fl. in the 1st century B.C. He served in Mithridates' wars against Rome. Sent to Greece (87 B.C.) with a large force, he made Athens his headquarters, occupied Piraeus, and stirred up revolt against Rome in the other Greek states. Sulla came from Rome to command the war against Mithridates, and defeated Archelaus at Chaeronea (86) and at Orchomenus (85 B.C.). Mithridates came to distrust Archelaus who then deserted to the Romans (81 B.C.).

Archelaus (of Cappadocia). King of Cappadocia, c34 B.C.–17 A.D.; a grandson of Archelaus (of Egypt). He owed his elevation to Mark Antony, who was captivated by the charms of Archelaus' mother, Glaphyra. He sided with Antony in the war with Octavian (Augustus), but was permitted after the defeat of Antony to retain his kingdom, to which was subsequently added part of Cilicia and Lesser Armenia. He was finally summoned to Rome by Tiberius, where he was held prisoner until his death. Cappadocia became, after his death, a Roman province.

Archelaus (of Egypt). King of Egypt in 56 B.C.; a son of the general Archelaus (of Cappadocia). He became high priest at Comana in 63 B.C., and secured the hand of Berenice, queen of Egypt, by representing himself to be the son of Mithridates VI Eupator. He was defeated and slain by the Romans after a reign of six months.

Archelaus (of Macedonia). King of Macedonia (c413–399 B.C.); son of Perdiccas II. He was a patron of Hellenic art and literature, and attracted to his court Zeuxis, Euripides, and Agathon, and invited Socrates who declined.

Archelochus (är-kel'ō-kus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Antenor and Theano. He accompanied Aeneas at the siege of the Greek fortifications. Telamonian Ajax killed him.

Archemorus (är-kem'ō-rus). A name given to Opheltes, son of Lycurgus of Nemea. It means "Beginner of Doom." Opheltes' nurse left him unguarded for a short time while she directed the Seven against Thebes, who were passing through Nemea, to a spring. When she returned a serpent had killed Opheltes. This was regarded as an evil omen, and for this reason the new name was given to him.

Archeptolemus (är-kep-tol'ē-mus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Iphitus. He replaced Hector's fallen charioteer. Teucer, attempting to kill Hector, aimed an arrow at him but Apollo deflected it and Archeptolemus was killed instead.

Archestratus (är-kes'trā-tus). Greek writer of Gela, in Sicily, who was a contemporary of Aristotle and flourished about the end of the 4th century B.C. He wrote a humorous poem about food and the cooking of it. Fragments which survive show him to have been a witty and talented writer.

Archias (är'ki-ās). According to Greek tradition, a descendant of Heracles. He lived in Corinth. Some say he went with a companion to visit the oracle at Delphi. The priestess asked him to choose between wealth and health. Archias chose wealth, and his companion, Myscellus, chose health. In later times Archias went to Sicily and founded Syracuse (734 B.C.), which became noted for its wealth. Myscellus went with a colony to Croton, which became noted for its physicians.

Archidamus I (är-ki-dā'mus). King of Sparta, of the Eurypontid house of Spartan kings, who reigned after the close of the Second Messenian War (7th century B.C.).

Archidamus II. King of Sparta, of the Eury-

pontid house of Spartan kings, who reigned c476–c427 B.C. He was the son of Zeuxidamus, who did not reign, and the grandson of Leotychides, the hero of Mycale (479 B.C.). He was a friend of Pericles. Early in his reign (c471 B.C.) he defeated the Arcadian League at Dipaea. In 432 B.C. when the allies of Sparta asked her to declare war on Athens for having broken the Thirty Years Peace by aiding Corcyra against Corinth, by the seizure of Potidaea, and more immediately, by assisting the Plataeans against Thebes, Archidamus prudently counseled moderation. He advised the Spartans to delay, on the ground that Sparta was not financially prepared for war and lacked a fleet. He was over-ruled. In the ensuing war he fought so bravely and well that the early years of the Peloponnesian War (431–421 B.C.) are called the Archidamean War. In the spring of 431 B.C. he led a large part of the Peloponnesian forces in an invasion of Attica, first however, sending an envoy from the Isthmus to make one last attempt to settle the disputes between Athens and the Peloponnesians. His envoy was not received. Archidamus besieged the fortress of Oenoë on Mount Cithaeron but could not take it. He marched to the plain of Eleusis and devastated it, crossed the plain of the Cephissus and encamped under Mount Parnes, from where he could see the Acropolis of Athens. Before this threat the populace poured for refuge into the city. The following year he invaded Attica again and ravaged the area south of the city. But the Athenians had a worse enemy inside their walls. Plague broke out. Among those who succumbed to it was Pericles. In 429 B.C. Archidamus led his forces against Plataea. The Plataeans appealed to him to refrain from violating their territory in the name of the heroes who had fallen there in the Persian War, among whom were many Spartans whose memories were annually honored by the Plataeans. Archidamus replied that he would so refrain if the Plataeans detached themselves from Athens and remained neutral. This the Plataeans were unwilling to do, and were besieged. In 428 B.C. Archidamus and the allies invaded Attica for the third time, destroyed the standing crops and, having used up the supplies they brought with them, retired.

Archidamus III. King of Sparta, of the Eury-pontid line of Spartan kings. He reigned from 360/359 to 338 B.C. He was the son of Agesilaus II, whom he succeeded. After the defeat of the Spartans at Leuctra (371 B.C.) he was made commander of a Spartan force sent to the relief of the survivors of that battle. He defeated the Arcadians, Messenians, and Argives in 368 B.C. in a fight called "the Tearless Battle," because although great loss was suffered by the Arcadians and their allies, not one Spartan lost his life. In 364 B.C. he occupied the fortress of Cromnon, between Megalopolis and Messenia. The garrison he placed there was besieged by the Arcadians and their allies, and when he sought to relieve it he was driven off with losses. He fought bravely to defend Sparta from the attacks of Epaminondas and the Thebans in 362. In 356 B.C. he supported the Phocians in their Sacred War to seize Delphi. In 343 B.C. he answered an appeal from Taras (Tarentum) in Italy for aid against the Italian tribes. Leading a band of mercenaries he sailed to Italy, waged inconclusive war there for some years and was killed (338 B.C.) at Manduria.

Archilochus (är-kil'ō-kus). Greek lyric poet, born at Paros, in the Cyclades, and active c700–650 B.C. A sensitive and highly intelligent man, he was embittered by poverty, and turned his talents to satire and invective. He took part in the colonization of Thasus but was compelled to leave there, some say because he dropped his shield and ran from a battle, others because he made so many enemies with his lampoons. He returned to Paros and became engaged to the daughter of a fellow townsman. But the father of his betrothed broke off the engagement and, later tradition says, Archilochus wrote such biting lampoons that both father and daughter hanged themselves. Thereafter, Archilochus wandered about as a soldier of fortune and freebooter, and reports have it that he was killed in a battle against Naxos. Fragments of his powerful and incisive work remain. Archilochus is regarded as a great innovator in meter, language, and the subjects of poetry. He used iambics in satires praised by Horace and Hadrian, among others. He was the author also of hymns (one of which was sung in the Olympics), elegies, and lampoons. He used the trochee in his serious works, and was the first to alternate long and short verses in the form called epode. Counted among the greatest of the poets by the ancients, the legend is that when the man who killed him appeared at Delphi the priestess refused to admit him, on the ground that he had slain one of the Muses.

Archimedes (är-ki-mē'dēz). Greek mathematician, engineer, and physicist, now usually considered to have been in each of these fields the outstanding figure of the ancient world. He was born at Syracuse, Sicily, c287 B.C., and was killed there, 212 B.C. He was the discoverer of principles and the author of treatises basic to the subsequent study of geometry and calculus, particularly on the dimensions of the circle, sphere, cylinder, and parabola; in physics, developer of the displacement theory known as Archimedes' principle, and supposedly also of that of the lever (of which, according to tradition, he said, "Give me a place to stand, and I will move the world"); in mechanics he was the inventor of the Archimedean screw and various machines of war. The son of an astronomer, he was a student at Alexandria where he probably met Conon of Samos. He spent much of his life at the court of Hiero II of Syracuse (who is said to have been his relative). Given the problem of determining the proportions of gold and silver in Hiero's crown, he is supposed to have cried "Eureka!" ("I have found it"), as, stepping into his bath, he discovered the relationship between weight and displacement of water, the principle now applied to determining the displacement of ships and specific gravity. His engines of war, which struck terror among the Romans and held them off for three years in their siege of Syracuse (214-212 B.C.), were considered unimportant by him. According to one tradition, he devised a huge burning-glass and set fire to the Roman ships as they sailed up to the wall of the city. Some say he was killed at the fall of Syracuse while drawing geometrical figures in the sand, though the Roman commander had ordered him spared for his great learning. The Roman was deeply grieved, ordered that an honorable burial be given him, and made provision for his survivors. His tomb, which was found, nearly covered with brambles, by Cicero in 75 B.C., was marked by a cylinder circumscribing a sphere with the ratio $3/2$, in accordance with his expressed wish. For in his own opinion his discovery of the relation between the surface and volume of a sphere and the cylinder that circumscribed it was his most important achievement.

Archipelago (är-ki-pel'ä-gō). [Also: Greek Archipelago; Turkish, Jezairi-Bahri-Sefid.] In ancient geography, a name for the various islands in the Aegean Sea, or for the sea itself.

Arch of Augustus. [Also: Porta Romana.] Roman triumphal arch at Ariminum (Rimini), Italy, built in 27 B.C., in honor of the restoration of the Flaminian Way. It is of white travertine, 45.9 feet high and 28.8 thick, with a single arch 29.5 feet high and 26.9 wide. A Corinthian fluted column on each side of the archway supports an entablature, above which there is a low pediment.

Arch of Constantine. Triumphal arch in Rome, SW of the Flavian Amphitheater ("Colosseum"), built by Constantine the Great to commemorate his victory over Maxentius at the battle of the Milvian Bridge in 312 A.D., and preserved with only superficial damage from weathering, abrasion, and vandalism. It has three passageways, a large central arch flanked by smaller arches. It is richly decorated with columns, architectural moldings, statues, and relief sculptures. The most important of the reliefs were removed from public monuments of the Flavian and Antonine periods to embellish Constantine's work. In the attic is Constantine's dedicatory inscription. In the 10th century the arch was incorporated into a castle, eventually coming into the possession of the Frangipani family, by which circumstance it escaped the despoiling to which most ancient monuments of Rome were subjected. (JJ)

Arch of Drusus. Roman arch (wrongly named) built by Caracalla (188-217 A.D.) to carry an aqueduct for the supply of his thermae over the Appian Way near the gate of San Sebastiano. It is built of travertine, faced with white marble, and decorated with composite columns, and originally had on each side an entablature and a pediment.

Arch of Hadrian. Triumphal gateway at Athens, probably built by Hadrian, between the old city and his new quarter. It is 59

feet high, with a single arch 20 feet high. Above the arch there is an attic with three large openings, originally closed. Above the central opening there is a pediment. The arch was decorated on each side with Corinthian columns.

Arch of Janus Quadrifrons. Roman arch at the NE extremity of the Forum Boarium. It is a four-way arch of marble, largely built of older architectural fragments. The interior is covered with a simple groined vault. The four fronts bear 48 niches for statues. The construction is that of the late 3rd or early 4th century A.D. and is probably to be referred to the time of Constantine.

Arch of Septimius Severus. Roman arch in the Forum, erected in 203 A.D. in honor of Severus and his sons Geta and Caracalla in commemoration of victories over the Parthians. It is of Pentelic marble, with a central arch and two side arches, flanked by four Corinthian columns on each face. There are sculptured panels over the side arches and a frieze above all with reliefs of Roman triumphs. The attic bears inscriptions, originally of bronze letters inlaid in the marble; scrap dealers have pried out the metal, but the matrices remain and can be clearly read, except for the name of Geta which was chiselled away at Caracalla's order.

Arch of Titus. Roman arch in the Forum, built in commemoration of the taking of Jerusalem. It has a single archway, the opening flanked on each face by four composite columns. The spandrels bear Victories in relief, and on the high attic is the dedicatory inscription. The vault is richly coffered and sculptured, and the interior faces of the piers display reliefs of Titus in triumph, with the plunder of the temple at Jerusalem, in which the seven-branched candlesticks are conspicuous.

Arch of Trajan. Arch over the Appian Way at Benevento, Italy, dedicated in 114 A.D., and one of the finest of ancient arches. It is of white marble, 48 feet high and 30½ wide, with a single arch measuring 27 by 16½ feet. On each face there are four engaged Corinthian columns, with an entablature, above which is a paneled attic. The arch is profusely sculptured with reliefs illustrating Trajan's life and his Dacian triumphs. There are Victories in the spandrels and dedicatory inscriptions on the central panels of the attic.

Arch of Trajan. Arch erected at Ancona, Italy, in 115 A.D. It is of white marble, and stands at the end of the breakwater built by Trajan, and is perhaps the best-proportioned of all Roman triumphal arches. It has a single opening 46 by 29½ feet, two engaged Corinthian columns on the face of each pier, and a high attic above the entablature.

Archon (är'kon). A chief magistrate of some states in ancient Greece, and particularly Athens. After the abolition of the title of king in Attica there was chosen a single archon, who exercised for life essentially royal prerogatives. The term of office was afterward reduced to ten years, and in 683 B.C. it was made annual, and the duties of the archonship were distributed among nine persons. The first was the archon eponymos (name-giving archon), whose functions were executive and judicial, and who gave his name to the civil year; the second was the archon basileus (archon king), whose duties were chiefly religious and ceremonial; the third was the archon polemarchos (archon generalissimo), who was, first in fact and then nominally, commander of the military power and whose main duties were judicial; and the remaining six were the thesmothetae, or administrators of justice, whose most important duty it was to pass carefully in review, each year, the whole body of laws of the state in order to make sure that no errors or contradictions had crept in, that repealed laws had been duly cancelled, and that repetition was avoided. It rested with the thesmothetae, also, to see that all the laws that were in vigor were strictly enforced, and to bring to trial any public official who had failed in his trust. They also had charge of all cases not specifically within the jurisdiction of the other archons. At the end of their year of office all the archons, unless they were found guilty of malfeasance, by virtue of their office entered the council of the Areopagus.

Archytas of Tarentum (är-kī'tas; tə-ren'tum). Greek Pythagorean philosopher, mathematician, statesman, and general; fl. c400-350 B.C. He was a friend of Plato. Believed by some to have furnished certain ideas used by Plato and Aristotle, he is known to have been the first to set up a system of analytical geometry and to distinguish harmonic progression. He was a notable contributor to the theory of proportion and the study of acoustics and music. Finally, he was the inventor of a method of doubling the cube, supposedly also of the pulley, and even, according to one account, of a flying machine.

Arctinus (ärk-ti'nus). Greek poet of Miletus, to whom three lost poems of the Epic Cycle are attributed; fl. c776 B.C.; said to have been a pupil of Homer. Author of Aethiopis, an epic poem which continued the narrative of the Trojan War from the point where it is dropped by the Iliad. From that point it described the arrival of the Amazon Penthesilea, and recorded her glorious exploits in battle, her death in combat at the hands of Achilles, the death of Memnon, the death of Achilles, and the rivalry between Ajax and Odysseus for the arms of Achilles that resulted in the suicide of Ajax. Another epic poem attributed to Arctinus, the Iliu Persis or Sack of Troy, told of the stratagem of the Wooden Horse, the taking and sack of Troy, and the departure of the Greeks. A third epic, the Titanomachia or War of the Titans, was also attributed to Arctinus. The works are known from quotations in later writers, inscriptions, and a late epitome.

Arcton (ärk'ton). In ancient geography, a mountain ("Bear Mountain") near Cyzicus on the Pontus. Here the Argonauts, after the tragic accident of slaying Cyzicus, king of the land, sacrificed to Rhea and prayed to her to calm the storms that beset them on their way to Colchis.

Ardea (är'dē-a). In ancient geography, a town in Latium, Italy, about 24 miles S of Rome. It was the chief town of the Rutulians, and later a Roman colony. In Republican times it served as a State prison. While Camillus, Roman tribune and dictator, was in voluntary exile here, the Gauls attacked, took, and sacked Rome (389 B.C.). Camillus, it is said, gathered a force of Ardeans and destroyed a part of the army of the Gauls that had encamped outside Ardea. From this victory he went on to free Rome. Ardea has the best example of early Italic fortifications of mounded earth, the agger, and interesting masonry fortifications in the volcanic stone known as tufa. Excavations have brought to light decorative architectural terra-cottas from several Italic temples of the 4th-2nd centuries B.C., and Swedish explorations have cleared the tufa foundations of a large temple and an early basilica. (JJ)

Ardys (är'dis). Son of Gyges, king of Lydia. Assurbanipal, king of Assyria (668-626 B.C.), relates in his annals that Gyges rebelled against him, but that his son Ardys, as a result of the invasion of Lydia by the Cimmerians, submitted to him and invoked his help.

Area (ä-rē'a). [Also: Areia.] An epithet applied to Aphrodite by the Spartans, meaning "Warlike," or "Devoted to Ares." Artemis and Athena also were given this epithet. Orestes is said to have dedicated an altar of Athena Area on the Hill of Ares (Areopagus) after he had been acquitted in his trial on the charge of murdering his mother. Nearby, unhewn stones were located, on which the defendants and prosecutors in a trial stood. One of the stones was the stone of Outrage; the other was the stone of Ruthlessness (see Areopagus). The sanctuary of Athena Area at Plataea was built by the Plataeans with their share of the spoils from the victory at Marathon (480 B.C.). The image in the temple at Plataea was by Phidias, and on the walls was a painting by Polygnotus showing Odysseus and the slain suitors.

Areithoüs (ä-rē-ith'ō-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), the father of Menesthius of Arne. He was called Corynetes (The Mace-man or Club-man) because he used an iron mace rather than a lance or spear in battle. He was trapped by Lycurgus, son of Aleus of Tegea, in a narrow place where he could not swing his mace and was slain by Lycurgus, who then took his armor. According to Pausanias, the tomb of Areithoüs was near Mantinea in Arcadia.

Areius (ä-rä'us). Stoic or Pythagorean philosopher of Alexandria; fl. c30 B.C. He was the friend and preceptor of Octavian, the future Augustus, and is said to have overcome the latter's hesitation to put to death Caesarion the son of Cleopatra, reputedly by Julius Caesar, by the following parody of Homer's famous praise of monarchy: "'Tis no good thing, a multitude of Caesars."

Arene (ä-rē'nē). In Greek mythology, the half-sister and wife of Aphareus, and mother by him of Lynceus. By Poseidon she was the mother of Idas.

Arene. City of Messenia, founded, according to tradition, by Aphareus and named for his wife and half-sister, the daughter of Oebalus and Gorgophone. The city played a part in the war between the Epeans and Pylians, in which Nestor as a youth won his spurs. Men of Arene followed Nestor to the Trojan War.

Areopagus (ar-ē-op'ā-gus). [Eng. trans, "Hill of Ares."] Low rocky hill at Athens, Greece, continuing westward the line of the Acropolis, from which it is separated by a depression of ground. On the S side near the top there is a flight of 15 rock-cut steps, and portions of the summit are hewn smooth to form platforms, doubtless for altars. Upon this hill sat the famous court of the same name. Two unhewn stones were nearby. On one of them, the Stone of Outrage, the accuser stood during the trial; on the other, the Stone of Ruthlessness, stood the accused. This court, originally a Council of Elders, exercised supreme authority in all matters in ancient times. Under the developed Athenian constitution it lost many of its ancient powers but retained jurisdiction in cases of homicide (including wounding with intent, and arson) and in religious concerns, and exercised a general censorship. In ancient times murder and manslaughter had been avenged by the family of the slain person either by slaying the slayer or by accepting a payment in compensation. As the worship of the dead souls and of the gods of the Underworld developed, the principle arose that a murderer had offended them and must be purified of his offense in order to satisfy the avenging Erinyes or Furies. Furthermore, until purification had been achieved the wrath of the Erinyes fell not only on the murderer, but on the community of which he was a part as well. Hence purification was a matter concerning the state and one on which the community was compelled to act. It became the function of the Areopagus to adjudicate these matters. According to mythology, the very first trial for murder that took place was that of Ares for the murder of Halirrhothius, a son of Poseidon. Ares claimed he had resorted to murder to save his daughter Alcippe from being violated by Halirrhothius and was acquitted. Some say the hill and the Council was named Areopagus in commemoration of this trial, and some say the name comes from Athena's epithet "Areia," for in the second trial Orestes was acquitted of the murder of his mother when Athena cast the deciding vote in his favor. The trials of myth and legend reinforced a developing principle: the substitution of justice and law for the blind vengeance symbolized by the Erinyes or Furies. In historic times the Areopagus was constituted of all archons who, after their year of office, had successfully proved themselves guiltless of malfeasance, in accordance with the provisions of law.

Ares (ār'ēz). One of the 12 Olympian gods. He was the hated and feared god of war who engaged in bloody strife for love of combat itself. He flung himself impetuously into battle, accompanied by his sister Eris (Strife), and other deities of relentless battle. Of all their gods, for whom the Greeks showed on the one hand reverence and on the other interested affection and curiosity, Ares alone won no sympathetic attention. As a symbol of an evil that exists, and the sorrow and suffering it causes, Ares was acknowledged but not loved.

Ares was the son of Zeus and Hera, both of whom disliked him, and Zeus often hinted that it was from his mother that Ares got his quarrelsome temper. The only one of the gods who appreciated Ares was Hades, for by his activities the population of Hades' realm was greatly increased. The various myths attached to Ares indicate that the Greeks were pleased to think their war god sometimes got a taste of his own medicine, and that he was by no means invulnerable. The Aloidae, giant sons of Iphimedia and Poseidon, captured Ares before they made war on the gods and shut him up in a bronze vessel. There he languished for 13 months before he was released through the intervention of Hermes. In the war of Heracles against Pylus, Athena aided Heracles, while Ares—along with Hera, Poseidon, and Hades—aided the Pylians. With Athena's aid Heracles wounded Ares twice and compelled him to withdraw. In the fight between Heracles and Cycnus, son of Ares,

Ares/

Ares sided with his son and was again wounded by Heracles. In this instance Athena led him away to Olympus to be healed.

Homer tells that Aphrodite, married to the lame god Hephaestus, fell in love with the straight and handsome Ares, and entertained him frequently in her husband's absence. Hephaestus, informed by Helios of his wife's unfaithfulness, laid a trap for the lovers. He made a brazen net of mesh so fine as to be invisible and as strong as it was fine. This he draped on the bed where Ares and Aphrodite were accustomed to disport themselves. He told Aphrodite that he was going on a journey to his favorite haunt, the island of Lemnos. As soon as he had gone Ares came joyfully to his house and embraced Aphrodite. The net fell on the lovers and bound them fast. Hephaestus, again informed by Helios, returned and published their disgrace by calling the gods to witness how Aphrodite had dishonored him. He vowed he would not release the lovers until Zeus repaid him the rich marriage gifts he had made when he was given Aphrodite's hand. Ares promised to repay him, and Poseidon offered his guarantee that if Ares failed to keep his promise he would assume the debt. Aphrodite and Ares were freed. Ares went off to Thrace, his favorite dwelling place because of its warlike people and savage country. Aphrodite went to the isle of Cyprus and was purified by the nymphs. This, however, was not the end of the affair. Eos seduced Ares, and Aphrodite, out of jealousy, punished Eos. And when Aphrodite fell in love with Adonis, Ares, some say, disguised himself as a wild boar, one of his sacred animals, and killed Adonis. To Ares, Aphrodite bore Harmonia, later the wife of Cadmus, and Eros, Anteros, Deimos, and Phobos. He had many other children, among them: Oxylus, whose mother was Protogonia, daughter of Calydon; Demonice bore him Evenus, Molus, Pylus, and Thes-tius; some say he was the father of Althaea's son Meleager; Ascalaphus and Ialmenus, the Argonauts, were his sons; Cyrene bore him Diomedes of Thrace, master of the man-eating mares; Pyrene bore him that Cycnus who fought with Heracles on the Echedorus River in Macedonia and was only saved by the intervention of Zeus; Pelopia bore him another Cycnus, who also fought with Heracles at Pagasae and was slain; Phlegyas, who became a king in Boeotian Orchomenus, was his son; Tereus of Thrace, the seducer of Philomela, claimed Ares as his father; and some say he was the father of Atalanta's son Parthenopaeus. Among his daughters were the Amazon Penthesilea, and Alcippe, for whose sake Ares slew Halirrhothius. For this killing he was tried, the first ever to stand trial for murder, on the Hill of Ares, afterwards known as the Areopagus and sacred to him. He was acquitted on the ground that he was protecting his daughter's honor. Ares gave arms and swift horses to Oenomaus who, some say, was his son. He gave the belt to the Amazon Hippolyte, which led to her death when Heracles came to fetch it as one of his labors for Eurystheus. Some say the dragon that guarded the spring at Thebes, slain by Cadmus, was a son of Ares. To atone for its murder Cadmus was compelled to serve Ares for a great year, that is, for eight years. The descendants of Cadmus also felt the wrath of Ares on account of the slaying of the dragon. In the war of the Seven against Thebes Menoeceus, son of Creon, voluntarily sacrificed himself to Ares on the advice of an oracle, to appease him and to give victory to Thebes. Another dragon guarded the Golden Fleece that hung in a grove sacred to Ares in Colchis. Colchian was one of his epithets, from his temple in Colchis.

Wherever conflict broke out, there Ares delighted to be. Some say it was Ares, with his sister Eris, who caused the wars between the Lapiths and the centaurs, because Pirithous, king of the Lapiths, had not invited them to his marriage to Hippodamia. In the Trojan War Ares helped the Trojans at the request of Aphrodite, and by so doing he roused his mother's (Hera's) anger against himself. But whereas he was a strong and violent fighter, he was not skilled in strategy. Athena twice worsted him in battle. She inspired Diomedes with immortal courage and encouraged him to attack Ares himself. She seized the spear Ares had hurled at Diomedes and deflected it, but the lance Diomedes threw, guided by her hand, found its target. Wounded, Ares withdrew to Olympus to be healed, and complained to Zeus about Athena. Zeus sternly advised him not to come whining to Olympus, and addressed him as the most hateful to him of all the gods of Olympus, because all his joy was in strife and battle. Zeus also mentioned the untamed temper of Ares' mother, and observed that it might be by her will that Ares had been wounded. However, since Ares was his own son, Zeus commanded that he be healed. If he had not happened to be his son, Zeus assured him that he would long ago have banished him to Tartarus. Later in the war Ares came face to face with Athena and accused her of encouraging Diomedes to attack him and of guiding his lance. He rushed at her, vowing vengeance. As he lunged with his spear she took up a huge boulder, flung it at him and flattened him. Ares' bright hair lay in the dust. Athena stood over him and laughed at his boasts and his foolish belief that his strength could overcome her skill.

Ares was worshiped by the Spartans, and had sanctuaries under the name Enyalios in several places, but unlike the other Olympians, he had no cities, with the exception of Thebes, where he was especially worshiped. The Spartans called him "Theritas," and the oldest sanctuary of Ares in Laconia was that of Ares Theritas on the road from Therapne to Amyclae. In the sanctuary was an image said to have been brought back from Colchis by the Dioscuri. According to Pausanias, the name Theritas came from a Colchian nurse of Ares, called Thero. But, Pausanias adds, his opinion is that the name comes from a word meaning "wild beast," because it is necessary to cast aside all the qualities of gentleness and humanity when one engages in battle. The Spartans sacrificed dogs to Ares under his title of Enyalios. Near Tegea on Mount Cresius is a sanctuary of Ares Aphneius. The story is that Ares embraced Aërope, a daughter of Cepheus, and that she died in giving birth to a child. However, the child clung to its mother, even though she was dead, and through the will of Ares sucked great quantities of milk from her breasts. For this reason Ares was named Aphneius (Abundant). At Tegea also, he was worshiped as Gynaecothoenas, because when the women of Tegea armed themselves and drove out the Spartans who had attacked them under Charillus, the women offered sacrifice to Ares for their victory on their own account. They gave the men no share in the meat of the victims, and named Ares Gynaecothoenas (He who entertains women).

The attributes of Ares are the spear and the blazing torch. Sacred to him were the vulture, the dog, and the boar. Priests of Ares marched in front of the armies and hurled the blazing torches at the enemy as a signal for battle to begin. In art Ares is represented as a muscular, handsome man, sometimes bearded and wearing armor, sometimes clean-shaven and wearing only the helmet. He is often shown also in company with Aphrodite and their son Eros. In the decipherment of the bronze-age tablets in the Linear B script appears the name Enyalios, which later appears as an epithet or alternate name of Ares, indicating that Ares had been equated with a Mycenaean divinity.

Arete (ā-rē'tē). In mythology, wife of Alcinoüs, king of the Phaeacians. She exerted great influence over her husband and, according to her daughter Nausicaä, it was important to make a good impression on her. So Nausicaä advised Odysseus when he was swept ashore on the island of the Phaeacians. Arete received him kindly and Alcinoüs therefore welcomed him. It was Arete, according to a late mythographer, who persuaded Alcinoüs not to surrender Medea to the Colchians. Arete reminded Alcinoüs of the horrible things irate fathers had done to their daughters, and prevailed on him to refuse to surrender Medea if she were married to Jason. Arete supervised the arrangements for the wedding and frustrated the Colchians in their attempt to fetch Medea back to her father.

Arete. Daughter of Dionysius the Elder, of Syracuse (c430-367 B.C.), and Aristomache. She was the wife of her uncle, Dion, but when he was banished (366 B.C.) by her half-brother, Dionysius the Younger, she was compelled to marry one of her half-brother's friends. When Dionysius was besieged in the citadel of Syracuse by the forces of Dion who had returned to lead a revolt, Arete was kept with him as a captive. Dionysius escaped from the citadel and his forces there later were compelled to surrender. Arete came out with them and was received by her weeping husband Dion, who took her back as his wife. After the death of Dion, Arete, sailing with her mother to the Peloponnesus, was seized by Hicetas, tyrant of Leontini, and drowned.

Arete. In Greek mythology, the personification of courage, or the manly virtues.

Arethusa (ar-ē-thū'sa). In mythology, a nymph of Elis, or Achaea, and a companion and follower of Artemis. Her remarkable beauty was only a nuisance to her as she preferred the pleasures of the chase. One time when she sought refreshment after a hot day of hunting she came to the bank of a cool stream, slipped off her robes, and splashed in the waters. As she was bathing she heard a curious murmuring in the river and, frightened, leaped out onto the bank. The river-god Alpheus, in whose waters she had bathed, fell in love with her and sought to embrace her. In terror she ran naked over fields and mountains, though he cried out to her with loving words. At last she knew her strength was failing and that the river-god would overtake her. She called on Artemis to save her. The goddess responded at once. She wrapped Arethusa in a mist and swept her off to Ortygia, an island in the harbor of Syracuse in Sicily. There the goddess split open the ground and Arethusa, transformed into a fountain, gushed forth from the chasm. Alpheus plunged into the ground of Elis and, passing under the sea, came at last to Ortygia and mingled his waters with those of the fountain of Arethusa. It was said that a flower dropped into the Alpheus in Greece ultimately floated to the surface of the waters of the fountain of Arethusa in Sicily, having traveled under the sea along the path taken by Alpheus when he pursued Arethusa. Various springs in ancient Greece also bore the name Arethusa.

Aretus (a-rē'tus). Named by Homer (Iliad) as one of Priam's 50 sons. He was slain by Achilles' charioteer, Automedon, as he struggled for possession of Achilles' immortal horses after the death of Patroclus, who had been loaned the horses by Achilles.

Areus (a-rē'us). [Also: Areius.] In Greek legend, a son of Bias and Pero. With his brothers, Leodocus and Talaus, he accompanied Jason in the Argo on the quest for the Golden Fleece.

Areus. [Also: Areius.] An epithet of Zeus, meaning "Warlike." Pelops sacrificed to Zeus Areus before his race with Oenomaus. The kings of Epirus also sacrificed to Zeus Areus.

Argades (är'ga-dēz). According to tradition, one of the four sons of Ion. One of the four ancient tribes of Athens was named for him. His brothers were Aegicores, Geleon, and Hoples.

Arganthonius (är-gan-thō'ni-us). In ancient geography, a mountain ridge in Bithynia, Asia Minor, near the Propontis.

Argeiphontes (är-jī-fon'tēz) or Argiphontes. An epithet of Hermes, meaning "Slayer of Argus." It was given to him because, at the command of Zeus, he first lulled hundred-eyed Argus who was guarding Io (transformed into a heifer) to sleep with his stories and his wand, and then killed him.

Arges (är'jēz). In Greek mythology, one of the Cyclopes, a son of Gaea and Uranus. His brothers were Brontes and Steropes. See Cyclopes.

Argia (är-jī'a). In mythology, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. Some say she was the sister and wife of the river-god Inachus and the mother of Io.

Argia. According to some accounts, the mother of that Argus who, with the aid of Athena, built the Argo for Jason. Her husband was Polybus.

Argia. In Greek legend, the wife of Aristodemus, one of the Heraclidae, and the mother of Eurysthenes and Procles.

Argia. See Aegia, daughter of Adrastus.

Argillus (är-jī'lus). In ancient geography, a colony of Andros in Macedonia. It revolted from Athens c424 B.C.

Arginusae (är-ji-nū'sē). In ancient geography, a group of small islands off the coast of Asia Minor, SE of Lesbos. Near here the Athenian fleet under Conon defeated (406 B.C.) the Spartans under Callicratidas.

Argiope (är-jī'ō-pē). In mythology, the wife of Agenor and the mother by him of Cadmus, Cilix, Phineus, Phoenix, Thasus, and one daughter, Europa. Argiope is also known as Telephassa.

Argiope. A daughter of Teuthras, king of

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

Mysia. According to some accounts of the myth, Teuthras gave her to Telephus, son of Heracles and Auge, when he came to Mysia searching for news of his parents.

Argiope. A nymph, sometimes said to be the mother of Cercyon the Arcadian.

Argive Heraeum. A famous sanctuary of Hera, patron goddess of Argos, situated on a spur of Mount Euboea between Argos and Mycenae. It contains on three terraces the remains of a 6th-century Doric temple which was burned in 423 B.C., the late 5th-century Doric temple which replaced it, and a number of stoas or colonnades excavated in 1892-95 by the American School of Classical Studies at Athens under the direction of Charles Waldstein. The temple was notable for its cult statue in gold and ivory by Polyclitus. In legend, it was at this shrine that the Greek chieftains swore allegiance to Agamemnon before leaving for Troy, and Herodotus tells Solon's story of Cleobis and Biton, sons of a priestess of Hera, who, when the team assigned to draw their mother to the shrine failed to arrive, yoked themselves to the car and drew her to the Heraeum. After which, having sacrificed and feasted, they lay down, never to awake. (JJ)

Argives (är'jivz). Name often used for the Greeks of Argolis. As a result of the important part they played under their king Agamemnon in the Trojan War, their name is extended by Homer in the Iliad to all the Greeks. See Argolis.

Argo (är'gō). The name of the famous fifty-oared ship in which the Argonauts sailed with Jason to Colchis to fetch the Golden Fleece. It was built by Argus, son of Arestor, and supposedly named after him. Its prow contained a beam, supplied by Athena, from a sacred talking oak of Dodona, which occasionally gave advice to the Argonauts on their journey. According to ancient writers the Argo was the first ship that ever sailed the sea.

Argo. An ancient southern constellation, the largest in the heavens. It contains Canopus, after Sirius the brightest of the fixed stars.

Argolis (är'gō-lis). In ancient geography, a division of the Peloponnesus, Greece, surrounded by Sicyonia, Corinthia, the Aegean (with the Saronic and Argolic gulfs), Laconia, and Arcadia, and containing the plain of Argos. According to one tradition, Inachus was the first king of the land. He named the river for himself and sacrificed to Hera. Others say Phoroneus, son of Inachus, was the first king. Hera and Poseidon struggled for control of Argolis and the river-gods Inachus, Cephissus, and Asterion were named to settle their dispute. They awarded Argolis to Hera. It became a land much loved by her and contained one of her holiest sanctuaries, the Heraeum. But Poseidon was enraged by the decision of the river-gods, and dried up all the rivers of Argolis. Later, out of love for Amyclone, daughter of Danaus, he brought forth the fountain of Lerna, source of the river Lerna whose waters never cease to flow. Phoroneus collected his followers, the Pelasgians, and founded a city in Argolis which he named Phoroniceum for himself. The Argives denied that Prometheus gave man the gift of fire, although they claimed his tomb was in their country. They said Phoroneus was the discoverer of fire, and they had an eternal fire that they called "the fire of Phoroneus." The Argives made offerings to him as to a hero. The name of the city founded by him was later changed to Argos by Argus, his descendant. Gelanor was king of the land when Danaus, fleeing thither from Egypt with his 50 daughters, arrived in Argolis and claimed the throne. Gelanor, who had no idea of yielding it to him, retired on the pretext of considering his demand. During the night a wolf fell on his cattle and destroyed his prize bull. This was considered to be an omen, and the following day Gelanor gave up his throne to Danaus. The latter established his own dynasty over Argolis, raised a temple to Lycian Apollo in gratitude for the omen and dedicated an image therein. His tomb is in Argolis. The kingdom was ruled by his descendants. Acrisius and Proetus, his great-grandsons, divided it. Acrisius kept the region around the city of Argos. Proetus took over the Heraeum, the cities of Midea and Tiryns, and the region of the coast. Acrisius tried to destroy his own grandson Perseus, because of an oracle that he would die at Perseus' hands. When he learned that Perseus was returning from his adventures with the Gorgon Medusa, whose head, the Argives claimed, was buried in Argolis, Acrisius fled. The oracle was fulfilled, however, for Perseus followed him to Larisa and accidentally killed him. After this Perseus did not wish to return to his kingdom, and he exchanged Argos for the kingdom of Tiryns, ruled by his cousin Megapenthes. On his way to take up the throne Perseus founded the city of Mycenae. The region of Argos was divided into three parts for the daughters of Proetus were afflicted with madness, and Melampus, who offered to cure them, demanded that the kingdom be divided between himself, his brother Bias, and the king. In time Atreus, son of Pelops, became ruler of the Argolid city of Mycenae. He extended his power and in the time of his son Agamemnon, all of Argolis, as well as most of the rest of the Peloponnesus and the islands, was under the domination of Mycenae. In fact, Agamemnon's influence extended throughout Greece. When Paris abducted Helen and carried her off to Troy Agamemnon recruited forces from all over and led them against the Trojans to recover his brother's wife. The names Danaans (descendants of Danaus) and Argives (descendants of Argus) are those Homer habitually used in the Iliad to describe the Greeks; he never used the word "Greek." Some of the Argives returning from Troy were shipwrecked at Caphareus on the coast of Euboea. Those who escaped drowning were afflicted by cold and hunger. They prayed to their gods to save them and withdrew to a cave on the shore. Inside the cave they found an image of Dionysus. They also found there a herd of wild she-goats that had taken refuge from the storm. They killed and ate them and clothed themselves in goatskins. When they returned to Argos they took the image with them and dedicated it in the temple of Dionysus, near the house of the Argive king Adrastus who led the Seven against Thebes. Agamemnon was murdered on his return from Troy and was succeeded, after an interval in which Clytemnestra and Aegisthus held sway, by his son Orestes. In the reign of Tisamenus, son of Orestes, the Heraclidae (Dorians) invaded Argolis, basing their claim to the land on an earlier conquest by Heracles who, they said, had left it in trust for his descendants. Tisamenus and his sons were driven out and fled to Achaea. The Nelidae, descendants of Bias and Pero, fled to Athens, where two tribes, the Paeonidae and the Alcmaeonidae, were named for them. The sons of the Heraclid Temenus seized the land.

Argolis was rich in mythological associations. Here was an altar of Zeus, God of Rain, over which the allies of Polynices, in the war of the Seven against Thebes, swore they would take Thebes or die in the attempt. There was also an image of Zeus Mechaneus (Contriver) to which, some say, the Greeks made the same vow with regard to the taking of Troy. In the temple of Tyche (Fortune) in Argolis, Palamedes dedicated the dice he invented, and which helped the Greeks while away the time in their ten-year war against Troy. Among the many sanctuaries was a temple of Leto, said to have been raised by Meliboea and Amyclas, the children of Niobe who escaped the arrows of Apollo and Artemis by praying to Leto. The temple contained a statue of Leto carved by Praxiteles. In a temple of the Dioscuri stood the wooden images of the Dioscuri, their wives Hilaira and Phoebe and their sons, reputedly carved by Scyllis and Dipoenus, pupils, some say, of Daedalus. The Argives claimed Helen raised a temple of Ilithyia here, for they say when the Dioscuri had rescued her from Theseus she gave birth to a child, the daughter of Theseus. She gave the child to her sister Clytemnestra. This daughter, according to the poets, was Iphigenia.

The legend of Danaus probably explains an early influx of an eastern people who mingled with the Pelasgian inhabitants of Argolis. After the invasion of the area by the Dorians the city of Argos, thanks to its position and its access to the sea, became the chief city of the area. Other important cities of Argolis where Tiryns, Mycenae, Midea, and Nauplia.

Argonautica (är-gō-nō'ti-kā). Title of a lost poem on the adventures of the Argonauts, in the Epic Cycle, attributed by one source to Epimenides. (JJ)

Argonautica. An epic poem, extant in four books, by Apollonius Rhodius. It describes the adventures of Jason and the Argonauts on their expedition to obtain the Golden Fleece, some time before the Trojan War.

Book I: Jason, the son of Aeson, arrives before Pelias, King of Iolcus, shod in one sandal only. Pelias, having seized the throne from Aeson, had been warned by an oracle to beware of a man wearing one sandal. He therefore sends Jason on a perilous mission: to fetch the Golden Fleece from King Aëtes in Colchis, and return it to Hellas. Argus, aided by Athena, builds a ship, the Argo, and heroes and demigods from all over Greece gather to accompany Jason. Among them are: Orpheus; Polyphemos, who had fought the centaurs; Mopsus, who had learned the augury of birds from Apollo; Oileus, the father of the Locrian Ajax; Menoetius, the father of Patroclus; Canthus; Telamon, father of Ajax; Peleus, father of Achilles; Tiphys, the helmsman of the Argo; Heracles, who interrupts his labors for Eurystheus; Idmon, a seer, the son of Apollo; Polydeuces and Castor; Taenarus, Erginus, and Ancaeus, sons of Poseidon; Meleager, from Calydon; Zetes and Calais, sons of Boreas; Acastus, Pelias' own son; Argus; and many others. Atalanta wishes to join but Jason, chosen leader when Heracles refused the task, fears her presence would cause strife.

The Argo sails from Magnesia and goes to Lemnos where the Lemnian women, angered because their husbands preferred captive maidens to their lawful wives, had recently slain all the males of the island. Hypsipyle, their queen, is persuaded by her old nurse to let the Argonauts land; she invites them to remain and share her kingdom. They linger a year after which, chided by Heracles for abandoning their mission, they put to sea again. They sail by Samothrace, cross the Euxine Sea, pass through the Hellespont and land at the island of the Doliones, where they are welcomed and entertained by King Cyzicus. The night after the Argo leaves the Doliones it is blown back again by unfavorable winds, and in the darkness the Doliones mistake the Argonauts for raiders; a fight ensues, and Jason kills Cyzicus. Daylight reveals the bitter mistake. The Argonauts make sacrifices of mourning to Rhea and leave for Mysia. On the way Heracles, rowing alone because his companions are weary, breaks his oar. He goes into the forests of Mysia to find a tree from which he can fashion a new oar and Hylas, his squire, goes to look for water. Hylas is captured by a nymph of a spring, and while Heracles and Polyphemos search for him the Argonauts sail. A fierce quarrel breaks out among them over the abandonment of Heracles and Polyphemos but is quieted when Glaucus, a sea god, rises and tells them Heracles must finish his labors for Eurystheus, Polyphemos will found a city, and Hylas has become the husband of a nymph. The Argonauts then proceed to Bebrycia.

Book II: Amycus, king of the Bebryces, arrogantly challenges all travelers to box with him. Polydeuces accepts the challenge for the Argonauts and kills him. The Argonauts then fight the Bebryces and defeat them. Passing through the Bosphorus, they land on the coast opposite Bithynia, where they find Phineus, who had been endowed with the gift of prophecy by Apollo. Zeus had blinded Phineus and sent Harpies to befoul his food so that he was always at the point of starvation because Zeus was enraged that a mortal should have the gift of complete prophecy. Phineus had eagerly awaited the arrival of the Argonauts for he knew they could help him. At his request, Calais and Zetes pursue the Harpies but are prevented from killing them by Iris, messenger of Zeus, who promises that they will not hound Phineus again. Phineus gives some advice and makes certain predictions to the Argonauts, although he does not tell them complete prophecies for fear of Zeus, and they leave him. When they come to the Clashing Rocks (Symplegades) they take the advice of Phineus and send a dove to test the passage through the rocks. The rocks part for the dove and the Argo follows swiftly, aided by Athena. After passing the isle of Thyrias they push on to the land of the Mariandyni, where they are especially welcome because they had defeated the Bebryces, enemies of the Mariandyni. Idmon the seer is killed by a wild boar while they are with the Mariandyni, and Tiphys, helmsman of the Argo, also dies here. Ancaeus, a son of Poseidon who has great knowledge of the sea, takes his place. After passing Sinope, being driven by winds away from the land of the Amazons and passing the bleak home of the Chalybes, an iron feather from a bird of Ares falls and wounds Oileus. This informs them they are near Aretias, Ares' isle, where Phineus had told them to land and find help from the sea. Since it is impossible to kill Ares' birds they frighten them away by creating a fearful din with their shields, and then they land. Here they find the four sons of Phrixus and Chalciope who had been shipwrecked on their way from Colchis to Hellas. These sons, grandsons of King Aeëtes, are the help from the sea promised by Phineus. They are taken aboard and the voyage continues, passing the rock to which Prometheus is chained and from which they hear his screams as the eagle tears at his liver. At last they arrive at the Phasis, river of Colchis, and see the towers of Aeëtes' city.

Book III: Hera and Athena, watching the progress of the Argonauts from the heavens, ask Aphrodite to send her son Eros to smite Medea, Aeëtes' daughter, with love for Jason so that she, a powerful sorceress, will help the Argonauts. Hera is angry with Pelias because he does not properly honor her and she favors Jason because, when she was disguised as an old crone, he had helped her across the raging floods of the Anaurus River. Aphrodite bribes Eros with a golden ball that had once been the plaything of Zeus, and when Jason appears before Medea and her sister Chalciope, Eros sends an arrow that transfixes Medea and instantly she falls wildly in love. The eldest son of Phrixus accompanies Jason to the palace and explains his errand. Aeëtes is enraged; only the laws of hospitality prevent him from despatching the Argonauts at once, along with the sons of Phrixus whom he accuses of plotting to gain his throne. Jason reassures him and offers to fight the enemies of Aeëtes in return for the Golden Fleece. Aeëtes craftily replies that he will give Jason the Fleece if he succeeds in a trial of courage: to yoke two fire-breathing bronze bulls, plow a field with them, sow dragon's teeth, and then slay the armed men who will spring up from the teeth. Aeëtes says he asks Jason to do only what he himself has done, but secretly he is sure Jason will perish. Jason accepts the challenge. Chalciope, mother of Phrixus' sons, urges Medea to help Jason so that he will protect her sons, and Medea, consumed by love for Jason, agrees to betray her father. That night she meets Jason at the shrine of Hecate and gives him a charm which, when steeped in water and sprinkled on his body and his weapons, will render him invulnerable for a day. She tells him to throw a boulder among the armed men who will spring up from the dragon's teeth and they will slaughter each other. Jason performs all the rites Medea ordains and next day, protected by the charm, he successfully yokes the bulls and fulfills the remainder of the task Aeëtes had set for him.

Book IV: Aeëtes, enraged at Medea's treachery, plots to kill Jason. Medea, frantic with love and guilt, flees to Jason. She warns him to leave, begs him to take her with him and promises to help him secure the Golden Fleece. In return he promises to make her his wife. Together they approach the dragon that guards the Fleece. Medea lulls it to sleep with a magic song; Jason seizes the Fleece; they return to the ship and cast off at once. Aeëtes and his son Apsyrtus pursue them. Apsyrtus takes a short cut and traps the Argonauts when they stop to sacrifice to Hecate. Rather than give up the Golden Fleece, Jason proposes to surrender Medea to her brother. She reproaches him bitterly for breaking his oath to marry her and advances a plan to get rid of Apsyrtus. She carries it out by inducing Apsyrtus to come to her alone, tells him she had been carried off by force and that she wishes to return to Aeëtes. Jason, hiding nearby, leaps out and kills him and buries his body. The Colchians are then prevented from further pursuit by heavy storms sent by Hera. But Zeus is angry at the murder of Apsyrtus, and vows many woes to the Argonauts. They learn this from the Argo itself. It had been made from sacred Dodonian oak, and now speaks to them, telling them they must go to Circe to be cleansed of this murder. It is thus that they go to Aeaea and are purified by Circe, the sister of Aeëtes.

When they leave Aeaea, Hera sends Iris to smooth the seas for the Argo. They pass the island of the Sirens and are saved from succumbing to their lures by the songs of Orpheus. Thetis and the Nereids propel the Argo through Charybdis and past Scylla, and carry it in the air over the treacherous Rolling Rocks (Planctae). At length they come to Drepane (Corcyra), the land of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians. Here the Colchians catch up with them again and demand Medea but Arete, wife of Alcinous, persuades him to make this decision: if Medea is a virgin he will return her to her father, otherwise he will not separate her from her man. Arete thereupon urges Jason to marry Medea and this is done. The Golden Fleece serves as a marriage couch and Orpheus sings the marriage song. The Colchians admit defeat, and rather than face the wrath of Aeëtes they settle among the Phaeacians. After leaving the Phaeacians the Argo is blown onto the shoals of Syrtis. On the advice of some nymphs the Argonauts carry their ship on their shoulders across reefs and sand to the Tritonian Lake. Here they see the Hesperides, mourning because only the day before Heracles slew the dragon who guarded the golden apples. Here also Canthus is killed by a shepherd whose sheep he is trying to steal, and Mopsus the seer dies as the result of stepping on a poisonous serpent. Triton then appears to the Argonauts and guides them out of the lake to the sea. They stop at Crete where Medea brings about the death of bronze Talos, the guardian of Crete who walks around its shores three times a day; they sail by Aegina and at last return safely, carrying the Golden Fleece, to Pagasae, the port where the Argo was built.

Argonautica. The title of a Latin epic poem in eight books, by the Roman poet Valerius Flaccus (1st century A.D.), recounting the legendary adventures of the Argonauts. (JJ)

Argonauts (är'gō-nōts). The Greek heroes and demigods who sailed with Jason on the Argo to fetch the Golden Fleece from Colchis. Various writers have drawn up varying lists of Argonauts, until finally the roster, which originally may have included only Minyans from Iolcus, Orchomenus, and Pylus, came to include representatives from all over Greece. Thus, every part of Greece shared in the expedition (which may have had an historical basis in an early trade venture), and therefore shared the glory and any future advantages which might derive from it. Following is the list of Argonauts given by Apollonius Rhodius in his Argonautica:

- Acastus, son of King Pelias of Iolcus
- Admetus, prince of Pherae, son of Pheres
- Aethalides, son of Hermes
- Amphidamas, son of Aleus, from Arcadia
- Amphion, son of Hyperasius, from Pellene
- Ancaeus, son of Lycurgus, from Arcadia
- Ancaeus, a steersman, son of Poseidon, from Tegea
- Areus, a son of Bias
- Argus, builder of the Argo
- Asterion, son of Cometes
- Asterius, brother of Amphion
- Augeas, son of Helius, from Elis
- Butes, son of Teleon, from Athens
- Canthus, son of Canethus, from Euboea
- Calais, winged son of Boreas and Orithyia
- Castor, one of the Dioscuri, from Sparta
- Cepheus, son of Aleus, from Arcadia
- Clytius, son of Eurytus, from Oechalia
- Coronus, son of Caeneus, a Lapith from Thessaly
- Echion, herald of the Argonauts, son of Hermes
- Erginus, son of Poseidon, from Orchomenus
- Eribotes, son of Teleon, from Athens
- Erytus, brother of Echion, from Alope
- Euphemus, son of Poseidon, from Taenarus
- Eurydamas, son of Ctimenus, a Dolopian
- Eurytion, son of Irus
- Heracles, son of Zeus, from Tiryns
- Hylas, squire of Heracles
- Idas, son of Aphareus, from Arene
- Idmon, a seer, son of Apollo, from Argos
- Iphiclus, son of Thestius, from Aetolia
- Iphiclus, son of Phylacus, from Phylace
- Iphitus, brother of Clytius
- Iphitus, son of Naubolus, from Phocis
- Jason, son of Aeson, captain of the expedition
- Laocoön, uncle of Meleager
- Leodocus, brother of Areus
- Lynceus, brother of Idas
- Meleager, son of Oeneus, from Calydon
- Menoetius, son of Actor
- Mopsus, son of Ampycus, a Lapith
- Nauplius, son of Clytonaeus, from Argos
- Oileus, father of Ajax the Lesser, from Locris
- Orpheus, the musician and poet, from Thrace

Argoön (är'gō-on). A harbor on the island of Aethalia (Elba) into which, as legend would have it, the Argonauts put on their roundabout way home from Colchis. They gave it this name in honor of their ship, the Argo. The site is now occupied by Portoferraio, the chief city in the island of Elba.

Argos (är'gos, -gos). Town in S Greece, in the district anciently called Argolis, in the Peloponnesus. It is situated about nine miles NW of Nauplia and the coast. According to legend, an ancient city was founded here by Phoroneus, son of Inachus, and his Pelasgian followers. He named it Phoronicum and sacrificed to Hera. Argus, a descendant of Phoroneus, changed the name of the city to Argos. It is regarded as the oldest city in Greece, and was one of the cities most beloved by Hera, who, the Argives claimed, was born in Argos. The region of Argolis fell under the domination of Danaus who fled hither from Egypt with his 50 daughters. He established his dynasty in Argolis and erected a temple to Lycian Apollo. His descendants Acrisius and Proetus partitioned the kingdom. Acrisius became ruler of the region around Argos. In a later generation Perseus, grandson of Acrisius, exchanged the kingdom of Argos for Tiryns. Argos was the home of Adrastus, father-in-law of Tydeus and Polynices and the leader of the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. By the time of the Trojan War Argos was under the influence of the ruler of Mycenae, of the dynasty of Pelops, and at the request of Agamemnon, its king, sent many Argives against Troy. They won great distinction under their leader Diomedes. The word "Argives" was habitually used by Homer in the Iliad to designate the Greeks. The great kingdom over which Agamemnon had ruled was diminished in the reign of his grandson, Tisamenus, by the Dorian invasion, the so-called return of the Heraclidae, for the Dorians based their claim to Argos on ancient conquests by Heracles, who left it in trust for his descendants. The Heraclid Temenus became ruler of Argos, but such was the Argive love of liberty, according to some, that the king had but little power.

As a Dorian city Argos, thanks to its position in the plain (the name means "plain"), and its access to the sea, became the dominant city in this area of the Peloponnesus. Under the rule of King Pheidon, in the early 7th century B.C., Argos was the equal of any of the city-states of Greece. Pheidon coined the first Greek money in Aegina. Argos was a center of trade and in this period controlled Mycenae and Tiryns, destroyed Asine, and defeated the Spartans at Hysiae (669 B.C.). Pheidon captured Olympia from Elis and returned the management of the Olympic Games to Pisa. With the rise of Sparta the power of Argos declined, and she was unable to assist Pisa when Elis attacked and won back control of Olympia. In the 6th and early 5th centuries the power of Argos was reduced by Cleomenes I, king of Sparta, who defeated her at Sepeia (c494 B.C.) in her own territory. Six thousand Argives perished when Cleomenes set fire to the sacred grove in which they had taken refuge.

The city itself would have fallen at this time if it had not been for the bravery of the poetess Telesilla. From that time forward, though remaining independent, a dangerous enemy or a valued friend, Argos was a second-rate power. Enmity toward Sparta caused the Argives to refuse to submit to Spartan leadership when Greece was threatened by the Persians and the city-state played no part in the Persian War. However, she could not prevent her former subject-cities of Mycenae and Tiryns from sending men to help the Greeks at Thermopylae and Plataea. After the Persians had been driven out of Greece, Argos attacked and destroyed Mycenae and Tiryns. Some say the attack was out of jealousy for the renown they had won in the Persian War. Others say it was because they had sheltered slaves escaped from Argos. Following the Persian Wars, Argos recovered some of her former power. A democratic constitution was adopted and an alliance with Athens against Sparta was concluded. With her allies, Athens, Corinth, and Mantinea, Argos was defeated by the Spartans at the first battle of Mantinea (418 B.C.). Argive hatred of the Spartans persisted and Argos took part on the side of Thebes in the defeat of Sparta at the second Battle of Mantinea (362 B.C.). In 229 Argos joined the Achaean League against Macedonia. The League was defeated (146 B.C.) by the Romans. Argos fell under Roman domination and enjoyed a new prosperity.

The citadel of Argos was on a rocky hill to the west, called Larissa. Cut into the flank of the hill are the remains of an ancient theater that seated 20,000 spectators. The upper tiers of seats of the cavea are rock-hewn; below these are tiers of masonry. Twenty tiers in all survive, the lowest consisting of thrones of honor. There are remains of a Roman stage and of several modifications of the Greek stage structure. An underground passage ran from behind the proscenium to the middle of the orchestra. Up the hill from the theater was a temple of Aphrodite. Near the summit was an ancient temple of Hera Acraea (Of the Height). North of the city, near the summit of the hill called Aspis, was a sanctuary of Pythian Apollo and Athena. In the sanctuary was an oracle. Oracular responses were given in the following manner: each month a lamb was sacrificed in the night; a woman forbidden to cohabit with a man drank the blood of the lamb and then prophesied. In this sanctuary Diomedes is said to have dedicated an image of Athena Oxyderces (Bright-eyed) in gratitude to the goddess for clearing the mists from his eyes when he was wounded in the Trojan War. Near the citadel were buried the heads of the sons of Aegyptus, who were killed by their brides on their wedding night. Their bodies were buried at nearby Lerna. Argos was noted for its school of sculpture, in which Ageladas (late 6th century B.C.) and Polyclitus (5th century B.C.) were outstanding examples.

Argus (är'gus). In Greek mythology, a son of Niobe and Zeus. He reigned in the Peloponnesus and named it Argos after himself. His great grandson, the son of Agenor, who bore the same name and was called Argus Panoptes (All-seeing), had a hundred eyes placed all over his body. No matter how many of his eyes were resting, two were always awake. He killed a bull that was ravaging Arcadia and wore its hide. He came upon the monster Echidna while she was sleeping and killed her. It was Argus Panoptes to whom Hera had given the task of guarding Io, after the latter had been transformed into a heifer by Zeus to protect himself from the jealousy of Hera. Argus guarded Io night and day. At length Zeus sent Hermes to rescue her. Hermes beguiled Argus with many stories and songs, accompanying himself on the syrinx, until at last every one of Argus' hundred eyes fell asleep. Hermes touched them with his magic sleep-inducing wand, lest they open suddenly, and then cut off Argus' head. Hera placed the hundred eyes of Argus in the tail of the bird sacred to her, the peacock, where they make a brilliant display and perpetuate the memory of Argus.

Argus. In Greek legend, a son of Phrixus and Chalciope, and the grandson of Aeëtes, king of Colchis. He tried to persuade Aeëtes to give Jason the Golden Fleece. See Phrontis.

Argus. He built the Argo for Jason, according to tradition, and sailed in her on the quest for the Golden Fleece. His parentage and nationality are variously given.

Argus/Aricia

Argus. Son of Jason and Medea. See Alcimedea.

Argus. In the Odyssey, Odysseus' hound. He recognized Odysseus when he returned to his home after an absence of twenty years, wagged his tail once, and died.

Argyra (är'ji-rä). A nymph of a spring of the same name in Achaea. She loved the beautiful youth Selemnus, but her love for him died when his beauty faded. See Selemnus.

Argyrotocus (är'gi-rō-tok'sus). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Lord of the Silver Bow." It was given to him because of the silver bow and arrows made for him by Hephaestus with which he punished the wicked and arrogant.

Aria (ä'ri-a, a-rī'a). A nymph. She was loved by Apollo and bore him a son Miletus who, according to tradition, founded the city of that name in Caria.

Ariadne (ar-i-ad'nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Minos, king of Crete, and Pasiphaë. She was the sister of Acacallis, Androgeus, Catreus, Glaucus, and Phaedra. When Theseus came to Crete as one of the 14 Athenian youths and maidens who were sent as tribute to Crete every nine years to be thrown to the Minotaur, Ariadne fell in love with him. She offered to help him overcome the Minotaur and to find his way out of the Labyrinth if he would promise to take her back to Athens and marry her. Theseus agreed. Ariadne gave him a ball of golden thread which she had obtained from Daedalus, the builder of the Labyrinth in which the Minotaur was housed. According to some accounts, she held the end of the thread, but others say Theseus was instructed to fasten the end of it to the door post of the Labyrinth. As he penetrated the Labyrinth Theseus unwound the ball of thread. Instructed by Ariadne, he seized the Minotaur by the hair and, as some say, killed him with a sword given to him by Ariadne, and sacrificed him to Poseidon. He then found his way out of the Labyrinth by rewinding the golden thread until he came again to the entrance. Ariadne who was awaiting him led the Athenians to the ships which had been made ready, and all escaped. On the island of Naxos, where they stopped, Ariadne fell asleep. When she awoke Theseus and the Athenians had sailed away.

Some say that Dionysus appeared to Theseus in a dream and warned him to leave Ariadne, and this was what caused him to forget his promise. In any case, while Ariadne wept alone and demanded vengeance on Theseus, Dionysus came to her. He fell in love with her and married her immediately. Later he set the golden marriage crown, made by Hephaestus, among the stars. Zeus made Ariadne immortal. She bore Dionysus many children, including Oenopion, Thoas, Staphylus, Latromis, Euanthes, and Taupopolus. But some say Dionysus did not marry Ariadne. On the contrary, he asked Artemis to slay her because she had profaned his shrine with Theseus. And others say that Ariadne was put ashore at her own request and that the fleet of Theseus was blown away in a violent storm, and when Theseus returned he found Ariadne had died. Ariadne was given divine honors. Festivals were held for her at Naxos, in which women first wailed to commemorate her abandonment by Theseus, and then reveled to celebrate her marriage to Dionysus. In the palace at Crete there was an elaborate mosaic floor, said to have been laid out by Daedalus, which was made for Ariadne to dance upon.

Ariadne's Crown. See Corona Borealis.

Ariana (ar-i-ā'nā, ar-i-an'a). In ancient geography, a region in Asia, of vague boundaries, extending from Media on the W to the Indus River on the E, and from Hyrcania and Bactriana on the N to the Persian Gulf and Arabian Sea on the S.

Aricia (a-rish'a). [Modern, Ariccia.] An ancient Latin town, situated in the Alban Hills, 16 miles SE of Rome. There was a grove sacred to Diana (Artemis) to which Artemis brought Hippolytus after he had been restored to life by Asclepius. The grove surrounded a lake and was itself set off by steep cliffs. In the grove was an ancient oak tree, the branches of which were sacred. If a runaway slave, fled to the grove for sanctuary, chanced to break off one of the branches of the oak then the priest of the temple of Diana was compelled to fight him, and if he was killed in the fight the slave became priest. All the priests were drawn from runaway slaves, and each priest obtained his position by killing his predecessor. In later times the temple of Diana Nemo-rensis was one of the most famous and wealthy in Italy. The Romans also said that there was a nymph Aricia, the mother of a Virbius said to be the son of Hippolytus.

Aries (ā'ri-ēz). The first sign of the zodiac—the Ram—which the sun enters at the vernal equinox, March 21, and leaves April 20. Also, a zodiacal constellation. Owing to the precession of the equinoxes, the sign Aries has moved completely out of the constellation of the same name, and is now in the constellation Pisces.

Arimaspians (ar-i-mas'pi-anz). In classical mythology, a one-eyed people of Scythia. They were at war with the Griffins whose gold they sought.

Ariminum (ä-rim'i-num). [Modern name, Rimini.] In ancient geography, a town of N Italy, situated on the Adriatic Sea. It was an Umbrian, then a Gallic settlement, and became a Roman colony in 268 B.C. It was the starting point of Julius Caesar in the civil war of 49 B.C. As the terminus of the Via Flaminia which, coming from Rome, here reached the Adriatic Sea, and of the Via Aemilia, it was of great military importance, and long dominated communications between Rome and upper Italy. Among the Roman antiquities are an amphitheater, triumphal arch, and the marble bridge of Augustus across the Marecchia River. The bridge is one of the most perfect of ancient bridges.

Arimnestus (ar-im-nēs'tus). Plataean general who commanded the Plataeans at the battles of Marathon (490 B.C.) and Plataea (479 B.C.). According to tradition, before the battle of Plataea the Greeks were in some doubt as to whether they should withdraw their forces to Attica, in obedience to an oracle of Delphi that seemed to command it. Arimnestus was visited by Zeus in a dream. The god told him the Greeks had misinterpreted the oracle, for the precinct of Eleusinian Demeter where the oracle told them to fight was at Plataea, not at Eleusis as the Greeks thought. When Arimnestus awoke he called the elders to him and told them of the dream. They searched for a sanctuary of Eleusinian Demeter, and at last found a very ancient one nearby, near Hy-siae, at the foot of Mount Cithaeron. This site they found well adapted for battle, and thanks to the dream of Arimnestus, some say, the Greeks remained and defeated the Persians at Plataea.

Ariobarzanes (ar'i-ō-bär-zā'nēz). Soldier and satrap of the Persian empire who, after the battle of Gaugamela (331 B.C.), secured the pass through the so-called Persian Gates. Alexander the Great was able to force the pass and continue to the east only by stratagem.

Ariobarzanes I (of Cappadocia). [Also: Ariobarzanes I Philoromaeus.] King of Cappadocia; fl. about the beginning of the 1st century B.C. He was several times expelled by Mithridates VI of Pontus and restored by the Romans.

Ariobarzanes II (of Cappadocia). [Also: Ariobarzanes II Philopator.] King of Cappadocia, son of Ariobarzanes I, whom he succeeded c63 B.C.

Ariobarzanes III (of Cappadocia). [Also: Ariobarzanes III Eusebes, Ariobarzanes III Philoromaeus.] King of Cappadocia; died 42 B.C. He was a son of Ariobarzanes II, whom he succeeded c51 B.C. He aided Pompey against Julius Caesar in the civil war but was pardoned by Caesar. He was put to death by Cassius.

Ariobarzanes I (of Pontus). Satrap of Pontus; fl. 5th century B.C. He was the father of Mithridates I of Pontus.

Ariobarzanes II (of Pontus). King of Pontus (363–337 B.C.); son and successor of Mithridates I of Pontus. He revolted (362 B.C.) against Artaxerxes II of Persia, and founded the independent kingdom of Pontus.

Ariobarzanes III (of Pontus). King of Pontus

Arion/Aristaeus

(266–c240 B.C.); son of Mithridates III of Pontus.

Arion (a-rī'on). A reputed son of Poseidon and the nymph Oneaea, but more likely the son of Cycleus, of Methymna in Lesbos. He was a skilled musician from Lesbos (fl. 628–625 B.C.). He journeyed from Corinth to Taenarus in Sicily and there won such great riches for his playing on the lyre that it is said the sailors on the ship bearing him home decided to kill him and steal his treasure. He asked to be allowed to sing one song before death, and sang so beautifully that dolphins gathered around the ship to listen. On finishing his song he leaped into the sea. A dolphin bore him up on its back and speedily took him to Corinth, arriving there before the ship. When the sailors were questioned about Arion when they came to Corinth, they said he was still in Sicily. On being confronted with him in person they acknowledged their guilt and were put to death. Apollo is said to have placed an image of Arion and his lyre among the stars. According to legend, Arion invented the dithyramb, a choral song in honor of Dionysus, and taught it to Corinthian choruses.

Arion. In Greek legend, a fabulous horse. It was said to be the offspring of Poseidon by Demeter (or, in other accounts, Gaea or a Harpy) who to escape him had metamorphosed herself into a mare. It was successively owned by Copreus, Oncus, Heracles, and Adrastus. It possessed marvelous powers of speech, and its right feet were those of a man.

Ariovistus (ar'i-ō-vis'tus). Germanic leader, active from c71–58 B.C. He was a chief of the Suevi, who crossed the Rhenus (Rhine) and invaded Gaul c71 B.C. to aid the Sequani, conquering the Aedui in 61 B.C. He was made an ally of Rome by Julius Caesar, but on an appeal by the Gauls Caesar engaged him in battle at Vesontio (now Besançon, France) and finally defeated him near what is now Mulhouse, France, in 58 B.C.

Arisbe (a-ris'bē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Merops, the seer. She was the first wife of Priam, king of Troy, and bore him a son, Aesacus. After the birth of Aesacus Priam gave Arisbe to Hyrtacus as his wife, and she was the mother by him of Asius and Nisus. She lived outside Troy on the slopes of Mount Ida. Helenus, a son of Priam and Hecuba, left Troy after the death of Paris and went to the town in the Troad named for Arisbe.

Arisbe. According to some accounts, the daughter of Teucer and the wife of Dardanus. She came from Crete and, some say, she gave her name to the town of Arisbe in the Troad. Others say the town was named for the first wife of Priam, and some say the name of the wife of Dardanus was Batia.

Aristaeum (ar-is-tē'um). In ancient geography, a city near Mount Haemus, in Thrace. It was said to have been founded by Aristaeus during his travels about the earth, and after founding this last city he disappeared.

Aristaeus (ar-is-tē'us). In Greek mythology, a son of Apollo and Cyrene. He was born in Cyrene, whither his mother had been brought by Apollo, and was reared by nymphs who taught him how to make cheese, to build beehives, and to raise the cultivated olive. From Libya he went to Boeotia, where Apollo took him to Chiron's cave in order that he might be instructed in the Mysteries. The Muses taught him the arts of healing and of prophecy and when he had grown to manhood they married him to Autonoë, by whom he became the father of Actaeon and Macris, the nymph who cared for the infant Dionysus. Instructed by the Delphic oracle to visit Ceos, he immediately sailed to that island and found it suffering from a plague. This plague was caused by the Dog Star because the murderers of that Icarius who was the first to make wine were hiding among the Ceans and had not been punished. Aristaeus lifted the plague by raising altars to Zeus, on which he offered sacrifices, and by finding and slaying the murderers of Icarius. Ever after this Zeus caused the cooling summer winds to blow on Greece and the islands for forty days following the rising of the Dog Star. The islanders annually offered sacrifices to appease the Dog Star, and gave divine honors to Aristaeus in gratitude for relief from the plague. From Ceos Aristaeus went to Arcadia. In the valley of the Peneus River near Tempe he came on Eurydice, wife of Orpheus. He attempted to ravish her and she fled. In so doing she stepped on a serpent and died of its bite. Shortly afterward, all of Aristaeus' bees died. He appealed to the naiads of the Peneus River and they advised him to consult the sea-god Proteus. He caught Proteus as he slept on the island of Pharos; seized the god and held him fast through all the changes he underwent in an effort to escape from Aristaeus' clasp. At last Proteus resumed his own form and told Aristaeus his bees had died because he had caused the death of Eurydice. Aristaeus now appealed to his mother. She told him to raise altars to the dryads, companions of Eurydice, and to offer sacrifices of bulls and heifers, and to leave the animals' carcasses at the altars. After nine days Aristaeus returned; a swarm of bees rose from the decaying carcasses. He captured the swarm and put it into a hive. Later Aristaeus sailed to Sardinia and taught all he had learned from the nymphs and Muses to the inhabitants there, as he had done wherever he went. He also visited Sicily and Thrace and taught the arts of agriculture there. He founded the city of Aristaeum in Thrace and finally disappeared. As the deity who presides over hunting and herds and the domestic arts of beekeeping, wine-making, and olive-growing, he was worshiped in Thessaly, Boeotia, and various other parts of Greece, as well as in the islands, in Cyrene, Thrace, Sicily, and Sardinia.

Aristagoras (ar-is-tag'ō-ras). Tyrant of Miletus (fl. c500 B.C.). He was the nephew and son-in-law of Histiaeus, former tyrant of Miletus who was, under the guise of friendship, kept a virtual prisoner at the court of Darius at Susa. Aristagoras thought to enrich himself by restoring some exiled leaders to Naxos, and secured the aid of the Persian satrap for this venture by proposing to him the conquest of the Cyclades and Euboea, with the capture of Naxos as the first step in this program. He assured the Persian that such a conquest would be easy and on gaining the consent of Darius for his expedition, he set out at its head to carry through his purpose. But the expedition was a complete failure. On the way Aristagoras quarreled with the Persian admiral who was sent to help him, and as a result of the quarrel the admiral warned the Naxians of the coming attack. Thus forewarned, they made preparations and were able to withstand Aristagoras and his forces. After four months of an expensive and useless siege he was compelled to retire. Rather than winning the island and the plaudits of the Persians he had wasted their money, and incurred the distrust of the Persian satrap and the enmity of the Persian admiral. To recoup his fortunes he resolved to foment a revolt of the Ionian cities which were already seething with unrest under the tyrants the Persians had placed over them. At this point, according to Herodotus, a messenger came to him from his uncle Histiaeus in Susa. The only message he bore was a request that the courier's head be shaved. Aristagoras did so, and on the messenger's scalp was pricked a command from Histiaeus to raise revolt in Ionia. This fitted in with the plans of Aristagoras to save himself from the wrath of the Persians because of the failure of the Naxian venture. He stirred the Ionians to revolt, and to make them the more eager to throw off the Persian yoke he called on the cities to throw off their tyrants, and he himself stepped down as tyrant of Miletus. He journeyed to Sparta to ask the help of Cleomenes. He showed Cleomenes a map of the world engraved on bronze, the first map Cleomenes had ever seen, and pointed out to him the rich Persian empire it would be so easy for him to conquer. But when Cleomenes asked him how long a journey it was from Ionia to Susa and heard that it was three months, he told Aristagoras to quit Sparta before sunset. Aristagoras did not give up. He returned as a suppliant to Cleomenes' house and attempted to bribe him. As Herodotus tells the story, Cleomenes listened as Aristagoras raised the bribe from ten to 50 talents. At that point the nine-year-old daughter of Cleomenes appealed to her father to send the stranger away before he was corrupted, and so Aristagoras lost again. He went next to Athens and Eretria, where he was more successful and won some support. But Aristagoras had neither the courage nor the ability to weld the Ionians into a united fighting force. The Persians gathered their forces and began to win systematically. In the face of their successes Aristagoras gathered his leaders together and discussed with them whether it would be wise to flee to Sardinia and establish a colony there, or to carry on his operations in Thrace. In the end he went to Thrace and was killed while besieging a city there (497 B.C.).

Aristarchus of Samos (ar-is-tār'kus; sā'mos). [Also: Aristarchos.] Greek astronomer and mathematician of the Alexandrian school; fl. c280–264 B.C. According to Archimedes, he was the first to maintain the heliocentric theory of the universe and the rotation of the earth on its axis. In order to reconcile the apparent immobility of the fixed stars with the revolution of the earth around the sun, he assumed that the sphere of the fixed stars was incomparably greater than that containing the earth's orbit. That is, the universe conceived by him was incomparably greater than that conceived by his predecessors. In his only extant treatise, On the Sizes and Distances of the Sun and Moon, he gave a scientific method to make these measurements. His results were grossly inaccurate, but the method was sound. This treatise is also of great mathematical interest because it contains the calculation of ratios which are in fact trigonometrical ratios. The discovery of an improved sun dial (a concave hemispherical surface with a gnomon in the center) was ascribed to him. He also wrote on vision, light, and colors.

Aristarchus of Samothrace (sam'ō-thrās). [Also: Aristarchos; called Coryphaeus of Grammarians.] Greek grammarian and critic; fl. at Alexandria, c217–c145 B.C.; died on Cyprus. He was a leading Homeric scholar of antiquity, now considered to have been one of the greatest philologists of the ancient world. A student of the school of Aristophanes of Byzantium, and the successor (c153 B.C.) of Apollonius as librarian at Alexandria, he was the founder of a school of philology known as Aristarcheans. A prolific commentator on and editor of Hesiod, Pindar, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and other Greeks, his version of the Homeric language and the arrangement into 24 books of the Iliad and Odyssey is a basis of many modern texts.

Aristarchus of Tegea (tē'jē-ā). Greek tragic poet of Tegea; contemporary of Euripides (c480–406 B.C.). He is said to have written 70 tragedies, of which the titles of two survive.

Ariste (ar-is'tē). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Best." Wooden images of Artemis Ariste stood on the road to the Academy near Athens.

Aristeas (a-ris'tē-as). [Sometimes called the Wandering Jew.] Greek poet, assigned to various periods, from the 6th century B.C. to the time of Homer. The accounts of his life are legendary; he is represented as a magician who rose after death, and whose soul could occupy or abandon his body at will. It is said that he dropped dead one day in a fuller's shop in Proconnesus. The fuller shut up his shop and went to gather the relatives of Aristeas. On their way to the shop to recover his body, they were met by a man who assured them that the poet was not dead, that he had just met him on the road to Cyzicus and spoken with him. The fuller was equally positive that Aristeas had died in his shop and the party proceeded there. When they arrived Aristeas had vanished. Seven years later he reappeared in Proconnesus and it was then, inspired by Apollo, that he was reputed to have written the epic poem Arimaspea, in three books, which described the one-eyed Arimaspi and contained revelations about the Hyperboreans and the gold-guarding Griffins. The information on these subjects, he claimed, was revealed to him while he was in a trance. After this Aristeas disappeared a second time. He turned up at Metapontum in Sicily and commanded the inhabitants to set up an altar to Apollo because, he said, Apollo had visited Metapontum alone of all the Italian cities, and he, Aristeas, had accompanied the god, in the form of a crow. Therefore, the Metapontines should set up a statue of Aristeas of Proconnesus near the altar of Apollo. Having said this, Aristeas vanished. The Metapontines, on the advice of the oracle of Delphi, carried out his instructions.

Aristeas or Aristaeos. [Surnamed the Elder.] Greek mathematician; fl. about the end of the 4th century B.C. He collaborated with Euclid in the composition of the "treasury of analysis," a geometrical method for advanced students. He wrote on the "comparison of the five figures" (i.e., the five regular solids) and proved that "the same circle circumscribes both the pentagon of the dodecahedron and the triangle of the icosahedron."

hedron when both solids are inscribed in the same sphere." He also wrote five books of solid loci connected with the conics (that is, a treatise on conics regarded as loci). This treatise is now usually considered by historians of science to be more important and more original than the one written later by Euclid on the same subject, although its object and point of view were different. Aristias called the conics, respectively, sections of right-angled, acute-angled, and obtuse-angled cones, and he discussed the three-line and four-line locus.

Aristias (a-ris'ti-as). Greek tragic poet; son of Pratinas and a younger contemporary of Aeschylus (525-456 B.C.).

Aristides (ar-is'ti-dēz). [Also: Aristeides; sur-named the Just.] Athenian statesman and general, born c530 B.C.; died probably at Athens, c468 B.C. He was the son of Lysimachus, a man of modest circumstances of the tribe of Antiochus in Athens. As a great admirer of Lycurgus the Spartan lawgiver and, after the expulsion of the Pisistratidae from Athens, a particular friend of Cleisthenes, grandson of the tyrant of Sicyon, he had a leaning toward aristocracy. A conservative and an advocate of Athens as a land power, he was continually opposed by Themistocles. Some say they had been rivals from boyhood. He came to oppose Themistocles almost as a matter of principle for, he said, the good of Athens. He was aware that he made this a practice. Once he successfully opposed Themistocles in a matter that was really advantageous to the public, and remarked, "The affairs of the Athenians will never prosper unless they throw Themistocles and myself in the Barathron (a deep pit into which condemned persons were hurled)." He was appointed public treasurer and found that the public funds had been mishandled, especially by Themistocles. The latter raised a hue and cry against him and, some say, would have had him condemned but the court (the Areopagus) was so aroused that they not only caused the charge to be dropped but got Aristides reelected chief treasurer. Aristides now pretended he had been too strict and closed his eyes, apparently, to those who pilfered the public money. Those who profited thereby praised him and urged that he be reelected. He now came before the people and said that when, as an honest man, he did right and looked out for their interests, he was abused and condemned, but when he let robbers steal the public monies he was praised. He added, "I am more ashamed of the present honor than I was of the former disgrace, and it is with indignation and concern that I see you esteem it more meritorious to oblige bad men than to take proper care of the public revenue."

Aristides was one of the ten generals sent by the Athenians to repel the Persians at Marathon (490 B.C.), and there fought with valor. The practice, some say, was to rotate the command among the ten generals, so that each commanded a day in turn. Some say that realizing the ability of Miltiades, when his day came to command Aristides voluntarily yielded it to Miltiades, and by his example caused the other generals to do the same.

He was chosen archon eponymus in 489 B.C. The people admired him most for his justice, and gave him the name "the Just." This name made him first loved, and then envied. Because he was so much in demand as a mediator, Themistocles accused him of usurping judicial power and sought to have him ostracized. (Ostracism was a means of removing from the city, for a stated time, any man who seemed to be becoming too powerful or who appeared capable of causing disorder in the state; it was not a punishment for crimes. According to the system, 6000 votes must be cast or the total voting was void. Of the 6000, the man whose name was written on the greatest number of ostraka—a tile or broken piece of pottery—was banished for ten years.) When the day for voting arrived, Aristides was in the marketplace where the votes were cast and counted. An illiterate citizen, unaware who he was, approached him and asked him to write the name Aristides on his ostrakon. He was asked whether Aristides had ever injured him in any way. "No," said the citizen, "I don't even know him, but I'm tired of hearing everyone call him 'the Just'." Aristides made no reply, but took the shell and wrote his own name on it as requested. He received the most votes and was banished (483 B.C.). A number of ostraka inscribed with Aristides' name, ballots used in this voting, have been found in the Agora excavations.

Themistocles also wished him banished because Aristides did not agree with his policy of building up the Athenian fleet. When he was leaving Athens he prayed that the people of his state would never see the day when they would be forced to remember him. When Xerxes marched into Greece (480 B.C.) all who had been banished by ostracism were recalled. Aristides did all he could to encourage resistance to the Persians, contrary to the fears of some who thought that since he had been ill-treated by the Athenians he might go over to the Persians. After the burning of Athens the Greek forces withdrew to Salamis. There Themistocles wished them to make a fight with their fleet, as the advantage in the narrow strait would lie with the Greek ships, as against the Persian ships. But the Spartans wished to withdraw to the isthmus and make a stand there. While they debated the Persians surrounded Salamis. Aristides, at great peril, sailed through the Persian fleet to Salamis and called Themistocles from the council. He urged that they forget their personal quarrel in the face of the common danger and told him there was now no question of withdrawing to the isthmus, as the Greeks were surrounded. In the battle that followed, he took a force to the island of Psyttalia and wiped out the Persian garrison there. After the Greek success at Salamis (480 B.C.) he opposed sailing to the Hellespont to cut off the Persian retreat. On the contrary, he was eager to carry the war against the enemy vigorously to the end that the Persians would the sooner be driven out of Greece, rather than to destroy their means of exit and force them to ravage Greece. Xerxes left at once to return to Persia. Mardonius was left in command of a vast land force of Persians and their allies. He sought to separate the Athenians from their allies by bribes. The Spartans heard of this and sent urgent envoys to Athens, offering in their turn what amounted to bribes if the Athenians would stay in the war and help them to resist the Persians. Aristides was grieved that the Spartans would think the Athenians capable of such deeds.

To their envoys he said, "The people of Athens would not, for all the gold either above or under the ground, barter the liberties of Greece." As for the envoys of Mardonius, he pointed to the sun and said, "As long as this luminary shines, so long will the Athenians carry on war with the Persians, for their country which has been laid waste and for their temples which have been profaned and burned."

At the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.), he commanded 8000 Athenian foot soldiers. In drawing up the battle line both the Tegeans and the Athenians claimed the honor of the left wing and hot words were uttered by both in defense of their claims. Aristides addressed Pausanias, the Spartan general in command, "The post neither gives valor nor takes it away, and whatever post you assign us, we will endeavor to do honor to it, and take care to reflect no disgrace upon our former achievements. For we are come hither not to quarrel with our allies, but to fight with our enemies." His words restored calm and Pausanias awarded the left wing to the Athenians. After Plataea, he was a commander at Byzantium (c479 B.C.) and succeeded Pausanias as admiral after the Ionian revolt. After the Persian war he won the friendship and support of the Greek allies of Athens through his mildness and fair treatment. He was sent to assess the tax that the members must pay to support the Delian League, and won the gratitude of all by the fairness of his assessments. He drew up the articles of alliance between the Greek states, and confirmed them for Athens with an oath. But he yielded to expediency later on the occasion of transferring the treasure of the League from Delos to Athens, though this was contrary to the treaties. In agreeing to the change he said, "It is not just, but it is expedient."

To the end of his days he enjoyed honor and though he wielded vast power, especially in financial matters, he spent his life in relative poverty. The circumstances and whereabouts of his death are obscure. A monument was erected to him at the public expense at Phalerum. Athens continued to honor him by giving dowries for his two daughters and a sum of money, a pension, and land to his son. He was noted for his moderation, his steady service to the state, and for his justice. He was neither elated with honors nor unduly cast down by failures. He refused to seek support by granting favors, and he treated his enemies with justice. Once, it is said, he prosecuted a man and the judges, influenced because it was Aristides who prosecuted, were about to pass sentence without giving the accused a hearing. Aristides sprang up and insisted that he be heard before sentence was passed. Another time he was the mediator between two citizens. One of them sought to influence him by saying the other had done many injuries to Aristides. He replied, "Don't speak of that, but tell me what injury he has done you, for it is your cause that I am judging, not my own." The following verses are from The Seven Against Thebes, the tragedy by Aeschylus:

"To be and not to seem, is this man's choice;

Reaping the fruits that in a rich mind grow,

Whence sage advice and noble actions flow."

When they were recited upon the stage everyone in the audience looked at Aristides as being the man whose reputation for justice and service best exemplified the sentiments of the verses. According to Plutarch, "Plato, among all that were accounted great and illustrious men in Athens, judges none but Aristides worthy of real esteem."

Aristides of Miletus. [Also: Aristeides.] Greek writer; fl. c150–100 B.C. He was the author of the Milesiaca or Milesian Tales, so-named because of their setting, considered to have been the first Greek prose romance. Translated into the Latin, these stories were especially admired by the Romans.

Aristides of Thebes. [Also: Aristeides.] Greek painter; fl. 4th century B.C. He did battle scenes, hunting scenes, and other works, prized by Alexander and others for their expression of the mind and passions of man. His most famous painting represented a conquered city. In it a mother, dying, thrusts back the infant who seeks her breast, to prevent the child from sucking blood.

Aristides, Publius Aelius. [Also: Aristeides; surnamed Theodorus.] Greek rhetorician; born in Mysia, Asia Minor, c120 A.D.; died at Smyrna, c180 A.D. He was the author of treatises on speech, declamations, sacred discourses and others, used as models of Attic style. He traveled widely in Asia, Egypt, Greece, and Italy. Felled by a sickness that lasted 13 years, he continued his studies, and fashioned his rhetoric on that of Demosthenes and Plato. He was greatly admired in his lifetime, and so impressed Marcus Aurelius with his account of the destruction (178) of Smyrna by earthquake that the emperor was persuaded to rebuild the city. In addition to two treatises, 55 of his ceremonial speeches are extant. They are powerful and concise exhibitions of profound thinking, and treat of historical subjects, deities, and cities. In a series of six orations, called the Sacred Orations, he described the hints given to him while he was in a trance, by Asclepius on how to cure his long illness. He also composed eulogies on Athens, Rome, and Smyrna.

Aristides, Quintilianus. [Also: Aristeides.] Greek author; fl. between 3rd and 4th centuries A.D. He was the author of a treatise on music (printed in a collection in 1652), in three books. The first book treated harmony, rhythm, and meter. The second described the elevating influence of music. The third, based on Pythagorean principles, compared harmonic intervals and the harmony of the universe. The work is considered by some as the most important ancient book on the subject of music.

Aristippus (ar-is-tip'us). Greek philosopher; born at Cyrene, Africa; fl. c435–386 B.C. He was a pupil of Socrates and the founder, or the grandfather of the founder, of the Cyrenaic school, also known as the Hedonistic system. Starting with the Socratic principles of virtue and happiness, he based his ethics on the pursuit of pleasure, tempered with prudence in order to avoid pain. Little is known of his life, and it is uncertain how much of his theory actually originated with him, and how much was developed by his followers.

Aristobulus (a-ris-tō-bū'lus, ar'is-tō-). Greek historian from Cassandrea; fl. 4th century B.C. He was a companion of Alexander the Great on the Asiatic expedition. His account of Alexander's campaigns was later used by Plutarch, Arrian, and others.

Aristocrates (ar-is-tok'ra-tēz). According to Greek tradition, a son of Aechmis, king of Arcadia. On the border of Orchomenus, near Mantinea in Arcadia, was a temple of Artemis Hymnia, the priestess of which was a virgin. Aristocrates violated the priestess, and when his deed was discovered he was stoned to death. After this, the priestess of the temple had to be an old woman, rather than a young virgin. The grandson of Aristocrates, Aristocrates the second, was also stoned to death because the Arcadians discovered that he had accepted bribes from the Lacedaemonians to betray Messenia, the ally of Arcadia.

Aristodemus (a-ris-tō-dē'mus). According to tradition, a son of Aristomachus, and the brother of Cresphontes and Temenus. He was a descendant of Hyllus, son of Heracles. He was the father and founder of the two royal Spartan houses. The wife of Aristodemus was Argeia, a descendant of Polynices, son of Oedipus. Shortly after she bore Aristodemus twin sons he died. The Lacedaemonians wished to make the elder of the twins king in his father's place, but didn't know which was the elder. Their mother claimed she didn't know which of them was the first-born herself, although, according to Herodotus, she knew perfectly well but hoped that both might become kings. The Lacedaemonians sent to the oracle to inquire what they should do. The priestess instructed them to make both boys kings, but to show greater honor to the elder. This left the Spartans about where they were before, still ignorant of which was the elder. At length it was suggested to them that they set a watch on Argeia, to observe whether she habitually bathed, fed, and tended one of her sons first, or whether she varied, sometimes taking the one and sometimes the other first. The Spartans acted on this suggestion, and observed that she did in fact always tend to the same one first. Since this child was the one more honored by his mother the Spartans concluded he was the first-born and gave him the most honor also. The twins were Eurysthenes, the elder, and Procles, and from them sprang the two royal houses of Sparta. They ruled as co-kings, and there was always great enmity between them. According to the Spartans themselves, Aristodemus led them into the land, later known as Lacedaemonia, after he had drawn it in the lots by which he and his brothers divided up the Peloponnesus. Some say, however, that he was shot by Apollo because he failed to visit the oracle at Delphi, or that he was murdered by the sons of Pylades and Electra, and that in the division of the Peloponnesus a representative drew his lot on behalf of his sons. Still others say he was killed by a stroke of lightning at Naupactus just as he was about to sail with the Dorians for the invasion of the Peloponnesus. In any case, his sons inherited his share, which was Sparta.

Aristodemus. Messenian king, 8th century B.C. (c731-724 B.C.), and traditional hero of the First Messenian war with Sparta which, according to tradition, lasted 20 years and ended 724 B.C. An oracle told the Messenians they would be successful if a father willingly sacrificed his virgin daughter. Aristodemus offered his daughter, but she was betrothed, and her young prospective husband, wild with grief at the thought of losing her, first claimed Aristodemus no longer had authority to offer her up for Messenia. Since she was to be his wife he alone could make such a decision. His claim being denied he then declared that she was not a virgin but was about to become a mother. Aristodemus was enraged at this accusation; he killed his daughter and opened her body to prove that she was not pregnant. His impious rage offended the gods, and her death did not satisfy the oracles. Grief-stricken in his turn, Aristodemus was haunted by evil dreams, despaired of defeating the Spartans, and at length committed suicide on his daughter's tomb.

Aristomachus (ar-is-tom'a-kus). In Greek legend, the father of Hippomedon of Argos who was one of the Seven against Thebes.

Aristomenes (ar-is-tom'ē-nēz). Messenian national hero of the Second War against Sparta, which took place in the first half of the 7th century B.C. He was the son of Nicomedes, or, as some say, of a god who assumed the shape of a serpent when he embraced Aristomenes' mother. In the years following the end of the First Messenian War against Sparta, Aristomenes urged the defeated Messenians to revolt, with such success that they

gathered a force and waged war on Sparta. Aristomenes, noted for his daring, went secretly at night to the temple of Athena of the Bronze House, in Sparta, and fixed thereon a shield. This shield, a goad to the Spartans, was inscribed that it was a gift to the goddess from Aristomenes, and was a shield he had taken from the Spartans. In the battle which the Spartans waged against the Messenians Aristomenes fought like a whirlwind and threw the Spartans into such confusion that they broke and fled. Before the battle Aristomenes was warned by a seer not to pass a certain pear tree where the Dioscuri, protectors of Sparta, were sitting. In his ardor to pursue the Spartans he forgot the seer's warning and lost his shield for disobeying the seer. While he looked for it the Spartans escaped. Later he recovered his shield and took it to Lebadia, where he dedicated it at the shrine of Trophonius. When he returned to Messenia he was received with the wildest acclaim. He made a successful cattle raid on Laconia, and though wounded drove the stolen cattle back to Messenia, but when he made an attack on Sparta at night he was deterred by the appearance of Helen and the Dioscuri. In the continuing war, he was taken prisoner in a sanctuary but escaped during the night. The Arcadians were allies of the Messenians, but Aristocrates, their leader, accepted a bribe to betray the Messenians. In the midst of a battle Aristocrates, without letting his people know he had been bribed, ordered his men to retreat. He led them through the thick of the battling Messenian forces, throwing them into utter confusion, so that the Spartans cut them to pieces. Aristomenes collected the survivors and took them to Mount Eira. There they withstood siege for 11 years, plundering the countryside to maintain themselves. In a sharp engagement with the Spartans Aristomenes was struck on the head by a stone, and while stunned was set upon by the enemy and taken prisoner with about 50 of his followers. The Spartans resolved to kill them all by hurling them into a jagged chasm that had no outlet, but when Aristomenes was hurled forth an eagle swooped down and rescued him, and deposited him unharmed in the bottom of the pit. As he could not escape he prepared himself for death, but soon observed a fox scavenging on the dead bodies of his comrades who had been cast into the pit. Aristomenes realized that there must be some entrance to the pit by which the fox had come in. He seized the animal and followed it to a hole just large enough for the fox, but he enlarged it, escaped, and returned to Mount Eira and resumed his command of the Messenians. He attacked and slew a force of Corinthians on their way to the aid of Sparta, and the Spartans asked for a truce. During the truce Aristomenes was careless and was seized by some Cretan archers in Spartan employ. They were elated with his capture and sent messengers to tell the Spartans, while they took their captive to a farmhouse for safe-keeping. But there he was freed by a maiden of the house, in accordance with a dream she had had. He gave her to his son for a wife. An oracle now foretold the destruction of Messenia. According to the oracle, when a he-goat drank of the waters of the Neda, Messenia would fall. The seer who related this oracle to Aristomenes, in secret, said that a wild fig tree which grew on the banks of the Neda was now leaning over the bank to such an extent that its branches were in the water. The Messenians used the same word for the fig tree as for he-goat and Aristomenes realized that the end was at hand, but did not tell the Messenians. He took certain secret things and buried them in a secret place at Ithome, calling on Zeus as he did so to honor the pledge, for an oracle had said that if these things were preserved the Messenians would recover their country. After this he exhorted his followers to defend themselves on the acropolis at Mount Eira. But their citadel was betrayed by an adulterous woman. In a violent storm the Spartans attacked with ladders, and the Messenians could not hold out much longer. The seer who knew of the oracles told Aristomenes to lead out as many Messenians as he could, and to save them and himself, while a few brave Messenians held up the Spartans to cover their retreat. Aristomenes followed his advice and took his Messenians to Arcadia. There he and his followers were cordially received, for the Arcadians had never learned that their king betrayed the Messenians for money. Now he prepared to betray them again, but was discovered and stoned to death by the Arcadians themselves. Aristomenes went to Rhodes on his way to Persia, but died while at Rhodes, and was honored by a splendid tomb built for him by the Rhodians.

Ariston (a-ris'ton). A descendant of Procles, son of Aristodemus, and hence of the junior branch of the royal house of Sparta. He was co-king of Sparta with Anaxandrides, in the time of Croesus. Ariston had been twice married but neither of his wives bore him any children. He now fell in love with the very beautiful wife of his most intimate friend. This woman had once been as ugly as she was now beautiful. Her parents commanded her nurse to take her every day to the temple of Helen at Therapne and beg the goddess to take away the child's ugliness. One day as the nurse was leaving the temple a woman came to her and asked to see the child. At first the nurse refused as she had been ordered to do by the child's parents, but at last yielded. The stranger looked at the little girl and prophesied that one day she would be the most beautiful woman in Sparta. From that day, the child's appearance began to change. She grew up to be a beautiful woman and married Agetus, the friend of Ariston. Ariston resolved to win her from her husband. He proposed to his friend that each give as a gift to the other whatever his friend most desired of all his possessions. Agetus agreed. He made his request and received what he had asked for. Ariston now asked for the wife of Agetus. Agetus was thunderstruck, but as he had given his oath he was compelled to give up his wife. Ariston now put aside his second wife and took the wife of Agetus. After a time she bore a son, Demaratus. See Demaratus.

Ariston or Aristo (-tō). Greek Stoic philosopher; born on the island of Chios in the Aegean Sea; died c250 B.C. He was a disciple of Zeno and later, according to Diogenes Laertius, of the Platonist Polemo. Of the various branches of philosophy he recognized only ethics as a legitimate study.

Aristophanes (ar-is-tof'a-nēz). Athenian writer of Greek comedies; born between c450 and 446 B.C.; died c385 B.C. Out of the buf-foony of Greek comic plays Aristophanes created an artistic comedy. A conservative and a passionate believer in the good old days of Marathon, he attacked with triumphant vigor "progressive" education (Socrates), new ideas in philosophy (the Sophists), melodrama, rhetorical claptrap, and bizarre musical innovations in contemporary tragedy (Euripides), and above all demagoguery and corruption in politics (Cleon and Hyperbolus). His criticism of the tragedies of Aeschylus and Euripides in The Frogs is the earliest piece of literary criticism in existence. His comedies are characterized by a wealth of imagination, a freshness of wit, a pungency of satire, and bursts of pure lyric poetry that can be found in no other comedies except perhaps those of Shakespeare. He took the role of public critic seriously, and his political satire was so effective that he was awarded by the Athenian state a crown of wild olive for the good advice he had given the city. Because his work often dealt with satire of current events some of it is obscure to a later age; at the same time, passages of rollicking humor, brilliant wit, and eloquent poetry are timeless. According to Gilbert Murray (The Literature of Ancient Greece), "His most characteristic quality, perhaps, is his combination of the wildest and broadest farce on the one hand, with the most exquisite lyric beauty on the other." Of his many comedies these 11 survive: The Acharnians (425 B.C.), The Knights (424), The Clouds (423), The Wasps (422), The Peace (421), The Birds (414), Lysistrata (411), The Thesmophoriazusae (411), The Frogs (405), The Ecclesiazusae (391), and The Plutus (388 B.C.). Of these plays, The Acharnians, The Birds, and Lysistrata, as well as the lost Babylonians, were produced under the name of Callistratus, and The Wasps and The Frogs under the name of Philonides. The titles of at least 20 lost plays are recorded, and hundreds of fragments survive as quotations in later writers.

Aristophanes of Byzantium. Greek grammarian, critic, and lexicographer; born c257 B.C.; died c180. He is now considered to have been perhaps the greatest philologist of the ancient world. He went to Alexandria in his youth and succeeded Eratosthenes as librarian of the Alexandria museum (c194 B.C.). A pupil of Zenodotus and Callimachus, he was one of the Alexandrian scholars from whom our traditional explanation of Homer is derived, and was an instructor of Aristarchus of Samothrace, who succeeded him as the leading Homeric scholar of the day. Besides Homer, he edited Hesiod, Alcaeus, Anacreon, Pindar, Plato, and the Greek dramatists, wrote commentaries on Aristophanes (the playwright) and on Callimachus' literary history (Pinakes), compiled word lists, and introduced diacritical marks in an effort to systematize the pronunciation and accentuation of Greek. The invention of punctuation is sometimes ascribed to Aristophanes, but systematization is perhaps a more exact description of his contribution.

Aristotle (ar'is-tot-l). [Sometimes called the Stagirite.] Greek philosopher, one of the greatest thinkers of antiquity, and a continuing influence on philosophic speculation; born at Stagira (whence the name above), on the NW Aegean coast, 384 B.C.; died at Chalcis, in Euboea, 322 B.C. He was the son of Nicomachus, the personal physician of Amyntas II of Macedonia, and probably spent part of his childhood at the Macedonian court. When he was 17 he went to Athens and attended the Academy of Plato where he remained until Plato's death. He then went to Assus as the guest (348-347 B.C.) of Hermias, the ruler of Atarneus and Assus, and married Hermias' niece, Pythias. After the death of Hermias in 345 B.C., he went to Mytilene, and there carried on zoological studies. In 343-342 B.C. Philip of Macedonia invited him to Pella to act as the tutor of his son, Alexander. In 335 B.C., after Philip's death, he returned to Athens and founded outside the city a school which took its name (the Peripatetic School) from a covered court, or peripatos, in the garden of the school. The school had a communal life and an extensive library, and was a center of research in every field of contemporary knowledge. When Alexander died there was an outbreak of feeling against the Macedonians, and Aristotle was charged with impiety. He left Athens and went to Chalcis, and there died in 322 B.C. of a digestive disease.

Written Works. His works were of three kinds: 1) early writings published by himself, mostly in the form of Platonic dialogues, and Platonic in spirit, which survive only in fragments, e.g. the Protrepticus; 2) later didactic works in which he moved away from Platonism towards his more mature views, and which also survive only in fragments, e.g. the Theodectea; and 3) the works of his maturity, many of which still survive. The body of surviving works accredited to him does contain some which are spurious, but for the most part the works are genuine. The extant writings may be conveniently divided into the classes used by the ancient editors: 1) the Organon, or group of writings on logic, which includes the Prior and Posterior Analytics; 2) the works on natural science which include the Physics, On the Soul, and the History of Animals; 3) miscellaneous writings, which include the Problems; 4) the work on primary philosophy, called the Metaphysics; 5) the works on moral philosophy, which include the Nicomachean Ethics and the Politics; and 6) the works on art, the Rhetoric and the Poetics. To these must be added one historical work, the Constitution of Athens, written on papyrus and discovered in Egypt in the latter part of the 19th century.

Influence as Philosopher. Aristotle has been the philosopher par excellence of the western world, and his influence is still significant. He was primarily a philosopher of moderation and common sense. In metaphysics he believed in both matter and mind, in both the natural and the supernatural. In ethics he believed in both physical well-being and spiritual contemplation. In political theory he advocated constitutional government and rule by the middle class. Aristotle's philosophy is an inspired common sense governed by a critical insight into the meaning of human experience.

Aristotle and the History of Science. Aristotle was one of the founders of the inductive method. He was the first to conceive the idea of organized research, and himself contributed considerably to the organization of science by his systematic survey and classification of the knowledge of his time. He took pains to make as clear as possible the fundamental principles of each science in particular, and of science in general. He may be called the founder of logic, and his systematization of it in the Organon was so masterful that it still dominates much of the teaching of today. He prepared the systematization of geometry by his investigations of its more fundamental and philosophical aspect, in particular by his introduction of new or better definitions and his discussion of the concepts of continuity and infinity. He completed the system of homocentric spheres of Eudoxus and Callippus, using a total of 55 spheres to account for all the celestial motions. He offered proofs of the sphericity of the earth, and attempted to estimate its size. To the four elements he added a fifth (the quintessence) called aether, the natural movement of which was circular. The celestial bodies are made of aether and are perfect and incorruptible (this theory stood until 1610). If the mechanical writings be genuine, Aristotle had done much profound thinking on the subject, but whether he was fundamentally right or fundamentally wrong depends entirely upon one's interpretation of his thought. He is said to have discovered the law of the lever, and that sound is transmitted by vibrations of the air. He made the first systematic study (and wrote the first textbook) of meteorology, as well as the first treatise on chemistry.

Contributions to the Natural Sciences. Aristotle carried on immense botanical, zoological, and anatomical investigations. He clearly recognized the fundamental problems of biology: sex, heredity, nutrition, growth, adaptation. He outlined both a theory of evolution (scala naturae) and of scientific classification of animals. He proposed theories of generation and heredity. He may be called the founder of comparative anatomy (e.g., comparative study of the womb). Many of his anatomical descriptions are admirable (e.g., reproduction of selachians, especially placental development of the dogfish, embryonic development of the chick, stomach of ruminants, and others). Some of Aristotle's errors, however, retarded scientific progress because of the uncritical acceptance of his investigations. Thus his denial of the sexuality of plants (he assimilated their reproduction to nutrition and growth) was the main cause of the enormous delay in its discovery (Camerarius, 1694). In spite of earlier Hippocratic views, he considered the heart as the seat of intelligence, the function of the brain being then simply to cool the heart by the secretion of phlegm and to prevent its overheating. He realized that the arterial system duplicates the venous system, but failed to understand the real difference between arteries and veins; he believed that arteries contain air as well as blood. Here again Aristotle's views were the main cause of the extraordinary tardiness of the discovery of the circulation of the blood (Harvey, 1628).

Other Contributions and Summary. He attempted an inductive study of politics, and wrote a history and critical account of Greek constitutional law. One of the modern definitions of psychology as "the positive science of the behavior of living things" is a return to the standpoint of Aristotle. His theory of dreams was far more rational than that of Democritus (he tried to explain them by the persistence of sense impressions, having observed the exaggerated excitement caused by slight stimuli if they interrupt a dream). Aristotle's influence, for good or evil, in every department of knowledge, was so tremendous that a good history of Aristotelianism would include a large part of the history of science and thought down to the 18th century. The prodigious activity of Aristotle marks the climax of the golden age of Greece. The very existence of his works proves not simply that he had an encyclopedic mind of the highest order, but also that a large amount of scientific research had already been accomplished by his time. Unlike Plato's successor, Speusippus, Aristotle was not essentially a mathematician. He had a deep mathematical knowledge, but that knowledge was happily balanced by a very extensive acquaintance with every branch of natural history.

Aristoteles (ar-is-tot'ē-lēz) or Aristotle. The original name of Battus, son of Polymnestus of Thera and Phronima. See Battus.

Aristoxenus (ar-is-tok'sē-nus). Greek music theorist and philosopher of the Peripatetic School; student of Aristotle; born at Tarentum, Italy; fl. 4th century B.C. Now usually considered to have been the greatest music theoretician of ancient times, he was the founder of the school of musicians known as Aristoxeneans; his Elements of Harmony (of which three books are partly preserved) is of value to music historians. Author also of Elements of Rhythm (which exists in fragments), and of more than 430 lost works.

Arius (ā-rī'us). [Also: Areius.] In Greek legend, a despot of Teuthrania. During his rule Pergamus, son of Andromache and Neoptolemus, came into his land with his mother. Pergamus killed Arius, took his city, and named it Pergamum after himself.

Arminius (är-min'i-us). [Latinized name of Armin; German, Hermann.] German chieftain of the Cherusci (near modern Hanover); born c17 B.C.; assassinated 21 A.D. He was immortalized as the liberator of the Germans from Roman rule. He entered the Roman military service in 1 A.D. and became a Roman citizen of the equestrian order, but on his return to Germany he found his people oppressed by Roman rule and secretly organized a revolt of the Cherusci. He surprised Quintilius Varus, the Roman governor, in the Teutoburgian Forest in 9 A.D. and destroyed him and three complete legions of Roman troops. The news of this disaster caused a near panic at Rome. The massacre of the three legions by Arminius forced the withdrawal of the Roman frontier from the Elbe to the Rhine. This was the worst disaster suffered by Roman arms during the rule of Augustus, and he never ceased to mourn it. Germanicus Caesar defeated him in 16 A.D., and captured his wife, but he still maintained the independence of the right bank of the Rhine. The victory of Germanicus had been so costly that he was recalled and the frontier on the Elbe was abandoned. Arminius overthrew Maroboduus, head of the Marcomanni, but was killed in a feud among rival chiefs.

Arnaeus (är'nē-us). In Homeric legend (Odyssey), the real name of Irus, the beggar who had the monopoly of begging in the halls of Odysseus' palace. He was given the nickname Irus, a distortion of Iris, because he was used by the suitors of Penelope as an errand boy.

Arne (är'nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Thea (daughter of Chiron the centaur), and Aeolus, king of Magnesia in Thessaly. Her mother was transformed into a mare by Poseidon before Arne was born, and Arne's first appearance into the world was as a foal which bore the name Melanippe. She was then transformed into an infant girl by Poseidon, and was given by Aeolus, who renamed her Arne, to Desmontes to bring up. When she grew up she was seduced by Poseidon. Desmontes, on discovering that she was about to bear a child, blinded and imprisoned her. She bore twin sons, Aeolus, who became guardian of the winds, and Boeotus, ancestor of the Boeotians. Desmontes ordered the twins exposed on Mount Pelion but they were saved by shepherds. They were given to Theano, the childless wife of Metapontus, king of Icaria, who presented them to her husband as her own children. Metapontus was delighted with them, thinking they were his own children. Later Theano bore twins of her own but Metapontus still preferred Aeolus and Boeotus. Theano now wanted to be rid of them. She advised her sons to attack them on a hunting expedition and kill them. But her scheme miscarried. Poseidon came to the aid of his sons and they killed Theano's children. Aeolus and Boeotus, on being informed by Poseidon that he was their father, were then ordered to kill Desmontes and to free their mother who was still languishing in prison. They did as commanded and were reunited with Arne whose sight was restored by Poseidon. When Metapontus learned the truth he married Arne and adopted her sons. Later he tired of her and put her aside to take a new wife. Aeolus and Boeotus took their mother's part and slew the new queen. They then fled. Arne and Boeotus went to Thessaly, to the home of her father Aeolus. He gave Boeotus part of his kingdom, which Boeotus renamed Arne in honor of his mother.

Arne. In Greek mythology, a princess of the island of Siphnus. Minos, desiring to win her friendship for his war against the Athenians, bribed her with gifts of gold and secured her aid. To punish her greed she was changed into a magpie, ever attracted by the glitter of bright things.

Apennines, flows S, W, NW, and then W, and empties into the Mediterranean about six miles SW of Pisae. Pisae (Pisa) and Florentia (Florence) are situated on it.

Arpi (är'pī), or Argyripa (är-jī'ri-pā). Named in the Aeneid, as a town built by Diomedes in Garganus in Apulia, after he had fled from his native Calydon on his return from the Trojan War. The town, lying near the Adriatic coast, is the site of modern Foggia.

Arpinum (är-pī'nūm). [Modern name, Arpino.] In ancient geography, a town of C Italy, situated near the Liris River, SE of Rome. The ancient town was first Volscian, then belonged to the Samnites, was taken by the Romans in the Second Samnite War, and was made a Roman ally with voting rights in 188 B.C. It was the birthplace of Marius and Cicero.

Arpoxais (är-pok'sā-is). According to tradition, the second son of Targitaus, the first inhabitant of Scythia. He was the founder of the Scythian tribes known as the Catiari and the Traspiani. See Colaxais.

Arrephoria (är-e-fôr'i-ä). In ancient Athens, a festival celebrated by maidens. Four young girls of noble birth were selected. These maidens were called Arrephoroi and lived for a time in the temple of Athena Polias on the Acropolis, where two of them were engaged in weaving the peplus that was annually presented to Athena. At the time of the festival the girls were clothed in white garments and performed the following ceremony at night. The priestess of Athena put laden baskets on their heads which the maidens carried by an underground passage to a sanctuary nearby. Neither the priestess who put the burdens in the baskets nor the maidens who carried them knew what they were. After the girls delivered what was in their baskets they received something in its place and returned to the priestess. Some say this festival commemorated the acts of the daughters of Cecrops, to whom Athena gave a chest with orders to guard it but not to look inside. They disobeyed her command and discovered within the chest the infant Erichthonius, half-man and half-serpent. The sight of him drove them mad and they hurled themselves from the Acropolis. Only Pandrosos, of the sisters, did not disobey the command of the goddess. She became the first priestess of Athena and had a sanctuary on the Acropolis.

Arretium (ä-rē'shum, -shi-um). [Modern name, Arezzo.] In ancient geography, a city in C Italy in Tuscany, situated in the Clanis valley, near the junction of the Arnus and Clanis rivers, about 38 miles SE of Florentia. An ancient Etruscan city, it was colonized by the Romans and became the terminus of the Via Flaminia. Arretium refused to take part in an Italian coalition against Rome (285-282 B.C.) and was besieged by the whole force of the confederacy, including paid hordes of Gallic Semones. Lucius Caecilius Metellus went to the relief of the city, but was defeated and slain, with seven military tribunes and 13,000 men, the rest of the army being made prisoners. The city contains many remains from the Etruscan and Roman periods. In the 1st century B.C. potters of Arretium perfected the production of a fine tableware known as terra sigillata, decorated in relief in imitation of embossed metal ware, with an excellent red glaze, which came to enjoy wide vogue in the Mediterranean and was widely imitated in western Europe. It appears in museums and excavation reports as Arretine Ware.

Arrhidaeus (är-i-dē'us). Macedonian soldier; half brother of Alexander the Great; killed 317 B.C. He was one of the military leaders who disputed the empire after Alexander's death in 323 B.C., being elected by the soldiers under his command in Babylonia. He was put to death by order of Olympias, mother of Alexander.

Arria (är'i-ä). Roman woman whose husband, Caecina Paetus, was condemned to death for conspiracy against the emperor Claudius. As her husband hesitated to destroy himself, she stabbed herself (42 A.D.) and handed him the dagger with the words "Paete, non dolet" ("Paetus, it does not hurt").

Arrian (är'i-an). Greek meteorologist; fl. first half of the 2nd century B.C. He wrote a book on meteorology and a short monograph on comets, but his work was largely absorbed in later writings and only three fragments of it now are extant.

Arrian. [Latin, Flavius Arrianus.] Greek historian and philosopher; born at Nocomedia, Bithynia; fl. 2nd century A.D. Because of his culture and ability he was made a citizen of Rome and of Athens, and held high offices in the state. Hadrian appointed him governor of Cappadocia (c131), and he served as consul (c146) under Antoninus Pius. He spent his last years in his native town as a priest of Demeter. He was a friend and follower of Epictetus, whose lectures he published and on whose philosophy he wrote a manual. The latter became so popular, because of its tersely expressed moral precepts, that much later it was used as a textbook. He was the author also of valuable historical works in the style of Xenophon, notably his Anabasis of Alexander, based on first-hand accounts by Aristobulus and others, the Indica on Nearchus' expedition to India, the Periplus of the Euxine (Black Sea), and the Cynegeticus, on hunting.

Arsinoë (är-sin'ō-ē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Phegeus, king of Psophis. Phegeus gave her in marriage to Alcmaeon who had fled to his court to be purified. Alcmaeon gave her the necklace and peplus of Harmonia, which he had brought with him and which caused disaster to whomever possessed them. Alcmaeon, pursued by the Erinyes for the murder of his mother, went to the river-god Achelous for purification. On his return to Psophis he asked Arsinoë to surrender the necklace and peplus to him. This she willingly did, unaware that during his absence he had married the daughter of Achelous and wished to give the necklace and peplus to her. When Phegeus learned the truth he had Alcmaeon killed. Arsinoë would not listen to the truth about Alcmaeon and prayed that her father and brothers would die before the next new moon to punish them for having widowed her. Her father locked her in a chest and gave her to the king of Nemea for a slave. But her prayer was answered, her father and brothers were dead within a month.

Arsinoë. In Greek legend, the nurse of Orestes. According to some accounts, after the murder of Agamemnon, Aegisthus plotted to kill Orestes. Arsinoë, who knew of the plot, nobly substituted her own son in Orestes' bed, and he was slain. She secretly carried Orestes off to Strophius, king of Phocis and uncle of Orestes, for safety.

Arsinoë. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, and a sister of Hilaïra and Phoebe, who became the wives of the Dioscuri. By Apollo, she became the mother of Eriopis, and some say she also bore him Asclepius, but the general account is that Coronis was the mother of Asclepius. Arsinoë was given a hero's honors in Sparta, where she also had a sanctuary.

Arsinoë I. The daughter of Lysimachus of Thrace, and first wife of Ptolemy II; fl. in Egypt, c280 B.C. Suspected of plotting against her husband's life, she was for a time banished.

Arsinoë II. Daughter of Ptolemy I of Egypt, wife of Lysimachus and, afterward, of Ptolemy II. She was born c316 B.C.; died 270.

Arsinoë III. Fl. c220 B.C. The wife of Ptolemy IV Philopator, by whose order she was put to death.

Arsinoë IV. Killed at Miletus, 41 B.C. Queen of Egypt in 47 B.C., put to death by Mark Antony at the instigation of her sister Cleopatra.

Arsinoë. In ancient geography, a city on the E coast of Cyprus near ancient Salamis. It was built by Ptolemy II of Egypt. The name of the city now on the same site is Famagusta.

Arsinous (är-sin'ō-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a man of Tenedos, the father of Hecamede, the prize of war given to Nestor for his maid-servant by Achilles.

Arsippe (är'si-pē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Minyas and the sister of Alcithoë and Leucippe. The sisters were driven mad for denying the divinity of Dionysus. See Minyades.

Artabanus (är-tā-bā'nus). Brother of Darius the Great (king of Persia, 521-c485 B.C.). When Xerxes, son of Darius, decides to wage war on the Greeks Artabanus reminds him that he advised his father not to make war on the Scythians. Darius ignored his advice and so lost many good men before making a safe retreat from Scythia. The Greeks, he says, are much more valiant than the Scythians, and are bold fighters on sea and land. He advises Xerxes of the dangers that so nearly befell Darius in crossing the Hellespont, and warns him of the worse dangers an invasion of Greece would present. But at least, he urges Xerxes to withdraw from the council that is discussing war against the Greeks and think well what course he should follow before he makes up his mind to go to war, as his other chiefs advise; or to refrain from war, as Artabanus advises. He reminds Xerxes that the gods knock down the tallest trees in the forest with the lightning, for the gods love to cut down all things and men that stand above their fellows, and thus a great host (the Persians) can, by the will of the gods, be destroyed by a small force (the Greeks). Artabanus chides Mardonius, a counselor who strongly advises war, for belittling the Greeks and stirring up Xerxes' will to war. He suggests that if war is determined on Xerxes should remain in Persia. He proposes that he and Mardonius put up their sons as pledges, that Mardonius march at the head of as large an army as he feels is necessary to defeat the Greeks. If Mardonius is successful, Artabanus and his sons must perish, but if he is not successful Mardonius and his sons must be slain. This advice from Artabanus infuriates Xerxes. He commands Artabanus to remain at home with the women and decides in favor of war. Later Xerxes thinks it over and decides that Artabanus has given good advice. He makes up his mind to abandon the war. In the night he dreams a man appears to him and tells him not to abandon his plans for war. He pays no attention to the dream, and next day calls his chiefs together and acknowledges that Artabanus is right, and he will not make war. The Persians are delighted. That night Xerxes has the same dream; the figure that appears to him threatens that unless he makes war he will be brought low. Xerxes sends for Artabanus and tells him the dream. If, as he thinks, the dream was sent by the gods it will be sent to Artabanus too, if only Artabanus clothes himself in Xerxes' raiment and sleeps in his bed. Artabanus tries to soothe him, saying man is likely to dream of what is uppermost in his mind, and the war against the Greeks had occupied them above all else for many days. However, if the dream was really sent by the gods it will come to him too. Although, he tells Xerxes, the dream will not be so simple-minded as to be fooled by the disguise of Xerxes clothes. Yet he agrees to put them on. He sits on the throne, dons Xerxes' garments, and lies down on Xerxes' bed to sleep, thinking that thus he will prove Xerxes is mistaken. But the same dream comes to him, and threatens him for advising Xerxes not to make war. Artabanus springs up and hurries to Xerxes. He agrees that the dream has come from the gods, who desire the war against the Greeks, and he now gives it his support. Xerxes makes preparations for the war. After four years a host is assembled at the Hellespont. Artabanus now expresses his fears about two things: land and sea. For the army is too great to live off the land and the fleet is too vast to find harbor in case of storms. Xerxes upbraids him for his fears. If a man were to consider every possible hazard before he acted he would never act at all. He tells Artabanus Persia would never have grown so great if his predecessors had been so afraid of taking a chance as Artabanus. Xerxes, taking the three sons of Artabanus with him as captains, leaves his sceptre and his empire in Artabanus' hands and sends him back to Susa as he leaves for the invasion of Greece. Subsequent events proved that Artabanus was correct in all his fears, that the gods could indeed cut down the mighty forces of Persia.

Artabazus (är-tā-bā'zus). Persian general of the Parthians and Chorasmians in the campaigns of 480 and 479 B.C. His forces took no part in the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.), and after the defeat of Mardonius there he retreated to Asia.

Artabazus. Persian general under Artaxerxes II; fl. c362-328 B.C. He was satrap of Phrygia and rebelled (c356 B.C.) against Artaxerxes III, aided by the Athenian general Chares. He was pardoned (c349) for his uprising through the intercession of Mentor, fought at Gaugamela (331 B.C.) under Darius, and was made satrap of Bactria by Alexander the Great.

Artachaees (är-tak-ā'ēz). Persian engineer; died c481 B.C. He was one of the engineers in charge of the construction of a canal across the Athos peninsula, near Acanthus in N Greece, to allow the passage of Xerxes' fleet in 480 B.C. Xerxes wanted the canal to spare his fleet the dangerous winds that had buffeted his father's ships when they rounded the peninsula in 490 B.C.

Artacia (är-tā'shi-a, -shā). In the Odyssey, a spring in the land of the Laestrygonians where the companions of Odysseus met the daughter of King Antiphates.

Artaphernes (är-tā-fēr'nēz). Persian general; fl. c500 B.C. He was a brother of Darius the Great (of Persia), by whom he was appointed satrap of Sardis. He interfered ineffectually in behalf of Hippias, the expelled tyrant of Athens, and took part in suppressing the revolt (499-498 B.C.) of the Ionians against Persian rule.

Artaphernes. Persian general; son of the foregoing Persian general of the same name. He commanded, with Datis, the Persian army which invaded (490 B.C.) Greece and was defeated at Marathon, and led the Lydians in the expedition of Xerxes I against Greece ten years later which ended in the defeat of the Persians.

Artaxerxes I. (är-tā-zèrk'sēz). [Surnamed Longimanus, meaning "the Long-handed"; name in the Old Testament, Artachshast.] King of Persia (464-425 B.C.). He was a younger son of Xerxes I. Aided by the vizier who had murdered his father, he ascended the throne (464 B.C.). When, some time later, he discovered this vizier was his father's murderer and the author of other crimes, Artaxerxes killed him and his sons in a hand-to-hand struggle in the palace. According to ancient writers he was handsome, brave, of a mild disposition, and greatly influenced by his mother and his wife. Early in his reign he was forced to put down the rebellion of one of his satraps. Following this the Libyan Inarus raised a rebellion in Egypt and called in the Athenians to help him. After a long struggle (460-454 B.C.) in which the Athenians sailed up the Nile and took possession of most of Memphis (459), Egypt was subdued. The forces of Artaxerxes were defeated (449 B.C.) on sea and land in a double action at Salamis in Cyprus by the Athenians. That same year peace was concluded with the Athenians under which the Persians agreed not to invade the Aegean, while the Athenians abandoned their interest in Cyprus and pledged to honor the coasts of the Persian Empire. This peace, known as the Peace of Callias, ended the great struggles with Persia for over a hundred years.

Artaxerxes is presumed to have instigated the mission of Ezra and Nehemiah (his cup-bearer) to Jerusalem, thus furthering Judaism. He won the epithet "Longimanus" because of the excessive length of his right hand.

Artaxerxes II. [Surnamed Mnemon.] King of Persia (404-358 B.C.). He was the son of Darius II and Parysatis, and succeeded his father on the throne of Persia (404 B.C.). His mother, who had great influence over him, preferred to see her younger son, her favorite Cyrus, as king, and plotted unsuccessfully to secure the throne for him. Cyrus, with a band of Greek mercenaries that included Xenophon and a body of Asiatic troops, took the field and prepared to seize the throne from Artaxerxes. He marched across Asia Minor, along the Euphrates, and into Babylonia. At the village of Cunaxa, outside Bablyon, Artaxerxes came out to oppose him. Cyrus was killed (401 B.C.), his Asiatic troops fled, and Artaxerxes retained his throne. He willingly gave the Greek mercenaries permission to depart, after which they made the famous march to the sea celebrated in Xenophon's Anabasis. At the beginning of the 4th century B.C. a Peloponnesian force under the Spartan king Agesilaus II invaded the coasts of Asia Minor and temporarily freed the Greek cities there (396). The Spartan triumphs were short-lived, as Agesilaus was called home to fight the Greek enemies of Sparta. In 388 B.C. the Spartan Antalcidas journeyed to Susa to make peace with Artaxerxes. By the terms of the peace, concluded in 386 B.C. and called the "King's Peace," the cities of Asia Minor and Cyprus fell to Persia, and the other Greek cities were declared autonomous, except Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scyrus which continued to belong to Athens. Having concluded peace with Sparta Artaxerxes was compelled to turn his attention to the series of rebellions within his empire. Satraps in the provinces from the Hellespönt to the Nile rose up against him; Egypt freed herself from Persian domination. In his last years Artaxerxes had given himself up to the pleasures of the harem, had put his three eldest sons to death as a result of the intrigues of their brother Ochus, but by the time of his death (358 B.C.), thanks largely to the jealousy and intrigues of the various revolting satraps against each other, the king's authority over the empire had been restored.

Artaxerxes III. [Surnamed Ochus.] King of Persia (358–338 B.C.). He was the son of Artaxerxes II, and cleared his path to the throne by inducing his father to put to death the three older brothers who stood in his way. He succeeded to the throne on the death of Artaxerxes (358 B.C.). On his accession he put to death most of his relatives who might have contested his right to rule. He energetically and harshly asserted his power over his satraps, compelled them to disband their mercenary armies, and succeeded (343 B.C.) in conquering Egypt which he thereupon treated with great cruelty. He was poisoned (338 B.C.), along with his older sons, by his favorite, the eunuch Bagoas, who had come to have great power.

Artemidorus Daldianus (är'tē-mi-dō'rus dal-di-ā'nus). Greek soothsayer of Daldis, in Lydia; fl. c170 A.D.; author of a four-book treatise on the interpretation of dreams, valuable to modern scholars as a source of information on ancient rites and superstitions. He also wrote treatises on auspices (divination based upon the observation of birds) and on chiromancy (palmistry), but these have been lost.

Artemidorus of Ephesus (ef'ē-sus). Greek geographer; fl. c104–100 B.C. He was at one time the Ephesian ambassador to Rome. He is better known, however, as the author of an 11-volume geographical work, now lost, largely based on earlier writers and in turn used by Strabo and others. It purported to deal with the whole "inhabited world," and attached much importance to physical geography and distances between places cited.

Artemis (är'te-mis). One of the 12 Olympian gods, the daughter of Zeus and Leto, and the twin sister of Apollo. As with Apollo, the worship of Artemis was supposed to have come from the Hyperboreans, for which reason she was known as Hyperborean Artemis. Armed like Apollo with a silver bow, she was a mighty hunter, a "Rainer of Arrows," who sent them to punish the wicked and impious, and who could also heal and reward. Sudden death occurring in women was attributed to the arrows of Artemis. She did not share with Apollo the gift of prophecy, nor had she any connection with the arts. She was the virgin huntress, devoted to the chase, the goddess of streets and the founding of towns, the protectress of all young animals, and the goddess of flocks. As Apollo was a god of light, sometimes identified with the sun, so Artemis was also a goddess of light and was identified with the moon, particularly with Selene and Hecate.

Leto was compelled to wander through the earth searching for a place to bear her children, because jealous Hera had decreed that no place where the sun shone could receive her rival. At last she came to the tiny island of Ortygia. There she bore Artemis, and because she was born without pain Artemis became the goddess invoked by women in childbirth, and was sometimes known as Ilithyia, the birth-goddess. As soon as she was born Artemis helped her mother across the narrow strait to the neighboring and slightly larger floating island of Delos, which offered to receive Leto in spite of Hera's threats. On Delos Artemis acted as midwife and helped her mother to bear Apollo, her twin. But some say Artemis was born on Delos itself, and some say she was born in the Ortygian grove at Ephesus. While she was yet a child, her father Zeus took her on his knee and asked what gifts she desired of him. At once, Artemis asked for the gift of eternal virginity. This was granted her, and she became one of the three goddesses whose heart could not be moved by the power of Aphrodite (the others were Athena and Hestia). She also asked for bow and arrows like her brother's, for 60 ocean nymphs to be her companions, and 20 river nymphs from Crete to look after her hunting gear and her hounds. Besides, she wanted all the mountains of the world and just one city, for she expected to spend most of her time hunting on the mountains. Zeus promised her all she asked and more, and made her goddess of roads and harbors. Artemis went off to the realm of Oceanus and to Crete, where she chose her companions. Then she went to visit the Cyclopes, at the invitation of Hephaestus. Brontes, who had been told to make whatever she asked, took her on his knee, but she did not care for his fondling, and tore a handful of hair out of his chest to express her annoyance. At the time of her visit the Cyclopes were at work on a silver trough for Poseidon. Artemis imperiously told them to interrupt the work and make her a silver bow and a quiver of arrows, and promised to give them the first thing she shot with them as a reward. The Cyclopes did as she bid. Armed with her bow, Artemis went to Arcadia. There she met Pan, who gave her hounds for the chase. Next she captured alive two pairs of golden-horned, bronze-hoofed stags and harnessed them to a golden chariot. In this she set off for Thrace to try out her weapons. Her first two arrows struck trees; her third slew a wild beast; and her fourth was used to punish a city of unjust men.

Artemis jealously guarded the honor of her mother and her brother. She helped Apollo kill Tityus when he attacked Leto as she was on her way to Delphi. She killed the daughters of Niobe who had boasted of her many sons and daughters, taunted Leto because she had only two children, and recommended to the Thebans that they worship her instead of Leto. Some say that she slew Coronis the Lapith with her arrows when Apollo complained to her that Coronis had been unfaithful to him. But others say she helped Coronis when she was bearing Apollo's son Asclepius. Artemis sent heavy punishments on those who failed to give her due honor. Oeneus of Calydon forgot her when he was sacrificing first fruits to the gods. Helius informed Artemis of this oversight, and she sent a monstrous boar to ravage Calydon, the realm of Oeneus. Meleager, the son of Oeneus, called together a group of heroes and the boar was at length slain, but Meleager quarreled with his uncles and finally killed them and brought about his own death. Artemis turned all but two of his wildly grieving sisters into guinea-hens. Admetus also offended her by neglecting her at his marriage rites. When he went to the marriage chamber he found it filled with writhing serpents. Apollo, who was serving as bondman of Admetus at the time, told him how to appease Artemis. Atreus, son of Pelops, promised to sacrifice the best of his flocks to Artemis. Hermes, who wanted to punish the Pelopidae because Pelops had murdered his son Myrtilus, schemed with Pan, and put a lamb with golden fleece and a horn of gold into the flocks that Pelops had left to his sons Atreus and Thyestes. Atreus claimed the lamb with golden fleece, and did indeed kill it and offer the flesh to Artemis but he took the skin, stuffed it, and hid it in a chest. But some say it was Artemis herself who put the lamb with golden fleece among the flocks of Atreus, to test him. By withholding the golden fleece from the sacrifice he incurred her wrath, and she punished his family, especially his son Agamemnon. Broteas, son of Tantalus, was a great hunter. He failed to honor Artemis and, some say, she drove him mad; he cast himself on a pyre and so perished. On the other hand, she rewarded those who honored her. Hippolytus, son of Theseus, worshiped Artemis above all, and even denied the power of Aphrodite. Aphrodite caused his death, not because he honored Artemis, but because he denied her, the goddess of love. Artemis begged Asclepius to restore Hippolytus. He did so with a magic herb, and Artemis wrapped him in a cloud and carried him off to Italy. There in her sacred grove of Aricia she changed his name to Virbius and gave him the nymph Egeria for a wife.

Artemis, the chaste goddess, resisted all would-be lovers. Otus, one of the Aloidae, sought to embrace her. With his brother Ephialtes he pursued her to the island of Naxos. As the brothers were about to discover her, Artemis transformed herself into a hind. The brothers separated to attack from opposite sides. With the hind between them, each hurled his spear, but Artemis disappeared, and the spears so forcefully hurled sped on; each brother was pierced by the other's spear. Some say that Orion, returning from the East with his sight restored after Oenopion had blinded him, met Artemis as he sought Oenopion for revenge. She persuaded him, as a mighty hunter, to give up the idea of revenge and go hunting with her. Apollo, fearing that Orion might melt the heart of his virgin sister, caused a great scorpion to attack him. Orion fought the monster with his arrows and his sword, but could not kill him. He fled into the sea to escape the scorpion and swam off toward Delos. Apollo now approached Artemis. He pointed to the speck on the sea made by Orion's head as he swam rapidly away and challenged her to hit it with one of her arrows. Artemis took aim, shot at the speck, and killed Orion. When she learned that she had killed Orion she begged Asclepius to restore him to life, but Asclepius was killed by the thunderbolt of Zeus before he could do so. Artemis then set Orion's image among the stars, with the image of the scorpion ever in pursuit. But some say Artemis herself sent the scorpion against Orion, either because he had attempted to violate her, or pursued one of her maidens who had come from the Hyperboreans, or because he challenged her to a match at quoits, and that Orion died of the scorpion's bite. Unfortunate Actaeon, who accidentally happened to pass a fountain where the goddess and her companions were refreshing themselves, stopped to watch the goddess in her bath. When he was discovered Artemis transformed him into a stag and he was pursued and torn to pieces by his own hounds. Artemis escaped the amorous advances of the river-god Alpheus at Letrini in Elis by daubing her own face and the faces of her companions with white clay. For this she was given the epithet Alphaea (Whitish). When Alpheus came in search of her he could not tell which was the goddess and was forced to withdraw disappointed. And Artemis punished those of her companions who forgot their vows of chastity. When she noticed that Callisto, loved by Zeus, was about to have a child, she transformed her into a bear and set her companions to hunt her, but Zeus saved Callisto by translating her to the heavens. Others say it was not Artemis who transformed Callisto into a bear, but Zeus, to save her from Hera, and that Artemis and her maidens were tricked by Hera into pursuing the bear.

Artemis loved all animals, but the hind was her favorite. She transformed the Pleiad Taygete into a hind to help her escape the embraces of Zeus. Afterward, Taygete dedicated a hind with golden horns and bronze hoofs to Artemis in gratitude. Inscribed on the hind was the legend, "Taygete dedicated me to Artemis." But others say this hind, called the Cerynian hind because it roamed the Cerynian Hill, was one of five hinds with bronze hoofs and horns of gold that Artemis had seen as a child. She captured four of them and harnessed them to her chariot, but the fifth escaped. Heracles was ordered by Eurystheus to catch the Cerynian hind as one of his labors. Because it was sacred to Artemis he was reluctant to harm it. He pursued it for a year, and at last transfixed the forelegs of the creature with one arrow and captured it alive. Artemis reproached him for having harmed her sacred hind, but forgave him when he explained the necessity under which he was operating, and allowed him to carry it off to Eurystheus at Mycenae.

Some say that Artemis visited her anger at Atreus on his son Agamemnon because Atreus failed to sacrifice the golden-fleeced

lamb to her as he had promised. Others say that she punished Agamemnon because he killed a hare that was about to bear young, or because he killed a stag and boasted that "Artemis herself could not have done better." As the Greek fleet was gathered at Aulis in preparation for the voyage to Troy, it was windbound. Calchas the seer said Artemis was angry, and would not send favorable winds until Agamemnon had sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia to her. Agamemnon secured the presence of Iphigenia at Aulis by a trick, and made ready to sacrifice her. As she bared her throat to receive the knife, Artemis spirited her away and left a hind in her place. She took Iphigenia to her temple in Tauris and made her a priestess there, while the goddess went off and, like Apollo, helped the Trojans in the war. In the temple of Artemis at Tauris was an ancient wooden image of the goddess that had fallen from heaven. Strangers who were forced by storms to land on the coast were sacrificed to the Taurian Artemis, who was also called Artemis Tauropolus, Artemis Dictynna, Hecate, and Trivia. Certain preparatory rites were performed on the victim. He was then clubbed to death and his head severed from his body. The head was nailed to a cross and the decapitated body was cast into the sea from the cliff on which the temple of Taurian Artemis stood. If the victim was of noble blood he was killed with a sword by the priestess herself, and his corpse was burned in a sacred flame that rose from Tartarus. While Iphigenia was serving as priestess, Orestes, her brother, came, in obedience to an oracle, to fetch the image and take it back to Greece. Like other strangers, he was about to be sacrificed, but Iphigenia recognized him and with her help he escaped, taking her with him, and returned to Brauron, near Athens, with the image. Some say the goddess made Iphigenia immortal, and that she was sometimes known by the name Iphigenia herself. A temple of Artemis was raised at Brauron, and Iphigenia was its first priestess. At the temple, in obedience to instructions from Athena, the rites included pricking the throat of a man with a knife just enough to draw blood, in commemoration of the narrow escape of Orestes at Tauris. Brauronian Artemis was worshiped at Athens and Sparta, and stags and goats were sacrificed to her. An oracle said the altar of the Taurian image of Artemis should be stained with blood, as was the marble altar at Tauris, and at first human sacrifices were offered to her. In the time of Spartan Lyncurgus this practice was changed. Young boys were scourged in the temple while the priestess held the image of the goddess. If the scourgers did not lay on heavily enough the image grew so heavy the priestess could scarcely hold it. When the scourgers laid on with more vigor the image became light. An image of Brauronian Artemis, made by Phidias, was in her sanctuary on the Acropolis at Athens. Some say the ancient wooden image of Taurian Artemis was at Brauron, and that it was taken by Xerxes in the Persian War and given to the Syrians, who still claimed it was in their possession in the 2nd century A.D., but the Lydians and the Cappadocians each also claimed that they had the image. And others say Orestes took it to the sacred grove of Artemis at Aricia, in Italy, and that the Romans later returned it to Sparta. But the Spartans, who claimed they had the true image, said the Taurian image was lost. After centuries it was found in a thicket of willows at Limnaeum in Laconia by two noble Spartans who subsequently went mad. Because the image was held upright by willow fronds that twined around it, Artemis has the epithet Orthia (Upright) and Lygodesma (Willow-bound). This image at Limnaeum, the Spartans say, is the true image.

When Zeus asked Artemis what gifts she would like from him she asked for as many names as her brother Apollo. In addition to the epithets already mentioned, she was Agrotera (Huntress), Coryphaea (Of the Peak), Limnaea and Limnatis (Of the Lake), Daphnaea (Of the Laurel), Lyceia or Lycea (Wolfish), Aeginaea (Goat-goddess), Caryatis (Of the Walnut-tree), Cedreatis (Of the Cedar) from an image of the goddess set in a cedar tree, and Eurippa (Horse-finder) from a sanctuary raised by Odysseus in Arcadia where he found his mares for which he had been searching throughout Greece. She was Hiereia (Priestess), Pyronia (Fire-goddess), Peitho (Persuasion), Selasphorus and Phosphorus (Light-bearer), Ariste

Artemis/Artemisia

(Best), Calliste (Fairest), and Paedotrophus (Nurse of Children). Artemis Savior was worshiped in many places. In Megara there was an ancient sanctuary of Artemis Savior erected by grateful Megarians because the goddess helped them to defeat a force of Persians during the Persian War. The Persians lost their way in the hills at night. Thinking the enemy was nearby they shot off a volley of arrows. The arrows struck rocks, which Artemis caused to groan. Under the impression that they were killing Greeks, the Persians fired all their arrows, and the next day when the Megarians attacked them had no ammunition with which to defend themselves and were slain. Theseus raised a temple of Artemis Savior at Troezen in gratitude for her help in overcoming the Minotaur; and the people of Boeae in Laconia worshiped Artemis Savior because she helped them to find a site for their city. At Condylea, in Arcadia, she was worshiped as Condyleatis and as the Strangled Lady because some children playing near the sanctuary found a rope and tied it around the neck of the image, and said the goddess was being strangled. The Calydonians worshiped her as Laphria. At Patrae an annual feast was held, called Laphria. A circle of green logs was set up around the altar. A procession marched to the temple. The maiden priestess rode in a car drawn by a deer at the end of the procession. The next day, great numbers of live wild beasts were hurled on the fire that was lighted within the circle of green logs. Some say Artemis got the epithet Laphria from a Calydonian man named Laphrius. Others say the name was given her because her wrath weighed more lightly (elaphroteron) on the Calydonians and Oeneus as time passed. In Arcadia she was also Heme-rasia (She who Soothes) because at her sanctuary Melampus cured the daughters of Proetus of their madness. At Pyrrhicus in Laconia she was worshiped as Astrateia because she stayed the advance of the Amazons there.

The worship of Artemis was universal in Greece, Delos, Crete, Sicily, and southern Italy, and was especially strong in Arcadia, where she had many temples and sanctuaries, and throughout the Peloponnesus. In Thrace, Artemis was Tauropolus, to whom human sacrifices were made, and who drove men mad. Later, the Thracians sacrificed dogs to her. In Greek Asia she was widely worshiped. At Ephesus, where the Amazons were said to have introduced her worship, she was a fertility goddess. In the magnificent temple of Artemis there, was an image of Artemis Polymastus (Many-breasted), which had many breasts and bore a mural crown on the head. The symbol of Artemis Polymastus at Ephesus was a bee. Chaste Artemis, the huntress who roamed the mountains and streams and in whose care were all animals, led her nymphs in the groves and received sacrifices on woodland altars. She was known as Arcadian Artemis. Artemis of Ephesus, known as Ephesian Artemis, was an Asiatic deity adopted and adapted by the Greeks who settled in Asia Minor. The laurel and the fir tree were sacred to Artemis, as were the hind, the bear, the dog and the boar. Her attributes were the bow and quiver, torch, javelin, and crescent. In art she is represented as a young woman of noble and severe beauty, tall and majestic, and generally bearing bow and quiver as the huntress or mountain goddess, and often accompanied by a hind or a dog. She was identified by the Romans with their Diana, an original Italian divinity.

Artemisia (är-te-miz'i-ä, -mish'i-ä). A daughter of Lygdamis, who succeeded to the throne of Halicarnassus on the death of her husband, and ruled over the Dorian cities of Halicarnassus, Cos, Nisyrus, and Calydna. As a vassal of Persia she furnished five triremes to Xerxes I in the Second Persian War. Her ships, says Herodotus, were the most famous of the fleet after those of the Sidonians. She acted as a counselor to Xerxes and stood high in his favor. She advised Xerxes not to risk a sea fight with the Greeks after he had taken Athens, because she considered the Greeks superior at sea and besides, he had accomplished what he set out to do—made himself master of Athens. In her opinion the Greeks who had gathered on Salamis would not be able to hold out against him, cut off as they were from supplies, and she did not think it likely that they would do battle on behalf of Athens. Thus a sea fight was unnecessary in her view. She expressed the fear that if he undertook such a battle and was unsuccessful at sea great harm would come to his land forces. In addition, she had no very high opinion of some of the allies on whom he would be forced to rely in a sea fight. Xerxes was delighted that Artemisia, who had fought bravely at Euboea, dared to differ from his other captains in her advice which, however, he did not take. The fleet was ordered to Salamis and the army began to march towards the Peloponnesus. The Athenians were so indignant that a woman dared appear in arms against them that they offered a reward of 10,000 drachmas to whoever could capture her. The reward was never claimed. At the Battle of Salamis (480 B.C.) the Persian fleet was in confusion. Artemisia's ship was pursued by an Athenian trireme. In the press of ships which choked the escape route Artemisia rammed a Calyndnian ship, one of the Persian allies, and sank it without a trace. This act of destroying one of her allies brought her luck from two sides. The Athenian ship, seeing her sink the Calyndnian, thought she was a Greek ship or a Persian deserter and gave up pursuit, thus saving her life. Xerxes, watching the battle, saw her sink a ship and thought it was a Greek ship, as his advisers assured him it was. He is said to have remarked, "My men have behaved like women and my women like men." Since there were no survivors of the Calyndnian ship there was no one to expose her. After the Persian defeat at Salamis Xerxes again asked advice of Artemisia: whether to return to Persia and leave Mardonius behind with a land army, as Mardonius wished. She advised Xerxes to go home, so that the Persians would still have their master. What happened to Mardonius was unimportant, she thought. If he were successful it would redound to the credit of Xerxes; if he failed it would be the loss only of a slave. This time Xerxes took her advice and, entrusting certain of his children to Artemisia, he departed for Persia.

Artemisia (of Caria). Queen of Caria, in Asia Minor, 352-c350 B.C.; fl. middle of 4th century B.C. In memory of her husband Mausolus, she built at Halicarnassus a tomb, the Mausoleum, which was regarded by the ancients as one of the seven wonders of the world. To give further proof of her affection she is said to have mixed her husband's ashes with a precious liquid and to have drunk the potion so prepared.

Artemisium (är-tē-mish'i-um). A promontory in N Euboea, Greece, crowned by a temple of Artemis. Here where the sea runs in a narrow channel between the island of Sciathus and the mainland of Magnesia, the Greeks sent a fleet to engage the Persian fleet while their army was being engaged at the pass of Thermopylae. Alarmed over the fate of their country, now being invaded by the Persians, the people of Delphi consulted the oracle and were told to pray to the winds, for the winds would do Greece great service. When the Persian fleet assembled near Artemisium it was scattered by a great storm that lasted four days. The Athenians said Boreas sent the winds to help them, and raised a temple to Boreas on the Ilissus River. The Persians claimed that they brought the storm to an end by sacrificing to Thetis, for it was near where their fleet was anchored, Cape Sepias, that Peleus had seized Thetis, and the area was sacred to her. The Persians regrouped at Aphetæ. The Greeks would have withdrawn, being greatly outnumbered, but some say Themistocles was bribed by the Euboeans to remain at Artemisium and risk a battle. The Persians thought to surround the small Greek fleet, and sent a fleet of 200 ships around Euboea to bottle up the Greeks in the strait. The Greeks, commanded by Eurybiades, were warned of the Persian plan by an Ionian who deserted from the Persians, and they resolved to sail against the Persian ships at Artemisium. The Persians thought they were mad when they saw the few Greek ships coming against them, and expected they would easily overcome them. The Greeks executed a maneuver: at a signal they brought the sterns of their ships together, the prows facing outward in a circle toward the enemy. At a second signal they attacked. They captured or sank 30 Persian ships. The battle was still raging when night fell. The Persians retired to Aphetæ, the Greeks to Artemisium. During the night a crashing storm buffeted the Persian fleet at Aphetæ and completely destroyed the 200 ships that were on their way around Euboea. After two more days of sea fights the Greek fleet withdrew, having inflicted heavy damage on the Persians but without reaching a decisive result. The battle at Artemisium took place at the same time as the nearby land battle at Thermopylae (480 B.C.). The two battles represented a desperate attempt to keep out the Persian invaders; neither of the battles succeeded in this aim.

In 1928, in the Straits of Artemisium, Greek sponge-divers located an ancient wreck containing fragments of classical sculpture, and further diving recovered the now famous Zeus of Artemisium, a bronze statue of the middle of the 5th century B.C. showing the god hurling his thunderbolt, and a Hellenistic group of a horse and diminutive jockey.

Artemisius (är-tē-miz'ī-us), Mount. Mountain on the border of Arcadia and Argolis, near Mantinea. Here the Inachus River rises. On the mountain was a temple and image of Artemis, for whom the mountain was named.

Aruns (ar'unz). In Roman legend, the Trojan ally who slew Camilla, the ally of Turnus. Camilla had been dedicated to Diana by her father, and on her death the goddess sent Opis to kill Aruns and avenge Camilla, and rescue her body.

Arval Brothers (är'val). In ancient Rome, a priesthood of 12 members, including the emperor, who offered public sacrifices for the fertility of the fields.

Aryballus (ar-i-bal'us). A form of Greek vase. Probably in ancient times this name was applied to a large vase with a small neck, used for carrying water to the bath. In later archaeological nomenclature, it generally denotes a small vase shaped like a ball, with a short neck and a small orifice surrounded by a broad flat rim, used like the alabastrum in anointing the body with oil.

Ascalabus (as-kal'a-bus). In mythology, a son of Misme of Eleusis. When Demeter, searching for her lost daughter Persephone, came to the house of Misme she was received kindly and given water to drink. In her thirst, Demeter drank it hastily and Ascalabus mocked her for her greed. To punish him, Demeter sprinkled some of the water on Ascalabus and transformed him into a lizard. A similar story is related of Abas, the son of Celeus.

Ascalaphus (as-kal'a-fus). In mythology, a son of Acheron, the river-god, and Orphne, a nymph of the groves of Avernus. He was a gardener in the Underworld and saw Persephone eat seeds from a pomegranate when she was abducted by Hades. On learning that Persephone could leave the Underworld provided she had eaten no food there, he informed Hades that she had eaten the pomegranate seeds. For this reason Persephone was compelled to divide her time between earth and the Underworld. Demeter changed Ascalaphus into an owl, or put him under a great stone, as a punishment for his tale-bearing.

Ascalaphus. In Greek legend, a son of Ares and Astyoche. He and his brother, Ialmenus, accompanied Jason in the Argo on the expedition for the Golden Fleece. The brothers were suitors of Helen, daughter of Leda and Zeus, and took the oath with the other suitors, to come to the aid of the man who became her husband should any ill befall him as a result of his marriage. When Helen was carried off to Troy by Paris, Ascalaphus joined with others from Boeotian Orchomenus who served under Agamemnon in the Trojan War. Ascalaphus served as a sentry. In the fighting before Troy he was killed by Deïphobus.

Ascalon (as'ka-lon). [Also: Ashkelon, Askelon, Eshkalon; Assyrian, Isqualuna; modern name, Migdal Ashkalon.] In ancient geography, one of the five chief cities of Philistia, situated on the Mediterranean about 39 miles SW of Jerusalem. According to Herodotus, it was the site of the most ancient of all the temples of Aphrodite, even antedating that at Cyprus which was built in imitation of it. The temple was pillaged by Scythians when, having overrun Media, they were on their way to Egypt. As a punishment for their desecration of the temple Aphrodite caused these Scythians and many of their descendants to suffer from the "female sickness," that is, they were afflicted with a tendency to impotency. The temple to which Herodotus referred was later identified as the temple of Derceto, a Syrian goddess whose form was half-maiden and half-fish, and whose sacred lake was nearby. Ascalon is mentioned in Phoenician and Assyrian inscriptions; the names of four of its kings (Sidka, Sarludari, Rukibti, and Mitenti) appear in the annals of Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.) and Esarhaddon (680-668 B.C.). Herod I, whose birthplace it was, adorned the city with many edifices.

Ascania (as-kā'ni-a), Lake. [Modern Turkish, İsnik or Iznik.] In ancient geography, a lake in Bithynia, Asia Minor, draining finally into the Sea of Marmara. Nicaea was situated at its E extremity. Length, about 11 miles.

Ascanius (as-kā-ni-us). In Roman legend, the son of Aeneas and Creusa. He accompanied his father on the flight from Troy. When the Trojans were shipwrecked on the shores of Carthage Cupid, sent by Venus, assumed the form of Ascanius to cause Dido to fall in love with Aeneas. Jupiter, to reassure Venus who was complaining of the ills which beset Aeneas, foretold a 30-year reign for Ascanius in Italy, and that his dynasty would rule for 300 years, until a priestess should bear twin sons by Mars who would found the Roman nation. In Latium Ascanius shot a tame stag and inflamed the Latins against the Trojans; this was one of the causes of the war between the Latins and the Trojans, in the course of which Ascanius used his bow against men for the first time. But he was prevented from taking an active part by Apollo, who restrained him in order to preserve him for his destiny. Ascanius moved the kingdom founded by Aeneas from Lavinium and made Alba Longa, on the slopes of the Alban Mount, his stronghold. Here, as Jupiter had foretold, his descendants ruled after his death. Latin writers also call him Iulus.

Asclepiadae (as-klē-pī'a-dē). Primarily, a word meaning the sons or descendants of Asclepius. It came to apply to a priestly family that gathered and preserved medical information, traditions, and practices over the course of many years. The material so gathered and preserved was handed down secretly from father to son. Hippocrates belonged to this family.

Asclepiades of Bithynia (as-klē-pī'a-dēz; bi-thin'i-a). Greek physician; fl. c100 B.C. He is notable as the first eminent one of his country to practice at Rome. He opposed the theories of Hippocrates, asserting that disease springs from a disordered movement of the corpuscles and that a cure is achieved by soothing remedies, such as diet, moderate exercise, bathing, wine, and (for the insane) music. He achieved considerable success in Rome by his methods. Portions of his written works are preserved.

Asclepiades of Samos (sā'mos). Greek lyric poet and writer of epigrams. He was a native of Samos, a younger contemporary of Theocritus, and was active in the early 3rd century B.C. He is the earliest, and considered by some the most important, of his school. According to some scholars his graceful love poems gave the name Asclepiadean to that type of verse. Some 40 epigrams of his are found in the Greek Anthology.

Asclepius (as-klē'pi-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Coronis and Apollo. Apollo caused Coronis' death, before Asclepius was born, because he found she had been unfaithful to him. As her body lay on the funeral pyre he was overcome with remorse and resolved at least to save his son. He sent Hermes to snatch the unborn child from his mother's womb. Hermes took the infant to Chiron the centaur, who brought him up and taught him the arts of healing and hunting. Asclepius was much more interested in the medical arts than in sport, and soon outstripped his master. Aided also by instruction from Apollo, he became a skilled surgeon and highly successful in prescribing drugs. Some say Athena gave him two phials of the blood of Medusa when her head was cut off by Perseus. The blood that was drawn from the left side was used to restore the dead to life; that from the right side he used to destroy life. But others say Athena divided the blood drawn from Medusa between herself and Asclepius. She used her share for destructive ends; Asclepius used his share for healing. Asclepius was the father of Podalirius and Machaon, the physicians who accompanied the Greeks to Troy, and of Hygea. Asclepius is said to have used the blood of Medusa, or an herb known only to him, to restore Lycurgus, Capaneus, Tyndareus, Glaucus, Orion, and Hippolytus to life. Hades complained to Zeus, some say, that Asclepius was taking away his subjects by restoring them to life, and Zeus killed him with his thunderbolt. Others say Asclepius accepted a bribe in defiance of divine law, and restored the dead to life, and was slain by the thunderbolt of Zeus. Apollo, infuriated at the slaying of his son, killed the Cyclopes, because they had forged the thunderbolt of Zeus. To punish him, Zeus ordered him to serve Admetus of Pherae for a year without pay. Some say Asclepius was later restored to life himself, thus fulfilling a prophecy that he would fulfill his destiny twice. His image was set among the stars. Asclepius was worshiped throughout Greece as a hero and god of healing for centuries. One of his most famous shrines was at Epidaurus. In his temple there several serpents were kept, for serpents, annually renewing themselves by shedding their skins, were connected in some mysterious way with the art of healing. Asclepius was always shown with a serpent, usually carrying a staff about which a serpent was coiled. The cock was commonly sacrificed to him. Patients who went to the healing shrine at Epidaurus slept in the temple, presided over by an image of Sleep or Dreams, and their cures were related to them in dreams. A great festival in honor of Asclepius was held every five years at Epidaurus. There were temples and shrines to Asclepius throughout Greece. At Pergamum, founded by a colony from Epidaurus, there was another famous shrine; as there was also at Tricca in Thessaly, whose inhabitants claimed that their town was the birthplace of the healing god. After 293 B.C. Asclepius was worshiped in Rome, under the name Aesculapius. He had been brought to Rome in the form of a serpent; his shrine was on the Tiber island.

Asconius Pedianus (as-kō'ni-us pē-di-ā'nus), Quintus. Roman historian and grammarian, born probably at Patavium (Padua), 9 B.C.; died 76 A.D. He was notable for his commentaries on Cicero's speeches.

Asculum Apulum (as'kū-lum ap'ū-lum). [Modern name, Ascoli Satriano.] In ancient geography, a town of SW Italy, in the region of Apulia, on the slopes of the Apennines. The town was founded by the Romans. It was the scene of the costly victory (279 B.C.) of Pyrrhus over the Romans.

Asculum Picenum (pī-sē'num). [Modern name, Ascoli Piceno.] A town in the Abruzzi on the Adriatic slope of the Apennines, capital of the Picentes, which fought against Rome in the Social War and was destroyed by Pompey, but rapidly regained importance under the empire. It has many antiquities: fortification walls, a gate, the Porta Romana, remains of an aqueduct, a Roman bridge over the river Truentus (modern Tronto), still in use, a second Roman bridge whose arch fell recently, a well-preserved Roman temple of the 1st century A.D., now the church of S. Gregorio, and Romanesque churches and houses of exceptional interest. Ancient cemeteries in the vicinity have yielded evidence of early commerce via the Adriatic with central Europe and S Italy, the Aegean, and the Balkans. (JJ)

Ascus (as'kus). In mythology, a giant who helped Lycurgus to put Dionysus in chains on the border of Thrace, or, as some say, cast him into a river. Zeus or Hermes came to the rescue of Dionysus. They slew Ascus and took his hide for a wineskin. Some say that the city of Damascus in Syria got its name from this incident.

Asea (ā-sē'a). Town in Arcadia, in the central Peloponnesus, with a fortified acropolis commanding the Asean Plain, celebrated for its springs which flow to the Alpheus, and capital of the short-lived Asean League. (JJ)

Asia (ā'zhā). To the ancient Greeks, Asia meant the lands bordering the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea. The name also embraced the few parts of Africa known to them, and it was only after the Nile began to be considered as a dividing river that the countries W of it were separated from Asia, while Egypt was still included in it. Moreover, the knowledge of the ancients with regard to Asia did not reach far beyond the boundaries of the Perso-Macedonian empire. The parts S of the Himalaya range were called India, those to the N Scythia. The west was termed Upper and Lower Asia, the Tigris being the dividing line between both.

Asia Minor (mī'nor). Peninsula of W Asia which lies between the Euxine Sea and the Propontis on the N, the Aegean Sea on the W, and the Mediterranean Sea on the S; the E boundary is vague. The chief divisions in ancient times were Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Lycia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Phrygia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, Lycaonia, Cilicia, Cappadocia, and Pontus. The surface is in the main a plateau, traversed by the Taurus and other ranges. The chief rivers are the Sangarius, Halys, Maeander, Sarus, and Hermus.

It was the seat of Troy, Lydia, and other ancient powers, and of the Ionian Greek civilization; its possession has been disputed by Persia, Macedonia, Syria, Rome, the Byzantine empire, Parthia, the Saracens, the Seljuks, and the modern Turks. According to Herodotus, there were 15 races or nations in Asia Minor: in the S part the Cilicians, Pamphylians, Lycians, and Caunians; W of the great central plateau, close to the coast, the Carians, Lydians, Mysians, and Greeks; on the shores of the Euxine, Thracians, Mariandynians, Paphlagonians, and Cappadocians; in the interior, the Phrygians, Chalybes, and Matieni.

Asinara (ās-i-nā'ra), Gulf of. Arm of the Mediterranean, off the NW coast of Sardinia. See also Insula Herculis.

Asinarus (ās-i-nā'rus). [Italian names, Falconare, Fiume di Noto.] In ancient geography, a small river near Syracuse, Sicily. To this stream came the Athenians under Nicias, after their total defeat at Syracuse, 413 B.C. Tormented by thirst, they rushed into the river. The Syracusans, with their Peloponnesian allies, manned the steep bank on the opposite side of the river and shot them down ruthlessly as they plunged into the water to drink. Nicias surrendered here to stop the slaughter of his men. To celebrate the anniversary of their great victory, the Syracusans established Asinarian Games, named for the river where the total destruction of the enemy took place.

Asine (a'si-nē). In ancient geography, a city of Argolis, on the Gulf of Argolis. The people were Dryopes, who originally came from Mount Parnassus. They were captured by Heracles and taken as slaves to Delphi, but the oracle commanded that they be taken to the Peloponnesus. The people of Asine claimed they were not taken as slaves to Delphi but abandoned their town when Heracles assaulted it, and appealed to Eurystheus, who gave them Asine near Hermion in Argolis out of enmity to Heracles. These Dryopes of Asine were the only Dryopians who were proud to be called Dryopes. Men of Asine went to the Trojan War under the command of Diomedes and his friend Sthenelus. Asine was destroyed by Argos in the 7th century B.C. Excavations have re-

Asine. City of the Peloponnesus, on the western shore of the Gulf of Messenia. It was given to people who had been driven out of Argos by the Spartans, after the First Messenian War, and the Argives occupied it ever after. At the end of the Second Messenian War, which resulted in the conquest of Messenia, Asine alone was left separate in the division of the land.

Asius (ā'si-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), the son of Hyrtacus. He came from Arisbe on the banks of the Selleis river in the Troad as an ally of the Trojans. Polydamas advised the Trojans not to attack the Greek moat and wall in their chariots, lest the horses stumble into the moat, upset the chariots, and make the warriors an easy prey for the Greeks. Asius refused to take his advice. He drove at the Greeks in the way which the Greeks used to return in their war-cars, but once inside the walls he was unable to maneuver. He descended from his chariot, and in an attempt to kill Idomeneus was himself slain by that hero. His horses were captured by Antilochus, son of Nestor.

Asius. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Dymas, and the brother of Hecuba. When Patroclus had driven the Trojans back to the gates of Troy, Hector paused to decide whether to fight on or withdraw inside the walls. Apollo assumed the form of Asius, Hector's uncle, and urged him to turn on Patroclus and perhaps Apollo would give him victory. Asius was slain by Ajax.

Asklepios (as-klē'pi-os). See Asclepius.

Asopus (a-sō'pus). The god of the Sicyonian river of the same name. By his wife Metope, the daughter of Ladon, he was the father of two sons, Pelasgus and Ismenus, and 12 (or as some say, 20) daughters—Corcyra, Salamis, Aegina, Pirene, Cleone, Thebe, Tanagra, Thespeia, Asopis, Sinope, Ornia, and Chalcis. His beautiful daughters were harassed by the attentions of various gods who carried them off and ravished them. Sinope was carried off by Apollo, according to some accounts, and bore him a son, but later shrewdly frustrated the attentions of Zeus. Corcyra and Salamis were abducted by Poseidon. Thebe disappeared with Zeus.

Asopus/Assus

When Aegina too disappeared Asopus lost patience with the gods and determined to recover her. He learned that Sisyphus of Corinth had information concerning her whereabouts, but Sisyphus never gave away anything for nothing. It was necessary for Asopus to bribe him by giving Corinth the never-failing Pirene Fountain, to tell what he knew. Sisyphus then divulged that Zeus had carried off Aegina. Asopus pursued Zeus and overtook him in a forest. Zeus, who was carrying no thunderbolts at the time, fled and changed himself into a huge stone to escape the wrath of Asopus. When Asopus had passed by Zeus resumed his shape, returned to Olympus, and from there hurled thunderbolts at Asopus. He wounded Asopus and lamed him. It is for this reason that the Asopus River flows sluggishly, and the thunderbolts hurled by Zeus at Asopus are said to account for the lumps of burned coal that are sometimes found in the river bed.

Asopus. A town in Laconia, on the eastern promontory of the Peloponnesus on the Gulf of Laconia. It was noted for a sanctuary of Asclepius, who was here given the epithet Philolaus, "Loved by the people." Athena here was named Cyparissia, "Cypress goddess."

Asopus. [Modern name, Oropo.] In ancient geography, a small river in Boeotia, Greece, flowing into the Euripus in N Attica.

Asopus. [Modern name, Hagios Georgios.] In ancient geography, a small river in Sicyonia, Greece, rising in Phliasia and flowing through Sicyonia to empty into the Corinthian Gulf about four miles NE of Sicyon. According to tradition, the water of the Asopus came under the sea from the Maeander River in Caria.

Aspasia (as-pā'zhā). Greek courtesan, born at Miletus, in Ionia; fl. c440 B.C. She was renowned for her wisdom, beauty, and wit. She was for many years the mistress of Pericles, who was so attracted to her that he left his wife and would have married her except for his own law of 451 B.C., which forbade Athenians to take foreign wives. Her brilliance made her house a center of Athenian literary and philosophical life. According to some accounts, she advised Pericles on public policy and helped him write his speeches. Accused of impiety, she was saved from death by Pericles' eloquence; her son, by Pericles, was legitimized under his father's name by a special Athenian decree after the death of Pericles' two sons by his first wife.

Aspendos (as-pen'dos). [Also: Aspendus.] In ancient geography, a city in Pamphylia, Asia Minor, on the Eurymedon. It contains a Roman theater which is one of the best-preserved of all ancient structures of the kind. The cavea is quite intact. There is also a Roman aqueduct which crosses the valley by a long range of arches.

Asphalius (as-fal'i-us). Epithet of Poseidon, as a god who grants safety to harbors and to navigation in general. Poseidon was worshiped under this name in several towns of Greece.

Asphodel Fields (as'fō-del.) Named by Homer as the meadow of the dead, where the shades of heroes wandered disconsolately. In Greek mythology the asphodel was the peculiar plant of the dead, its pale blossoms covering the meadows of Hades; perhaps because in Greek lands it is a very common weed, plentiful in barren and desert places and about tombs.

Assaracus (a-sar'a-kus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Tros and Callirhoë, and a descendant of Dardanus and Ilus, the founders of the Trojan race. He was a king in Phrygia, and the brother of Ganymede, Ilus the Younger, and Cleopatra. Through his son Capys he was the ancestor of Aeneas.

Assus (as'us). [Also: Assos; modern Turkish, Behram or Behramköy.] In ancient geography, a city situated on the Gulf of Adramyttium, Mysia. The site, in what is now W Turkey, was thoroughly explored and excavated (1881-82) by the Archaeological Institute of America, with the important result of illustrating the architectural and topographical development of a minor Greek city with a completeness comparable to the body of information supplied by Pompeii concerning Roman towns under somewhat similar conditions. The remains studied include very extensive fortifications of successive periods, and temples ranging from the archaic Doric to foundations of the Christian era, a theater, baths, porticoes, a gymnasium, private dwellings in great variety, a remarkable and highly adorned street of tombs, and a Greek bridge.

Assyria (ā-sir'i-ā). [Greek, Syria; ancient name, Assur, Asur, or Ashur; Persian, Athura.] Ancient Asiatic state which at the period of its greatest power covered a territory of about 75,000 square miles, bounded by Armenia on the N, the Lower Zab River on the S, the Zagros Mountains on the E, and the Euphrates River on the W. The name was derived from that of the national deity, Assur, and was first applied to the city situated about 50 miles S of the modern Mosul. The city of Assur is not mentioned in the Old Testament, but it survived Nineveh, being still in existence in the time of Cyrus of Persia (Cyrus the Great), the conqueror of Babylon. The name Assur, besides being given to the city (and thence to the country), was also an element in the names of many Assyrian rulers. The Persians called the city Athura. The Greeks included under the name Assyria, or its shortened form Syria, the entire territory between Babylonia and the Mediterranean, sometimes applying it even to Babylonia. The N and E portions of the country were mountainous but the greater part was flat, being an extension of the Babylonian plain. Its principal rivers were the Tigris, the Upper and Lower Zab, the Kurnib, the Khoser, and the W Khabur. It was a fertile country, and abounded in all sorts of animals, among others the stag, roebuck, wild bull, and lion. The hunting of the lion was the favorite sport of the Assyrian kings. According to Genesis (x. 8-12, 22) the Assyrians were descendants of Shem and emigrants from Babylon. Their Semitic-Babylonian origin is fully attested by their sculptures and inscriptions. Their language is, apart from a few dialectical and orthographical variations, identical with Babylonian, and closely akin to Hebrew. Assyria derived its civilization from Babylonia. Its religion was the same as that of the mother-country, with the exception of the national god Assur, who was placed by them at the head of the pantheon. Assyrian architecture was a slavish copy of that of Babylonia. Although stone abounded in Assyria, bricks continued to be used in imitation of the practice in Babylonia, where no stone existed. The Babylonian emigrants who founded Assyria have been dated by some scholars as leaving Babylonia c2000 B.C., although some recent archaeological research indicates the probability of a settlement at an even earlier date. In the 15th century B.C., Assyria was involved in a war with Babylonia. War continued between the two countries for a long time with varying success. Finally, however, Assyria became supreme and Babylonia the vassal state. The chief maker of Assyria's glory was Tiglath-pileser I (c1120-1100 B.C.), who conquered the city of Babylon, other cities of Babylonia, and penetrated as far as the Mediterranean. His more important successors were Assur-dan II (930-911 B.C.), Assurnazirpal (884-860 B.C.), Shalmaneser III (860-824 B.C.), who came in contact with Damascus and Israel, Tiglath-pileser III (Phul in the Old Testament), 745-727 B.C., whose power extended to the confines of Egypt and who put the crown of Babylon on his head, Sargon (722-705 B.C.), the conqueror of Samaria, who defeated the Egyptians of Raphia, Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.), and Esarhaddon (680-668 B.C.). These last two kings mark the height of Assyrian power, and Esarhaddon was enabled by his conquests to add to his name the title king of Upper and Lower Egypt and Ethiopia. Under Assurbanipal (the Sardanapalus of Greek writers), 608-626 B.C., the decline of the empire began. In some respects this reign was most prosperous and brilliant; it was the golden age of art and literature. Under this reign too, Susa was conquered and destroyed. But signs of the approaching disintegration were seen in the constant uprisings of the oppressed nations. The downward course was rapid. Once, c625 B.C., Assyria succeeded in repelling an attack of the Medes and Persians, but later, Cyaxares in union with Nabopolassar of Babylon repeated the attack (606 B.C.), Nineveh fell, and Assyrian power entirely disappeared.

Astacus (as'ta-kus). [Modern Turkish name, Izmit.] In ancient geography, a Greek colony in Bithynia, Asia Minor, near Nicomedia.

Asta Pompeia (as'ta pom-pē'ā). An ancient name of Asti, city in the Piedmont region of N Italy.

Asteria/Astyages

goddess of fecundity and love, among the Phoenicians equivalent to the Ishtar of the Assyro-Babylonians; often considered to be an equivalent of the Greek Aphrodite. She is the female counterpart of Baal, with whom she held the first place in the Phoenician pantheon. Baal was identified with the sun, and Astarte with the moon, and she is often represented under the symbol of the crescent. The chief seat of her worship was at Sidon. The pomegranate and the dove were sacred to her. The favorite places of her worship were sacred groves, and she herself was often adored under the symbol of a tree, the asherah (translated "grove") often denounced in the Old Testament. Her cult in later times was combined with orgiastic celebration.

Asteria (a-stē'ri-a). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the Titans, Coeus and Phoebe, and the mother, by Perses, of Hecate. Pursued by Zeus, she assumed the form of a quail and leaped into the sea to escape him. She was then transformed into an island, Ortygia, which floated in the sea. Later, when her sister, Leto, sought refuge to bear her children, the tiny island received her gladly; four pillars rose from the sea floor to anchor it, and the modest island, thereafter called Delos, became famed as the birthplace of Leto's children, Apollo and Artemis.

Asteria. An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as a goddess of the heavens, meaning "Starry."

Asterion (as-tē'ri-on), or Asterius (-us). According to tradition, a son of Cometes. He sailed with Jason on the Argo.

Asterion. In ancient geography, a river of Argolis, Greece. When Hera and Poseidon contended for control of Argos the river-god Asterion was one of the judges of the dispute. He awarded the land to Hera. In a rage at the decision, Poseidon dried up his waters. The stream Asterion flowed past the Argive shrine of Hera, called the Heraeum. Some say one of the nymphs who cared for Hera in her childhood was the nymph of this river named Asterion.

Asterius (as-tē'ri-us). In Greek mythology, the king of Crete when Europa was brought there by Zeus. After Zeus left Europa, with the three sons she had borne him, Asterius married her, and since this marriage was childless he adopted her three sons and made them his heirs. Asterius or Asterion was also the name given to the Minotaur, the monster that Pasiphaë bore as a result of her unnatural union with the Cretan Bull.

Asterius. In mythology, a giant, the son of Anax. He succeeded his father as ruler of the land later known as Caria. Miletus, fleeing from King Minos of Crete, came to his land and killed Asterius. His body, later disinterred from its grave on a neighboring island, was found to be over ten cubits long.

Asterius. In Greek legend, a son of Hyperasius. With his brother Amphion he was one of the Argonauts who accompanied Jason on the quest for the Golden Fleece.

Asterodia (as-tēr-ō-dī'a). A Caucasian nymph. She was the mother, by Aeëtes, king of Colchis, of Apsyrtus.

Asteropaeus (as-tēr-ō-pē'us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan ally. He was a Lycian from Paeonia, a son of Pelegon, and a descendant of the river-god of the Axius River. He accompanied Sarpedon at the siege of the Greek moat and walls. He was later slain by Achilles on the banks of the Scamander River and Achilles bore off his remarkable armor.

Asterope (as-ter'ō-pē). Another name for Sterope, one of the Pleiades.

Astrabacus (as-trā'bā-kus). According to tradition, a Spartan prince who with Alopecus found the wooden image of Artemis that Orestes brought back from Tauris.

Astraea or Astrea (as-trē'a). In classical mythology, the goddess of justice.

Astraeus (as-trē'us). In Greek mythology, a son of the Titan Crius and Eurybia, and the brother of the Titans Pallas and Perses. He was the father of the winds and the stars by Eos, the goddess of Dawn.

Astrateia (as-tra-tī'a). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Stayer." There was a sanctuary of Artemis Astrateia at Pyrrhicus, in Laconia, because the advance of the Amazons was stayed there.

Astronomica (as-trō-nom'i-ka). A Latin hexameter poem on astrology, of which five books survive, by the Roman poet Marcus Manilius, a contemporary of Augustus and Tiberius. (JJ)

Astyages (as-tī'a-jēz). Son of Cyaxares, king of the Medes. According to Herodotus, who is the source of the following information, he married a daughter of Alyattes, king of Lydia, and thus was the brother-in-law of Croesus, who later became king of Lydia. Astyages succeeded his father as king of the Medes and reigned in the period 584-c549 B.C. He had a daughter Mandane, of whom he dreamed that such a flood of water flowed from her that it covered all Asia. The interpretation which the Magi put on this dream terrified him. As a consequence, he married his daughter to a Persian nobleman, Cambyses, who was of the royal race of the Persians and their hereditary monarch, but since at that time the Persians were subject to the Medes he was looked on as inferior as a husband to a Mede of a lower class. After Mandane was married to Cambyses and had gone to his home in Persia, Astyages dreamed again. This time it seemed that from his daughter's womb grew a tree which overshadowed all of Asia. The Magi interpreted this to mean that Mandane's offspring would become king if he lived long enough. Astyages sent to Persia and ordered Mandane brought back to his court. He gave orders that the child she was about to bear should be destroyed as soon as it was born. Soon afterward Cyrus was born. He was given into the hands of Harpagus, a trusted aid of Astyages, to be destroyed. As it happened the orders of Astyages were not carried out—the shepherd to whom Harpagus gave the task brought up the child as his own son—but Astyages and Harpagus were unaware of this. Years later a boy was brought before Astyages on the complaint of a Median noble, who accused the lad of playing the king and insulting the son of the nobleman. Astyages was struck by the appearance of the boy, and soon learned that it was his own grandson, whom he thought had been slain. He sent the child, Cyrus, to his mother in Persia, having been assured that his dream was fulfilled because Cyrus had acted as king among his playmates. But Harpagus he punished for his disobedience by slaying his son, cutting the body in pieces, and serving it to Harpagus at a banquet. At the end of the banquet he asked Harpagus how he had enjoyed it. When Harpagus answered that he had enjoyed it very much, Astyages order his servants to bring in the hands, feet, and head of Harpagus' son, that the father might know on what flesh he had feasted. (This story appears in various myths, as in the story of Atreus and Thyestes.) Harpagus maintained his composure, saying that whatever pleased the king pleased him, but thenceforth he determined on revenge. He enlisted the interest of some powerful Median nobles who chafed under the harsh rule of Astyages. When Cyrus grew to manhood Harpagus sent messages to him, urging him to lead the Persians in a revolt against Astyages, and assuring him of the coöperation of the Median nobles and himself. The Persians had long been anxious to throw off the Median yoke, thus when Cyrus proposed that they revolt they accepted him as their leader with enthusiasm. Astyages got wind of the plot and summoned Cyrus into his presence. When Cyrus came it was at the head of an army. Astyages, forgetting the cruelty he had earlier inflicted on Harpagus, sent out an army against Cyrus that was commanded by Harpagus and, according to plan, this army was quickly put to flight. When Astyages learned of the defeat of his army he sent for the Magi who had advised him to send Cyrus to his parents in Persia, because the dream had been fulfilled, and impaled them. Then at the head of a hastily gathered force he marched out against Cyrus and was utterly defeated by him in battle (c549 B.C.). Astyages had ruled for 35 years when he was defeated by Cyrus and his people passed under the dominion of Persia. Astyages spent the remainder of his days in the court of Cyrus, where he was courteously treated. Later he encountered Harpagus, who taunted him with having lost his kingdom and bragged that he had engineered the revolt. Astyages answered him that if it was true he was powerful enough to stir up the revolt then he was a fool not to have led it himself and made himself sovereign; and moreover, he had done an evil service to his own countrymen, the Medes, by helping to set a Persian over them. Astyanax (as-tī'ā-naks). In Greek legend, the son of Hector and Andromache. At the fall of Troy Odysseus advised Agamemnon to kill Astyanax lest, when he was grown up, he assemble the Trojans and make war on the Greeks. In consequence of this advice and a prophecy by Calchas, Astyanax was taken from his mother's arms and hurled from the towers of Troy. Astyanax was also known as Scamandrius.

Astydamas (as-tī'da-mas). Name of two Greek tragic poets, father and son, of the 4th century B.C. Fragments are all that remain of their works.

Astydamia (as'ti-da-mī'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Amyntor of Ormenius. It is extremely difficult to disentangle the various mothers of the many children of Heracles, but according to some accounts her father refused to give her to Heracles, on the ground that he already had a wife; Heracles then slew Amyntor and abducted Astydamia, and she bore him a son, either Tlepolemus or Ctesippus. Other accounts however, say that Astyoche was the mother of Tlepolemus.

Astydamia. According to some accounts, a daughter of Pelops and Hippodamia, and the mother of Amphitryon.

Astyoche, Astyocheia (as-tī'ō-kē, as'tī'ō-kī'a). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Phyleus, king of Ephyra on the Selleis River. When her father's city was attacked by Heracles she was carried off as a captive and became the mother, by Heracles, of Tlepolemus.

Astypalaea (as'ti-pa-lē'a). [Also: Astropalia; Italian, Stampalia.] Greek island in the Aegean Sea, about 77 miles NW of Rhodes; one of the Dodecanese Islands. Length, about 13 miles.

Atabyrian (a-ta-bī'ri-an). Epithet of Zeus, from his sanctuary on Mount Atabyrium (or Atabyrum or Atabyris), the highest peak on the island of Rhodes. The sanctuary was founded at Althaemenes, son of Catreus, who had voluntarily gone into exile at Rhodes from his native Crete so that he would not be the one to fulfill an oracle predicting that Catreus would meet death at the hands of one of his children. From the sanctuary, which was still highly esteemed in the 1st century B.C., the homesick Althaemenes could see his native Crete in the distance. Atabyrian Zeus was worshiped in the form of a bull, and bronze images of bulls on the mountain were said to bellow when any evil threatened.

Atalanta (at-a-lan'ta) or Atalante (-tē). In Greek legend, the supposed daughter of Iasius of Arcadia, but some say Zeus was her father. Iasius had hoped for a son. In his disappointment over the birth of a daughter he exposed the child on a mountain to die. Artemis became her protector and sent a she-bear to nurse the infant until she was found by a band of hunters. They rescued her and brought her up. Once later, when Atalanta was fainting from thirst she called on Artemis for help, and struck the earth with the point of her spear. Artemis caused a stream of water to gush forth. Atalanta was warned by the oracle at Delphi against marriage, but the oracle added that she would marry and that she would not enjoy her marriage. She therefore shunned the society of men and devoted herself to hunting, as did the virgin goddess Artemis. She became a skilled and fearless hunter, and once killed two centaurs who pursued her in the forest. According to some accounts, she accompanied the Argonauts in the quest for the Golden Fleece, but others say that Jason refused her request to be admitted as a member of his company on the ground that the presence of one woman among so many men would cause trouble. When she heard of the great company that Meleager of Calydon was assembling to hunt the Calydonian Boar she eagerly went to join the group. Meleager saw her lovely face, fell in love with her charm, which was boyish and feminine at the same time, and welcomed her as a member of the hunt. But the great heroes who had come at Meleager's call objected strongly to the presence of a woman in their midst, and some threatened to withdraw. Meleager announced that they must accept Atalanta or he would abandon the project of the hunt entirely. They reluctantly agreed to accept her. When the boar was raised from its lair many of the noble hunters sprang to attack it, but none succeeded in wounding it. On the contrary, the boar killed some of the hunters and drove others to cover. Atalanta was the first to draw blood by striking it in the head with one of her arrows. Ancaeus, who scoffed at Atalanta because she hadn't killed the boar, boasted that he would show her how to hunt, but as he went to the attack the boar charged him and disembowelled him with its tusks. Meleager administered the final blow to the boar after it had been wounded by Atalanta. He awarded the boar's hide and tusks to her because she had drawn first blood. To honor a woman in this way was a humiliation in the eyes of some of the hunters. Meleager's uncles protested the award. They said either Meleager, who had killed the boar, should have the hide, or it should be awarded to one of them, as those most to be honored among those present. Their anger in this matter led to their own and Meleager's deaths. Some say that Atalanta bore a son to Meleager in secret and that she exposed the child, Parthenopaeus, on a mountain to die, and afterward pretended that she was a virgin. After her success in the Calydonian Hunt Atalanta returned to her father's house and was delightedly received. He wished her to marry, as he hoped for grandsons. Atalanta, mindful of the warning of the oracle, agreed to marry, but set up certain conditions which her future husband must first meet. Relying on her swiftness of foot, she said any suitor for her hand must run against her in a race. If he won she would marry him; if he lost she would kill him. In spite of the harsh conditions there were many suitors, and many lost the race and their lives. Hippomenes came to watch the contest. He was astonished that any man would be so foolish as to take such a risk, thought no woman alive was worth it. But when he saw Atalanta's beauty he changed his mind. He fell in love with her and decided to race for her hand himself. When he made known his intentions Atalanta looked at him and her heart softened. She did not want him to die, and hoped he would win. Before the race began Hippomenes appealed to Aphrodite for help, because, he said, it was Aphrodite who had caused him to fall in love with Atalanta and take such a mad risk. Aphrodite answered his prayer by giving him three golden apples and instructions for the use he should make of them. As the race started the runners were even for a time but soon Atalanta fleetly drew ahead. Hippomenes cast one of the golden apples in front of her. On seeing it Atalanta hesitated, then bent and picked it up. This gave Hippomenes a chance to draw ahead. When she again overtook him and widened the space between them he used a second apple, and toward the end of the course it was necessary for him to use the third. With their help he was able to beat Atalanta and win her for his bride. As Atalanta had already fallen in love with him before the race everyone was delighted. But in their happiness they forgot to show their gratitude to Aphrodite. That goddess, in anger because they had so quickly forgotten her and also to punish Atalanta for denying the power of love for so long, caused them to profane the temple of Cybele with their love-making. Cybele avenged the outrage to her shrine by transforming them into lions and yoking them to her car. Sometimes Atalanta is called the daughter of Schoeneus of Boeotia, and her husband is variously named as Melanion; and some think the Atalanta of Arcadia and the Atalanta of Boeotia were two different maidens who had almost identical histories.

Atalanti (at-a-lan'ti; Greek, ä-tä-län'dē), Channel (or Gulf) of. [Also: Channel (or Gulf) of Atalante (or Talanti).] The NW portion of the sea passage which separates Euboea from the mainland of Greece.

Atargatis (ä-tär'gä-tis). Syrian goddess, worshiped in Carchemish, corresponding approximately to Astarte and the Assyro-Babylonian Ishtar. At Ascalon she was worshiped by the Philistines under the name of Derceto in the form of a woman terminating in a fish. She also had a temple at Ephesus, and her numerous retinue of priestesses, which the Greeks found there, is supposed by some to have given rise to the legend of the Amazons.

Ate (ä'tē.) A daughter of Zeus (according to Homer) or of Eris (according to Hesiod). She was the goddess of mischief, who ensnared the feet of mortals and caused them to act rashly and unreasonably. It was Ate who so blinded Zeus to his own interests on the day when he was awaiting the birth of his hero son Heracles, that he promised Hera that the first son born that day would be lord over all those who dwelt around him. Hera then delayed the birth of Heracles until after Eurystheus, grandson of Perseus, was born, in consequence of which Heracles had to serve Eurystheus. For causing this mischief Zeus clutched Ate by the hair and flung her out of heaven. Agamemnon blamed his rash act in taking Briseis from Achilles on Ate, naming her the goddess who strikes men with blindness and makes them stumble and fall.

Atella (a-tel'a). In ancient geography, a town in Campania, Italy, about ten miles N of Naples.

Aternus (a-tér'nus). [Modern name, Aterno.] Upper course of the river Pescara, in C Italy.

Athamas (ath'a-mas). In Greek mythology, a son of Aeolus and Enarete, and the brother of Sisyphus and Salmoneus. He was a king of Orchomenus in Boeotia. At Hera's command he married Nephele, a cloud in the shape of a woman, and by her had two sons, Phrixus and Leucon, and one daughter, Helle. Tiring of his phantom wife, he abandoned Nephele in favor of Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, and had two sons by her, Melicertes and Learchus. Ino, to get rid of his heirs by Nephele, duped him into believing that a famine which was devastating the land could be lifted by the sacrifice of Phrixus. As Athamas prepared to carry out the sacrifice a winged ram with golden fleece, sent by Hermes, arrived at the altar and carried Phrixus and his sister Helle away on its back. Nephele complained to Hera because she had been replaced by Ino. The goddess resolved to punish Athamas, both because of his treatment of Nephele and because Ino had sheltered Dionysus, the son of Zeus and Semele. Hera laid a divine frenzy on Athamas, in which he killed his son Learchus and would have killed Ino too but with the aid of Dionysus she escaped, carrying Melicertes in her arms. Athamas' remaining son Leucon died. Since he was banished from Boeotia for his crimes, Athamas consulted the oracle at Delphi to learn where he should go. He was told that he should settle where wild beasts provided his dinner. He wandered into Thessaly and there came upon wolves mauling sheep that they had just killed. The wolves fled at the approach of Athamas and his companions. The slain sheep provided Athamas and his friends with a hearty meal and, in accordance with the instructions of the oracle, he founded a city, Alos, on the site. In Thessaly he married again and raised a new family.

Athena (a-thē'nā) or Athene (-nē). [Also: Pallas Athena.] One of the 12 Olympians. Although she was worshiped throughout Greece, her cult was especially strong in Attica, where she was a national divinity, and where her worship was gloriously memorialized in the Parthenon, the Temple of the Maiden Goddess on the Acropolis at Athens. The worship of Athena is essentially an expression of developing ethical and social principles. She is a goddess of war who fights in righteous causes. Like Zeus, she wields the thunderbolt and the lightning. She personifies the clear upper air as well as mental clearness and acuteness, embodying the spirit of truth and divine wisdom; she wears the aegis, symbolizing the dark storm-cloud, and is armed with the resistless spear (the shaft of lightning). She participates with skill and wisdom in wars to defend the state, but does not fight, like Ares, with uncontrolled ferocity for sheer love of strife. Her activities in war restore order, and thus she is a goddess of peace. She upholds law and order, encourages the arts by which the state is strengthened, and has invented so many aids to mankind that she is called the Contriver. Athena is also the goddess who taught and encourages the household arts of spinning, weaving, and cooking. She is the protectress of the young, the patroness of agriculture, of construction of all kinds, of healing, and of music. She is especially devoted to the interests of mankind for, some say, when Prometheus fashioned men of clay and water it was Athena who breathed life into them.

Some say Athena was born beside the lake Tritonis in Libya, and that Poseidon was her father. By the temple of Hephaestus at Athens was a blue-eyed statue of Athena, signaling her relationship to Poseidon with blue eyes like his. But she quarreled with Poseidon and appealed to Zeus, who then adopted her as his daughter. Others say she was reared by the river-god Triton, and that his daughter Pallas was her dear companion. They often played at war games together, and one day Athena accidentally struck and killed her. In memory of her grief, Athena placed the name of her playmate before her own, and was henceforth known as Pallas Athena. She made a wooden image of Pallas, wrapped it in her aegis, and set it up and honored it. This image, the Palladium, afterwards dropped, or was hurled, from heaven. It fell into the Troad

and was found by Ilus, who made a temple in which he set it up, and it became the sacred image that protected Ilium (Troy) as long as it remained in the citadel. Others say the winged giant Pallas was the father of Athena, and that he attempted to violate her and she killed him. She flayed him, they say, and used his skin for her aegis, and attached his wings to her own feet. The generally accepted account is that Zeus fell in love with the Titaness Metis, called by some his first wife, and embraced her. An oracle of Gaea predicted that Metis would bear a girl child, and if she should have another child it would be a son who would destroy Zeus, as he had destroyed his father Cronus. On learning of this oracle Zeus swallowed Metis. Some months later as he walked beside Lake Tritonis in Libya he was smitten with a violent headache and roared with pain. Hermes recognized the cause of his anguish and called Hephaestus, or as some say, Prometheus, who took up an axe and smote Zeus on the forehead. Out of his cloven skull Athena leaped, fully armed. She became the favorite of her father Zeus, and sat at his right hand, giving him counsel. Oaths taken in her name, along with those of Zeus and Apollo, were most sacred. Some say her epithet Tritogeneia means "Triton-born," and was given to her because she was born near Lake Tritonis. Because of the connection with Triton in the varying accounts of her birth, any place that had a lake or a river named Triton claimed to be her birthplace. The oldest seat of her worship in Greece was on the Triton River that flows into Lake Copais, in Boeotia, for it was here that the river-god was said to have reared her. But some say she came to Greece from Libya by way of Crete, and that Alalcomeneus, the first man, brought her up near Lake Copais, for which reason she had the epithet Alalcomeneis.

As a goddess of war Athena was called Area (Warlike). She took part in the war between the gods and the giants, but first she prudently sought out Heracles, for an oracle had foretold that the gods could not defeat the giants without his help. She found him and helped him to find the magic herb that would make him invulnerable, then conveyed him to the battle, where she advised him how to kill Alcioneus. Because she drove a chariot—which she invented—in the struggle with the giants, she was given the name Hippia (Horse-goddess). She pursued Enceladus and flattened him with a rock so that he became the island of Sicily, and some say the Pallas whose skin she used for her aegis was a giant she killed in this war. Athena contended with Hera and Aphrodite for the prize of beauty, thrown among the wedding guests at the marriage of Peleus and Thetis by Eris. She promised Paris, who was given the task of awarding the prize, victory in all his battles, but when he gave the prize to Aphrodite she became an implacable enemy of Paris and the Trojans. In the Trojan War her services were always on the side of the Greeks. She so inspired Diomedes with valor that he wounded Aphrodite and then, with Athena riding beside him in his chariot and guiding his spear, he wounded Ares. When Diomedes was wounded by Pandarus Athena cleared the mist from his eyes and filled him with new courage. In gratitude for her help, Diomedes dedicated a sanctuary to Athena Oxyderces (Bright-eyed) at Corinth when he returned from the Trojan War. She was a protector of Achilles. When Hector stood alone before the walls of Troy Athena assumed the guise of his brother, Deiphobus, and stood beside him and tricked him into remaining to face Achilles and death. It was Athena, some say, who inspired the stratagem of the Wooden Horse and helped Epeus to build it. On the side of the Horse was an inscription that dedicated it to Athena. After the capture and sack of Troy, Locrian Ajax (Ajax the Lesser) seized Cassandra as she clung to the image of Athena in the sanctuary whither she had fled for refuge. In tearing Cassandra from the sanctuary he bore off the image which she clasped with her. This brought the wrath of Athena on Ajax, and on the Greeks because they did not punish him. She caused the death of Ajax in a storm at sea on his way home, and for 1000 years afterward the Locrians were compelled to propitiate Athena by supplying two Locrian maidens to serve in her sanctuary at Troy. Odysseus was one of her favorites. He raised several sanctuaries to Athena Celeuthea (Lady of the Road), along the road in Laconia on which actor; up, lûte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

he had raced for the hand of Penelope. Athena caused Telamonian Ajax to go mad to save Odysseus from his wrath when the armor of Achilles was awarded to Odysseus instead of to him. Though she could not prevent Poseidon from harrying Odysseus on his voyage home from Troy, she took the opportunity, when Poseidon was absent, to appeal to Zeus to let Odysseus, already delayed ten years on his journey, return home. She helped Odysseus regain his own shores and instructed and aided him so that, with his son Telemachus, he slew the suitors who had been reveling in his halls at his expense and won back his wife and his kingdom. Agamemnon, who had made proper sacrifices to Athena before leaving Troy, had a speedy voyage home. Menelaus, angry at the gods for allowing the war to last so long, refused to sacrifice to the goddess, and was punished by being driven about the seas for seven years before he was permitted to return to Sparta.

ATHENA WITH HERACLES
Red-figured Greek cup, Duris, c480 B.C.
Munich

In the reign of King Cecrops, Athena and Poseidon contended for control of Athens. Poseidon struck the rock of the Acropolis with his trident and a fountain of sea water gushed forth, and whenever the south wind blows the sound of waves can be heard in this fountain. Athena's gift to Athens was an olive tree, as Cecrops testified. (Both the well and the olive tree were later enclosed in the Erechtheum. When this temple was burned during the Persian War (480 B.C.) the olive tree was destroyed, but instantly a new shoot sprang forth from the burned trunk, and the tree was shown to the traveler Pausanias in the 2nd century A.D.) The gods, called on to decide which gift was of more benefit to the people of Athens, voted in favor of the olive tree and Athena. In a rage, Poseidon flooded the plain. Athena's town of Athenae was engulfed by the flood, whereupon she took Athens as her city and gave it her own name. On another occasion she contended with Poseidon for Troezen. By a decree of Zeus they were directed to share it, and the Troezenians raised a temple of Athena Sthenias (Strong) on their citadel.

Athena was one of three goddesses (the others were Artemis and Hestia), who did not yield to the power of love exerted by Aphrodite; she remained a virgin. Hephaestus, tricked by Poseidon into thinking she would welcome his advances, once tried to make love to her when she entered his forge. She repulsed him, and his spilled seed fell to the ground and fertilized Earth. When the child Erichthonius was born of this accidental union Earth refused to have anything to do with him. Athena took the child, half-man and half-serpent, put him in a chest and gave the chest to the daughters of Cecrops—Aglauros, Herse, and Pandrosos—with the admonition to take good care of it but not to look inside. Curiosity compelled the maidens, with their mother, to open the chest. When they saw the strange creature inside they were seized with fear, and leaped to their deaths, some say, from the Acropolis. A white crow brought the news to Athena as she was carrying a huge rock to fortify the Acropolis. She dropped the rock, which stayed where it fell and became Mount Lycabettus, and punished the crow for bringing her the distressing news by changing its feathers to black and forbidding crows to perch on the Acropolis in future. She took Erichthonius up into her aegis and reared

him in the Erechtheum, the oldest temple on the Acropolis, and thereafter sacred serpents were kept in the temple in his honor. Erichthonius became king of Athens and instituted the Panathenaea in her honor. In another case, Athena rescued the heart of Zagreus, who had been torn to pieces by the Titans, enclosed it in a clay figure, and breathed life into it, making Zagreus immortal.

Athena Promachus (Champion) was the protector and defender of heroes and freely gave them her aid. Cadmus, desiring to sacrifice the cow that had led him into Boeotia to Athena, killed the dragon that guarded the sacred spring whither he had gone to fetch water for the sacrifice. Athena appeared to him and thanked him for the sacrifice. She told him to sow half the dragon's teeth and gave him the city of Thebes. She gave the other half of the dragon's teeth to Aeëtes of Colchis. She advised Danaus to build a ship and flee with his daughters from Egypt. He set up an image of Athena at Lindus, in Rhodes, in acknowledgment of her help. Afterward, on the order of Zeus, Athena and Hermes purified the daughters of Danaus for the murder of their husbands, and Danaus raised a sanctuary of Athena Saitis (Sais, the name of the Egyptian goddess identified with Athena) on the hilltop at Lerna where, some say, the heads of the murdered men were buried. Athena helped Perseus when he went to fetch the head of Medusa. She gave him a bright shield to use as a mirror when he cut off Medusa's head, and guided his hand as he did so. After he had put Medusa's head to good use Perseus gave it to Athena and she placed it in her aegis, or as some say, in the middle of her shield. Some say the Gorgon Medusa was transformed from a beautiful maiden into a hideous monster because she had vied with Athena in beauty. Others say she was transformed for committing impious acts with Poseidon in a sanctuary of Athena. Athena gave Cepheus of Tegea a lock of Medusa's hair to protect his city, and to Asclepius she gave some of Medusa's blood. Some say the blood that came from the left side of Medusa was used to bring death, and that from the right side was used for healing; and some say all the blood of Medusa that was given to Asclepius was used by him for healing and restoring life. She gave Erichthonius two drops of Medusa's blood, one to bring death and the other to cure, contained in vials, and fastened them with golden bands to his body. Bellerophon owed much to her, for she bridled Pegasus, for which reason she was called Chalinitis (Bridler) and gave the winged horse to him. Brave Tydeus, father of Diomedes, was especially loved by Athena. When he was wounded in the fighting of the Seven against Thebes, she hurried off to Zeus and fetched an herb that would make him immortal. She arrived with the magical herb just in time to see Tydeus gulp the brains of Melanippus from his dismembered head. This sight so disgusted her that she refrained from healing his wound and making him immortal, as she had intended to do, and let him die. Heracles was another of her favorites, and by one of her devices he was restored to his mother when he had been abandoned as an infant. She gave him a robe when the gods were arming him with gifts, gave him bronze castanets with which to frighten the Stymphalian birds, advised him how to attack the Lernaean Hydra, helped him fetch the Apples of the Hesperides (which were later returned to her as it was unlawful for mortals to keep them), and guided him to the Underworld to fetch Cerberus. Heracles raised a sanctuary of Athena Axiopoenus (Just Requital) in Laconia after he had avenged the death of Oënus by slaying Hippocoön and his sons. In all his labors and trials Athena stood as his friend; twice she took his part in battles against the gods, and when he was immortalized she led him to the gods of Olympus. She was a friend to Jason and helped Argus build the Argo for the expedition for the Golden Fleece, and inserted in the keel a beam of oracular oak from the sacred grove at Dodona which gave Jason good advice on his journey.

As a patroness of law and order, Athena compelled the Erinyes to allow Orestes to come to trial before the Areopagus for the murder of his mother, and when the vote was even she cast her vote in favor of Orestes. This strengthened the Areopagus and substituted law and mercy for vengeance. In gratitude, Orestes dedicated an altar to Athena Area (Warlike). The Erinyes were much exercised at what they considered a perversion of their ancient privileges. They threatened to lay a blight on Athens if the verdict was not reversed but Athena persuaded them, with promises of gifts and honor from the Athenians for all time, to dwell peacefully in a grotto on the Acropolis. In return for honors and sacrifices from the Athenians the Erinyes promised favorable winds for Athena's ships, fertility for her land, and prosperous marriages for her people. The Erinyes, henceforth known as The Kindly Ones, were then led in a torchlight procession to their new home on the Acropolis, which became an oracular shrine and a place of sanctuary.

Athena is credited with having invented many things. She constructed the double flute of stag's bones, but when she played on it Hera and Aphrodite laughed, although she drew from it delightful music. One day she went to a quiet pool, and watching herself in its surface, she played on her flute. When she saw how distorted her face was, with her cheeks puffed out, she cast the flute from her and laid a curse on whoever should pick it up. It was found by Marsyas and caused his death. Some say she also invented the trumpet, and Hegeleos, son of Tyrsenus, raised a sanctuary of Athena Salpinx (Trumpet) in Argos. But others say it was Tyrsenus, son of Heracles and a Lydian woman, who invented the trumpet, and that Hegeleos taught the Dorians how to play it. Among her other inventions were earthenware pots, the plow, the ox-yoke, bridle, chariot, ship, and the science of numbers. She also made dice from knucklebones and used them for divination.

On the whole, Athena was not a vindictive goddess. She did transform Arachne, who had the arrogance to challenge her to a weaving contest, into a spider. But when Tiresias, the son of her dear companion Chariclo, happened to see her as she bathed in the Hippocrene Spring on Mount Helicon, he was blinded at the will of the gods for having seen what was unlawful. But some say Athena laid her hand over his eyes and blinded him. When Chariclo reproached her Athena could not restore his sight, because he had seen what was unlawful, but she gave him the gifts of prophecy and divination, and a long life.

Athena had many epithets. As Athena Polias (Of the City), she had temples on the Acropolis at Athens, at Troezen, in Arcadia, and at Erythrae in Asia Minor. As Poliastas (Keeper of the City) she had a sanctuary at Tegea into which the priest entered but once a year, and as Poliuchus (City-protecting) she had a citadel in Sparta. The citadels at Athens, Argos, Sparta, Epidaurus, Troezen, Pheneus, and Troy and Smyrna, among others were all sacred to her, and illuminate her important role as a guardian and strengthener of cities. As patroness of the useful and decorative arts she was Ergane (Worker), a name first given to her by the Athenians. There was a sanctuary of Athena Ergane on the citadel at Sparta, and an altar at Olympia in Elis. The descendants of Phidias, known as Burnishers or Cleansers because they had the hereditary task of cleaning and polishing the great statue of Olympian Zeus, sacrificed to Athena Ergane before they began their work. The cock, a bird supposedly very ready to fight, was sacred to Athena Ergane. At Elis there was also an altar to Athena Leitis (Goddess of Booty), and the Eleans worshiped her as Mother in gratitude for the repopulation of Elis after the destruction of the population by Heracles. A temple of Athena Narcaea, raised by Narcaeus, son of Dionysus and Physcoa, also stood in Elis, as well as a temple of Athena Cydonia. This last was said to have been founded by Clymenus, a descendant of the Cretan Dactyl Heracles, who came from Cydonia in Crete. Pelops sacrificed to Cydonian Athena before he began his race with Oenomaus for the hand of Hippodamia. As Paeonia (Healer) Athena had an image at Athens and an altar at Oropus, and as Health she had an image on the Acropolis at Athens. Amphitryon dedicated an image of Athena Zosteria (Girdler) at Thebes because here he put on his armor when he went to fight against Chalcedon and the Euboeans; Castor and Polydeuces raised a temple of Athena Asia in Laconia, near Gythium, when they returned from Colchis, in honor of the Colchian shrine of Athena Asia. The temple of Athena Anemotis (Of the Winds) was founded in Messenia after prayers to the god-

ness had caused violent and unseasonable winds that were damaging the country to cease. The sanctuary of Athena Alea in Tegea was founded by Aleus, great-grandson of Zeus and Callisto, and was respected throughout the Peloponnesus as an inviolable place of sanctuary. The sanctuary of Athena Itonia in Boeotia was named, some say, for Itonius, son of Amphictyon. The bronze image in it was made by Agoracritus, a pupil of Phidias. In the sanctuary the Boeotians gathered annually for their general assembly. One story concerning the sanctuary is that Iodama, a priestess, entered the sacred precinct at night and Athena appeared to her. When Iodama saw the head of Medusa in Athena's aegis she was turned to stone. Ever after, fire was put on the altar of Iodama each day, with the thrice repeated chant that Iodama lives and is asking for fire. But some say Athena was a daughter of Itonius, and that Iodama was her sister. There was another sanctuary of Athena Itonia between Larisa and Pherae. The Spartans dedicated a bronze image of Athena on the citadel at Sparta; the bronze sanctuary in which it was housed, and for which reason the image was called Athena of the Bronze House, was begun by Tyndareus and was finished early in the 6th century B.C. by the Spartan Gitiadas. At other places there were images and sanctuaries of Athena Promachorma (Protector of the Anchorage), Pronaea (Of the Fore-temple), Pronoia (Forethought), Xenia (Hospitable), Larisaea (Of Larisa), Ophthalmitis (Of the Eye), Cissaea (Ivy-goddess), Cyparissia (Cypress-goddess), Coryphasia (Of Coryphasium), Aeantis (Ajaccian), Aethyia (Gannet), Agoraea (Of the Market-place), Apaturia (Deceitful), and Hippolaitis (Of Hippola). As Athena Nike (Victory) she had a special temple on the Acropolis at Athens, and was sometimes depicted holding a figure of Victory in her outstretched hand. To the Athenians she was especially Parthenos (Virgin or Maiden), and for her they built the Parthenon. Inside the temple the gold and ivory image of Athena Parthenos, by Phidias, was set up (438-7 B.C.). The face, hands, and feet were of ivory; precious stones formed the pupils of the eyes. The robe was of gold. The gold, which weighed 40 talents, could be removed from the image, and because of this Phidias was acquitted of a charge that he had stolen some of it, for when it was weighed it was found that the 40 talents were all accounted for. In the image the goddess wears her aegis. On her left side is her shield, on the outside of which is depicted in relief the battle of the Amazons and the Athenians. Into this scene Phidias put a portrait of himself, a bald-headed old man lifting a stone, and a portrait of Pericles, the face of which is somewhat obscured by his arm raised to hurl his spear. Because of these two portraits on an image of the goddess Phidias was convicted of impiety. On the inside of the shield the Battle of the Giants was shown. In her extended right hand Athena held an image of Victory wearing a golden crown. In her left hand, beside the shield, was her spear. Under the shield was a golden serpent, and on her helmet was the Sphinx. The war between the Centaurs and the Lapiths was depicted on her sandals, and the pedestal showed the birth of Pandora. Also on the Acropolis was the great bronze Athena Promachus (Champion) by Phidias, made from the spoils taken by the Athenians at the Battle of Marathon, and a third image, dedicated by the Lemnians and thought by some to be the most beautiful, called Lemnian Athena. All of these works have perished; descriptions from ancient writers and some copies of the Athena Parthenos are all that remain.

The chief festival of Athena was the great Panathenaea, at which time a peplos embroidered by the Athenian women was presented to the goddess, games and contests were held, and the festival was terminated by a great procession to the Acropolis. Other festivals of Athena were held at various times of the year to mark the progress of the crops. The sea-eagle, cock, serpent, and olive tree were sacred to her, but above all she was identified with the owl, symbol of wisdom. The coins of Athens bore the head of Athena on one side, and her sacred owl on the other. As a goddess of war she is represented in art with a helmet, shield, and spear; as a goddess of peace and the useful arts she is sometimes represented without her helmet and holding a distaff. The Romans identified their Minerva with Athena.

Athenae (a-thē'nē). Town near Eleusis, Greece. According to mythology, it was Athena's town, and when Poseidon lost in his contest with her for control of Athens, he flooded the plain in his rage and Athenae was engulfed. Athena then took Athens for her city and gave it her own name.

Atheneum (ath-e-nē'um). A famous school or university at Rome, founded by the emperor Hadrian. It was named for Athens, and was situated on the Capitoline Hill.

Atheneus (ath-e-nē'us). Greek mechanician; fl. possibly about the end of the 2nd century B.C. He wrote a book on siege engines which contains historical information on these engines.

Atheneus. Greek grammarian, rhetorician, and philosopher, born at Naucratis in Egypt. He was active c200 A.D. He wrote The Learned Banquet (Deipnosophistae) in 15 books, ten of which survive. The work purports to describe the conversation of a number of learned men, including Galen the physician and Ulpian the jurist, at a banquet given by a rich and cultivated Roman. The conversation covers the subject of cookery and banqueting in encyclopedic detail, providing a sourcebook of information on the customs, vessels, foods, wine-vessels, and entertainment in antiquity. It also includes comments on the weaknesses of philosophers, on subjects connected with social life, manners, customs, trade, art, and science. The work provides abundant evidence of the immense reading the author had done in many ancient authorities, and by quoting from many of the prose-writers and poets, especially from the masters of Middle and New Comedy, he has preserved fragments of many ancient writers' works otherwise lost. The work also contains what is believed to be the first account in history of a rain of fishes.

Athenagoras (ath-e-nag'ō-ras). Syracusan demagogue; fl. end of the 5th century B.C. He was an opponent of Hermocrates, whom he accused of trying to frighten the Syracusans when the latter warned that the Athenians were on their way and urged the Syracusans to prepare to resist them.

Athena Nike (a-thē'nā nī'kē), Temple of. Small Ionic amphiprostyle tetrastyle marble temple, dedicated to Athena as goddess of Victory.

Pausanias called it the Temple of Nike Apteros or Wingless Victory; inscriptions indicate that the official designation was as Athena Nike. It was erected c427-424 B.C., on the site of an earlier temple, to designs by Callicrates, one of the architects of the Parthenon, and stands at the SW extremity of the Acropolis at Athens on a bastion projecting before the S wing of the Propylaea. Measuring 18 by 27 feet on the stylobate, it has a continuous frieze sculptured in high relief, with an assembly of gods on the E and battle scenes elsewhere. Four slabs of the frieze, among the Elgin Marbles in the British Museum, have been replaced with casts in the reconstructed temple. The small pediments also had sculptures. Along the north, east, and south faces of the bastion was a parapet, the Nike Parapet, sculptured with Nikai or Victories in relief, including the famous Victory Loosing her Sandal, among the most precious of all Greek sculptures.

The temple was pulled down by the Turks in 1686 to furnish the material for a rampart in front of the Propylaea. In 1834, when this rampart in turn was taken down, the stones of the temple were recovered, and in due course it was rebuilt, but with minor inaccuracies so that in 1936-1940 it was again dismantled and rebuilt. The temple, begun c427 B.C., had been commissioned c449 B.C.; during the interim Callicrates had used the plans in constructing the very similar temple on the Ilissus, which was seen and drawn by Stuart and Revett and was still standing in 1778 but subsequently vanished, torn down presumably for its materials. Athena Parthenos (pär'the-nos). Ivory and gold statue by Phidias, once in the Parthenon. It was one of the most admired works of antiquity. Only copies of the work survive, the most important of which, for its careful reproduction of details, is the Roman copy belonging to the collection of the National Museum at Athens. According to the writer Pausanias (2nd century A.D.), the face, hands, and feet of the image were of ivory; precious stones formed the pupils of the eyes. The robe was of gold. In the image the goddess wore her aegis. On her left side was her shield, on the outside of which was depicted in relief the battle of the Amazons and the Athenians. On the inside of the shield appeared the Battle of the Giants. In her extended right hand the goddess held an image of Victory wearing a golden crown. In her left hand, besides the shield, was her spear. Under the shield was a golden serpent, representing Erichthonius, and on her helmet was the Sphinx. Her sandals were decorated with a scene showing the war between the Centaurs and the Lapiths, and the pedestal showed the birth of Pandora.

Athenion (a-thē'ni-on). Leader in the second slave insurrection in Sicily, 103-99 B.C. He is said to have been the commander of bandits in Cilicia, where he was captured and sold as a slave into Sicily. He was chosen leader of the insurgents in the western part of the island, made an unsuccessful attack on Lilybaeum, joined Tryphon (Salvius), king of the rebels, by whom he was for a time thrown into prison, fought under Tryphon in the battle with Lucius Licinius Lucullus, and on the death of Tryphon became king. He was slain in battle by the hand of Marcus Aquillius who put down the revolt.

Athenodorus (a-thē-nō-dō'rus). Greek sculptor, born at Rhodes; fl. 1st century B.C. He collaborated, according to Pliny the Elder, with Agesander (believed by some to have been his father) and Polydorus on the group of the Laocoön.

Athenodorus Cananites (kā-na-nī'tēz). Stoic philosopher and tutor of Augustus, born at Tarsus, Asia Minor; fl. 1st century B.C. His influence over his one-time pupil is alleged to have been great even in later years; he was a friend also of Strabo and Cicero.

Athenodorus Cordylion (kōr-dil'i-on). Stoic philosopher and librarian at Pergamum; fl. early 1st century B.C. He lived at Rome during most of his later life.

Athens (ath'enz). [Greek, Athenai, Athinai; Latin, Athenae.] Capital of Greece, situated about five miles from its seaport Piraeus (on the Saronic Gulf) in E central Greece and Euboea, at the SW end of the Attic peninsula. The city lies at 350 feet above sea level on the Attic plain. Surrounding it are the mountains Aegaleos, Parnes, Pentelikon, and Hymettus on the W and E, which sometimes assume at dusk a delicate lavender color and give to the city its epithet "violet-crowned." Within the city limits stands the steep, rocky hill of Lycabettus. The Acropolis, around which the ancient city grew up, rises in the center of the city; it is the site of the earliest settlement and a place of many historical remains. In ancient times, on it were the royal palace and the dwellings of the Eupatrids. To the W is the Areopagus, or Hill of Ares, the site of the most ancient court of Athens, and the place where Saint Paul preached; farther W are the Hill of the Muses, the Pnyx, and the Hill of the Nymphs. In the 5th century B.C. long walls joined the city to its port. The city was founded, according to the old account, by an Egyptian colony led by Cecrops. It became the chief place in Attica, with Athena as its especial divinity, and was ruled by kings, among whom Erechtheus, Theseus, and Codrus are legendary and famous. Gradually the city spread to the lower slopes around the Acropolis and to the banks of the Illisus River. Thither the Eupatrids (nobles) moved and established the ancient aristocratic city described by Thucydides. Besides the Eupatrid enclave, other groups of dwellings to the north and northwest of the Acropolis formed the quarters occupied by artisans and tradesmen, such as the section known as the Ceramicus, alongside the ancient agora which, in the 7th and 6th centuries B.C. became the civic heart of the city. According to tradition, it was Theseus who united the twelve independent communities of Attica into a federal union governed by delegates to Athens. He renamed the Athenian Games the Panathenaea and invited all Attica to share in them, and he united the suburbs mentioned above to the city proper. Furthermore, he invited his fellow Greeks to become Athenian citizens, and many came to Athens. He is said to have divided the population thus enlarged into three classes: the Eupatrids, or nobles; the Georges, or farmers, and the Demiurges, or artisans. Lastly, he gave Athens a constitution, some say, and resigned his throne to further the democracy. After 1132 B.C., the legendary date of the death of Codrus, Athens was ruled by the Eupatrids, and had archons as magistrates, who were successively perpetual, decennial, and (after 683 B.C.) annual. Scholars have questioned the historical value of much of this legendary material. The laws of Draco were enacted in 621 B.C., and those of Solon in 594. Pisistratus became tyrant in 560 B.C. and his sons were expelled in 510. The reforms of Clisthenes (508 B.C.) made Athens (for its day) a pure democracy; popular assemblies of all its citizens (but not all, or even most, of its adult inhabitants were citizens) made the laws. The glorious period began with the Persian wars, in which Athens took a leading part, as at Marathon (490 B.C.) and Salamis (480). The city was temporarily held by the Persians (480 B.C.) who burned it and destroyed the buildings on the Acropolis. Athens became the head of the Delian League in c477 B.C., and for a short period had an extensive empire and was the first power in Greece. The Athenians in the "Age of Pericles" (c461-429 B.C.) at the onset of the Peloponnesian Wars are described by Thucydides. He puts the following speech into the mouth of the Corinthian envoy who addresses the Spartan assembly considering whether to declare war on Athens:

"You have never considered, O Lacedaemonians, what manner of men are these Athenians with whom you will have to fight, and how utterly unlike yourselves. They are revolutionary, equally quick in the conception and in the execution of every new plan; while you are conservative—careful only to keep what you have, originating nothing, and not acting even when action is most necessary. They are bold beyond their strength; they run risks which prudence would condemn; and in the midst of misfortune they are full of hope. Whereas it is your nature, though strong, to act feebly; when your plans are most prudent, to distrust them; and when calamities come upon you, to think that you will never be delivered from them. They are impetuous and you are dilatory; they are always abroad, and you are always at home. For they hope to gain something by leaving their homes; but you are afraid that any new enterprise may imperil what you have already. When conquerors, they pursue their victory to the utmost; when defeated, they fall back the least. Their bodies they devote to the country as though they belonged to other men; their true self is their mind, which is not truly their own when employed in her service. When they do not carry out an intention which they have formed, they seem to have sustained a personal bereavement; when an enterprise succeeds they have gained a mere installment of what is to come; but if they fail, they at once conceive new hopes and so fill up the void. With them alone to hope is to have, for they lose not a moment in the execution of an idea. This is the lifelong task, full of danger and toil, which they are always imposing upon themselves. None enjoy their good things less, because they are always seeking for more. To do their duty is their only holiday, and they deem the quiet of inaction to be as disagreeable as the most tiresome business. If a man should say of them, in a word, that they were born neither to have peace themselves nor to allow peace to other men, he would simply speak the truth."

In the short period from the victory over the Persians at Marathon (490 B.C.) and Salamis (480), to the defeat of Athens by Sparta (404 B.C.), the tremendous Athenian vitality described by Thucydides produced some of the world's greatest poetry, architecture, and sculpture. At the same time, Athenian commercial and maritime activity predominated in the Mediterranean. The Peloponnesian War (431-404 B.C.) resulted in the displacement of Athens by Sparta in the hegemony of Greece. Athens was defeated by Sparta in 404 B.C. and an aristocratic faction was put in power, but moderate democracy was restored a year later by Thrasybulus. Athens under the influence of Demosthenes resisted Macedonia, but was overthrown at the battle of Chaeronea (338 B.C.), and was generally after this under Macedonian influence. It was subjugated by Rome in 146 B.C., and pillaged by Sulla in 86 B.C.

The ancient architectural masterpieces are mostly on the Acropolis (q.v.), the chief ancient landmark. Other important structures are: the theater of Dionysus on the S slope of the Acropolis, where all the famous Greek dramas were produced. It was originally of wood, and was not completed in stone until the end of the 5th century B.C. The existing remains of the orchestra and stage structures are modifications of Roman date. East, and somewhat south of the Acropolis, are the remains of a temple of Olympian Zeus. According to legend, the first temple on the site was raised by Deucalion, in gratitude for his deliverance from the great flood. About 515 B.C. Pisistratus planned to raise a great temple on the site but the plan was not realized. In the 2nd century B.C., Antiochus IV, king of Syria, revived the plan of building a temple here, but work on it was suspended when he died. It was not until the Roman emperor Hadrian's time that the temple was completed (132 A.D.). Several columns with elaborate Corinthian capitals still stand. Also noteworthy are the Gate of the Oil Market, or New Agora, a gate built with gifts from Julius Caesar and Augustus; the Agora, to the north of the Acropolis and adjoining the quarter known as Ceramicus. This was the center of Athenian public life and after the Acropolis the heart of the city. Nearly in the center of the Agora was the altar of the Twelve Gods, from which distances from Athens were measured. Among other structures, there were temples of Apollo and of Ares, and an Odeum that held 1000 spectators. Many roads led to the Agora, which was not only the center of Athens but of all Attica. Here were such official buildings as the Bouleterium (Senate), the Tholos, and the Metroun. Here the votes for ostracism were cast. Here were colonnaded galleries for shops and meeting places, the Painted Portico, and various stoas. Public figures, artists, philosophers, and ordinary citizens gathered in the Agora. Religious activity was concentrated about its temples and altars, and through it wound the sacred Panathenaic procession on its way to the Acropolis. Excavations of the site have been carried on at intervals from the 19th century. Since 1931 the American School of Classical Studies has undertaken systematic excavations and restoration on a vast scale. Aided by large grants from John D. Rockefeller Junior and by Marshall Plan funds, and by a law authorizing the demolition of the structures which covered the ancient Agora, the site has been cleared and the excavations of the Agora have shed light on the entire history of Athens, from Neolithic times forward. On a slight rise which gives a splendid panoramic view of the Agora stands the well-preserved temple of Hephaestus commonly known as the Theseum. The "Long Walls," traces of which have now almost entirely disappeared, were two massive fortification walls extending from the ramparts of the city to those of the Piraeus, at a distance apart, except near their diverging extremities, of about 550 feet. Built between 461 and 456 B.C., they made the port and the metropolis practically one huge fortress, and assured Athenian supplies by sea while rendering possible Athenian naval triumphs at times when the Spartans held their land without the walls. They were destroyed in 404 B.C. when Athens fell before Sparta but were restored in 393 B.C. by Conon. The Long Walls followed the crests of the group of hills SW of the Acropolis. The arena of the Panathenaic stadium, a stadium still practically complete except for its sheathing of marble, measures 109 by 850 feet, and is bordered on its long sides and its semicircular E end by the slopes which supported the spectators' seats (about 60 tiers). There were at intervals 29 flights of steps to give access to the seats. The original stadium was begun about 330 B.C.; its stone tiers were covered with Pentelic marble through the generosity of Herodus Atticus c143 A.D. In 1895 money was given to restore the stadium in preparation for the Olympic Games of 1896; thus today it gleams with marble not even yet weathered to match other monuments.

Athesis (ath'e-sis). [Modern name, Adige.] River in N Italy, rising in the Rhaetian Alps and flowing S through the Alps to the plain of the Padus (Po). It sends arms to the Padus, and flows into the Adriatic N of the mouths of the Padus. On it are Tridentum (Trent) and Verona.

Athlete, The. Greek statue, held to be a copy of the famous Doryphorus (spear-bearer), the canon or type of Polyclitus, found at Pompeii, and added to the collection of the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The undraped figure is well proportioned and holds a simple, naturalistic pose.

narrow isthmus. Length, about 30 miles. As part of his preparations for his invasion of Greece, Xerxes, the Persian king, caused a canal to be cut through the isthmus. The purpose of this canal, which was about a mile and a half long, was to save the Persian fleet from rounding the stormy headland of Mount Athos where a large part of the fleet of Mardonius, son-in-law of Darius, had been destroyed (492 B.C.) by storms. Once past this headland, the promontory would protect the fleet from the tempestuous north-east winds. In addition, the canal would allow the ships to keep contact with the army of Xerxes as it proceeded along the coast. The dry ditch which marks the course of Xerxes' canal can still be followed.

Atilius (ā-tīl'i-us), Marcus. Latin writer; fl. 2nd century B.C. Little is known of him except that he is mentioned as an early writer of comedies. Three fragments are attributed to him.

Atlantides (at-lan'ti-dēz). See Hesperides; Pleiades.

Atlantis (at-lan'tis). Legendary island in the Atlantic Ocean, NW of Africa, referred to by Plato and other ancient writers, which with its inhabitants (who had achieved, according to most accounts, a high degree of civilization) was said to have disappeared in a convulsion of nature. The belief in the possibility of such a place has continued to exist even into modern times, and many writers (including Francis Bacon in his work The New Atlantis) have taken the name as an equivalent for a utopian state. A modern scholar has ingeniously suggested that the legend might have arisen from a prehistoric inundation of the bronze-age palace on the island known as Gla (an Albanian name; the ancient name is not recorded, unless indeed it was Atlantis) in the Copaic Lake in Boeotia, which was subject to periodic flooding.

Atlas (at'las). In Greek mythology, a Titan, the son of Iapetus and the nymph Clymene. His brothers were Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Menoetius, and he was the father of the Pleiades (by Pleione), of the Hyades (by Aethra), of the Hesperides (by Hesperis), and according to Homer, the father of Calypso. He lived in the western lands, beyond the stream of Ocean, in the land of the Hyperboreans, or some say in Mauretania, and was the proud gardener of the orchard where grew the tree with the golden apples which had been a wedding present to Hera. According to Hesiod he was condemned by Zeus for his part in the battle of the Titans, in which he was the leader, to stand at the western extremity of the earth near the habitation of the Hesperides, upholding the heavens with his shoulders and hands. His station was later said to be in the Atlas Mountains in Africa. Heracles, seeking the golden apples as one of his labors for Eurystheus, sought the aid of Atlas, but he hesitated to help him for he remembered a prophecy that one day a son of Zeus would rob him of the golden fruit. He told Heracles he feared Ladon, the hundred-headed serpent that guarded the apples. Heracles immediately shot Ladon with one of his arrows, and then offered to hold up the heavens if Atlas would pluck the apples for him. Atlas was so glad to get rid of his burden that he agreed, and while Heracles assumed the heavens he fetched the apples. He offered to take them to Eurystheus himself, but Heracles had no intention of holding up the heavens indefinitely, and cunningly agreed to this plan, if Atlas would just take back the heavens for a moment so that he could pad his shoulders, which were getting sore from the unaccustomed weight. Atlas amiably resumed the burden, and was then amazed and distressed as Heracles walked off, leaving him holding the heavens as before. Another story concerning Atlas is that Perseus, returning from slaying Medusa, visited him and asked for refreshments. Atlas remembered the prophecy about a son of Zeus and treated him inhospitably. Perseus punished him by showing him the head of Medusa and turned him to stone, and it is this huge bulk of stone which is now called the Atlas Mountains in Africa.

Atossa (ā-tos'a). Queen of Persia in the 6th century B.C. She was a daughter of Cyrus the Great and Cassandane, and the full sister of Cambyses. The latter fell in love with her and since it was not the custom for Persians to marry their own sisters he asked the Persian judges if there was any law which permitted the king to marry his sister. The judges said there was no such law but, on the other hand, there was a law which permitted the king of Persia to do whatever he chose. In this way the judges allowed Cambyses to do what he planned to do and at the same time to save their own skins. Cambyses married Atossa. She did not accompany him on his expedition to Egypt, for by that time he had fallen in love with another of his sisters and took her with him to Egypt. On the death of Cambyses Atossa became the wife of his successor, the False Smerdis, as it was the custom for the successor to inherit wives as well as throne. When the False Smerdis was exposed and slain by a group of conspirators who set Darius on the throne in his place, Atossa married Darius. She bore him four sons, the eldest of whom was Xerxes. Such was her power and influence over Darius that, although he had older sons by a woman he had married before he became king, Atossa was able to persuade him to appoint her son Xerxes as his heir. She survived Darius and lived to see her son Xerxes I return from Greece defeated.

Atrax (ā'traks). In Greek mythology, a son of the river-god Peneus and Bura. The town of Atrax in Hestiaeotis, N Greece, was named for him. He was the father of Hippodamia, who married Pirithous, and of the maiden Caenis, who was transformed into a man by Poseidon.

Atræus (ā'trē-us, -trös). In Greek legend, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, and the brother of Thyestes, with whom he was fated ever to struggle. After the death of his half-brother, Chrysippus, in which he may have had a hand, he fled from Elis to Mycenae where he succeeded Eurystheus as king and wielded the sceptre, made by Hephaestus and given to him by Pelops. He first married Cleola, who died after giving birth to a son, Plisthenes. He then married Aërope and by her was the father of Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Anaxibia. He had a horned lamb with golden fleece which he claimed authorized whoever possessed it to be king. It had been sent to him by Hermes who wanted to avenge the death of Myrtilus by Pelops. Hermes was sure that Atræus would not, as he had vowed to do, sacrifice the golden lamb along with the finest of his flocks, to Artemis. He did kill the lamb but had it stuffed and mounted and decreed that whoever possessed it was endowed with royal power. Thyestes, in a plot with Aërope who had fallen in love with him, stole the lamb and was acknowledged as king. Atræus then proposed that if he could cause the sun to reverse its path through the heavens—to go from West to East—Thyestes should acknowledge him as the rightful king. With the help of Zeus and Eris the sun did just this. Atræus became king again and Thyestes went into exile. This by no means ended the struggle between the brothers. Thyestes arranged the murder of Plisthenes and then, on being lured back to Mycenae, was served his own sons in a ghastly banquet of welcome given him by Atræus. After Thyestes had eaten, Atræus revealed that it was the flesh of his own children he had enjoyed. Thyestes laid a curse upon the House of Atræus and again went into exile. An oracle told Atræus to bring back Thyestes in order to end a famine that then wasted Mycenae. He sought him in Sicyon, where he met Pelopia and, unaware of her true parentage and that she was soon to bear a child, he married her, having cast Aërope into the sea because of her unfaithfulness with Thyestes. Pelopia bore Aegisthus, whom she exposed, but he was rescued and brought up by Atræus as his own son. In fact this was the child of Thyestes and his own daughter, Pelopia, although she did not know that it was her father who had ravished her when she was sacrificing to Athene one night. After some years Atræus brought Thyestes back to Mycenae, threw him in prison, and commanded Aegisthus, still a child, to kill him. Aegisthus tried to obey but was foiled by Thyestes, and by means of the sword which his mother had given him Thyestes identified him as his own son. Together they then killed Atræus.

Atropos (at'rō-pos). In Greek mythology, that one of the three Fates who severs the thread of human life.

Atta (at'a), Titus Quinctius. Latin poet; fl. early in the 1st century B.C. Fragments of his work survive.

Attalus (at'a-lus). [Also: Attalos.] Macedonian general; died c336 B.C. He was a general under Philip II of Macedon. Philip cast aside his wife Olympias to marry Cleopatra, actor; up, lüte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

daughter or niece of Attalus. At the wedding feast, Attalus urged those present to pray for a legitimate heir, thus impugning the virtue of Olympias, who had borne Alexander to Philip. Alexander, who was present, flung a wine-cup into the face of Attalus. Attalus was sent to Asia with other generals to prepare for Philip's planned attack on the Persian Empire. When Philip was murdered, he supported the claims of Cleopatra's infant son to the throne, thus incurring again Alexander's hatred. At the latter's order he was murdered in Asia (c336 B.C.).

Attalus I. [Also: Attalos; surnamed Soter.] King of Pergamum (241–197 B.C.); born 269 B.C.; died 197 B.C. He carried on war with the Galatians, with Syria, and with Macedonia, and was allied with Rome against Macedonia in the latter part of his reign. Votive groups were set up by him on the Acropolis at Athens in honor of his victory over the Gauls. These groups of figures of about half life-size, depicted a battle of the gods and giants, combat between Athenians and Amazons, the victory of Marathon, and destruction of the Gauls by Attalus. Four figures from these groups were acquired by the National Museum at Naples: a fallen giant, a dead Amazon, a fallen Persian, and a dying bearded Gaul. Attalus was an outstanding patron of literature, philosophy, and the arts. He presented Delphi with a colonnade (stoa) for the shelter of pilgrims. His successors, Eumenes II and Attalus II, presented similar stoas to Athens.

Attalus II. [Also: Attalos; surnamed Philadelphus.] King of Pergamum (c159–138 B.C.); born 220 B.C.; died 138 B.C. He was a son of Attalus I and successor to his brother Eumenes II. He was an ally of Rome. Like all the Attalids he was interested in letters and the arts. He presented Athens with a stoa which bears his name. Restoration of the Stoa of Attalus in the Agora was completed in 1956 by the American School of Classical Studies.

Attalus III. [Also: Attalos; surnamed Philometor.] King of Pergamum (138–133 B.C.); born 171 B.C.; died 133 B.C. He was a nephew of Attalus II. By his will he left his kingdom to the Romans. He is of some interest to historians of science for his studies in botany and, more narrowly, in agriculture

(a treatise by him in this field was used by Pliny). However, his interests in these fields seem to have had a very practical motive not unrelated to the political hazards of his day: his chief interest was in poisonous plants, and he prepared and experimented with a number of poisons.

Atthis (at'this). In mythology, a daughter of Cranaus, king of Cecropia. Some say that she died before marriage, and in her honor her father renamed his kingdom Attica; others say that she was the mother of Erichthonius.

Attic (at'ik). One of the dialects of ancient Greek, spoken in Athens and the surrounding district (Attica). Three periods can be distinguished in the history of the Attic dialect: 1) Ancient Attic, till the end of the 5th century B.C.; 2) Middle Attic, from the end of 5th century B.C. to the middle of the 4th century B.C.; and 3) New Attic, from the middle of the 4th century B.C. to the death of Alexander the Great. Attic was considered the most highly cultivated of the Hellenic dialects.

Attica (at'i-ka). In ancient geography, a division of C Greece, bounded by Boeotia (partly separated by Cithaeron) on the NW, the Gulf of Euripus (separating it from Euboea) on the NE, the Aegean Sea on the E, the Saronic Gulf on the SW, and Megaris on the W. It contained several mountains (Cithaeron, Parnes, Pentelicus, and Hymettus) and the plain of Attica, watered by the Cephissus and Ilissus rivers. Its chief city was Athens, with whose history it is in general identified.

Atticus (at'i-kus), Titus Pomponius. Roman scholar and bibliophile, born at Rome, 109 B.C.; died 32 B.C. He is best known for a collection of letters from Cicero, his intimate friend, which he edited and published. A man of great political discretion, he was also simultaneously the friend of Pompey and Caesar, both of whom Cicero opposed. His surname derives from a 20-year residence at Athens during the Roman civil war.

Attis (at'is). See Atys.

Attius (at'i-us), Lucius. See Accius, Lucius. Attus (at'i-us) or Attus (at'us), Navius. Augur under Tarquinius Priscus. According to legend, Tarquinius Priscus, in a war against the Sabines, wished to make some changes in the army as organized by Romulus. However, the Senate would not consent to the changes without consulting the auguries. Tarquinius was impatient and scornful of the ability of the sacred birds to pass on such a matter. To prove, as he thought, that augury in this case was a waste of time, he mockingly requested the augur Attius to tell him if what he was thinking would come to pass. Attius took the auspices and replied that what Tarquinius was thinking would surely come to pass. Tarquinius laughed in triumph and announced he was thinking that the augur would sunder a whetstone with a razor. Addressing Attius, he handed him these objects. "Take them," he commanded, "and accomplish what your birds declare is possible!" Attius took them and immediately cut the whetstone in two with the razor. A statue of Attius, with his head covered, was afterward raised on the spot where he performed this feat.

fat, fâte, fâr, fâre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nôr,

Atymnius (a-tim'ni-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Amisodarus of Caria, and the brother of Maris. He accompanied Sarpedon as an ally of Troy in the Trojan War. He was slain by Antilochus.

Atys (ā'tis) or Attis (at'is). Mythical personage in the worship of the Phrygian goddess Cybele. Some say he was the son of the Lydian supreme god Manes. Others say Nana, daughter of the river-god Sangarius, ate the fruit of an almond tree and as a result bore Atys. He was a beautiful Phrygian youth beloved of Cybele. The goddess wished to make him a guardian of her temple to keep him for herself. She exacted a promise from him to remain faithful to her, and he swore to do so, saying, "If I lie, may the love for which I break faith be my last love." But Atys forgot his pledge. He fell in love with and embraced the nymph Sagaritis. Wild with rage and grief, Cybele hacked down the tree in which the nymph lived and so killed her. Atys was driven mad. He fled to the top of Mount Dindymus and there mutilated himself and dragged his head in the dust. He died at a pine tree, which received his spirit while from his blood sprang violets. A tomb was raised to him on Mount Dindymus, in the sanctuary of Cybele, and henceforward the priests of Cybele emasculated themselves and tossed their hair in feigned madness in commemoration of Atys. A festival of orgiastic character, lasting three days, was celebrated in his honor in the spring. A pine tree covered with violets was carried to the shrine of Cybele as a symbol of the departed Atys. Then, amidst tumultuous music and the wildest exhibition of grief, the mourners sought for Atys on the mountains. On the third day he was found, and the rejoicing which followed was as extravagant as the mourning which preceded. (A similar ceremony was observed by women and girls to commemorate the death and rebirth of Dionysus.) The myth may be considered as the counterpart of the Greek legend of Aphrodite and Adonis, which itself is reminiscent of the Semitic legend of Tammuz and Ishtar.

Auge (ô'jē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Aleus, king of Tegea, and Naera. Her father made her a priestess of Athena in an attempt to circumvent a prophecy that her son would kill her mother's brothers. Heracles, who was being entertained by Aleus, violated her nevertheless. When it became apparent that she was about to bear a child, Aleus, who mocked her plea that Heracles had ravished her, gave his daughter to Nauplius with instructions to drown her. Nauplius departed for the coast with her. On the way Auge felt that the time to give birth to her child had come. She went into a thicket on Mount Parthenius and gave birth to Telephus, whom she left to die on the mountain, but he was rescued. Auge and Nauplius proceeded on their journey and Nauplius, who had no intention of killing Auge, sold her to some traders who took her to Mysia and sold her to King Teuthras. According to some accounts Teuthras married her, and many years later Telephus came to Mysia on the advice of the oracle and was reunited with his mother. Other accounts say that Auge was adopted as a daughter by Teuthras, and that when Telephus arrived, gave him his adopted daughter as a wife in return for Telephus' aid in a war. But on the wedding night the miraculous appearance of a serpent caused their true relationship to be revealed.

Augeas (ô'jē-as, ô-jē'as) or Augeias (ô-jē'as). In Greek mythology, a son of Helius (or of Phorbas). He was a king of the Epeans in Elis, and one of the Argonauts. Augeas was the owner of a herd of 3000 oxen, including 12 white bulls sacred to the sun. His cattle, by a gift of the gods, were extremely fertile and never sickened and died of disease. They were kept in a stable that had not been cleaned in 30 years. As one of his labors for Eurystheus, Heracles undertook to clean the stables in one day, and Augeas agreed to pay him one-tenth of his herds if he fulfilled the task in the time stipulated. Phyleus, son of Augeas, was called as a witness to the bargain. Heracles carried out his contract by diverting the rivers Alpheus and Peneus and washing them through the stables. Augeas refused to honor his agreement, on the ground that Heracles had been commanded to carry out this task by Eurystheus and furthermore, he had been assisted by the river-gods. He banished Phyleus, who upheld Heracles. Heracles ultimately had his revenge; he gathered a force and attacked and killed Augeas and his other sons, and made Phyleus ruler of the kingdom.

Augiae (ô-jî'ë). Homer's name for the Laccian town of Aegiae.

Augur (ô'gër). Among the ancient Romans, a functionary whose duty it was to observe and to interpret, according to traditional rules, the auspices or reputed natural signs concerning future events. It was the function of the augur to announce the approval or disapproval of the gods with respect to proposed activities, rather than to make specific predictions. These auspices were studied, with a fixed ceremonial, in the following classes of phenomena: 1) signs from the heavens, including thunder and lightning, and other meteorological manifestations; 2) signs from the direction of flight or the various cries of birds; 3) signs from the manner of eating of domestic hens kept for this purpose; 4) signs from the movements and attitudes of animals; 5) evil omens from various fortuitous incidents, such as the fall of an object, the gnawing of a mouse, the creaking of a chair, etc., occurring during the augural ceremonies, or when these were about to begin. The official or public augurs, who constituted a college probably founded by Numa, were originally three in number. By the time of the Tarquins they had been increased to six. (For an interesting legend concerning augury during the time of Tarquinius Priscus, see Attius, Navius.) After 300 B.C., the number of augurs was raised to nine, of whom five had to be plebeians. Sulla made the number 15; Julius Caesar, 16, not including his own official membership in his character of perpetual chief priest and dictator; and toward the close of the empire the number was still further increased. The augurs wore the sacerdotal praetexta, or toga with a broad purple border, and their distinctive emblem was the curved rod called the lituus, with which they marked out the limits of the templum or boundary within which the omens with which they had to do were to be observed. Before any public business or ceremony was undertaken, the augurs decided whether the auspices were propitious, or whether unfavorable omens demanded interruption or delay; they conducted the inauguration or exauguration of priests, establishment of temples and places such as new settlements, and fixed the times of movable festivals. Augural advice was not always followed, and Roman history relates numerous occasions on which the rejection of such advice was followed by disaster.

Augusta (ô-gus'ta). In ancient Rome, a title conferred as a supreme honor upon women of the imperial house. It was first borne by Livia, then by Antonia, grandmother of Caligula, and first as consort of the emperor by Agrippina, wife of Claudius. Later it was bestowed, with the consent of the emperor, upon others beside the consort of the reigning Caesar.

Augusta Praetoria (ô-gus'ta prē-tôr'i-a). [Modern name, Aosta.] Town in NW Italy at the foot of the Alps, situated on the Duria Major River. It was the ancient capital of the Gallic tribe of the Salassi, and became a Roman colony under Augustus. Roman walls, towers, gates, arches, and theaters are preserved.

Augustodunum (ô-gus-tô-dû-num). [Modern name, Autun.] Large town in Gaul, founded by Augustus in 12 B.C., supplanting the earlier Bibracte, with important Roman remains including fortifications and two town gates. (JJ)

Augustus (ô-gus'tus). [Original name, Caius Octavius; called later Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus.] The first Roman emperor. He was the son of a wealthy knight, Caius Octavius, and Atia, the niece of Julius Caesar. He was born just before sunrise, on Sept. 23, 63 B.C.; died August 19, 14 A.D. Some say he was born in the Palatine district in Rome, and the room in which he was said to have been born became a shrine after his death. But the people of Velitrae, the home of his father and his ancestors, insisted that Octavius was born there in a small room on his father's estate. Later, it was forbidden to enter this room before ceremonies of purification had been performed. Numerous legends have been preserved concerning his birth and predictions of his future greatness. In ancient times part of the wall of Velitrae had been struck by lightning. Seers foretold that a native of the city would become ruler of the world. On the night that Octavius was born, a seer, on learning the hour of his birth, prophesied that the ruler of the world had been born. Later, Octavius consulted the priests of Dionysus in Thrace concerning his son's future. When the priests poured wine for the sacrifice over the altar, a pillar of flame rose from it. This same sign had appeared when Alexander the Great sacrificed at the same altar. That night Caius Octavius dreamed that his son appeared, armed like Jupiter with the thunderbolt, crowned, and riding in a chariot decked with laurel branches. Other dreams and omens confirmed that he would wield supreme power. At the ceremonies in honor of his coming of age, the gown of a senator that Caesar permitted him to wear, split apart and fell about his feet. This was interpreted as a sign that the Senate itself would one day be brought to his feet.

Before he was legally entitled to them, he was given many honors. At the age of 18 he followed Caesar to Munda in Spain to help him against the sons of Pompey. At Munda, Caesar noticed a palm tree and ordered his men not to cut it down as the palm was a symbol of victory. The tree suddenly put out a new shoot that grew so fast it overshadowed the original stock. Doves nested in it. Some say that this omen confirmed Caesar in his intention to name Octavius as his heir. In the following year Octavius was in Apollonia, in Illyria. While he was there news of Caesar's death reached him (44 B.C.). He returned to Rome at once. Having learned that Caesar had adopted him and made him his heir, he took the name Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus, and was henceforth known as Octavian. He took command of the army and assumed the reins of government.

In Rome he was at first scorned by Mark Antony, who ridiculed his pretensions; Brutus and Cassius, the chief conspirators against Caesar, thought him beneath their notice and retired to their estates. But Octavian maneuvered shrewdly. He gained the influence of Cicero, the Senate, and the people against Mark Antony. After defeating Mark Antony at Mutina (43 B.C.), he became reconciled with him, and in the same year formed the Second Triumvirate with him and Marcus Lepidus. The three members divided the western provinces between them. Brutus and Cassius held the eastern provinces in the name of the Republic. The triumvirs consolidated their power by proscribing a large number of citizens and confiscating their estates as well as the territories of many cities, which they handed over to their soldiers. Those citizens of republican complexion who escaped the proscription went to Brutus and Cassius in the east. In 42 B.C. Octavian and Mark Antony pursued them. It is said that on his way to Philippi, Octavius met a Thessalian who assured him that he had met the ghost of Julius Caesar on the road and that the ghost foretold the victory of Octavian over the forces of Brutus and Cassius. In his first encounter with the enemy at Philippi, he was unsuccessful, and was forced to flee to the camp of Mark Antony. It was said that he escaped death only by the intervention of a friend's dream. The dream caused him to leave his tent, which was afterwards surrounded by an enemy party that cut the tent to ribbons under the impression that Octavian was in it. In the second engagement at Philippi he defeated Brutus and Cassius (42 B.C.). Both the conspirators committed suicide. Some say that Octavian cut off the head of Brutus and sent it to Rome to be flung at the feet of Caesar's divine image as proof that he had avenged Caesar's death. After the success at Philippi, Octavian and Mark Antony, whose friendship had never been strong, quarreled. Lucius, brother of Antony, raised a revolt at Perusia. Octavian proceeded to the city and laid siege to it. It is said that one day as he was sacrificing before the walls, a party of the enemy raided his camp and carried off the sacrificial vessels as well as the carcasses of the victims. Soothsayers foretold that the dangers threatened by the omens, which had been unpropitious on the victims, would now fall on those who had carried them off. Octavian forced the city to capitulate. Some say that after its fall he chose 300 prisoners from the upper ranks of citizens and offered them as human sacrifices on the Ides of March to the god Julius (Caesar). In 40 B.C. Octavian and Mark Antony were again reconciled. Antony married Octavia, the sister of Octavian, and departed to rule the eastern half of the empire. Lepidus was given 20 legions and command of one province in Africa. Sextus Pompey, son of Pompey the Great, had control of Sicily and was constantly threatening to cut off the grain supply on which Rome depended. Octavian waged war on him

(43–35 B.C.). Two stories are told of propitious omens in connection with the battle against Sextus. One, that when he was walking near the shore before a naval battle off Sicily, a fish leaped out of the water and fell at his feet. The other, that he met a peasant driving a donkey and asked him his name. The peasant answered that his name was Eutychus (Prosperous) and his donkey's name was Nicon (Victory). In spite of these favorable omens, the war dragged on; Antony at first refused to send assistance. Octavian lost two fleets in violent storms, but raged that he would win this war "whatever Neptune may do." Antony finally did send some help and the war ended in victory for Octavian. He was greatly aided by the services of his good friend and admiral, Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa, to whom he gave his daughter Julia in marriage, despite the fact that Agrippa was already married and that Julia was very much younger and already becoming well known for her vices. Sextus Pompey fled to Asia and perished there soon afterwards. Lepidus, whose ideas of his own importance had become highly exaggerated, demanded the leading place in the government and was expelled from the triumvirate for his presumption, and went into permanent exile (36 B.C.). For the next five years Octavian and Antony shared power, but whereas Antony accomplished little in the East except for promoting his liaison with Cleopatra, Octavian consolidated his power in the West. When Antony cast aside Octavia, the sister of Octavian, and when it was discovered that in his will he had made his children by Cleopatra his heirs, Octavian had a proper reason for declaring war on him and eliminating the only serious rival who opposed him. He met Antony at Actium in Epirus, and defeated him decisively (31 B.C.). After the battle he was compelled to go to Brundisium and put down a mutiny, which he did with dispatch. He then pursued Antony to Alexandria, besieged the city, and forced Antony to sue for peace. As a condition of the peace he compelled Antony to promise to commit suicide, and saw that he had carried out the promise by inspecting the corpse. He was so anxious to have Cleopatra in the triumphal procession that would follow this victory that, some say, he tried to have her restored by sending a snake charmer to suck out the poison of the asp that she had allowed to bite her. This was a failure, and with some magnanimity Octavian permitted Antony and Cleopatra to be buried in the same tomb. But he dragged Antony's son by Fulvia from the image of the god Julius whither he had fled for sanctuary and had him slain. He also sought out and had killed Caesarion, Cleopatra's son by Caesar. But the children of Antony and Cleopatra he brought up with as much care as if they had been members of his own family. In memory of his victory at Actium he founded the city of Nicopolis (City of Victory) near the scene of the battle, and instituted public games to be held every five years there.

With the defeat of Antony, Octavian became sole ruler of the Roman dominion, and remained sole ruler for the next 44 years. In 28 B.C. he was made princeps senatus (First senator). On Jan. 17 of the following year he received the title of Augustus, by which title he is best known in history. Augustus preserved the republican forms, but united in his own person the consular, tribunician, proconsular, and other powers. His generals carried on various wars in Spain, Africa, Germany and elsewhere, but the Roman advance in the last-named country received a definite setback through the defeat of Varus by Arminius in 9 A.D. The loss of Varus and three legions with all their officers and men was a blow from which Augustus never completely recovered. It was said that when he heard the news, he went into a state of depression, and let his hair and his beard grow, and that he was often observed to beat his head on a door while he shouted, "Quintilius Varus, give me back my legions!" The anniversary of the loss was observed as a day of mourning. Yet Augustus preferred to avoid war if he could. During his reign the gates of the Temple of Janus on the Quirinal, which were open during times of war, were closed three times, signifying that the country was at peace. From the founding of Rome up to his time, they had been closed only twice before. Augustus was a strict disciplinarian over the army, did not encourage the creation of new citizens lest he dilute Roman blood, built libraries, and beautified the city. He boasted that he had found Rome a city "of sun-dried brick and left it clothed in marble." Among the structures for which he was responsible were the Forum, a temple of Apollo on the Palatine, and a temple of Jupiter the Thunderer on the Capitoline. He also urged such Romans as could afford it to raise new temples and public monuments and to restore such of the existing ones as stood in need of it. He revived ancient religious rites and customs; restored the calendar, which had been allowed to lapse, and named one month (formerly Sextilis) for himself; he tidied up the civil and administrative forms that had fallen into disorder during the years of civil war; he provided the most elaborate public spectacles ever to be presented to the Roman public; and he encouraged the growth of an indigenous Roman literature, which under him reached its greatest point. Above all, he consolidated the empire and brought peace to it. He was in fact, supreme ruler and emperor. Twice he thought of restoring the republican constitution, but was persuaded that the time was not ripe to do so. He rejected divine honors as well as the title "Father of his Country."

Augustus married first, Claudia, step-daughter of Antony, for reasons of state, but divorced her when he quarreled with her mother. His second wife was Scribonia, who bore him a daughter, his only child, Julia. Julia caused him great sorrow, for though he attempted to raise the moral tone of Roman life, the activities of Julia his daughter and Julia his granddaughter were a public scandal. When he learned what all Rome knew, he had them both banished and refused all pleas to forgive them, or to lessen the severity of their punishment. He adopted his grandsons, the children of Julia and Agrippa, Caius, Lucius, and Agrippa Postumus. Caius and Lucius died in young manhood. Agrippa Postumus was accused of plotting against him, was banished, and died under mysterious circumstances. The third wife of Augustus was Livia Drusilla, whom he took from her husband Tiberius Nero, though she was pregnant at the time. He adopted her son Tiberius and, having lost the heirs of his body, made him his heir. There is no doubt that Livia Drusilla was a strong character and that she exerted great influence on Augustus. Some say that her constant aim in the exercise of her influence was to strengthen the office of emperor and to see to it that her son Tiberius eventually filled it. Whether, as is sometimes hinted, she hastened the end of Augustus by the judicious use of poison, can probably never be proved. Omens foretold his death: lightning struck his name on one of his statutes, for example. On Aug. 19, 14 A.D., after a very brief illness, he died in the same room at Nola where his father had died. His body was burned and the ashes placed in the mausoleum on the Tiber that he had built for himself and his family. By a decree of the Senate, Augustus was named one of the gods to be worshiped by the Romans. He had prepared an official biography, the Res Gestae Divi Augusti or Index Rerum Gestarum, containing lists of his public honors, of his public benefactions from his private purse, and of the military successes of the Romans during his principate, and a statement of his attitude toward and position in the Roman state. In accordance with his wishes this was engraved on two bronze tablets and placed on his mausoleum. Copies, in Latin and in an official translation, have been found at Ancyra (Ankara) in Galatia, and at Apollonia and Antioch in Pisidia, the most nearly complete of which, inscribed on the walls of the temple of Rome and Augustus at Ancyra, is known as the Monumentum Ancyranum, a term consequently sometimes used synonymously for the official title.

Aulis (ô'lis). In ancient geography, a town on the E coast of Boeotia, Greece, said by some to have been named for a daughter of Ogygus. Twice the Greek fleet assembled here for the expeditions against Troy. The second time the fleet was held windbound through the will of Artemis. In accordance with instructions from a seer, Agamemnon made ready to sacrifice his daughter, Iphigenia, to appease Artemis and secure favorable winds. One tradition has it that Iphigenia was actually sacrificed. According to another account, as the sacrificial knife was at her throat, Artemis substituted in her place a hind, and took Iphigenia away to Tauris. In the temple of Artemis at Aulis were two white marble images of the goddess, one carrying a torch and the other showing the goddess in the act of shooting an arrow. Also in the temple was preserved the plane tree in which the eight nestlings and their mother were swallowed by a mottled serpent, just before the Greeks sailed to Troy, thus indicating that the war would last ten years. The traveler Pausanias, writing in the 2nd century A.D., says he saw the plane tree in the temple, and that he was also shown the bronze threshold of Agamemnon's tent at Aulis.

Aura (ô'ra). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Lelas and Periboea. She was a huntress and a companion of Artemis. Dionysus pursued her but she rejected his advances. Dionysus appealed to Aphrodite to cause Aura to return his love. She then yielded to him and bore him twins. But afterward she was stricken with madness, killed one of her children, and cast herself into the Sangarius river. Zeus transformed her into a spring.

Auriga (ô-rî'ga). A northern constellation, the Charioteer or Wagoner, containing the first-magnitude star Capella. It is supposed to represent a charioteer kneeling in his vehicle. He is often represented with a kid on his left shoulder.

Aurora (â-rô'ra). [Greek, Eos.] In Roman mythology, the goddess of the dawn. The poets represented her as rising out of the ocean in a chariot, her rosy fingers dropping gentle dew.

Aurunci (ô-run'sî). A dialectal form of the name of an Italic people, the Ausones (q. v.), who formerly occupied the Vescian Plain and the valley of the river Liris, on the border between Latium and Campania. (JJ)

Ausona (ô-sô'na). One of three oppida, Ausona, Vescia, and Minturnae, of an Italic people known as the Ausones or Aurunci, who formerly occupied the Vescian Plain and the valley of the river Liris on the border between Latium and Campania. The site has not been identified. (JJ)

Ausones (ô'sô-nêz). An Italic people, known also as the Aurunci, who formerly occupied the Vescian Plain and the valley of the river Liris, on the border between Latium and Campania. Their three principal villages, or oppida, were Ausona, Vescia, and Minturnae,

which according to Livy were captured by the Romans in 314 B.C., after which the independent history of the Ausones ceases; but at Minturnae (q.v.) a colony of Roman citizens was established in 295 B.C. and it thereafter became an important Roman industrial and commercial city. The shrine of a local nature-goddess, the Dea Marica, now explained as the Goddess of the Marshes, on the right bank of the Liris near its mouth, survived into Imperial times. The sites of Ausona and Vescia are lost; echoes of the Ausones survive in the nomenclature of the region, the Montes Aurunci to the west, the Via Ausonia, the Ager Vescinus or Vescian Plain, the Montes Vescini, the Latin colony of Suessa (now Sessa) Aurunca, the usually dry streambed known as the Ausente, a Roman bridge known locally as the Ponte Ronaco (= Aurunco), a hamlet called Rongolisi (= Auruncolisium), the Roman family name Ausonius, and so on. Among Greek and Latin writers Ausonia, the land of the Ausones, became a poetic or romantic name for Italy. (JJ)

Ausonia (ô-sô'ni-ă). A term for the region, on the border between Latium and Campania, formerly occupied by the Italic people known as the Ausones (q.v.) or Aurunci, occasionally used by Greek and Latin poets as a name for Italy. (JJ)

Autolycus (ô-tol'i-kus). In Greek mythology, a son of Hermes and Chione, and the twin half-brother of Philammon, whose father was Apollo. He was a famous thief and possessed the power, given him by his father, of making himself and the things that he stole invisible or of giving them new forms. He stole the cattle of Sisyphus but Sisyphus found them, and seduced Anticlea, the daughter of Autolycus. Autolycus was the grandfather of Odysseus and gave him his name, which means the "angry one." He gave Odysseus rich gifts when the latter visited him as a child, and it was during this visit that he received the scar from a gash of a boar, by which Odysseus was recognized when he returned to Ithaca ten years after the end of the Trojan War. Autolycus was the thief who stole the cattle of Eurytus of Oechalia and, after changing their color, sold them to Heracles.

Autolycus. Greek mathematician and astrono-mer, born at Pitane in Aeolis; fl. late 4th century B.C. He was the author of two treatises still extant: one a work on the motion of points on a sphere (the oldest Greek mathematical work preserved as a whole) and the other a study of the apparent rising and setting of fixed stars. Autolycus was the first to try to explain certain difficulties involved in the theory of homocentric spheres in astronomy, notably the fact that the apparent differences in the relative sizes of the sun and moon, and in the brightness of the planets, suggest variations in their distances from the earth.

Automedon (ô-tom'e-don). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Diodes. He was Achilles' charioteer, the driver of the immortal horses Balius and Xanthus. After the death of Patroclus, who had borrowed the horses from Achilles, the horses wept and refused to leave the battlefield. Automedon could not persuade them to move but he stayed with them and finally, after Zeus had assured them that they would never fall into Hector's hands, Automedon drove them back to Achilles.

Autonoë (ô-ton'ô-ë). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, and a sister of Agave. She married Aristaeus at the order of the Muses and bore him a son Actaeon, who was torn to pieces by his own hounds. When Dionysus arrived in Thebes, his divinity and his worship were denied by Pentheus, king of Thebes and son of Agave. To punish him, Dionysus drove Agave and her sisters and other Theban celebrants mad. Under this spell the Theban women mistook Pentheus, who was caught spying on them from a treetop, for a wild beast. They shook the tree until he fell from it and, under the impression that he was a young lion, Autonoë helped Agave tear him limb from limb. Autonoë, like Agave, had been punished by the god for originally doubting his divinity, and with her sister was forced to go into exile.

Auxo (ôk'sô). In Athens only two Charites (Graces) were recognized. Auxo (Increase) was one of them. In Greek mythology, Auxo is also recognized as one of the goddesses of the seasons. See Charites.

actor; up, lûte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; ꝥH, then; ġ as d or j, ſ as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z̃ as z or zh.

the southernmost of the seven hills of ancient Rome, rising on the left bank of the Tiber, S of the Palatine. Below it to the N lay the Circus Maximus, and to the E the Baths of Caracalla. According to some accounts, the hill was named for Aventinus, a king of the ancient city of Alba Longa, who was buried on it.

Avernus, Lacus (ā-vēr'nus, lā'kus). [Modern: Lake Averno; Italian, Lago d'Averno.] Small lake near Puteoli in Campania, Italy, about nine miles W of Neapolis, anciently believed to be the entrance to the infernal regions.

Axine (ak'sin). An early name for the Euxine (Black) Sea, meaning "Unfriendly."

Axiopoenus (ak'si-ō-pē'nus). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Just Requital." Heracles raised a sanctuary of Athena Axiopoenus in Laconia, after he had avenged the killing of Oeonus, who had accidentally killed one of their dogs, by killing Hippocoön and his sons.

Axius (ak'si-us). [Modern name, Vardar.] In ancient geography, a river of Paeonia, about 200 miles long. It flows south and empties into the Myrtoan Sea (Thermaic Gulf).

Azan (ā'zan). In mythology, a son of Arcas and the dryad Erato. He became ruler of the district of Azania, named for himself, in Arcadia. Some say the first funeral games ever celebrated in Greece were held in his honor.

Azani (ā-zā'nī). [Also: Azanion, Aizani.] In ancient geography, a city in Phrygia, Asia Minor.

Baalbek (bāl'bek). See Heliopolis.

Babrius (bā'bri-us). [Also: Babrias, Gabrias.] Greek writer and fabulist, who flourished possibly in the 1st century A.D. or later, in Syria. He is chiefly known for having put into choliambic verse the fables attributed to Aesop.

Babylon (bab'i-lon). [Possibly the Biblical Babel; ancient Persian, Babirus.] In ancient geography, a city in Mesopotamia, the capital of Babylonia, situated on both sides of the Euphrates River, above the modern city of Hilla, S central Iraq, about 50 miles S of Baghdad. The etymology of the name is, as ascertained by many passages in the cuneiform inscriptions, Bab-Ili (meaning "Gate of God"), from bab ("gate") and ilu ("god"). Babylon was one of the oldest cities of Mesopotamia, and was the undisputed capital of Babylonia at the time of the Elamite conquest, in the third millennium B.C. As capital of the country it shared in all its vicissitudes, and was the principal target of the Assyrian invasions. It was first conquered (c1270 B.C.) by the Assyrian king Tukulti-Adar, then (c1110 B.C.) by Tiglath-pileser I. Of Shalmaneser II (860-824 B.C.) and his son and grandson it is recorded that they victoriously entered Babylon and sacrificed there to the gods. It was customary with the Assyrian kings, in order to be recognized as fully legitimate kings, to go to Babylon and there perform the mysterious ceremony termed by them "seizing the hands of Bel." Sennacherib sacked it (690 B.C.), and completely razed it to the ground. His son and successor Esarhaddon undertook, 11 years later, the restoration of the city. But it was under Nabopolassar (625-604 B.C.), the founder of the new Babylonian empire, and especially under his successor Nebuchadnezzar (605-562 B.C.) that it became "Babylon the Great." The ruins, now covering both banks of the Euphrates, are those of the Babylon of these kings and their successors, and convey some idea of its former magnitude and splendor. Nebuchadnezzar, who took more pride in the buildings constructed under his auspices than in his victorious campaigns, concentrated all his care upon the adorning and beautifying of his residence. To this end he completed the fortification of the city begun by his father Nabopolassar. The city itself was adorned with numerous temples, chief among them Esagila ("the high-towering house"), temple of the city and of the national god Merodach (Babylonian, Marduk) with his spouse Zirpanit. In its neighborhood was the royal palace, the site of which was identified with the ruins of Al-Kasr. Sloping toward the river were the Hanging Gardens, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, the location of which is in the N mound of ruins, Babil. The temple described by Herodotus is that of Nebo in Borsippa, not far from Babylon, which Herodotus included under Babylon, and which also in the cuneiform inscriptions is called "Babylon the second." This temple, which in the mound of Birs Nimrud represents the most imposing ruin of Babylonia, is termed in the inscriptions Ezida ("the eternal house"), an ancient sanctuary of Nebo (Assyrian, Nabu), and was restored with great splendor by Nebuchadnezzar. It represents in its construction a sort of pyramid built in seven stages, whence it is sometimes called "temple of the seven spheres of heaven and earth," and it has been assumed that the narrative of the Tower of Babel in Genesis xi. may have been connected with this temple. Concerning Babylon proper, Herodotus mentions that it had wide streets lined with houses of three and four stories. In the conquest (538 B.C.) of Cyrus of Persia, the city of Babylon was spared. Darius the Great razed its walls and towers. Xerxes (486-465 B.C.) despoiled the temples of their golden statues and treasures. Alexander the Great wished to restore the city but was prevented by his early death. The decay of Babylon was hastened by the foundation (300 B.C.) in its neighborhood of Seleucia, which was built from the ruins of Babylon. The last who calls himself in an inscription "king of Babylon, restorer of Esagila and Ezida," was Antiochus the Great (223-187 B.C.). In the time of Pliny (23-79 A.D.) Babylon was a deserted and dismal place.

Babylonia (bab-i-lō'ni-a, -lōn'ya). In ancient geography, a region and country of SW Asia. Its extent and boundaries are matters of divergence of opinion, some scholars considering it to have been coextensive with the whole, but others with the S part only, of Mesopotamia. Before the rise of Babylon to power,

S Mesopotamia was known as Chaldea and as Sumer. A line running from the Euphrates near Hit to a little below Samarra on the Tigris has been suggested as an approximate boundary between Sumer to the south and Akkad to the north. Some, however, apply the name Sumer to the whole region; some also identify it with the Biblical Shinar (also spelled Shanhar, Shenar), which others differentiate from Sumer and apply only to N Mesopotamia.

Culture. The N part of the area between the Tigris and the Euphrates is an upland; the S part is an alluvial plain resulting from deposits of silt by the two rivers. This alluvial land advances into the Persian Gulf at the rate of about 115 feet a year. From this it is known that Eridu, anciently a seaport and now 130 miles inland, existed 6000 years ago. It is widely believed that man first attained civilization in this alluvial plain. The ruins of many cities and towns have been discovered, with artifacts of Stone Age and Bronze Age cultures. There is evidence that from an early age this was a region where many peoples met. The Sumerians drained swamps, built canals, practiced flood control, developed agriculture and trade, and developed skills in metal-working, pottery, and textiles. They had an advanced understanding of astronomy and also practiced astrology, and acquired such a reputation for magic that their other name, Chaldeans, was for ages a synonym for magicians. Their religion was polytheistic; different Semitic and non-Semitic deities were popular in different periods, and each city had its particular god or goddess. At Nippur, Bel was especially worshiped, but within the precincts of his temple there were shrines to 24 other deities. One of the great Sumerian achievements was the cuneiform alphabet, perhaps the first ever to take form. Systems of weights, measures, and accounting were also invented in Sumer and later highly developed in Babylon.

History. The Sumerians, a non-Semitic people, were conquered by the Akkadians, generally supposed to have been Semites, under Sargon I; the Akkad dynasty may be dated c2400-2200 B.C. At this time the city of Babylon began to dominate the entire region from the mountains E of the Tigris to the Arabian or Syrian Desert and from the Persian Gulf to the borders of what is now Armenia. Thus the ancient Babylonian empire occupied approximately the area now comprised in the kingdom of Iraq. From about 2200 B.C. it was ruled for some centuries by the Guti, a highland people; about 1850 B.C. it was conquered by the Amorites, who were probably Semites. The capture of Mari, chief city of the Amorites, by the Sumerian Hammurabi is now generally dated about 1700 B.C. Under Hammurabi the village of Babylon became a great city, and the laws were written down in the famous Hammurabian Code. Babylonia, however, was far from through with invasions, being conquered thereafter by Horites and Hittites and, about 1270 B.C., by the Assyrians. For centuries Assyria had been a vassal state of Babylonia, but now for more than 600 years the Assyrians were supreme. Under Nebuchadnezzar (605-562 B.C.) Babylonia enjoyed its greatest power and Babylon its peak of wealth and glory; but in 538 B.C. Cyrus of Persia put an end to Babylonian power. After the Persians, Babylonia was ruled by Alexander the Great, by the Seleucids, the Parthians, the Arabs, and the Turks. Throughout the later centuries the ancient system of drainage and irrigation was neglected, and the land became almost a wilderness, while ancient cities and towns were leveled by war or abandoned by their inhabitants.

Bacchae (bak'ē) or Bacchantes (ba-kan'tēz). [Also: Maenads.] In ancient Greece and Italy, female worshipers of the god of wine, generally called by the Greeks Dionysus, and by the Romans Bacchus.

Bacchae, The. A drama by Euripides, produced after his death, in 405 B.C. It is concerned with the strange and awful punishment which Dionysus inflicted on Pentheus and the daughters of Cadmus for denying his divinity. The scene is before the royal palace at Thebes. Dionysus enters and proclaims that he is the son of Zeus and Semele, daughter of Cadmus. He describes his travels through Lydia, Phrygia, Persia, and all of Asia, during which he established his worship. He is now in Thebes to teach his mother's sisters and Pheneus, ruler of Thebes, that he is indeed a god. Because of their doubts, he has already driven the women mad; they are raging on the hills. A chorus of Asian women enters and sings in praise of Dionysus.

Tiresias and Cadmus come in. Only they of all Thebes are going to the mountain to take part in the rites for Dionysus. They only are wise; the rest are fools to question the gods. Pentheus joins them. He says he has heard of the women's revels, and that he has ordered them captured and imprisoned. He sneers at the claims of Dionysus and vows to cut off his head. He mocks Cadmus and Tiresias, clad in fawnskins and bearing the thyrsi of Dionysus, and blames Tiresias for introducing the pestilential rites into Thebes. Tiresias answers by declaring that Dionysus, giver of wine, and Demeter, giver of grain, are the two greatest gods. He advises Pentheus to welcome the god. Cadmus also admonishes him, and suggests that he wear the ivy crown of Dionysus. Pentheus disregards their warnings. He orders his attendants to find and bind Dionysus. Tiresias and Cadmus depart, predicting woe for Pentheus, as the chorus sings of the folly of the obstinate and then praises Dionysus, who demands faith from all.

Pentheus returns, followed by attendants who have brought Dionysus with them. They say that he, disguised as a mortal, came with them willingly. Furthermore, the captives have been freed: the chains miraculously dropped from their limbs. After questioning his captive and finding his answers evasive, Pentheus orders him chained and imprisoned. The chorus sings to Dirce, the sacred fountain of Thebes, foretelling the time when the city will accept Dionysus, and praying the god to free them of their chains. They hear the voice of Dionysus. An earthquake follows, in which the monument of Semele is wreathed in flames. Dionysus approaches and comforts the chorus. Pentheus also comes out, looking for his captive. A herdman now enters and describes the wild revels of the women on the mountain. He speaks of a miraculous fountain of wine that gushed from the earth when the thyrsus struck the ground. He earnestly advises Pentheus to welcome the wonder-working god. But Pentheus refuses to be convinced. Instead he proposes to take up arms against the women. He disregards the repeated warnings of Dionysus not to provoke a god, but agrees to his suggestion to go and observe the revels. Dionysus says he must go disguised as a woman, otherwise the maenads will kill him. Pentheus goes off to effect his disguise. The god now informs the chorus of his intended revenge on Pentheus: he will make him mad, cause him to go through the streets garbed as a woman after all his terrible threats, and bring about his death at the hands of his own mother. Thus all Thebes will know that Dionysus is the son of Zeus. The chorus sings of the doom that awaits those who in their folly exalt their own unbelief.

Pentheus reappears in his woman's robes. Dionysus ridicules him by fixing his hair and adjusting his robe, but as Pentheus is now completely mad, he submits and departs. The chorus calls on Justice to avenge his impiety, and to punish him because he fears neither the gods nor the laws.

Presently a messenger enters and announces the death of Pentheus. He had climbed to the top of a tree to spy on the women. Informed of his presence by Dionysus, the women threw stones and their thyrsi at him and finally, in a frenzy, uprooted the tree and brought him down. Agave, his mother, attacked him. He tried to tell her he was her son, but she paid no heed. Under the impression he was a lion, she tore him limb from limb. She then impaled his head on her thyrsus and was even now returning to the city in triumph, bearing it aloft.

Agave enters. She calls Cadmus and Pentheus to share her triumph, to see the head of a young lion she has caught with her bare hands. Cadmus follows her, bearing the fragments of Pentheus' body. He regards his daughter with anguish and speaks of the just but ruthless stroke by which Dionysus has ruined them. Gradually he brings his daughter to a realization of what she has done and tells her that this is a punishment for denying the divinity of Dionysus. Aware of the horror she has committed under a spell of madness, Agave laments for her dead son. Dionysus, now revealed as a god, enters. He declares that Agave and her sisters were involved in the punishment of Pentheus because of their unbelief. They shall be exiled permanently. Even Cadmus and his wife are sentenced to exile and ultimately they will be transformed into serpents. Dionysus is deaf to Agave's plea that his punishment is too extreme and too similar to human vengeance. They must go into exile. The play closes, as many of Euripides' plays close, with words to the effect that the ways of the gods are too mysterious for mortals to understand.

Bacchanalia (bak-ā-nā'li-ā, -nāl'yā). Festival in honor of Bacchus (Dionysus). Introduced into Rome from the Greek communities in S Italy, the Bacchanalia (the name is a Latin equivalent of the Greek Dionysia) originally consisted of secret rites practiced by women only (the Bacchae or Bacchantes) on three days of the year. Later the rites were opened to men and were celebrated five days each month; they became drunken orgies, at which it was supposed that crimes were plotted and conspiracies were hatched, and the Roman Senate by decree in 186 B.C. prohibited them throughout Italy, under penalty of severe punishments.

Bacchiadae (ba-kī'ā-dē). Ruling family of Corinth. They were descendants of Heracles, and took their name from Bacchis, said to have been king of Corinth in the period 926–891 B.C. As members of the ruling class they intermarried, lived luxuriously, and displayed the utmost arrogance toward the people. They were deposed by Cypselus, 657 B.C., and many of them fled to other parts of Greece and to Italy.

Bacchiglione (bāk-kē-lyō'nā) River. See Meduacus Minor.

Bacchus (bak'us). In classical mythology, a name of Dionysus, the son of Zeus and Semele. He was the god of wine, personifying both its good and its bad qualities. Bacchus was the current name of the god among the Romans. The orgiastic worship of Bacchus was especially characteristic of Boeotia, where his festivals were celebrated on the slopes of Mount Cithaeron, and extended to those of the neighboring Parnassus. In Attica the rural and somewhat savage cult of Bacchus underwent a metamorphosis, and reached its highest expression in the choragic literary contests, in which originated both tragedy and comedy, and for which were written most of the masterpieces of Greek literature. Bacchus was held to have taught the cultivation of the grape and the preparation of wine. It is thought that while the worship of Dionysus originated in Phrygia, the name Bacchus is Lydian in origin.

Bacchylides (bă-kil'i-dēz). Greek lyric poet (fl. 5th century B.C.), born on the island of Ceos, in the Aegean Sea. He was a nephew and pupil of Simonides, and a contemporary and rival of Pindar. He lived for a time at the court of Hiero I of Syracuse. He wrote, as did Pindar, odes or hymns for athletic victors, as well as paeans, processions, and other works. Among his extant works is a poem on the meeting of Theseus and Minos in Crete and a poem in praise of peace. Horace is said to have been influenced by the work of Bacchylides.

Bacis (bā'sis) or Bakis (-kis). In Greek legend, a name given to several seers or prophets, the most celebrated of whom was the Boeotian Bacis, whose oracles were delivered at Heleon in Boeotia. Specimens of these (spurious) oracles, in hexameter verse, have been preserved. According to Herodotus, Bacis had warned the Euboeans of the Persian invasion in the following oracle:

"When o'er the main shall be thrown a byblus yoke by a stranger, Be thou ware, and drive from Euboea the goats' loud-bleating."

But the Euboeans made light of the oracle and took no precautions, to their great loss. Bacis also foretold the eventual and total defeat of the Persians in the following pronouncements:

"When they shall bridge with their ships to the sacred strand of Artemis . . .

Mad hope swelling their hearts at the downfall of beautiful Athens—

Then shall godlike Right extinguish haughty Presumption."

This oracle referred to the victory of the Greeks at Salamis. The following was to the victory over Mardonius at Plataea:

"By Thermodon's stream, and the grass-clad banks of Asopus,

See where gather the Grecians, and hark to the foreigners' war-shout—

There in death shall lie, ere fate or Lachesis doomed him,

Many a bow-bearing Mede, when the day
of calamity cometh."

Bactra (bak'trā). [Also known anciently as Zariaspa; modern, Balkh.] In ancient geography, a city in SW Asia, supposed by most authorities to have been the capital of the ancient country of Bactria. It was the center of Zoroastrianism, and Zoroaster is said to have died there. Bactra, which its natives called "Mother of Cities," anciently rivaled Ecbatana, Nineveh, and Babylon. It was conquered by Cyrus the Great and by Alexander the Great.

Bactria (bak'tri-ā). In ancient geography, a country in C Asia, N of the Paropanisus Mountains (now Hindu Kush) on the upper Oxus River (now the Amu Darya), nearly corresponding to the modern district of Balkh in Afghanistan. The ancient capital was Zariaspa, Baktry, or Bactra (now Balkh). Bactria was the cradle of the Persian religion which Zoroaster reformed c600 B.C. At a very early period it was the center of a powerful kingdom which was conquered first by the Medes, then (as part of the domain of the Medes) by the Persians, and finally by Alexander the Great, who took a Bactrian princess, Roxana, as one of his wives. It was a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidae (a dynasty of rulers in Asia that stemmed from one of Alexander's generals), and from 256 B.C. for about 100 years an independent Greco-Bactrian kingdom which extended to the Kábul and Indus rivers. Bactria belonged thereafter to the Sassanidae until c640 A.D., and has since been under Moslem rule. Bactria played in ancient times an important cultural role, acting as an intermediary between the civilizations of the Greek world, India, and China.

Baetica (bē'ti-kā). In ancient geography, the southernmost division of Hispania (Spain). It was also known as Hispania Ulterior.

Bagoas (bā-gō'as). Favorite eunuch of Alexander the Great; fl. second half of the 4th century B.C.

Bagoas. Egyptian eunuch, originally in the service of Artaxerxes III of Persia. For a short time he virtually usurped the sovereignty of the empire. He put to death Artaxerxes (338 B.C.) and his son Arses (336 B.C.), but was himself compelled to drink poison (336 B.C.), which he had intended for Arses' successor, Darius III.

Baiae (bā'yē). [Modern name, Baia.] Seaport

in SW Italy, in the Campania, near Cape Misenum on the Gulf of Puteoli, W of Neapolis. It was a great seaport and the leading Roman watering-place, especially in the times of Horace, Nero, and Hadrian. It was famous for its luxury, and contained the villas of many celebrated Romans. Among the antiquities of Baiae are: 1) A Temple of Diana, so-called, in reality part of a Roman bath. It is octagonal without, circular within, with a pointed dome 97 feet in diameter. The walls have four ornamental niches. The structure is in opus incertum cased in masonry of brick and stone. 2) A Temple of Mercury, so-called, in reality part of a Roman bath, three subdivisions of which survive. The chief of these is the frigidarium, or cold bath, a circular domed structure 144 feet in diameter, with a circular opening at the apex, as in the Pantheon at Rome. The two others are rectangular and vaulted, the vault of one having excellent ornament in relief. 3) A Temple of Venus, so-called, in fact part of a Roman bath, an octagonal buttressed structure of opus incertum cased in brick, and opus reticulatum, circular within, 94 feet in diameter, and domed. It has eight windows above, four doors below, and had lateral chambers containing stairs.

Balbus (bal'bus), Lucius Cornelius. [Called Lucius Cornelius Balbus Major.] Roman politician, born in Gades (now Cádiz, Spain); fl. in the 1st century B.C. He was surnamed "Major" to distinguish him from his nephew Lucius Cornelius Balbus. He served in Spain in the war against Sertorius, and was made a Roman citizen in 72 B.C. His right to the citizenship was successfully defended (c55 B.C.) by Cicero. He sided with Caesar against Pompey, having been entrusted with the management of the former's affairs at Rome. On the death of Caesar he attached himself to Octavian, under whom he obtained the consulship in 40 B.C.

Balbus, Lucius Cornelius. [Called Lucius Cornelius Balbus Minor.] Roman politician, surnamed "Minor" to distinguish him from his uncle Lucius Cornelius Balbus. He was quaestor (44-43 B.C.) to the propraetor Asinius Pollio in Spain, where he acquired a large fortune through oppression of the native population. He subsequently became proconsul of Africa, and enjoyed a triumph (19

B.C.) in consequence of a victory over the Garamantes.

Balius (bā'li-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), one of a pair of immortal horses belonging to Achilles. See Xanthus.

Balkh (balch). See Bactra.

Baltia (bal'shi-a). In ancient geography, an unidentified island off the coast of Scythia, mentioned by Pliny and other writers. The name of the Baltic Sea is derived from it.

Bantia (ban'shi-a). In ancient geography, a town in S Italy, SE of Venusia and NE of the modern Potenza. The inhabitants spoke Oscan as evidenced by the Tabula Bantina, found in 1793 and now in the Naples Museum.

Baphyra (bā'fi-ra). According to Greek mythology, when the maenads who had torn Orpheus limb from limb attempted to wash away the blood that stained their hands in the waters of the Helicon River, the river, rather than be of any assistance to the murderers, plunged underground. In this way it avoided being an accessory in any way to the murderesses. The river emerged from the ground several miles away and took the name Baphyra.

Barathron (bar'a-thron). Steep ravine on the W slope of the Hill of the Nymphs, at Athens, Greece, outside of the ancient walls, rendered more precipitous by ancient use of it as a quarry. In antiquity this was the "pit" into which the bodies of criminals were thrown after execution, or in some cases while still living.

Barca (bār'ka). In ancient geography, a city in Cyrenaica, N Africa, situated near the coast: one of the cities of the Pentapolis.

Bardiya (bār'di-ya). A son of Cyrus the Great and the brother of Cambyses. He was known to the Greeks variously as Mardos, Smerdis, Maruphius, Merphis, Tanaxares or Tanyoxarces. See Smerdis.

Basento (bā-sen'tō). See Casuentus.

Basilis (bas'i-lis). In ancient geography, a town in Arcadia, founded by that Cypselus who gave his daughter in marriage to Cresphontes. It was the site of a sanctuary of Eleusinian Demeter.

Bassae (bas'ē). Place in Arcadia, Greece, near Phigalia. It is noted for its ruined temple of Apollo Epicurius, built in the second half of the 5th century B.C., probably by Ictinus, the actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; 𐤀, then; 𐤁 as d or j, 𐤂 as s or sh, 𐤃 as t or ch, 𐤄 as z or zh.

architect of the Parthenon. According to Pausanias, the temple was raised to Apollo Epicurius (Reliever) in gratitude to the god for lifting a plague that afflicted the Phigalians during the Peloponnesian War, c420 B.C. Armor found near the temple indicates that Apollo Epicurius may originally have been a war god and shows that the site of his temple on the height (over 3700 feet) was used as a place of refuge for the Phigalians in their wars with Sparta. Set back in the solitude of the mountains of Arcadia, the existence of the temple was forgotten for centuries. It was discovered by a French archaeologist in 1765. According to one account, he overheard an Arcadian shepherd telling a friend that he had left his sheep "up by the pillars." The Frenchman inquired about the "pillars," investigated, and found the temple, one of the best preserved in Greece. It is a Doric peripteros of six by 15 columns, in plan 41 by 125 feet, the cella with pronaos and opisthodomos of two columns in antis. In the interior of the cella six piers project from each side wall, their faces formed by Ionic three-quarter columns. A portion toward the back of the cella has no piers, and has a door in the side wall facing the east; it is probable that this was the cella proper, and that the main part of the cella was merely a monumental court, open to the sky—a unique arrangement. The famous frieze, about two feet high (often called the Phigalian Marbles; since 1814 in the British Museum), surrounded the interior of the cella, above the architrave; it is in high relief, and represents combats of Greeks with Amazons and of Lapithae with Centaurs.

Bastarnae (bas-tär'nē) or Basternae (-tēr'-). Germanic tribe. They appear in history in the 2nd century B.C., as auxiliaries of Perseus against the Romans in the Third Macedonian War in the region about the Euxine Sea N of the Ister, whither they had come from their original seat, apparently on the upper Vistula. During the succeeding centuries they were in frequent conflict with the Romans, but disappear in the 3rd century A.D. They appear to have been among the first Germanic people to leave their old homes in the north, and were the forerunners, accordingly, of the southward movement that afterward became general.

Batavi (bə-tā'vī). Germanic tribe, a branch of the Chatti. The Batavi inhabited the Insula Batavorum (between the Rhine, Waal, and Meuse rivers) in Roman times, were subjugated, probably by Drusus, and became the allies of the Romans (c15 A.D.) serving in the Roman armies, especially as cavalry. Later they took part in the rising (69–70 A.D.) under their own countryman, Civilis. They were ultimately merged in the Salic Franks.

Bathos (bā'thos). A place near Trapezus in Arcadia. The legend states that here the giants made a last stand in the battle against the gods. Pausanias reported that the ground still burned and smoldered and that occasionally a giant's bones were turned up by plowmen.

Baths of Caracalla (kar-a-kal'a). Baths in ancient Rome, begun by the emperor Lucius Septimius Severus in 206 A.D. The thermae proper occupied a space of 750 feet by 380 feet, in a large square enclosure of about 33 acres, bordered by porticoes and connected foundations. The remains include walls, arches, and vaults, which are among the most imposing ruins of ancient Rome, and portions of the figured mosaic pavements.

Baths of Diocletian (dī-ō-klē'shan). Baths in ancient Rome, begun by the emperor Diocletian in the late 3rd century A.D. They were not opened, however, until 306 A.D., the year after the abdication of Diocletian.

Baths of Titus (tī'tus). Baths in ancient Rome, constructed in the 1st century A.D. by the emperor Titus, situated NE of the Flavian Amphitheater ("Colosseum").

Bathycles (bath'i-klēz). Greek sculptor, born at Magnesia (now Manisa, in Turkey), and active probably about the middle of the 6th century B.C. He was commissioned by the Spartans to construct a throne for the colossal image of Amyclaeon Apollo in Laconia. On the throne he and his Magnesian assistants carved reliefs representing mythological scenes—Zeus carrying off Taygete, Heracles battling Cynus, the battle of the Centaurs at Pholus, Theseus leading the Cretan Bull, Perseus beheading Medusa, and many more well-known figures of mythology. Under the throne was the tomb of Hyacinthus.

Bathyllus of Alexandria (bə-thil'us). Freedman of Maecenas; fl. c20 B.C. He was noted

as a comic dancer in the pantomimi, a popular dramatic form of the Hellenistic period.
Batia (bā-tī'a). A nymph who, according to some accounts, bore Hippocoön to Oebalus. The other sons of Oebalus were Icarius and Tyndareus.

Batia. In Greek legend, a daughter of Teucer. When Dardanus came to his shores, Teucer gave Batia to him in marriage, and she bore him Erichthonius, whom Homer described as the richest of men and the owner of 3000 magnificent horses.

Baton (bā'ton). In Greek legend, the charioteer of Amphiaraus, and member of the same family, the Melampodidae. He accompanied Amphiaraus in the war of the Seven against Thebes, and was swallowed up in the earth with him when Zeus made a chasm in the earth to save Amphiaraus from the spears of his enemies.

Batrachomyomachia (bat''rā-kō-mī''ō-mā'ki-a). [English, The Battle of the Frogs and Mice.] Ancient Greek mock epic in hexameters, of which 316 lines are extant. Although its authorship is, at best, a matter of conjecture, it was formerly attributed to Homer, and by some critics to Pigres of Halicarnassus, brother of Artemisia, queen of Caria. The poem is a parody of the heroic epics, which describes a fierce battle between frogs and mice, in which finally, the gods intervene and send a large force of crabs to aid the frogs, hard-pressed by the mice.

Batrachus (bat'ra-kus) or Batrachos (-kos). Greek sculptor and architect at Rome in the time of Augustus.

Battiadae (bā-tī'a-dē). Dynasty of Greek rulers in Cyrene in N Africa, which reigned from the 7th to the 5th century B.C. They have been classified as follows: Battus I (630-590 B.C.), founder of the city; Arcesilaus I (590-574 B.C., his son); Battus II (the Happy, his son, 574-c560 B.C.); Arcesilaus II (the Ill-tempered, his son, c560-c550 B.C.); Battus III (the Lamé, his son, c550-c530 B.C.); Arcesilaus III (his son, c530-c510 B.C.); Pheretima, regent c515-c514 B.C.; Battus IV (the Fair, son of Arcesilaus III, c510-c470 B.C.); Arcesilaus IV (his son) ascended the throne c470 B.C., gained a Pythian victory in 462, and lived until c450 B.C. With his death the dynasty ended and a popular government was established.

Battus (bat'us). In Greek mythology, a peasant who saw the child Hermes steal Apollo's cattle. He promised Hermes that he would not reveal that he was the thief. To test him, Hermes appeared to Battus in disguise and offered him a bribe if he would reveal the name of the thief. Battus succumbed to the bribe and, as he had broken his promise, Hermes turned him to stone.

Battus. According to Greek tradition, a son of Polymnestus of Thera and Phronima. His name was originally Aristotle or Aristoteles; he was given the name Battus, the Libyan word for "king," either by the oracle of Delphi or because he became king. He was born with an imperfection which hindered his speech and when he was grown, journeyed to Delphi to consult the oracle about his stammering. The priestess, addressing him as Battus, commanded him to found a colony in Libya. He returned to Thera. Later, finding the people of the island afflicted by sufferings, he sent envoys to the oracle at Delphi. They returned with the reminder from the oracle that he must found a colony at Cyrene in Libya. He sent out two ships, the crews of which settled on an island near the coast of Libya, but their settlement did not prosper. A third visit to the oracle at last convinced Battus that he must go himself and settle in Libya proper if he wished to relieve the sufferings of the people of Thera. With his followers he sailed to Libya and, through the deceit of his Libyan guides who saw to it that his party passed through the best parts of Libya at night, settled in one of the least appealing parts of the country. On his journey through the Cyrenaean desert he was cured of his stammer. It is said that he was faced by a fierce lion there, and was so terrified that he cried out in a loud, clear voice, and ever after spoke without any impediment. His colony survived, and under his descendants won large portions of the richest and pleasantest areas of the land. See Battiadae.

Baubo (bō'bō). According to some accounts, an aged nurse in the house of Celeus at Eleusis. When Demeter, disguised as an old woman, came to the house of Celeus in her search for her daughter Persephone, she pretended she had escaped from pirates and was seeking refuge. She seemed so sad that

Baubo sought to cheer her up. She gave her a cup of mint-flavored barley-water, and then she groaned as if she were in labor. Suddenly Baubo brought Demeter's own son from under her skirt. Because she had given the goddess a cup of mint-flavored barley-water, it became the custom at the Eleusinian Mysteries to give the worshippers this mixture to drink. In a fragment of an Orphic hymn a vulgar gesture which caused Demeter to smile, despite her grief, and accept the drink, is attributed to a servant, Iambus. Baubo came to have a place in the nocturnal mysteries of Eleusis. These details are probably inventions of a later date to provide a basis for certain aspects of the worship of Demeter at Eleusis.

Baucis (bô'sis) and Philemon (fi-lē'mon, fi-). Zeus, disguised as a mortal, once visited the earth with Hermes, according to a Greek myth. They went to many homes, seeking refreshment and rest, but wherever they knocked, they were turned away. At last they came to a humble cottage in Phrygia. It was inhabited by an old couple, Baucis and Philemon, who had spent their lives together in this dwelling. They welcomed the strangers who knocked at their door, warmly invited them in, and set about to make them comfortable. Baucis stirred up the fire and prepared vegetables while her husband set out the meat. Whatever of comforts they had in their home they offered to the strangers who had come. When the meal was ready, Baucis and Philemon happily served their unknown guests. They set a jug of their local wine on the table. As the meal progressed and the wine was passed around, Baucis and Philemon observed that no matter how much wine was drunk, the jug remained filled. In the presence of this obvious miracle they were frightened. Zeus now revealed that he was a god and that his companion was Hermes. He told Baucis and Philemon that they were the only ones in the area who had shown kindness to strangers. Because of their surly attitude Zeus resolved to punish those who had been unfriendly to the disguised gods, but he wished to spare Baucis and Philemon. He told them to climb the nearby mountain for safety. They did as the god commanded. When they reached the top of the mountain they looked back and saw that the land below was covered with marshy water. Only their poor hovel was spared. It was miraculously transformed into a golden-roofed, marble temple. As they watched, pitying those who had lost their homes, Zeus spoke to them. He promised to give them whatever boon they desired. After thinking it over, they told Zeus they would like to serve as priests in his temple for the rest of their lives. When it came time to die, they asked that they might be allowed to die in the same instant, that neither would have to bear the grief of losing the other. Zeus granted their wish. For the remainder of their lives the good and pious couple looked after the temple. One day, in their extreme old age, as they stood on the temple steps talking of their life, each noted that the other was gradually becoming covered with leafy foliage. Bark grew up around their bodies. Before their faces were enclosed, they bade each other goodby and both were transformed into trees at once. Standing side by side, the two trees were later honored with floral wreaths as befitted those whom the gods loved and who had loved the gods.

Baucis. Greek poetess of Tenos, a friend of Erinna and a disciple of Sappho. An epitaph upon her by Erinna is extant.

Bavius (bā'vi-us). Roman poetaster; died in Cappadocia, 35 B.C. He was an enemy of Vergil and Horace. His name is always associated with that of Maeivius, who shared his vindictive feelings toward those greater poets and his lack of poetical ability.

Bebryces (beb-rī'sēz). A people of Bithynia, dwelling on the Euxine Sea. According to legend, Heracles defeated them under their king, Mygdon, and gave the land to the Mariandyni, who founded a city and named it Heraclea in his honor. The Bebryces won the land back under their new king, Amycus, a son of Poseidon, but lost it again when Amycus was slain by Polydeuces, whom he had challenged to a boxing match. After the death of Amycus, the Argonauts won his land and restored it to the Mariandyni.

Bedriacum (bē-drī'ā-kum). [Also: Bebriacum.] In ancient geography, a village in N Italy, E of Cremona. The exact location is undetermined. Here the forces of Vitellius, under Cecina and Valens, defeated (April, 69 A.D.)

the forces of Otho; later in the same year, the forces of Vespasian, under Antonius, defeated those of Vitellius.

Behistun (bā-his-tön'). [Also: Bisitun, Bisutun; ancient name, Baghistan.] In ancient geography, a place in C Asia, about 23 miles E of what is now the city of Kermanshah, Iran. It is the site of a monument of Darius the Great, called the "Rosetta Stone of Asia," consisting of bas-reliefs and trilingual inscriptions 500 feet up the face of a sheer cliff, 1700 feet high. The bas-reliefs include a sculpture showing Darius with his foot on the prostrate form of the False Smerdis (Gaumata). In front of Darius are nine of the rebel chiefs, their hands bound behind them and a rope around their necks. Over all is a winged figure of the god Ahura Mazda. The inscriptions are in three kinds of cuneiform writing (Old Persian, Elamite, and Accadian), and tell how he killed the False Smerdis after the death of Cambyzes, won victory over the rebels, and "with the aid of his good horse and his good groom, got himself the kingdom of the Persians." The inscriptions, deciphered (c1846) by Sir Henry Rawlinson, provided the first key to the ancient Assyrian writings.

Belgae (bel'jē). In ancient history, a people in northern Gaul, mainly of Celtic origin, occupying the area that now comprises Belgium, Luxembourg, NE France, the S part of the Netherlands, and part of W Germany. They were conquered in 57 B.C. by Julius Caesar.

Bellerophon (be-ler'ō-fon). In Greek legend, a son of Glaucus and the grandson of Sisyphus. His name was originally Hipponous but was changed to Bellerophon after he killed Bellerus, a countryman. Following this death and the accidental killing of his brother, he left Corinth and went to Proetus, king of Tiryns. There Antia (Sthenoboea in some accounts), the wife of Proetus, fell in love with him but he rejected her advances. Enraged, she told Proetus that Bellerophon had made love to her against her will and asked Proetus to kill him. Proetus was unwilling to take such drastic action against a guest. Instead he sent Bellerophon to Iobates, king of Lycia, who was Antia's father. With him he sent a letter, asking Iobates to kill the bearer for the insult to Antia. But Iobates also hesitated to act himself. He imposed a task on Bellerophon that he felt sure would bring about his death: to slay the Chimaera, a monster that shot flames from its lion's head, had the body of a goat and a slashing serpent's tail. Bellerophon was advised by a seer to catch the winged horse Pegasus to assist him in this task. Aided by Athena, who gave him a golden bridle, he found Pegasus drinking at a spring, slipped the bridle over his head and tamed Pegasus. He leaped on Pegasus' back and sped off to find the Chimaera. According to some accounts, he first attacked it with arrows as he soared above it, then when it was weakened and gasping he poured molten lead into its mouth and dispatched it. Iobates was amazed at Bellerophon's success in this venture and sent him off to fight the Solymi and the Amazons. The special advantage of flying over his enemies and attacking from above again gave him success. Iobates then sent Lycian warriors to lie in wait for Bellerophon and kill him, but he defeated them with the aid of a flood sent by Poseidon. This convinced Iobates that he was dealing with the offspring of a god and he gave up further attempts to have him killed. Instead he made him the heir of his kingdom and gave him his daughter Philonoë in marriage. Three children were born of this marriage: Isander, Hippolochus, and Laodamia. But Bellerophon's successes went to his head. He felt he was the equal of the gods and decided to fly up to Olympus on Pegasus. Such arrogance offended the gods. As he rose through the air on Pegasus' back, Zeus sent a gadfly to sting Pegasus; the winged horse reared, and Bellerophon fell to earth and was lamed and blinded by the fall. Pegasus continued to Olympus. From that time on Bellerophon was hounded by the gods and became a miserable, solitary wanderer until he died.

Bellerus (bel'er-us). A man of Corinth who was killed by Hipponous, the son of Glaucus. Because of his death Hipponous was known as "Bellerophontes," "killer of Bellerus," and widely known in mythology as "Bellerophon." (q.v.).

Bellona (be-lō'na). In Roman mythology, the goddess of war, regarded sometimes as the wife and sometimes as the sister of Mars. She was, probably, originally a Sabine divinity, and her worship appears to have been introduced at Rome by a Sabine family, the Claudii. She is represented as armed with shield and lance.

Belus (bē'lus) or Belos (-los). In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon and Libya, and the twin of Agenor. He was a descendant of Io and Zeus. He became king of Chemmis (later Panopolis) on the Nile River, and was the father of the twins Aegyptus and Danaus, and of Cepheus.

Belus. According to some accounts, the father of Dido, and conqueror of Cyprus.

Benacus, Lacus (be-nā'kus, lā'kus). [Modern name, Lake Garda; Italian, Lago di Garda.] Large lake in N Italy, in Transpadane Gaul. The Mincius River carries its waters into the Padus. The lake is noted for storms.

Beneventum (ben-e-ven'tum). [Modern name, Benevento.] In ancient geography, a city in S Italy, about 35 miles NE of Neapolis. It was an ancient Samnite town that became a Roman colony, with its name changed from Mal(e)ventum, in 268 B.C., after the victory of the Romans over Pyrrhus which took place there. The town was pillaged by Hannibal after his victory at Cannae in 216 B.C. Among the many Roman monuments that remain are the Arch of Trajan, built in 114 A.D. and some Roman bridges.

Benthesicyme (ben-the-sis'i-mē). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Poseidon and Amphitrite. She brought up her half-brother, Eumolpus, son of Poseidon and Chione, and gave him one of her daughters in marriage. When she learned that he had fallen in love with another of her daughters, she banished him to Thrace.

Berecynthia (ber-e-sin'ti-a). Another name for Cybele, a Phrygian goddess identified with Rhea. Her worship was common in Phrygia, in the Berecynthian forest or on Mount Berecynthus.

Berenice (ber-e-nī'sē). Daughter of Ptolemy II (Philadelphus) of Egypt and wife of Antiochus II (Theos), king of Syria. She was murdered in 246 B.C.

Berenice. Sister of Cleopatra, slain by the Romans in 55 B.C.

Berenice I. Wife of Ptolemy I (Soter) of Egypt and the mother of Ptolemy II (Philadelphus); fl. 4th and 3rd centuries B.C.

Berenice II (of Cyrene). Egyptian princess; wife of Ptolemy III (Euergetes); fl. 3rd century B.C. She is said to have dedicated her hair in the temple of Arsinoë at Zephyrium for the safe return of her husband from an expedition to Syria. The astronomer Conon of Samos reported that her hair had been transformed into the constellation called Coma Berenices.

Beroë (ber'ō-ē). In Greek legend, the nurse of Semele. Hera assumed her form in order to persuade Semele to ask Zeus, who was at that time in love with Semele, to appear to her in all his splendor. Hera knew that no mortal could live who had seen Zeus in his Olympian array, and took the form of Beroë to wheedle Semele into making this demand of Zeus.

Beroë. Named by some as a daughter of Adonis and Aphrodite. In Roman legend, Beroë was a Trojan woman married to one of the companions of Aeneas on his flight to Italy. Iris assumed her form when she persuaded the Trojan women to set fire to the ships while Aeneas and his followers were celebrating funeral games for Anchises on the coast of Sicily.

Beroea (be-rē'a). In ancient geography, a town on the Haliacmon River, in Macedonia. It was taken and held briefly by Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, in 286 B.C. After that it remained a Macedonian town until the arrival of the Romans, 168 B.C., who came to fight Perseus, and to whom the town of Beroea was one of the first Macedonian towns to submit. Pompey spent the winter of 49-48 B.C. encamped here.

Berosus (be-rō'sus) or Berossus (-ros'us). Babylonian historian who flourished in the early 3rd century B.C. He was a priest of Bel in Babylon. He was the author of a history of Babylonia (in Greek) in three books, founded on the chronicles of the priests of Bel. Fragments which have been preserved by later writers, including Josephus and Eusebius, show it to have been a valuable source for the ancient history of the region.

Bessus (bes'us). Persian soldier and satrap of Bactria, fl. 331-330 B.C. He commanded the left wing of the Persian army at the battle of Gaugamela (Arbela), 331 B.C., and when the Persians were overwhelmed there by Alexander the Great, he fled with Darius III, king of Persia. In the flight of Darius and his noble companions through Media and past the Caspian Gates, Bessus and the rest refused to halt when Darius wanted to stand and make another fight against Alexander. With the consent of the other nobles, Bessus plotted against Darius to make himself king of the Persians in his place. Darius became virtually a prisoner of his companions. When Alexander, hotly pursuing Darius now that he had subdued the lands behind him drew near, Bessus stabbed Darius (330 B.C.), and fled to Bactra where he assumed the title "Great King" of the Persians under the name Artaxerxes. In 328 B.C., having secured his rear, Alexander pursued Bessus, whose cavalry now deserted him, across the Oxus River into Sogdiana. The people there had no desire to endure warfare for the benefit of Bessus, and sent word to Alexander offering to surrender him. He was brought to Alexander's camp and placed naked and in chains, by Alexander's order, by the side of the road as the army marched by. When Alexander came up to him and asked why he had murdered Darius, he replied that he had done it to win Alexander's favor. This did not please Alexander, for having made himself by conquest the successor of Darius, he held that Darius was under his protection. He ordered Bessus to be scourged. He was then sent to Bactra, tried for the murder of Darius, and found guilty. He was sentenced to have his ears and nose cut off and was afterward crucified.

Bia (bī'ā). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pallas and Styx and an attendant of Zeus. According to some accounts, she was one of those directed by Hephaestus to bind Prometheus to the rock in the Caucasus as a punishment for stealing fire from the gods for man. Her name means "Force."

Biadice (bi-ā-dī'sē). In Greek legend, the wife of Cretheus. According to some accounts, she fell in love with her nephew Phrixus, son of Athamas, and wooed him passionately. He honorably spurned her advances. She thereupon made false accusations against him, and this is sometimes given as a reason why Phrixus was chosen to be sacrificed when Boeotia suffered from a famine and was told by messengers from the oracle at Delphi that only a human sacrifice would lift the famine. The messengers from the oracle were later found to have been bribed to give this false message.

Biancavilla (byäng-kä-vē'lā). See Inessa.

Bias (bī'ās). According to Greek legend, a son of Amythaon and Idomene, and the brother of the seer Melampus. He was promised his cousin Pero for wife if he could deliver the oxen of Phylacus (or Iphiclus) of Thessaly to her father Neleus, king of Pylus. With the help of Melampus he secured the cattle and married Pero. After the death of Pero he married Iphianassa, daughter of Proetus, king of Argos. See Melampus.

Bias. One of the "Seven Sages" of Greece, noted for his apothegms. He was born at Priene in Ionia, and was active in the second half of the 6th century B.C. When Harpagus, general of Cyrus the Great, was subduing the Ionian cities of Asia Minor (c540 B.C.), Bias addressed the Ionian Greeks gathered at the festival of the Panionium. He advised them to join in one body and set sail for Sardinia, where they should found a single Pan-Ionian city and make themselves master of what the Greeks at that time thought was the largest island in the world. The Ionians did not take his advice.

Biblis (bib'lis). See Byblis.

Bibracte (bi-brak'tē). In ancient geography, a hill-town in C Gaul, the capital of the actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ǵ as d or j, š as s or sh, ʈ as t or ch, ʒ as z or zh.

Aedui, about eight miles W of Autun, France, with which it was formerly identified. Near it Caesar defeated the Helvetii in 58 B.C.

Bibulus (bib'ū-lus), Marcus Calpurnius. Roman politician. He was Julius Caesar's colleague as aedile and praetor. In 59 B.C. he was consul with Julius Caesar, after having been elected through the efforts of the aristocratic party. After an ineffectual attempt to oppose Caesar's agrarian law, he shut himself up in his own house, whence he issued edicts against Caesar's measures. Pompey appointed him commander of the fleet in the Ionian Sea in 49 B.C. to prevent Caesar from crossing over into Greece. His vigilance was, however, eluded by the latter in January of the following year, and Bibulus died in the same year (48 B.C.) near Corcyra (now Corfu).

Bion (bi'ōn). Greek bucolic poet, born at Phlossa, near Smyrna, Asia Minor. He was active c2nd-1st century B.C.; died in Sicily. In addition to some minor poems, his chief extant poem is the Epitaphios Adonidos (Lament for Adonis), noted for its imagery and graceful style. He is said to have been the teacher of Moschus.

Birds, The. Comedy of Aristophanes, exhibited in 414 B.C. and awarded second prize. It has been called Aristophanes' masterpiece. In a delightful manner it pokes fun at the current Athenian mood of hope for a wondrous change in the fortunes of Athens as the result of the departure of an expedition to capture Syracuse in Sicily. Two Athenians, Pithetaerus ("Persuader") and Euelpides ("Hopeful"), having realized, from Sophocles and other poets, that Tereus was a king of Athens before he was transformed into a hoopoe and made king of the Birds, decide to find Tereus and form a Bird-republic. Pithetaerus is fired with ambition and energy in this cause. He finds Tereus, reveals his design to the angry Birds and persuades them to cooperate. He has wings made for the new citizens, writes a constitution, erects buildings, and prepares defenses. Multitudes apply for citizenship in the Bird-republic. He arbitrarily admits some, such as a poet, and rejects those, seers and scientists, whom he considers unnecessary in the new state. The new land interferes with the communications between gods and men; the gods' supply of incense is cut off. Iris, messenger of the gods, is arrested for trespassing on the territory of the Birds. Prometheus deserts the gods and, hiding under an umbrella so that the gods on high cannot see him, arrives among the Birds. The gods send Poseidon, a sage, Heracles, a dullard, and Triballus, an absolute fool, to come to terms with Pithetaerus and the Bird-republic. Pithetaerus dominates the proceedings; Zeus awards the rule of the world to the Birds, gives Pithetaerus his own daughter in marriage, and Cloudecuckooland, the Bird-republic, is safely and unalterably established.

Bithynia (bi-thin'i-ā). In ancient geography, a division of Asia Minor, lying between the Propontis (Sea of Marmara), Bosphorus, and Euxine (Black Sea) on the N, Mysia on the W, Phrygia and Galatia on the S, and Paphlagonia on the E. Its inhabitants were of Thracian origin. Nicomedes I became (c278 B.C.) its first independent king; and Nicomedes III bequeathed (74 B.C.) the kingdom to Rome. It was governed by Pliny the Younger. The chief cities were Chalcedon, Heraclea, Prusa, Nicaea, and Nicomedia.

Bithynians (bi-thin'i-anz). A Thracian tribe, dwelling near the Strymon River and while they dwelt there, called Strymonians. According to their own account, as set down by Herodotus, they were driven out of their land by the Mysians and Teucrians and crossed the Thracian Bosphorus into Asia. They settled west of the Halys River and took the name of Bithynians. Their dress in war consisted of fox skins for their heads, coats of many colors for their bodies, and buskins of fawn skins for their feet and legs. Their weapons were javelins and dirks. Croesus, in expanding his domain, brought them under his control and they later formed part of the Persian Empire.

Biton and Cleobis (bi'ton; klē'ō-bis). In Greek legend, the sons of Cydippe, priestess of Hera at Argos. During a festival, the priestess had to ride to the temple in a chariot, and, as the oxen were not at hand, Biton and Cleobis dragged the chariot 45 stadia to the temple. There they fell asleep; in answer to a prayer of their mother to Hera to reward this act of filial piety with the greatest boon possible for mortals, they were given painless and swift death in their sleep. Herodotus makes Solon relate this story to Croesus.

Black Sea. See Euxine Sea.

Blue Grotto. Cavern on the shore of the island of Capreae.

Boae (bō'ē) or Bavo (bā'vō). [Modern, Čiovo; also: Bua.] Island off the Dalmatian coast, just W of Spalatum (now Split). It was a place of banishment under the Roman emperors.

Boeae (bē'ē). A city in Laconia, near the end of the southeastern promontory of the Peloponnesus. According to tradition, it was founded by Boeiüs, a descendant of Heracles. He collected the inhabitants of three cities (Etis, Side, and Aphrodisias), who had been expelled from their cities, and set out to found a new city. The oracle of Artemis told them the goddess would show them where to go. When they came to the inner shore of the promontory, they saw a hare. They followed it until it dived under a myrtle tree. Taking this as a sign from Artemis, they built their city on the spot where the hare disappeared, and ever after worshiped the myrtle tree.

Boëdromion (bō-ē-drō'mi-on). The third month of the Attic year, corresponding to the latter part of September and the early part of October. During this month the festival called Boëdromia was celebrated, in commemoration of the succor given by Theseus against the Amazons.

Boëdromius (bō-ē-drō'mi-us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Rescuer."

Boeotarch (bē-ō'tärk). One of the chief magistrates of the Boeotian confederacy. Two were chosen by Thebes, and one by each of the other members of the league. They held office for one year.

Boeotia (bē-ō'shā). In ancient times, a district in C Greece, bounded by Locris Opuntia on the N, Attica and the strait of Euripus on the E, Attica, Megaris, and the Gulf of Corinth on the S, and Phocis on the W. Its surface was generally level, forming a basin in which was Lake Copaïs, now drained. Through this region Cadmus was said to have driven a cow, as instructed to do by the oracle at Delphi, following it until it sank to the ground to rest. On that spot he built the city of Thebes. The area was named Boeotia to commemorate the journey of the cow through it, according to some accounts; others say it was named for Boeotus, who was a son either of Poseidon or of Itonus and Melanippe; but still others say it was named for Mount Boeon in Epirus, the land from which the Boeotians came. The cities of Boeotia were loosely united into the Boeotian League, of which Thebes was the leading and dominant city. Plataea refused to join the League. This caused a war with Athens to whom the Plataeans turned for aid, in which the Boeotians were defeated (509 B.C.). Plataea maintained close ties with Athens thereafter. The Athenians took many Boeotians prisoners in the war and kept them in iron fetters until they were ransomed. Afterward the Athenians hung the fetters in their citadel, and with a tenth of the ransom they constructed a bronze chariot with four horses which they dedicated to Athena on the Acropolis with the following verses:

When Chalcis and Boeotia dared her might,

Athens subdued their pride in valorous fight;

Gave bonds for insults; and, the ransom paid,

From the full tenths these steeds for Pallas made.

When Xerxes invaded Greece (480 B.C.), the Boeotians, except those of Plataea and Thespieae, sent him earth and water as tokens of submission and agreed to march with him as allies against their fellow countrymen. The Greeks who had taken up arms to resist the Persians, swore an oath against those Greeks who "delivered themselves to the Persians without necessity." In the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.), the Boeotians fought valiantly on the Persian side against the Athenians, but were defeated. The history of Boeotia after the Persian War is largely the history of Thebes, which took the commanding place among the Boeotian cities. According to ancient Greek tradition, the inhabitants of Boeotia were all extremely stupid (but this, like most other Greek traditions, has come down to us through Athenian sources, and the Athenians had little love for the people or cities of Boeotia, for obvious reasons); but some say that the worship of Dionysus and the art of writing were introduced into Greece through Boeotia, for they were brought there by Cadmus.

Boeotian League or Confederacy (bē-ō'shan). League of independent cities in Boeotia, supposed to have been at various times from 11 to 14 in number, with Thebes at the head (although Theban leadership was always resented, to some extent, by certain of the member cities). Its common sanctuaries were the temple of the Itonian Athene near Coronea, where the Panboeotia were celebrated, and the temple of Poseidon in Onchestus. Its chief magistrates were called boeotarchs, and were elected annually, two for Thebes and one for each of the other cities. It was finally dissolved, in 171 B.C. or in 146 B.C.

Boeotus (bē-ō'tus). In Greek legend, a son of Arne and Poseidon, and the twin brother of that Aeolus who became guardian of the winds. They were exposed to die as infants but were saved and brought up by Theano and Metapontus. Theano had passed them off to her husband as her own children. When she had sons of her own, she plotted to have them kill Boeotus and Aeolus but they were killed instead. They slew Desmontes, who had imprisoned and blinded their mother, then they freed their mother, and caused Theano to kill herself. Metapontus married Arne but later cast her aside, whereupon the twins killed the new queen. Boeotus fled to his grandfather Aeolus, and got from him the part of his kingdom which he renamed Arne, the home of the Boeotians.

Boëthus (bō-ē'thus). Greek sculptor of the Alexandrian school, born at Chalcedon (or Carthage, according to Pausanias); fl. in the 2nd century B.C. He was famous in antiquity for genre work of a high character. Pliny mentions a bronze figure of a boy strangling a goose, of which there is a replica in the Louvre. The boy extracting a thorn, found in replica in many museums, is supposed to represent Boëthus' statue of the same subject.

Boges (bō'jēz). Persian governor of Eion, a fortress at the mouth of the Strymon River. He was besieged by the Athenians under the command of Cimon (476-475 B.C.). Cimon offered him terms to withdraw and return to Persia, but Boges refused, rather than appear as a coward who would surrender his trust to save his own life. Instead he held out. When all supplies were exhausted, he caused a huge funeral pyre to be erected, slew his wife, children, and all those attached to his household, and threw their bodies on the blazing pyre. Then he collected all the treasures of gold and silver in the fortress and hurled them into the Strymon River, beyond the reach of the Athenians. When all this was accomplished, he flung himself onto the funeral pyre. Though Eion was taken by Cimon, the Persians long honored Boges for his bravery.

Boii (bō'i-i). Ancient Celtic people who entered Italy from Gaul c400 B.C. and settled between the Padus and the Apennines. They were overcome by the Romans in 282 B.C., but continued to struggle against them. After 191 B.C. they were not heard of again in Italy. It is thought that they migrated to what is now Bohemia, to which they gave their name. They disappeared from there also, c50 B.C. Another group of Boii joined the Helvetii in their invasion of Gaul in 58 B.C.; to them Caesar assigned land in the territory of the Aedui.

Bola (bō'lā). A town of the Aequi in Latium. It was a nameless site at the time when Aeneas visited his father in the Underworld. Anchises pointed out to him the shade of the man waiting to be born who would found the city.

Bomilcar (bō-mil'kar). Carthaginian general; fl. at the end of the 4th century B.C. He commanded (310 B.C.) the Carthaginians against Agathocles, the tyrant of Syracuse. Possibly impressed by the example of Agathocles, he conspired in 308 B.C. to make himself tyrant of Carthage with the aid of 500 citizens and a number of mercenaries, but was captured and crucified.

Bona Dea (bō'nā dē'ā). In Roman mythology, the goddess of fecundity, worshiped only by women. She was the female counterpart of Faunus (in various accounts, she is called his sister, wife, or daughter) and bore, in this relationship, the name Fauna. However, she was so exclusively a woman's goddess that the name used by women (Bona Dea) has come to be her usual name.

Bonus Eventus (bō'nus ē-ven'tus). In Roman mythology, a god of agriculture who later came to be regarded as a god of good luck. Boötes (bō-ō'tēz). A northern constellation containing the bright star Arcturus, and situated behind Ursa Major. It is supposed to represent a man holding a crook and driving the Bear (Ursa Major).

Boreadae (bō-rē'ā-dē). In Greek mythology, a name for the descendants of Boreas. It was applied especially to Calais and Zetes, his twin sons by Orithyia, the daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. These youths sailed with Jason in the Argo on the expedition for the Golden Fleece. In the course of the voyage the Argonauts landed in Thrace, and found Phineus, a blind seer, who had been married to Cleopatra, the sister of the Boreadae. Phineus promised to help the Argonauts if they would free him from the visits of the loathsome Harpies who polluted his food and kept him constantly on the verge of starvation. Calais and Zetes, who had grown wings as they attained manhood, pursued the Harpies and caught them. They would have killed them but Iris came as a messenger from the gods and warned them not to kill "the hounds of Zeus." In return, Iris promised the Boreadae that the Harpies would cease to harass Phineus. Grateful for being freed from the pestilent Harpies, Phineus gave the Argonauts much useful advice about their course to Colchis. Earlier in the voyage, when the Argonauts had landed in Mysia, Hylas, the squire of Heracles, had disappeared. Heracles searched frantically for him and delayed his return to the Argo. Some of the Argonauts wished to await the return of Heracles, but the Boreadae supported Jason's decision to proceed without him. It was in revenge for this that, long after the voyage of the Argo, Heracles killed them on the island of Tenos as they were returning from Pelias' funeral games. He buried them there and set up two columns, one of which moved at the breath of the North Wind.

Boreas (bō-rē-as). In Greek mythology, the North Wind, the son of Astraeus and Eos, or of Aeolus, and the brother of Hesperus, Zephyrus, and Notus. He fell in love with Orithyia, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and wished to marry her. Her father delayed the marriage, and Boreas abandoned his hitherto patient wooing, swooped down to the banks of the Ilissus River where Orithyia was playing, and carried her off in a gust of wind to his home in Thrace. Their children were Cleopatra, Chione, and the winged twins, Calais and Zetes. Enamored of the mares of Erichthonius, Boreas changed himself into a black stallion and produced 12 swift fillies by them that could run over standing grain without bending it and over the waves of the sea. A violent and stormy character, he was often appealed to by the gods to torment mortals, or even demigods, who were under the displeasure of the gods, as, for example, Hera appealed to him to shipwreck Heracles on Cos. Because he had carried off Orithyia from the banks of the Ilissus River at Athens and married her, the Athenians came to regard Boreas as kin to them. During the Persian War, when the Persian fleet lay at anchor off Chalcis in Euboea, an oracle came to the Athenians, instructing them to seek help from their son-in-law. They offered sacrifice to Boreas and Orithyia and prayed for their aid. A violent storm arose and battered the Persian fleet. Four hundred Persian ships and uncounted men and treasure were engulfed in the raging storm. In gratitude to their son-in-law Boreas, the Athenians erected a sanctuary to him on the bank of the Ilissus River. Boreas was identified by the Romans with their Aquilo.

Borghese Gladiator (bôr-gā'zā). [Also: Borghese Warrior, Fighting Gladiator.] Ancient Greek statue by Agasias of Ephesus, representing a warrior or an athlete. It is in the collection of the Louvre, Paris, having formerly been in the collection of the Villa Borghese, Rome. It dates from late 2nd to early 1st century B.C. The vigorous figure, undraped, is in an attitude of rapid advance, the left arm, encircled by the shield-strap, raised above the head, and the right (restored) extended downward and backward in the line of the body, grasping the sword.

Bosporus (bos'pō-rus). [Also: Bosphorus; Turkish, Karadeniz Boğazi; ancient name, Bosporus Thracius, Thracian Bosporus.] Strait which connects the Euxine (Black) Sea and Propontis (Sea of Marmara) and separates Europe from Asia. On it are Byzantium (now Istanbul) and Chrysopolis (now Uskûdar). The name means "Oxford": so named from the legend that Io, transformed into a heifer, swam across it. Length, about 20 miles; greatest width, about 2½ miles; narrowest, about 800 yards.

Bouphonia (bō-fō'ni-ā) or Buphonia (bū-fō'ni-ā). In ancient Attica, a ceremony which was part of the festival of Dipoliea (Dipolia) in honor of Zeus Polieus (Protector of the City), celebrated on the 14th day of Scirophorion (about the end of June). According to the ritual, wheat and barley, or cakes made of them, were placed on the altar of Zeus Polieus on the Acropolis at Athens. An ax and a knife, sharpened with water provided by maidens, were given to butchers. An ox was led before the altar and was permitted to eat the cakes, whereupon the ox was slain by the butchers, one of whom felled it with the ax and the other slit its throat. The butchers then fled. The ox was skinned, its flesh roasted, and all partook of the feast. Then the skin of the ox was stuffed with straw and the stuffed animal was set up and yoked to a plow. This action was followed by a trial to find out who had murdered the ox, of all animals one most valuable to man. All concerned in the ceremony were involved in the trial. The maidens who brought the water for whetting the ax and the knife accused the butchers; the butchers accused the knife and the ax. The knife and the ax were found guilty and were hurled into the sea. Under the procedure, a feast was provided for celebrants, but lest they be polluted for the murder of the ox, the ax and knife were found guilty, suffered just punishment, and the ghost of the ox was placated.

Bovianum (bō-vi-ā'num). In ancient geography, a city in Samnium, Italy.

Branchidae (brang'ki-dē). The site of a famous temple of Apollo and an oracle, situated in the territory of Miletus in Ionia near the port of Panormus. The oracle was frequently consulted by both the Ionians and Aeolians. Croesus, who made many rich offerings to the temple, sent to test the accuracy of this oracle when he was considering whether to attack the Persians. Evidently he was not satisfied with its accuracy, for he ultimately posed the question whether he should attack Persia to the oracle at Delphi, with disastrous results. A story is told that the people of Cyme, in Aetolia, captured a Lydian whom the Persians demanded that they surrender. The Cymaeans feared to give up one who had come to them as a suppliant, and consulted the oracle to know what they should do. The oracle told them to surrender the suppliant. However, the leader of the Cymaeans on hearing of this advice thought the oracular response must have been misunderstood, and went with a delegation to consult the oracle again. The same response was given, whereupon this Cymaeon leader, who had really been prepared to hear it, went about the temple and robbed all the nests that he found therein of their nestlings. A voice issued from the sanctuary and asked how he dared have the impiety to tear suppliants from the temple. The Cymaeans replied that if the oracle was so desirous of protecting his own suppliants, why did he advise the Cymaeans to give up their suppliant? The voice repeated the command to surrender the Lydian to the Persians, and added that for their impiety the Cymaeans might the sooner perish, and furthermore, should not consult the oracle again. Hecataeus, the historian and wise counselor, when he failed to dissuade the Milesians from their intention of revolting against the Persians, advised them at least to take the precaution of taking the treasures of the temple of Apollo at Branchidae, including a huge shield in gold which Croesus had dedicated there, and use them to build a fleet with which they could secure control of the sea. If the Milesians did not take the treasures, he said, the Persians would. His advice was ignored and the event turned out as he had foretold. When the Persians came to put down the revolt of the Milesians, the hereditary priests of the temple (who were also called Branchidae) surrendered the treasure to them (c494 B.C.). The Persians carried it off and burned the temple. Many of the men of Miletus were slain. Some of the women and children were sent up to Susa as slaves. Later Xerxes sent the Milesians who were considered responsible for the betrayal of the temple to Sogdiana, in C Asia, to save them from the vengeance of the Greeks. At Sogdiana these Greeks founded a small settlement in which they preserved their Greek customs, religion, and speech. When, over 150 years later (c327 B.C.), Alexander the Great came to their settlement in his march into Asia, the Branchidae of Sogdiana, so it is said, rushed to welcome him as a Greek and to give him their loyalty. Some say that Alexander could think of them only as the Greeks who had betrayed their trust concerning the temple of Apollo and had taken the side of the Persians against the Greeks. He submitted the case of the Branchidae to the men of Miletus in his army. These could not agree on a judgment against the descendants of the priests who had betrayed the temple.

Alexander himself decided their fate, so some say. The settlement was seized and every one of its inhabitants was massacred to avenge the dastardly crime of their ancestors. Magnificent ruins of the Ionic temple of Apollo of Branchidae, near Miletus, and of the ancient port, remain.

Branchus (brang'kus). In Greek legend, the son of Apollo and a woman of Miletus. During his birth his mother had a vision that the sun was passing through her body. The priests interpreted this as a favorable omen. Apollo loved his son and gave him the gift of prophecy. Branchus founded an oracle at Didyma, near Miletus, which was highly regarded, especially by the Ionians and the Aeolians. The descendants of Branchus became priests of the oracle and were said to have built the temple of Apollo at the place that became known as Branchidae.

Brasiae (bras'i-ē). Name by which the Laconian town of Prasiae was sometimes known.

Brasidas (bras'i-das). Spartan general; killed at Amphipolis, Macedonia, 422 B.C. He was the son of Tellis, and was noted for his incomparable bravery, eloquence, simple honesty, justice, moderation, and for his frank and winning manner. In 431 B.C., at the outbreak of the Peloponnesian War, the Athenians sent 100 ships around the Peloponnesus and attacked Methone on the coast of Messenia. Brasidas commanded a defense force in the area. When he learned of the attack, he rushed to the relief of Methone with a hundred heavy infantry. The Athenians, attacking the wall of the city, were completely surprised when he appeared from behind them. He and his men made their way through the enemy with small loss and entered the city. By his daring raid he saved Methone and was publicly thanked by Sparta for his exploit, the first to win such an honor in the war. In the Spartan attack (425 B.C.) on Pylus in Messenia, which had been taken and fortified by the Athenians, Brasidas distinguished himself by his bravery. It was difficult and hazardous to bring the Spartan ships in against the defenders. Brasidas, observing the reluctance to risk their vessels, shouted to the Spartan captains that "they must never allow the enemy to fortify himself in their country for the sake of saving timber, but must wreck their vessels and force a landing." He ordered his own steersman to run his ship aground. In the landing he received many wounds, fainted, and lost his shield in the water. It was afterward found by the Athenians and set up in the victory trophy they erected. The following year he hurried from the northeast of the Peloponnesus to relieve Megara, which was under Athenian attack, and the Athenians withdrew. Next (424 B.C.) he marched through Thessaly to Acanthus, on the Chalcidian peninsula, and by his eloquence and personality persuaded Acanthus to detach herself from the Athenian Confederacy. The burden of his plea to the Acanthians, who admitted him alone to present his case, was that the Spartans "were taking up arms to protect the liberties of Hellas against Athens." Stagira and Argilus in the same area followed Acanthus, and enabled Brasidas to capture Amphipolis, one of the most important cities of the Athenian empire. In the following year, with the aid of traitors, he captured Torone, on the Sithonian peninsula of Chalcidice, and completed his highly successful campaign against the Athenian cities in the region. His successes were not viewed with unmixed admiration by the Spartans themselves; rather, they aroused jealousy of the brilliant commander. Scione, on the Pallene peninsula of Chalcidice, revolted against Athens, put herself in his hands (423 B.C.), put a golden crown on his head as the liberator of Hellas, and wreathed him with garlands of victory. Such adulation, and his acceptance of it, made the Spartans uneasy and spurred his own ambitions. A one-year truce between Athens and Sparta had meanwhile been concluded. Nevertheless, when Mende, a neighbor of Scione, also revolted, Brasidas accepted the offer of an alliance with Sparta and continued his activities in the area. At the expiration of the truce (422 B.C.) the Athenians sent a fleet against Scione. Brasidas was unable to arrive in time to save it and withdrew to Amphipolis. Hither the Athenians under Cleon followed, but decided not to engage him and began to withdraw. Brasidas rushed out after them. Cleon was slain in the battle. Brasidas received a mortal wound. He was carried into the city and expired. The people of Amphipolis gave him the honors of a hero. They removed all the monuments of the actual founder of their city, the Athenian Hagnon, and named Brasidas their founder. Sacrifices were offered to him, and games were celebrated annually in his honor. He was the outstanding general of the first ten years of the Peloponnesian War.

Brauron (brô'ron). In ancient geography, a village on the east coast of Attica. It was to this place, some say, that Orestes and Iphigenia returned from Tauris, bearing the ancient wooden image of Taurian Artemis with them. The image was brought to this place on the instructions of Athena, and in obedience to her commands the temple of Artemis Tauropolus was raised to house the image. As part of the ritual in honor of Artemis Tauropolus, the throat of a man kneeling before the altar was pricked by a sword just enough to draw blood. This was in memory of the narrow escape Orestes had in Tauris, and was also a substitute for the human sacrifices that had been offered to Taurian Artemis. Iphigenia was the first priestess in the temple of Artemis at Brauron, and some say Artemis made her immortal and she became Hecate. Excavations carried out by the Greek Archaeological Society (1958) have revealed remains of an early 5th century B.C. Doric temple of Artemis at Brauron, on the site where, according to Euripides' Iphigenia in Tauris, Orestes and Iphigenia were commanded to raise the temple of Artemis. Votive offerings, statuettes, and inscriptions found in the nearby marshes confirm the ritual described above. The Athenians celebrated the festival called the Brauronia in honor of Artemis at Brauron. Once when the Athenian women were celebrating this festival, some Pelasgians, who had driven the Minyans from the isle of Lemnos, swooped down on the women at Brauron and carried them away to Lemnos with them as their wives. Later, the sons of these women, born on Lemnos, showed such pride and strength that the Pelasgians killed them all, and their mothers with them. The modern village of Vravron is near the site of ancient Brauron.

Brauronia (brô-rô'ni-ä). In Greek antiquity, a festival held at the shrine of Artemis at Brauron, in Attica, at regular intervals of several years. At this festival, little Attic girls performed a bear-imitation ceremony. Brennus (bren'us). Roman name for a leader of the Gauls who marched on Rome early in the 4th century B.C., and sacked it. Brennus first marched his forces into Italy and laid siege to the Etruscan city of Clusium. The Romans sent ambassadors to treat with him, to see if they could persuade him to withdraw. When asked what his purpose was, Brennus is said to have replied that his purpose was the same as that of the Romans: to take land from people who had so much they could not till it and give it to his own people who needed it. As the Romans made war to satisfy their needs, so did the Gauls, said Brennus. The Roman ambassadors, seeing they could accomplish nothing, withdrew into Clusium. In a subsequent engagement the Gauls attacked Clusium and one of the Roman ambassadors took part on the side of Clusium. He was recognized by the Gauls, who demanded his surrender. For it was against all the rules of war, they said, for an ambassador to take part in a battle. The Romans refused to surrender their envoy. At once the Gauls marched on Rome. They did no damage to the country they passed through, for, they said, their quarrel was with Rome because of the violation of the laws concerning ambassadors. When they arrived at Rome they found the gates of the city open and unguarded, and the city almost abandoned, so terrified were the Romans at news of their coming. A small force under Marcus Manlius had withdrawn to the citadel on the Capitoline Hill, and a few priests and magistrates sat quietly in the Forum, having refused to abandon their city. The Gauls suspected a trap, but as they proceeded into the city, they found there was no resistance. They came upon the speechless, unarmed men in the Forum, who neither looked up nor moved at their approach. One of the barbarians approached a seated Roman and gently stroked his long beard. The Roman took up his staff and brought it down heavily on the barbarian's head. The Gaul at once drew his sword and killed him. Following this, the Gauls, who had up to this point done no damage, killed the rest of the men in the Forum, plundered the city, and put all those they found in it to the sword. But they could not take the Capitol, which was defended by Marcus Manlius. Brennus kept part of his forces in Rome, having burned most of the city, to keep up the siege of the Capitol. After seven months, those on the Capitol were weakened by lack of supplies, and the Gauls in the ruined city were weakened by disease. Brennus agreed to withdraw his forces in return for 1000 pounds of gold. The defenders in the Capitol brought the gold to him to be weighed. As Brennus was weighing it, the Romans saw that he was tipping the scales and cheating them. When they protested, he laughed, took off his sword and belt, and flung them on the scales. They asked what this meant and he mocked them, saying, "Vae victis!" (that is, "Woe to the vanquished," conveying approximately the same meaning as, in modern times, "to the victor belong the spoils"). However, Brennus was not to be victor after all. While the weighing of the gold was proceeding, Camillus entered with a force he had gathered, took up the gold and gave it to an attendant, and gave the scales back to Brennus, to whom he said that Rome was accustomed to delivering herself with iron, not with gold. Brennus withdrew to a camp outside the city. The next day Camillus fell upon him and routed his forces with great slaughter.

Brennus. A leader of the Gauls. Attracted by the weakness of the Greeks and the wealth of their sanctuaries, he led an attack against them, 279 B.C. His army, or part of it, eluded the Greeks and swam across the Spercheus River, using their shields as rafts. They plundered the country around Thermopylae but were defeated by the Greeks, with the aid of ships from Athens, at Thermopylae. The Gauls would now have retired in discouragement, but Brennus rallied them. He sent part of his forces into Aetolia to draw off the Aetolians, and they sacked and murderously ravaged the town of Calium. As Brennus had expected, the Aetolians rushed back from Thermopylae to protect their cities. Some Greeks at Thermopylae who, according to Pausanias, were not so much traitors as they were anxious to get rid of the Gauls, led Brennus and a large part of his force around the pass at Thermopylae, even as the armies of Xerxes had been led around it 200 years earlier. From there Brennus began his march to Delphi to plunder the rich sanctuary there. But again, they say, the god Apollo came to protect his own, as he had done in the time of the Persian War. When the Gauls drew near, the ground shook with earthquakes; thunder and lightning assaulted the Gauls, rock slides fell on them, and lastly, during the night snow fell. The Greeks attacked them at sunrise, surprising them from the rear. Brennus was wounded. The same night Pan came to aid the Greeks by spreading panic among the barbarians. They thought they heard the sound of horses galloping, and rushed to arms and fell on each other, under the delusion they were fighting off enemies. The Greeks, beholding this, attacked them relentlessly and drove them off. Brennus, seeing that all was lost, com-

Briareus to free Zeus. The gods called him Briareus but men called him Aegaeon.

Brimo (brī'mō). A Greek goddess variously identified with Hecate, Persephone, or Demeter.

Brindisi (brēn'dē-zē). See Brundisium.

Brisea (brī-sē'ā). A town in Laconia. See Bryseae.

Briseis (brī-sē'is). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a daughter of Briseus and the wife of Mynes, king of Lyrnessus. On a raid on Lyrnessus, Achilles killed her husband and took her captive. She was awarded to him as part of the spoils from the raid and he loved her dearly. Agamemnon took her from Achilles when his own captive, Chryseis, was restored to her father at Apollo's demand. After the death of Patroclus, Agamemnon restored Briseis to Achilles, untouched, and she wept over dead Patroclus, who had always been so good and gentle to her.

mitted suicide. According to legend, he brought his life to a close by drinking undiluted wine.

Briareus (brī-ār'e-us). In Greek mythology, the son of Uranus and Gaea and the brother of Gyges and Cottus. He was a sea giant who had one hundred arms. When Hera, Poseidon, and Athena confined Zeus in chains as he slept, Thetis, a sea-goddess, called on Briseus (brī'sūs). In Homeric legend (Iliad), the father of Briseis. According to a later account, he hanged himself in despair when his daughter was taken captive by Achilles.

Britannicus (bri-tan'i-kus). [Original name, Claudius Tiberius Germanicus.] Roman noble, born c41 A.D.; died at Rome, 55 A.D. He was the son of the emperor Claudius and Messalina, and was heir apparent to the throne until the intrigues of his stepmother, Agrippina, and her paramour, the freedman Pallas, secured from Claudius the precedence for Nero, Agrippina's son by a former marriage. He is thought to have been poisoned at a banquet by Nero, whose mother had sought to work upon the fears of her rebellious son by threatening to bring the claims of Britannicus before the soldiery. The name Britannicus was given to him by the Senate because of the conquest of Britain about the time of his birth.

Britomartis (brit-ō-mar'tis). A Cretan divinity of hunters and fishermen. The name probably means "Sweet Maiden." According to some accounts, she was a daughter of Leto. Minos pursued her and she fled from him and hid in the marshes. Later he pursued her over mountains and hills and to save herself, she flung herself into the sea. She was caught in fishermen's nets, which she is said to have invented, and saved. Artemis immortalized her and in Crete, where there are many temples to her, she was called Dictynna. In Greece she was identified with Artemis.

Brize (brī'zē). The gadfly sent by Hera to goad Io and chase her all over the eastern end of the Mediterranean.

Brizo (brī'zō). A goddess worshiped by women and known for prophecy through dreams. She was also a protectress of sailors. Her seat was the island of Delos.

Brome (brō'mē). In Greek mythology, one of the nymphs who helped care for the infant Dionysus in a cave on Mount Nysa. With other nymphs who performed this service, she was rewarded by Zeus by having her image placed among the stars as one of the Hyades.

Bromius (brō'mi-us). An epithet of Dionysus, meaning "Thunder," and given to him from the thunder that pealed at his birth.

Brontes (bron'tēz). In mythology, one of the Cyclopes, a son of Gaea and Uranus. His brothers were Arges and Steropes. See Cyclopes.

Bronze Age. One of the Ages of Man described by Hesiod. It was the third of the five ages, each of which was worse than the last. In the Bronze Age men ate flesh. They armed themselves with weapons and delighted in warfare. Death carried them all off.

Broteas (brot'ē-as). In Greek mythology, a son of Tantalus and the brother of Pelops. He had a son Tantalus, named for his father (Thyestes is also named as the father of this Tantalus). He carved an image of the Mother of the gods in the living rock of Mount Sipylus, high above the plain, which is still visible. He refused to honor Artemis, boasting that even fire could not hurt him. In punishment for his arrogance, he was divinely inspired with madness, and cast himself into a fire and burned to death. But some say that Broteas was a son of Zeus and was blinded by Zeus for his wickedness. Others say that he was so ugly that in discouragement he killed himself.

Brundisium (brun-dizh-'i-um). [Modern: Brindisi.] City in Apulia, in SE Italy, situated on a land tongue between two bays of the Adriatic Sea. The ancient town, occupied by the Romans c266 B.C., became a Roman colony (246) and a naval station (244 B.C.). It assumed great strategic importance as the terminus of the Appian Way and port of embarkation for Greece and the Levant.

Bruttii (brut'i-i). [Also: Bruttium, Bruthius; Bruttiorum Ager.] In ancient geography, the southernmost division of Italy, corresponding to the modern provinces of Reggio di Calabria, Cosenza, and Catanzaro, and approximately coextensive with the modern region of Calabria.

Brutus (brō'tus), Decimus Junius. [Surnamed Gallaecus or Callaicus.] Roman consul and military leader; fl. 138 B.C. The surname Gallaecus (Callaicus) derived from his conquest of the Gallaeci (Callaiei), a people of NW Spain. He also repulsed the forays of the Lusitanians into the Roman colonies in Spain. He was consul in 138 B.C. He is remembered not only as a soldier, but also as a patron of poets, especially of Accius.

Brutus, Decimus Junius. [Surnamed Albinus.] Roman general; executed 43 B.C. He was one of the assassins of Julius Caesar. He was put to death by order of Mark Antony, with whom he disputed the province of Cisalpine Gaul. At the time of his death, Brutus was consul-designate. He is not to be confused with Marcus Junius Brutus, Caesar's chief assassin.

Brutus, Lucius Junius. Roman consul in 509 B.C., known as "The Founder of the Roman Republic." According to legend, he feigned idiocy (whence the name Brutus "stupid"; probably an erroneous etymology) to avoid exciting the fear and enmity of his uncle Tarquin the Proud (Tarquinius Superbus), who had put to death the father and the elder brother of Brutus to possess himself of their wealth. Tarquin, alarmed at the prodigy of a serpent appearing in the royal palace, sent his sons Titus and Aruns to consult the oracle at Delphi. They took with them for amusement Brutus, who propitiated the priestess with a hollow staff filled with gold. When the oracle in response to an inquiry of Titus and Aruns as to who should succeed to the throne, replied, "He who first kisses his mother," Brutus stumbled to the ground and kissed mother earth. When Tarquin seized and violated Lucretia, wife of Tarquinius Collatinus (whose father was a cousin of Tarquin the Proud), she called her husband and her father to her house. Brutus was one of several prominent Romans who accompanied Tarquinius Collatinus. Lucretia told them all that had happened, begged them to punish her ravisher, and then, in spite of their pleas, she took up a dagger and plunged it into her breast. Brutus, casting aside forever his pretense of idiocy, took up the blood-stained dagger, held it before them all, and swore by Lucretia's blood, once so pure, that he would "pursue Tarquin the Proud, his wicked wife and their children, with fire and sword: nor will I ever suffer any of that family, or any other whatsoever, to reign at Rome." He called the gods to witness his oath, then gave the dagger to the other men present and asked them to swear the same oath. With the aid of Publius Valerius, Brutus drove Tarquin out. The people immediately wanted to choose a new leader, but with the memory of the tyranny of Tarquin before them, they decided to divide the rule between two consuls. Brutus and Tarquinius Collatinus, as the man most implacably the enemy of Tarquin, were chosen consuls (509 B.C.), and established the Roman Republic.

On the understanding that he would give up his attempts to regain the throne and reestablish the kingship, envoys of Tarquin were allowed to reënter Rome to collect his personal treasure and belongings. While in the city, they plotted with two of the leading families of Rome to kill the consuls and restore Tarquin. Two young sons of Brutus were involved in the conspiracy. When the plotters were discovered, brought before the consuls and accused, they made no defense, since the proof against them was incontrovertible. They stood in silence. In the stillness Brutus addressed his sons, "You, Titus, and you, Tiberius, why don't you defend yourselves of this charge?" As they made no answer, Brutus turned to the lictors and delivered his sons into their hands. The lictors flogged them, then stretched them on the ground and cut their heads off. The others present averted their eyes before the scene, the humiliation of Brutus, but he sternly watched to see that justice was done for the crime against Rome. Some said his face showed neither grief nor pity, but others said that to the dignity of his expression was added a look of fatherly anguish. When his sons were dead, he left the Forum. Immediately afterward, Publius Valerius and Tarquinius Collatinus began to dispute as to what should be done with the other conspirators, some of whom were related to Collatinus. Valerius called for Brutus. He returned to the Forum and informed them that, he having pronounced judgment on his own sons, it was up to the people to pronounce judgment on the other traitors. The matter was put to a vote, and the conspirators were condemned to death and at once beheaded. But Tarquin had not given up his determination to regain power at Rome. He sought aid from the Etruscans and marched with a great force against Rome. Brutus and his new colleague as consul, Publius Valerius, led the Roman troops against them. Aruns, the son of Tarquin, met Brutus on the field. They charged headlong at each other and killed each other.

Brutus, Marcus Junius. [Adoptive name, Quintus Caepio Brutus.] Roman politician and general, born c85 B.C.; died near Philippi, Macedonia, 42 B.C. Of a prominent Roman family, on his father's side he claimed descent from Lucius Junius Brutus who expelled the Tarquins from Rome. His mother was Servilia, a sister of Cato the Younger. She was a descendant of Servilius Ahala, who slew Spurius Maelius (439 B.C.) for plotting to usurp power in Rome. Thus, on both sides of his family, Brutus had a heritage of hatred of tyrants. He was well educated, and was particularly devoted to the philosophy of Plato. In the disturbances that shook Rome before Caesar won control, he was noted for his conspicuous devotion to the ideals of the republic and for the fact that he was impervious to bribery and flattery. Pompey was responsible for the death of his father, and though on this account he would not even speak to Pompey, when the struggle for power between Pompey and Caesar erupted, Brutus unhesitatingly chose to ally himself with Pompey who had legality on his side. He voluntarily joined Pompey in Macedonia before the battle of Pharsalus. It is said that when Caesar learned that Brutus was in the enemy camp, he gave particular orders to his men not to harm him in the fighting; if possible, he was to be taken prisoner, but if he refused to give up, Caesar ordered his men to leave him. Some say Caesar did this out of regard for Brutus' mother Servilia, who was the woman most loved by Caesar. And some say that Brutus was Caesar's son by Servilia. At all events, Brutus was not harmed in the battle of Pharsalus (48 B.C.), which ended in the defeat of Pompey. Brutus then wrote to Caesar, who forgave him and made him one of his companions. Caesar appointed him governor of Cisalpine Gaul (46 B.C.), where he won the devotion of the province by his wise rule and by his refusal to enrich himself by plundering it. In 44 B.C. Caesar made him first praetor (praetor urbanus), and it appeared that there was no limit to his future in Rome. But there were many in Rome who hated and feared Caesar on personal or public grounds. For there was no doubt that under him the ancient liberties of the republic had vanished. Cassius, married to Brutus' sister Junia, was continually warning of the dangerous power Caesar held. Others who felt the same turned to Brutus because of his incorruptible spirit and because his name and heritage made him a natural choice to pull down tyranny. Urged on by Cassius and others, Brutus at last agreed to a plan to kill Caesar for the good of the republic. Some of the most prominent men in Rome joined the conspiracy, and it was decided that the deed would be committed at a meeting of the Senate which Caesar was expected to attend on the Ides of March (March 15, 44 B.C.). On that day the conspirators met at the Portico of Pompey. For various reasons, among them the omens of disaster that came to his wife Calpurnia, Caesar delayed his coming to the meeting, and the conspirators felt alarm that the plot might have been exposed. At last, however, Caesar arrived. As the conspirators gathered about him, Cassius turned his eyes to the statue of Pompey as if to invoke his spirit. Casca was first to strike at Caesar with his dagger. He hit him a glancing blow. Others approached and he fended them off, but when he saw Brutus threatening him, Caesar murmured "Et tu, Brute?" (You, too, Brutus?), covered his head with his robe, and ceased to defend himself. The thrust of Brutus went home. It was said that of the 23 wounds that struck Caesar on that day it was the second one, that inflicted by Brutus, that caused his death. When Caesar was dead, the senators fled. The conspirators had wanted to kill Antony also, but Brutus forbade it as they had agreed not to kill anyone else. Following the assassination, Brutus made a speech on the Capitol, exhorting the Romans to take back their liberties. There was no immediate outcry against the conspirators. On the contrary, Brutus was taken to the Forum with an escort of honor, but when Cinna, one of the conspirators, began to revile Caesar, the crowd murmured against him. The next day the Senate met and voted not only to give amnesty to the conspirators but also to honor them. Brutus was entertained by Lepidus. The following day the Senate met again and distributed the provinces, awarding Crete to Brutus. Mark Antony, who had fled in disguise after the murder of Caesar, returned and proposed that Caesar be given a public funeral. Cassius opposed him, but Brutus gave permission for it and also for a public reading of Caesar's will. When the will, bequeathing largesse to the citizens, was read, the crowd was moved by sympathy and affection for Caesar. Antony, aware of the tide of opinion that was rising, inflamed the crowd, praising Caesar, and holding up the blood-stained robe in which he died. His speech precipitated a riot, and Brutus and the other conspirators withdrew from the city.

Brutus went to Greece, where he was honored and welcomed, and from there to Asia, where he began to gather money and men to fight against Octavian (heir of Caesar) and Antony, who had temporarily given up the struggle between themselves for control in order to unite against Brutus. At Sardis, Brutus met Cassius, who had also by this time collected a large force. Before he left Asia, Brutus was sitting alone in his tent, late at night, meditating on the forces that he was about to set in motion. He thought he heard someone enter his tent, and looking up saw a phantom of monstrous shape. "Who of gods or men are you?" he asked, "and what is your errand with me?" "I am your evil genius, Brutus," the phantom answered, "and you will see me at Philippi." Turning back to his work, Brutus said, "I shall see you." There were other evil omens: when the armies of Brutus and Cassius embarked on their ships, two eagles perched on the leading standards and went with them, but flew off the day before the battle; at the sacrifices performed before battle was joined at Philippi, there were so many unfavorable omens that even the skeptic Cassius became alarmed. In a discussion before the battle Brutus and Cassius agreed that in case of failure they would commit suicide. In the first battle of Philippi (42 B.C.), Brutus was victorious over Octavian, who barely escaped with his life, but the forces of Cassius were overwhelmed by Antony. Cassius did not know that Brutus had been successful and he committed suicide. Twenty days later the forces of Brutus again met those of Octavian. The night before, the monstrous shape that had come to Brutus in Asia appeared in his tent again, but departed without saying a word. Next day the battle began in the afternoon. The army of Brutus was surrounded. He escaped with some friends and hid in a cave. He asked his companions to hold his sword, that he might fall upon it, but they refused. He then grasped the hilt of his naked sword with both hands and fell upon it (42 B.C.). According to Plutarch, when Antony found the body of Brutus, he wrapped it in one of his own costly robes for burial and sent the ashes of Brutus to his mother Servilia. But others say the head of Brutus was cut off and sent to Rome, where it was flung at the feet of a statue of Caesar.

Bryaxis (brī-ak'sis). Greek sculptor; fl. 4th century B.C. He is best known as one of the four sculptors (the others being Scopas, Leochares, and Timotheus) who created the Mausoleum, the tomb of Mausolus, satrap of Caria, at Halicarnassus, which was completed c333 B.C. The relief panel of the Amazon frieze from the northern face is attributed to Bryaxis. It is believed that Bryaxis was the sculptor of an Apollo which stood in the grove of Daphne near Antioch, and other notable ancient works have been attributed to him. A tripod having a base with sculptured figures of horsemen, recovered at Athens in 1891, is shown by its signature to have been his work.

Brygos (brī'gos). Attic potter, active at the beginning of the 5th century B.C. Five vessels signed by him as potter were decorated by the same painter, who became known as the Brygos Painter (because his true name is unknown) and was one of the foremost painters of his time. He has been recognized as the painter of over 170 vessels, chiefly cups. The inside of a cup (Munich) c490 B.C., has a maenad painted in black outline on a white ground. On the outside, in red-figure style, Dionysus appears with a troop of maenads and satyrs. A cup in the Louvre shows an Iliupersis (Sack of Troy), and one in the British Museum shows satyrs attacking Iris and Hera. On a cantharus (Boston), Zeus pursues Ganymede; on another (New York), two satyrs relax to music.

Bryseae (brī-sē'ē). A town in Laconia, whose inhabitants sailed under Menelaus to the Trojan War. In the temple of Dionysus here, only women were permitted to see the sacred image, and the rites they performed in its presence were secret.

Bryson of Heraclea (brī'son; her-a-klē'a). Greek mathematician, a member of the Pythagorean school; fl. 5th century B.C. He went a step further than his contemporary Antiphon toward the squaring of the circle

by considering not simply inscribed polygons of an increasing number of sides, but also circumscribed polygons. He believed, erroneously, that the area of the circle was the arithmetical mean between the areas of inscribed and circumscribed polygons.

Bubares (bū'ba-rēz). Persian engineer who helped direct the construction of a canal across the Athos peninsula, near Acanthus, in Greece, to allow the passage of Xerxes' fleet in his invasion of Greece, 480 B.C.

Bubona (bū-bō'nā). In Roman mythology, a female divinity, protectress of cows and oxen. The Romans placed small images of Bubona, and the companion goddess Epona, protectress of horses, in niches in stables, or painted pictures of the divinities over the mangers.

Bucephalus (bū-sef'a-lus). Favorite horse of Alexander the Great which, after accompanying its master through his principal campaigns, died (326 B.C.) at the age of 30. Alexander buried the horse with great pomp on the banks of the Hydaspes River (now the Jhelum) in India, and built at the site the city of Bucephalia, traces of which exist across the river from the modern town of Jhelum in Pakistan.

Bucolion (bū-kol'i-on). In Homeric legend (Iliad), the eldest son of Laomedon. He was the father of twin sons, Aesepus and Pedasus, by the nymph Abarbarea.

Bunaea (bū-nē'a). Epithet of Hera, from the temple raised to her on the Acrocorinthus at Corinth by Bunus, son of Hermes.

Bunus (bū'nus). In Greek legend, the son of Hermes and Alcidamea. He ruled Ephyraea for Aeëtes when the latter migrated to Colchis.

Buphagus (bū-fā'gus). In Greek legend, a son of Iapetus and Thornax. He was an Arcadian of Pheneus, who received Iphicles, the brother of Heracles, when he was wounded in the fighting between Heracles and Augeas. Buphagus cared for him until he died. Afterward, Buphagus was slain by Artemis because of his presumption in pursuing her.

Buphagus. Epithet, meaning "Ox-eater." It was given to Heracles following a contest with Lepreus, part of which consisted in devouring a whole ox.

Buphagus. In ancient geography, a river in Arcadia. It was said to have been named for Buphagus, the son of Iapetus and Thornax, who was slain by Artemis because he attempted to violate her on Mount Pholoë.

Bura (bū'rā). A city in Achaea, near the southern shore of the Gulf of Corinth. An oracle of Heracles there gave answers as the result of the throw of four dice. It was destroyed by an earthquake in 373 B.C. It joined (275 B.C.) the Achaean League.

Buraicus (bū-rā'i-kus). Epithet of Heracles, derived from the town of Bura in Achaea. Nearby Heracles had an oracle in a cave. Those who consulted the oracle took four dice from a pile and cast them on a table. The message was then gleaned from certain markings on the dice, which were interpreted in accordance with a painting hanging on the wall of the cave.

Burrus or Burrhus (bur'us), Sextus Afranius. Roman officer; died 62 A.D. He was appointed sole praetorian prefect by Claudius in 51 A.D., and was, together with Seneca, entrusted with the education of Nero. By his influence with the praetorian guards he secured the undisputed succession of his pupil in 54. He is thought to have been put to death by poison, probably for having offended Nero.

Busiris (bū-si'ris). According to Greek legend, a king of Egypt, who was the son of Poseidon and, as some say, Lysianassa, daughter of Epaphus. During his reign Egypt was afflicted with a famine that lasted nine years. Phrasius a learned seer of Cyprus, visited the land and told the Egyptians the famine would cease if they sacrificed one stranger each year on the altar of Zeus. Busiris adopted his advice and began by sacrificing Phrasius himself. When Heracles came to the land, after he had secured the apples of the Hesperides for Eurystheus, Busiris seized him and dragged him off to the altar to be sacrificed. At the altar Heracles burst his bonds and slew Busiris, his son Amphidamas, and all his followers, an event commemorated in several Greek vase-paintings.

Butes (bū'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Poseidon or Pandion, and the twin of Erechtheus, king of Athens. He was the brother of Procne and Philomela. After Pandion died actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; q̇ as d or j, ş as s or sh, ṫ as t or ch, ż as z or zh.

of grief over the fate of his daughters, Butes succeeded him as priest of Athena and Poseidon. He married his brother's daughter, Chthonia. He is the legendary ancestor of the family of hereditary priests of Poseidon in the Erechtheum.

Butes. According to the legend, a son of Teleon, who joined Jason and the Argonauts on the expedition for the Golden Fleece. On the way home from Colchis the Argonauts passed the island of the Sirens and were prevented from succumbing to their enchanting songs by the even sweeter singing of Orpheus. Only Butes yielded to their spell. He leaped overboard and would have perished at the Sirens' hands, but Aphrodite snatched him up and placed him on the Lilybean height, a promontory in Sicily, where he dwelt thereafter, and by Aphrodite became the father of Eryx.

Butes. In Greek legend, a son of Boreas. He was driven into exile from Thrace because he plotted against his brother, Lycurgus, and was discovered. With some companions he seized the island of Strongyle (Naxos) in the Cyclades. He pillaged passing ships and raided the mainland for women, since there were no women on Strongyle. In Thessaly he found the women celebrating the festival of Dionysus and seized Coronis, a Lapith princess, and ravished her. She appealed to Dionysus to avenge her and the god afflicted Butes with madness. In a spell he plunged into a well and was drowned.

Buthōē (bū'thō-ē). A city in Illyria, on Lake Lychnitis. It was built by Cadmus who, having resigned his Theban throne, had migrated to Illyria. Illyrius, the son of Cadmus in his old age, became its king.

Buthrotum (bū-thrō'tum). [Modern name, Butrinto, Vutrinto.] In ancient geography, a seaport in Epirus, now in Albania. It is said to have been founded by Helenus, son of Priam.

Buxentum (buk-sen'tum). [Modern name, Policastro.] Town of Greek origin in Lucania, situated on an arm of the Tyrrhenian Sea about 60 miles SE of Salernum. It was colonized by the Romans after the Second Punic War.

Byblis (bib'lis). According to legend, a daughter of Miletus, and the twin sister of Caunus, with whom she fell in love. When she confessed her love, he fled in horror to Lycia. In despair Byblis searched for him through many lands, until she fell of exhaustion. As she lay weeping, the Lelegian nymphs changed her and her tears into a fountain that never fails, and over the spot there grew an ilex tree.

Byblus (bib'lus). [Also: Byblos; modern name, Jubeil, also spelled Djebeil, Jebail, Jebeil, Jubayl; in the Bible, Gebal.] In ancient geography, a city in Phoenicia, situated on a hill close to the Mediterranean Sea, about 18 miles N of what is now Beirut. It was one of the earliest of the Phoenician settlements, and second in importance only to Tyre and Sidon. Its inhabitants, the Gebalites, are mentioned as skillful in hewing stones (1 Kings, v. 18) and in shipbuilding (Ezek. xxvii. 9). The word "Bible" comes (through Greek biblion, book) from the ancient name of the city, which exported papyrus. The city was most celebrated as the oldest seat of the cult of Adonis, to whom the city was sacred, and after whom the river it stood on was named. Gebal is mentioned as a kingdom paying tribute to Assyria in the annals of Tiglath-pileser II and Esarhaddon. It was taken by Alexander the Great. Excavations carried on there have unearthed numerous tombs and sarcophagi and the substructions of a large temple, perhaps that of Adonis.

Byrsa (bér'sä). See under ancient Carthage. Byzantium (bi-zan'shi-um, -ti-). [Greek, Byzantion.] In ancient geography, a Greek city built on the E part of the site of Constantinople (modern Istanbul), into which it was formally merged by the emperor Constantine I in 330 A.D. It was noted for the beauty of its location, for its strategic position controlling the entrance to the Euxine (Black) Sea, and for its control of the all-important grain trade between the Euxine region and Greece. It is said to have been founded by colonists from Megara under Byzas, for whom it was named, in 667 B.C. The Megarians had first founded Chalcedon, on the opposite shore of the Bosphorus. When they returned to the oracle of Delphi, they were chided by the priestess for their blindness in overlooking the more advantageous spot to which they returned and where they founded Byzantium. In the reign of Darius the Great the city was destroyed. Pausanias, the Spartan victor at Plataea (479 B.C.), seized and recolonized it, 477, but was driven out by the Athenians, 476 B.C. The city became a member of the Athenian Confederacy, from which it revolted in 440 and 411 B.C. Alcibiades conquered it in 408 B.C. by means of a blockade and the treachery of the Athenian party inside the city. Ly-sander the Spartan took it in 403 B.C. and set a Spartan governor to rule it. The Athenians regained control in 390, and at last recognized it as independent in 354 B.C. In 340 B.C. it was besieged by Philip of Macedonia and relieved by Phocion. During the reign of Alexander the Great it fell under Macedonian dominion, but with the disintegration of the Macedonian empire after Alexander's death it became a free city. It was allied to Rome, at first as a free city, then as a subject city, and was at length besieged by Severus (196 A.D.), who took it, destroyed its walls, and put the population to the sword. Constantine recognized the advantages of its location, rebuilt it, and transferred the government there, 330 A.D., and it became the capital of the long-lived Byzantine Empire.

Byzas (bī'zās). In Greek legend, a son of Poseidon and Ceroëssa, daughter of Zeus and Io. Some say he was the founder of Byzantium. Others say that a Byzas led a colony of Megarians to the Black Sea and founded Byzantium, c667 B.C.

Caanthus (kā-an'thus). In Greek mythology, a son of Oceanus. He was sent to look for his sister Melia, who had disappeared. He found that she had been carried off by Apollo, and when he was unable to rescue her, he threw fire into the sacred grove of Apollo. For his impiety Apollo slew him. According to Pausanias, the tomb of Caanthus was near the Ismenus River, at Thebes, on the spot where he was killed.

Cabirea (ka-bī'rē-ā). Epithet of Demeter. The Thebans said that on the site occupied by the grove of Cabirean Demeter outside Thebes, there was once a city occupied by the Cabiri. Demeter taught them her rites and entrusted a sacred object into their keeping. The Cabiri were driven from their homes in the war that the Epigoni waged against Thebes, but later returned and revived the rites. Only the priests were permitted to perform the rites. If private persons made the attempt, they were swiftly punished by the anger of the gods, as were also those who profaned the sacred places. During the Persian War some soldiers from the army of Mardonius entered the sanctuary of Demeter Cabirea in Boeotia. According to the account, they were struck with madness and hurled themselves into the sea.

Cabiri (ka-bī'rī). [Also: Cabeiri, Kabeiri.] In Greek mythology, certain beneficent deities of whom little is known. They were worshiped in parts of Greece and in the islands of Imbrus, Lemnos, and Samothrace. They are possibly of Phrygian origin. Their rites were secret. The mysteries of the Cabiri of Samothrace were regarded as inferior only to the Eleusinian. Later they became associated with the Dioscuri and gave protection against mishaps, especially by sea.

Caca (kā'ka). In Roman mythology, an ancient goddess of the hearth. Her place was later taken by Vesta. Caca was supposed to have been the sister of Cacus who stole the cattle Hercules had seized from Geryon. This occurred while Hercules rested in Italy on his return with the cattle to Greece. Caca is said to have reported the theft to Hercules.

Cacus (kā'kus). In Roman mythology, a giant, a fire-breathing, man-eating, half-human son of Vulcan, living near the spot on which Rome was built. He stole from Hercules some of the cattle of Geryon, dragging them backward into his cave under the Aventine, so that their footprints would not show the direction in which they had gone; but Hercules found them by their lowing. He ripped off the top of the mountain in a cave of which Cacus had hidden the cattle, hurled in stones and arrows, and, when these failed to hurt Cacus, jumped in and slew the monster, thus ridding the land of a pestilence and winning the gratitude of the inhabitants.

Cadmea (kad-mē'a). In ancient times, the citadel or acropolis of Thebes in Boeotia, Greece, named from its mythical founder, the hero Cadmus. The remains of the ancient fortifications include a stretch of ruined Cyclopean wall on the north side, and fragments of more recent walls on the south-eastern slope.

Cadmeans (kad-mē'anz). Graeco-Phoenicians (their name merely signifying "the Easterns") who in pre-Trojan times were said to have occupied the country which was afterward called Boeotia. Their name may have been derived from the legendary figure of Cadmus, whose name means "man of the East."

Cadmus (kad-mus). In Greek mythology, a son of Agenor of Phoenicia and Telephassa, and the brother of Cilix, Phoenix, and Europa. When Europa was carried off by Zeus, who had taken the form of a bull on this occasion, Agenor commanded his sons to find her, and threatened them with exile if they failed to do so. Cadmus, accompanied by his mother, sailed to Rhodes. He dedicated a bronze tripod in the sanctuary of Athena at Lindus, in Rhodes. This tripod was inscribed with Phoenician letters, and thus it was that Cadmus brought the alphabet into the Greek world. He also founded a temple of Poseidon in Rhodes, in fulfillment of a vow made during a storm at sea. He touched at the island of Thera and founded a colony there. Still in search of Europa, he journeyed to Thrace. Telephassa died there and Cadmus buried her. He next proceeded to Delphi to make inquiries of the oracle as to how he could find his sister. The priestess told him to give up his search. She instructed him to follow a cow, and where it should lie down, there he must build a city. Cadmus traveled through Phocis. He detached a heifer which had white marks in the shape of a full moon on its flanks from the herd of King Pelagon, and drove it through Boeotia. At last the cow lay down on the site of the city which later came to be known as Thebes. Cadmus wanted to sacrifice the cow to Athena at once. He sent his followers to a nearby spring for water. This was a spring of Ares, and was guarded by a fierce dragon that killed the companions of Cadmus. Cadmus slew the dragon and, on the advice of Athena, sowed part of its teeth. Instantly armed men sprang up from the soil; these were the Sparti, "sown" men. Cadmus flung stones into the midst of the Sparti and they, thinking they were being assaulted by some of their own number, fell to fighting among themselves and all except five were slain. The five survivors were Echion, Udaeus, Chthonius, Hyperenor, and Pelorus. They agreed to help Cadmus build his city, and became the ancestors of five of the leading families of Thebes. But Ares was angry with Cadmus for killing his dragon, and as a punishment compelled Cadmus to serve him for a Great Year, that is to say, for eight years, for such was the term of a "Great" or "Eternal" year. At the end of his term of service Athena made him king of Thebes, which at that time was known as Cadmea, and its inhabitants as Cadmeans. Zeus gave him Harmonia, the daughter of Aphrodite and Ares, for a wife, and all the gods attended the wedding. This was the first wedding of mortals which the gods honored with their presence.

Cadmus built the upper city of Thebes and reigned peacefully, but his descendants suffered grievously for his fault in killing the dragon of Ares. Harmonia bore Cadmus four daughters: Autonoe, Semele, Ino, and Agave, and one son, Polydorus. After some time, Cadmus gave up the throne in favor of his grandson, Pentheus, the son of Agave. In this time Dionysus came to Thebes. Pentheus doubted the divinity of the god and ordered the Thebans not to take part in the revels. Dionysus punished him by driving him mad and by causing his mother, who had also at first refused to believe that Dionysus was a god, to tear Pentheus to pieces while she was under a spell of divinely inspired madness. After this Cadmus and Harmonia fled, grief-stricken, from Thebes. They went to the land of the Encheleans, who were at war with their neighbors, the Illyrians. The Encheleans were informed by an oracle that they would defeat the Illyrians if Cadmus was their leader. They therefore made him their leader and defeated the Illyrians. Thus Cadmus became king of the Illyrians, and when a son was born to him in his old age, he named him Illyrius. In the end, Cadmus and Harmonia were turned into spotted serpents by Zeus, and finally went to the Elysian Fields.

Cadmus of Miletus (mī-lē'tus). Greek historian, called Cadmus of Miletus from his chief work, but by birth a Phoenician. He flourished probably in the middle of the 6th century B.C. He is generally considered to be the earliest of the Greek chroniclers and the first to write historic prose, a prose it should be noted, that was still marked by the poetic character of the earlier epics. According to tradition, he wrote his chronicle, a history of Miletus and the colonization of Ionia, immediately after he had invented letters. He also speculated on the cause of the periodic floods of the Nile.

Caduceus (ka-dū'sē-us). The rod or wand borne by Hermes, or Mercury, as an ensign of authority, quality, and office. It was originally merely the Greek herald's staff, a plain rod entwined with fillets of wool. Later the fillets were changed to serpents; and in the conventional representations familiar at the present day the caduceus is often winged. The caduceus is a symbol of peace and prosperity and in modern times figures as a symbol of commerce, Hermes being the god of commerce. It is also used as an emblem by physicians in this country. The rod represents power; the serpents represent wisdom; and the two wings, diligence and activity.

Caecilius (sē-sil'i-us, -sil'yus). [Surnamed Calactinus and, erroneously, Callantianus; original name, Archagathus.] Hellenistic historian, critic, and teacher, of Calacte in Sicily (whence his surname); active in the 1st century A.D. He was naturalized at Rome, where he took the name of his patron, one of the Metelli. He enjoyed high repute at Rome in the time of Cicero and Augustus, but his works are lost, with the exception of a few fragments.

Caecilius Statius (stā'shi-us, -shus). [Also: Statius Caecilius.] Roman comic poet, who died 168 B.C. He was by birth a member of the Celtic tribe of the Insubrians, and was brought as a prisoner to Rome c200 B.C. His comedies, of which only fragments survive, were adaptations of Attic originals.

Caeculus (sē'kū-lus). In Roman legend, the son of Vulcan and a young woman of a family of shepherds. As the young woman was sitting near the hearth, a spark, which was Vulcan, flew into her lap, and from this union Caeculus was born. His mother abandoned him, but he was found and brought up by shepherds. As a young man he became a wandering robber; later, with a band of companions, he is said to have founded the town of Praeneste. He asked Vulcan for a sign to prove to his doubting followers that he was truly of divine birth. Vulcan instantly answered his request by surrounding them with a ring of flames. Satisfied with this proof, Caeculus then requested Vulcan to cause the flames to subside so that his companions, their doubts now at rest, would not be injured. Vulcan again complied.

Caecus (sē'kus). See Claudius, Appius.

Caelian Hill (sē'li-an). [Latin, Caelius Mons.] Southeastern hill of the group of Seven Hills of ancient Rome, adjoining the Palatine, and between the Aventine and the Esquiline. The Lateran lies on its widely extending eastern slope. According to legend, the Caelian Hill was added to the growing city of Rome by Tullus Hostilius, third king of Rome (672-640 B.C.). He won dominion over Alba Longa, destroyed that city, and moved its inhabitants to Rome, where he settled them on the Caelian Hill.

Caelius (sē'li-us). [Full name, Marcus Caelius Rufus.] Roman politician, born at Puteoli, Italy, May 2, 82 B.C.; died 48 B.C. He was a friend and correspondent of Cicero. It is said that his education was supervised by Crassus and Cicero, and he was an especially close friend of the latter during the great orator's public career. He was also for a time intimate with Catiline, but according to Cicero was not involved in the latter's conspiracy, and in fact he exposed the part played by C. Antonius in that intrigue. In 56 B.C. his mistress Clodia, the sister of Publius Clodius and the Lesbia of the poems of Catullus, charged him with an attempt on her life, but he was acquitted with the aid of Cicero, whose oration in his defense, Pro Caelio, is one of the latter's most famous efforts. A tribune in 52 B.C. and an aedile in 50, Caelius supported Julius Caesar against Pompey in 49 B.C. Caesar appointed him praetor peregrinus (that is, judge of legal actions between persons at least one of whom was not a Roman citizen). But whether from a resentful feeling that this reward was insufficient to his services, or from impatience with what he considered the slow pace of Caesar's measures to cancel debts (of which Caelius had many), Caelius joined in a foredoomed conspiracy against Caesar's rising power. In 48 B.C. he was killed by soldiers whom he was attempting to win over to his rebellious plans.

Caelus (sē'lus). In Roman mythology, a god of the sky. He was later identified with Uranus.

Caeneus (sē'nūs). In Greek legend, a Lapith, originally the girl Caenis, daughter of Elatus, who was violated by Poseidon. He promised to grant any wish she might make and fulfilled her request to be changed into a man. She became a warrior who was invulnerable to the sword or spear and was renamed Caeneus and later had a son, Coronus. Caeneus was so powerful the Lapiths made him their king. He took part in the quest for the Golden Fleece and in the Calydonian Hunt. In the battle with the centaurs which broke out at the marriage of Pirithous and Hippodamia, the centaurs tried in vain to slay Caeneus, who was killing centaurs unmercifully. At length they entombed him beneath huge tree trunks. His soul flew out in the form of a bird, and when the Lapiths sought his body to bury it, it was found transformed back to its original form as a girl.

Caenis (sē'nīs). In Greek legend, the daughter of Elatus. She was violated by Poseidon who, in accordance with his promise to grant her any wish, transformed her into a man. See Caeneus.

Caepio (sē'pi-ō), Quintus Servilius. Roman consul in 106 B.C. As proconsul in Gaul (105 B.C.), he was defeated with Mallius by the Cimbri.

Caere (sē'rē). [Earlier name, Agylla.] In ancient geography, a city in Etruria, Italy, situated about 25 miles NW of Rome. It was supposed to have been founded by a warlike tribe from Lydia. In the Aeneid, it is spoken of as one of the towns that was oppressed by Mezentius, and for this reason Aeneas was advised to seek its aid by Evander, in his war against the Rutulians. According to some accounts, when the Gauls took Rome (389 B.C.), the vestal virgins fled with the sacred fire and their sacred vessels to Caere, and there performed the rites. From this event, some say, the rites came to be known as ceremonies, after Caere. The site of Caere is occupied by the modern village of Cerveteri (i.e., Caere Vetere, "Old Caere," to distinguish it from the new town, Cere Nuovo), noted for Etruscan ruins.

Caesar (sē'zar). In ancient Rome, a patrician family of the Julian gens, of which the origin was fancifully traced to a legendary Julius, son of Aeneas, and hence claimed descent from the goddess Venus. The first Caesar actually to be noted in the annals was Sextus Julius, who was a praetor in 208 B.C. Lucius Julius Caesar, consul in 90 B.C., had an important part in shaping Roman institutions by securing the enactment of the law granting Roman citizenship to such of the Italian allies as had not fought against Rome in the Social War or who had laid down their arms at once. Lucius Julius Caesar was killed in 87 B.C., during the civil war, and with him his brother Caius Julius Caesar Strabo Vopiscus, whom Cicero numbered among the Roman orators. A son of Lucius Julius Caesar, bearing the same name, served in Gaul under that other Caius Julius Caesar (c100-44 B.C.) who made the family name one of the most noted in history. This younger Lucius Julius Caesar accompanied his great relative in the campaign which secured for the latter mastery of the Roman world, and after his assassination, joined the avenging forces of Mark Antony, whose mother, Julia, was a sister of Lucius. He quarrelled with Antony, however, and was saved from proscription only by Julia's intervention.

Caesar (sē'zar), Caius Julius. Roman general, statesman, orator, and writer, born July 12, 100 B.C. (according to Theodor Mommsen, 102 B.C.); killed at Rome, March 15, 44 B.C. It is said that Caesar had a charger, each of whose hoofs was cloven into five parts, resembling toes. Soothsayers foretold that the master of the horse would one day rule the world. Caesar reared it carefully, was the first and only man ever to ride it, and eventually raised a statue of it before the Temple of Venus. Early in his career

Caesar made an enemy of the dictator Sulla, who stripped him of his office as a priest of Jupiter and forced him to go into hiding. Sulla ceased to hound him at the plea of influential members of the aristocratic party, but when he did so, he warned them never to forget that the man they pleaded for would one day cause the ruin of their party. Caesar served in Mytilene in 80 B.C., and was awarded a crown of oak-leaves for saving a soldier's life there. While on the way to Rhodes (76 B.C.) he was captured by pirates and held for ransom. He sent his staff to procure it and swore to the pirates that as soon as he was free, he would capture and crucify them. On the arrival of the ransom he sailed off, raised a fleet, and pursued, captured, and crucified the pirates as he had sworn to do. In 68 B.C. he was appointed quaestor and went to Spain. There, at Gades (now Cadiz), he saw a statue of Alexander the Great in the Temple of Hercules, and is said to have sighed because at an age when Alexander had already conquered the world, he had accomplished nothing. He returned to Rome and was made curule aedile (65 B.C.) and began his program of winning the commons to his side with public spectacles, wild beast hunts, gladiatorial combats, and plays. By bribery he succeeded in getting himself elected pontifex maximus (63 B.C.). The following year he became praetor, and the year after that, propraeor in Spain. Successful in Spain, he returned to Rome, was elected consul, and formed the "First Triumvirate" with Pompey and Crassus in 60 B.C. By this maneuver he associated himself with the popularity and influence of Pompey and won access to the wealth of Crassus. He was named proconsul in Gaul and Illyricum in 58 B.C.; defeated the Helvetii and Ariovistus in 58, and the Belgae in 57; invaded Britain in 55 and 54; was the first Roman to build a military bridge across the Rhene (Rhine), crossed it in 55 and 53 B.C., inflicting heavy losses on the Germans; and defeated Vercingetorix in 52 B.C.

His extraordinary military successes did not allay the fears of those who suspected him of plotting against the aristocratic party and the Republic. The consul in Rome proposed that since the Gallic War was over, Caesar should be recalled, his armies disbanded, and a new commander appointed to take his place. It was further proposed that he should not be allowed to stand for the consulship unless he was present in Rome, for this was the law. In the meantime, Caesar had won many to his side, with bribes, gifts, public spectacles, triumphs and their accompanying holidays. He now crossed into Cisalpine Gaul and came to Ravenna. The choice before him was to return to Rome as a private citizen and stand trial for all manner of alleged crimes and irregularities before a hostile court, or to march on Rome at the head of his loyal army and embroil it in civil war. He advanced to the river Rubicon, the boundary between Gaul and Italy. It is said that when he was considering whether to cross the Rubicon and bring on civil war, an apparition of great size and beauty was observed sitting on the bank of the river and playing a pipe. Shepherds gathered to listen and were joined by some soldiers from Caesar's army. When the soldiers neared, the apparition seized a trumpet from one of them, ran to the river, stopped there, blew a blast on the trumpet, and then crossed over. Caesar cried out this was a sign from the gods that they should cross over too. "The die is cast," he said, led his army across (49 B.C.) and began the civil war. In this he was eminently successful. Pompey, for the defense of the Republic, led an army opposed to him. Caesar defeated him (48 B.C.) at Pharsalus in Greece, and pursued him to Alexandria in Egypt. There he found that Ptolemy had murdered him. In his turn, Caesar murdered Ptolemy and gave the rule of Egypt to Cleopatra and her younger brother. (Cleopatra lived with Caesar at Rome, 46-44 B.C., and bore him a son, Caesarion.) He went next to the Near East and defeated Pharnaces at Zela in 47 B.C. In the triumph for Zela at Rome, one of the chariots carried the inscription, "Veni, vidi, vici." (I came, I saw, I conquered.) He defeated the followers of Pompey at Thapsus in 46 B.C. and at Munda in 45 B.C. He reformed the calendar in 46 B.C., brought the Senate up to strength, beautified the city, set about codifying the laws, and proposed many great public works, as the draining of the Pontine Marshes and Lake Fucinus.

the consul Cinna. She bore him a daughter, Julia. His second wife was Pompeia, a granddaughter of Sulla. He divorced her because she was implicated in an impiety with Publius Clodius, who, disguised as a woman, invaded the feast of the Bona Dea, a sacred festival from which men were excluded. The charge was never proved, nor was an accusation against her of infidelity with Publius Clodius. Caesar divorced her, he said, because "Caesar's wife must be above suspicion." His third wife was Calpurnia, daughter of the consul Lucius Piso.

Caesar was a persuasive and cogent orator, and a lucid writer. The Commentaries (or Memoirs), the only one of his literary works extant, contain the history of the first seven years of the Gallic War in seven books, and three books of the Civil War. As a brilliant military leader he was idolized by his soldiers. He had played brilliantly on the caprices of the people and won their entire support. The crown was offered to him on several occasions, the last of these being Feb. 15, 44 B.C., when he refused it as he had done before. However, as his power increased, he made powerful enemies, some of whom feared for the Republic and others who had personal reasons for enmity. He also lost some of the support of the people with his infringement of their ancient liberties. A plot was hatched to assassinate him. According to tradition, many omens, signs, and auguries foretold his death. Veterans who had been sent to colonize in Capua unearthed the tomb of Capys, the legendary founder of the city. With it was a bronze tablet bearing an inscription in Greek warning that if any disturbed the bones of Capys "a man of Trojan stock will be murdered by his kinsmen, and later avenged at a great cost to Rome." (Caesar claimed descent from Venus and Aeneas, hence his "Trojan stock.") An augur warned him that he would not be safe until the Ides of March had passed. The night before he was assassinated his wife Calpurnia dreamed that a temple-like gable, voted in his honor, had collapsed, and that he lay stabbed in her arms. Some say that before he went to the Senate on his last day, he was handed a note describing the plot, but he saved it to read later. Victims sacrificed before he went to the Senate were unfavorable. He saw the augur who had made the prediction about the Ides of March and taunted him, saying, "The Ides of March have come." The augur answered, "Yes, they have come, but they have not gone." He entered the Senate and was immediately surrounded by a ring of daggers. About 60 men were in the plot. The first dagger thrust wounded him, but he parried it. When he saw Marcus Brutus, who had defected from Pompey and become one of Caesar's lieutenants, preparing to make the second thrust, he sorrowfully murmured, "You, too, Brutus?" before he received the wound. Then he drew the top of his robe over his face and ceased to defend himself. Some say that of the 23 wounds he received, only the second was mortal. At news of his death great lamentation rose throughout the city. The conspirators dared not seize control. The blood-stained robe in which Caesar died was placed on an ivory funeral couch and set in a gilded shrine. At his funeral, a dispute arose as to whether his body should be cremated at the Temple of Capitoline Jupiter or in Pompey's Assembly Hall. According to one account, suddenly two divine beings appeared, armed with spear and sword, and set fire to the couch on which his body rested. The crowd of mourners added branches to the flames; those in the funeral procession who were wearing the robes he himself had worn at his triumphs, tore them to pieces and flung them on the flames. Women tossed on their jewelry, the soldiers contributed their weapons. As soon as the funeral was over, the crowd snatched brands from the pyre and ran to burn the houses of Brutus and Cassius, the two chief conspirators, but were prevented from doing so. Later a column of Numidian marble was raised in the Forum. Inscribed on it were the words, "To the Father of his Country." It became the custom to offer sacrifices at the foot of this column, to make vows there, and to settle disputes by taking oaths in Caesar's name. He was deified immediately by the Senate. At the games given by Augustus in honor of Caesar the god, a comet appeared, and shone thereafter for seven days in a row. This was said to be Caesar's soul, taken up to heaven, and in his honor a star was placed above the forehead of his divine image. The hall where he was murdered was closed. The Ides of March were henceforth known as "The Day of Parricide." The name Caesar was assumed by all male members of the Julian dynasty, and after them by the successive emperors, as inseparable from the imperial dignity. It thus became the source of the German Kaiser and the Russian Tsar or Czar. After the death of Hadrian the title Caesar was specifically assigned to those who were designated by the emperors as their successors and associated with them in the government.

Caesar, Drusus. See Drusus Caesar.

Caesarea (sē-zā-rē'a). A name given to various cities of the Roman empire in honor of an emperor.

Caesarea Philippi (fi-lip'i, fil'i-pi). See Paneas.

Caesarion (sē-zār'i-on). Egyptian ruler, son of Cleopatra and (probably) Julius Caesar; born 47 B.C.; died 30 B.C. He was executed by order of Octavian. As Ptolemy XV he was, with his mother, a nominal ruler of Egypt from c44 B.C. to the time of his death.

Caieta (kā-yē'ta). [Also: Portus Caieta; modern name, Gaeta.] In ancient geography, a town and port of Latium, situated on a promontory between Rome and Naples. According to legend, after he had visited his father in Hades and learned from him what his future and the future of his race would be, Aeneas coasted along the shores of Italy and put in at this place. Here his old nurse, Caieta, died and was buried, piously mourned by Aeneas. The town that grew up on this spot was named for her. Historically, Caieta was a Greek colony that ultimately became a Roman town.

Calamis (kal'a-mis). Greek artist, predecessor of Phidias, who was active at Athens, 480-450 B.C. He was a master of the older style of sculpture, and worked in marble, gold, ivory, and bronze. His works ranged from reliefs on small silver vessels to heroic statues in bronze. Among his works was a group of bronze boys with their hands outstretched, that was dedicated at Olympia. A heroic statue of Apollo at Apollonia in Pontus was carried off to Rome by Lucullus and set up in the Capitol. He was unrivalled for his horses, and produced figures of horsemen and four-horse chariots. The work of Calamis retained some of the archaic stiffness, but also showed an interest in and developing capacity for natural expression.

Calanus (kal'a-nus). [Also: Kalanos.] Indian philosopher; fl. 4th century B.C. He accompanied Alexander the Great from India. Becoming ill, he threw himself upon a funeral pyre in the presence of Alexander and his Macedonian officers three months before Alexander's death (323 B.C.), which he had predicted. His name is also given as Sphines.

Calauria (kā-lôr'i-a). [Modern name, Poros.] In ancient geography, a small island off Troezen on the E coast of the Peloponnesus. According to legend, it was given to Poseidon by Apollo in exchange for the former's share of the oracle at Delphi. A religious association of maritime towns—Athens, Aegina, Epidaurus, Troezen, Hermione, Nauplia, Prasias, and Orchomenus in Boeotia—joined together to promote the worship of Poseidon on the island; they built a stone temple (7th century B.C.) for their god, and sailors of the member towns propitiated him there with sacrifices. The sanctuary was served by a maiden priestess, who retired in favor of a younger one when she reached marriageable age. Demosthenes, the Greek orator, was exiled to this island after the unsuccessful uprising which he promoted against the Macedonians. He was later recalled but banished a second time. He returned to Calauria and committed suicide by taking poison in the temple of Poseidon (322 B.C.). His tomb is at Calauria, where he was especially honored.

Calchas (kal'kas). In Greek legend, a son of Thestor, a scion of Idmon, the seer who accompanied the Argonauts. He learned the art of divination from his father and became, according to Homer, the wisest of seers, "who knew all that has been, now is, or shall be in the future." His prophecies and interpretations of omens encouraged the Greeks to fight through the ten years of the Trojan War. He said Troy could not be taken without the help of Achilles; the Greeks accordingly sent for Achilles. When the Greeks first assembled at Aulis to sail against Troy, a crimson-backed serpent wound its way up a nearby plane tree, swallowed eight young sparrows in their nest and devoured their mother. The serpent, still coiled about the tree, then turned to stone. Calchas interpreted this to mean that the Greeks would fight nine years, in the tenth year would take Troy. In the second gathering at Aulis, after years of raiding the coasts of the Troad because they did not know the course to follow to Troy, the Greeks were held wind-bound. Calchas advised Agamemnon that only the sacrifice of his daughter, Iphigenia, to Artemis would bring favorable winds. Iphigenia was sacrificed and the storm winds ceased. Calchas then confirmed that the course which had been given them by a Mysian was correct and the Greeks sailed once more. While they were encamped before Troy, they were harassed by a rain of arrows sent by Apollo. Calchas offered to tell the reason for this plague on condition that Achilles would protect him from Agamemnon's anger. Achilles agreed and Calchas explained that Apollo was sending the arrows to punish Agamemnon for refusing to accept the ransom offered by a priest of Apollo for his daughter, Chryseis, Agamemnon's captive. Agamemnon was indeed angry and accused Calchas of always prophesying evil for him. However, he restored Chryseis to her father and the rain of arrows ceased. Other predictions that Calchas made and that the Greeks acted on were: 1) that Troy, after the death of Achilles, could not be taken without the aid of Achilles' son, Neoptolemus; 2) that the bows and arrows of Hercules, at that time in the possession of Philoctetes, who had been abandoned by the Greeks in Lemnos, were necessary for the taking of Troy; 3) that only Helenus, a son of Priam, could tell them what protected Troy and therefore he should be captured; and 4) that Troy could not be taken by direct siege but must be captured by stratagem. This last led to the ruse of the Wooden Horse, and some say Calchas was one of those who entered the city in it. After the taking of Troy he told the Greeks to spare Aeneas because it was his destiny to found a new nation in Italy. He prophesied that Astyanax, young son of Hector, would grow up and raise an army which he would lead against the Greeks if he were spared. Astyanax was slain. He said that Polyxena, daughter of Priam, must be sacrificed on Achilles' tomb; otherwise Achilles' shade, wrathful that he had not been duly honored, would raise great storms and prevent the Greeks from returning home. When the Greeks left Troy, he was forewarned by his prophetic powers of the disasters that would overtake them at sea. He therefore went by land to Colophon. It had been prophesied that Calchas would die when he met a seer wiser than himself. In Colophon or Clarus, he met Mopsus, a son of Apollo and Manto. Calchas challenged him to give the number of figs growing on a tree nearby. Mopsus answered that there were 10,000 figs, plus one bushel, plus one fig left over. When the tree was stripped and the figs counted, Mopsus was found to be correct. He then challenged Calchas to say how many pigs a sow that was about to farrow would produce. Calchas looked at the sow and said there would be eight male piglets, born within nine days. Mopsus disagreed. There would be three piglets, he said, only one a male, and they would be born the next day at noon. Again Mopsus proved correct and Calchas, having met a seer wiser than himself, died of a broken heart and was buried at Notium. But some say he committed suicide on account of the injury done his pride.

Caletor (ka-lē'tôr). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Clytius. He was a cousin of Hector, a descendant of Dardanus, Ilus, and Tros. He was slain by Telamonian Ajax as he attempted to set fire to the Greek ships in the Trojan War.

Caligula (ka-lig'ū-lā). [Original name, Caius

Julius Caesar Germanicus.] The third emperor of Rome (37–41 A.D.); born at Antium, Italy, Aug. 31, 12 A.D.; killed at Rome, Jan. 24, 41 A.D. He was the youngest son of Germanicus and Agrippina the Elder. As a child he was a great pet with his father's troops and wore a miniature uniform of the private soldier, even including the half-boot (caliga), whence the name Caligula, "Little Boot," given him by the soldiers. His popularity with the troops was such that when they rioted on hearing of the death of Augustus, the threat to remove Caligula to safety calmed them. He accompanied his father on his expedition to the East (18 A.D.), and after the death of Germanicus (19 A.D.), lived at Rome with his mother until she was banished (29 A.D.) by Tiberius, after which he lived with his grandmother Livia. At the age of 19 he went to Capreae at the request of Tiberius. There he behaved with such obsequiousness that he escaped the fate of his relatives, most of whom had been murdered by Tiberius. He refused to be tricked into making any complaint against the emperor, either in behalf of his relatives or on any other grounds, and in general behaved so slavishly that it was said of him, "Never was there a better slave, or a worse master." It is said that his unnatural obsession with brutality and his addiction to scandalous living manifested themselves early. Tiberius is said to have remarked of him, "I am nursing a viper in Rome's bosom. I am rearing a Phaëthon who will mishandle the fiery chariot of the sun and burn up the world." He succeeded Tiberius (37 A.D.), whose death he had caused or accelerated. Some say he caused Tiberius to be poisoned, and that before the emperor died, an attempt was made to remove the imperial ring from his finger. Tiberius would not let it go and he was smothered with a pillow. When Caligula became emperor, he was warmly regarded by the Romans, who had adored his father Germanicus. The Senate gave him absolute power and ignored Tiberius' will, by which his other grandson, Tiberius Gemellus, was named coheir. The Romans were so pleased at the accession of Caligula that, so it is said, 160,000 victims were sacrificed in thanksgiving. Among his first acts was to give the funeral oration in honor of Tiberius, shedding copious tears as he did so, and to give him a splendid funeral. He then recovered the bones of his mother and his brother Nero and returned them to Rome with great solemnity in proof of his devotion. He awarded honors in memory of his father and gave his grandmother Antonia—whose death he afterward hastened by his indifference and cruelty—all the honors once awarded to Livia, and, at first, he demanded that his sisters, Agrippina, Drusilla, and Livilla, be honored in Rome as himself. He recalled political exiles, dismissed long-standing criminal charges, published the imperial budget, restored the authority of the magistrates, carried out the bequests in Tiberius' will, and performed many other acts which won him great popularity. So great was the initial enthusiasm for him that the festival of Parilia, which commemorated the birth of Rome, was changed to the day when he became emperor, as if Rome had been born again. Among his public works was the completion of the Temple of Augustus and Pompey's Theater, begun by Tiberius, the commencement of an aqueduct to bring water to Rome, the rebuilding of the walls and temples of Syracuse, and the completion of the Temple of Didymæan Apollo at Ephesus. He ardently wished to cut a canal through the Isthmus of Corinth, but the project was abandoned. He was consul four times, in 37, 39, 40, and 41 A.D.

The moderation with which his reign began did not last long. Suetonius says he had suffered from epilepsy as a child, and that this caused mental as well as physical illness and perhaps accounts for his cruelty and his profligacy. He soon gave up the pretense that he was the ruler of a republic. Not only did he wish to be regarded as emperor; he wished to be treated as a god. He sent for the most famous statues of the Greek gods, including that of Zeus at Olympia, had their heads removed and his own head put in their places. He established a shrine to himself with priests, costly sacrifices, and a life-sized golden image. His reign was marked by wholesale killings of extreme brutality and by personal licentiousness little short of madness. On every occasion he showed his contempt for the people, and is said once to have exclaimed in a fit of vexation, "Would that the Roman people had only one head!" with the clear implication that this would considerably simplify their beheading. He was not content merely with the extermination of his enemies, real or imagined, but wanted them slain in the most cruel and lingering fashion. "Make him feel that he is dying," was a frequent order with him. He built a marble stable and an ivory manger for his horse Incitatus, and had the stable furnished with luxurious appointments for the occasions when guests had been invited in the name of Incitatus. Some say he planned to make the horse a consul. He made a fruitless expedition into Gaul in 40 A.D., and advanced to the English Channel where he ordered his men to pick up sea shells as spoils of the sea for Rome. On his return he demanded a triumph, but it was postponed. His extravagance, licentiousness, and savageries had the expected results. Plots against his life were discovered. There were omens that his life was drawing to a close. One was that when his men were preparing to move the statue of Olympian Zeus from the temple at Olympia, the statue burst into a roar of laughter and frightened the workmen away. An oracle warned him to "beware of Cassius." Thinking the governor of Asia was meant, he ordered the murder of Cassius Longinus. On Jan. 24, 41 A.D., as he left the Palatine Games to go for luncheon, he was set upon by Cassius Chaerea, tribune of a praetorian cohort, and murdered in the passageway that led from the theater he had just left. Cassius, so some say, asked him the password, and when he replied, "Jupiter," Cassius shouted "So be it!" and plunged his dagger into Caligula's throat. Caligula had married Junia Claudilla, daughter of a senator. She died in childbirth. He is said to have had incestuous relations with his sisters, one of whom, Drusilla, he treated publicly as his wife. Many other women had suffered his attentions. Some say he loved best Caesonia, who was wildly extravagant and notoriously promiscuous. She seemed to love him too, and he threatened to torture her to find out why she loved him. After Caesonia had borne him a daughter, Julia Drusilla, Caligula married her. Both Caesonia and Julia Drusilla were murdered following his own murder.

Callaeschrus (ka-lēs'krus). Sixth century B.C. Greek architect, associated with Antistates, Antimachides, and Porinus in preparing the original plans for the Olympieum, the colossal temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens projected by the Pisistratids. (JJ)

Callantianus (ka-lan-shi-ā'nus). See Caecilius.
Callias (kal'i-as). Athenian statesman, 5th century B.C. He is known to have fought in the battle of Marathon (490 B.C.). A member of one of the oldest Attic families, he was in his time the wealthiest citizen of Athens. It seems certain that he undertook an embassy to Artaxerxes I of Persia in 449 B.C. and secured that monarch's promise to refrain from attacks upon the Delian League and from sending Persian war vessels into Greek waters, in return for Athenian acceptance of Persian hegemony in Asia Minor. Many authorities, however, doubt that there ever was a "Treaty of Callias" in the form of a written agreement of this sort, and the story that upon his return to Athens he was accused of treason and fined 50 talents is also open to doubt. The agreement, however formal or informal, was beneficial to the cities of the Delian League, for it freed them from Persian interference for several decades. The "Treaty of Callias" is sometimes referred to as the "Peace of Callias," by confusion with a pact proposed many years later and in very different circumstances by another Callias, the grandson of the Callias here referred to.

Callias. Athenian soldier (died 370 B.C.) and leading citizen; grandson of Callias (5th century B.C.). A wealthy man, he was ridiculed in some of the plays of Aristophanes for his profligacy and ostentation. In 392 B.C., he commanded the Athenian hoplites in the victory over Sparta at Corinth. His name is associated with the so-called Peace of Callias, which was a proposal put forward by him at a conference in Sparta (371 B.C.). This, however, was disrupted by a quarrel between Sparta and Thebes. Callias was a friend of Xenophon and of Plato.

Callias, Peace of. Peace concluded at Sparta in 371 B.C., between Athens and Sparta, including their allies, from which, however, Thebes was excluded. It took its name from

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, Callias, one of the Athenian envoys, prominent in the conferences.

Callichorus (ka-lik'ō-rus). A river of Paphlagonia, the river of fair dances. It was so named because Dionysus, on his way back from India, held dances and revels in a cave nearby.

Callicrates (ka-lik'ra-tēz). Athenian architect and sculptor of the 5th century B.C. His great claim to fame is that he was the collaborator of Ictinus in designing the Parthenon on the Acropolis of Athens. He is also known to have designed the much-admired small marble temple of Athena Nike on the Acropolis near the Propylaea, which was completed c424 B.C.

Callicratidas (ka'li-krat'i-das). Spartan admiral; killed in battle, 406 B.C. He was named navarch (admiral) in 406 B.C. to succeed Lysander, whose one-year term was up. Some say that out of enmity to him Lysander purposely sowed disaffection among the men of the fleet. At first Callicratidas was successful: the Spartan fleet took the fortified place of Delphinium on the island of Chios and the town of Methymna in Lesbos, and blockaded part of the Athenian fleet at Mytilene. Callicratidas left part of his fleet to maintain the blockade and sailed to Arginusae, a group of small islands south of Lesbos, to engage the remainder of the Athenian fleet. A great battle was fought at Arginusae (406 B.C.). Callicratidas was slain and the Athenians were victorious.

Callidice (ka-lid'i-sē). In Greek legend, a queen in Thesprotia. According to some accounts, Odysseus, after his return to Ithaca, sought to appease Poseidon by going to a land whose people had never heard of the sea and there making sacrifices to the god. He went to Thesprotia where he married Callidice and became king. She bore him a son Polypoetes. After the death of Callidice Odysseus gave the throne to Polypoetes and returned to Ithaca.

Callimachus (ka-lim'a-kus). Greek sculptor, active toward the end of the 5th century B.C. He is credited with having originated the Corinthian capital, and with having been first to use the running drill for imitating the deep folds of drapery in statues. He made a golden lamp for the image of Athena on the Acropolis, and over the lamp he placed a bronze palm to draw off the smoke. He claimed to be the first to drill holes through stones, some say, and for the excessive elaboration of his techniques was given the title "Enfeebler of his Art."

Callimachus. Greek grammarian, critic, and poet. He was born at Cyrene, in North Africa, probably in the early part of the 3rd century B.C., and died at Alexandria c240 B.C. He was one of the first five of the great librarians of the Library at Alexandria, an office he held until his death. One of his great services to literature was the arranging and cataloguing of the numerous writings that had been collected there. The result of this labor was the Pinakes, or Tablets, an annotated catalogue of books which can be regarded as a literary history. He is said to have produced some 800 works, few of which are extant, and was one of the most influential personalities in literature between the times of Plato and Cicero. Eratosthenes, Aristophanes of Byzantium, and Apollonius of Rhodes were among his pupils. Instead of attempting to write epics in the manner of Homer and Hesiod, he advocated and wrote short, polished poems, as artificial and perfect in their limited scope as the epics of Homer were simple, sweeping, and moving. The emphasis of Callimachus was on learning artistically expressed in poems that represented the tastes of his own age. Fragments of his work which survive bear abundant witness to his learning. The polished verses give small evidence of poetic genius. Apollonius of Rhodes was no slavish follower of his master, and quarreled with him. The influence of Callimachus was largely responsible, Apollonius thought, for the failure of his epic, The Argonautica, in Alexandria. He went to Rhodes where a second version was very favorably received. Later ages have found the work of his rival Apollonius more interesting in its simple, honest story-telling and moving imagery than the cold, pedantic writings of Callimachus. He was greatly admired and imitated by the Romans, Ovid and Catullus, among others, having used the poems of Callimachus as models on occasion.

Callinus (ka-li'nus). Greek elegiac poet of Ephesus, who flourished early in the 7th century B.C. He is the oldest known writer (and sometimes considered the originator) of elegiacs. His poems were war-songs concerning the wars of the Cimmerians against Magnesia. There is extant one long fragment, attributed to Callinus, which is a patriotic exhortation to the young men of his age.

Calliope (ka-lī'ō-pē). In Greek mythology, one of the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne. She is the chief of the Muses, the Muse of epic or heroic poetry, and her attributes are a scroll and stylus. Calliope was the mother of Orpheus by Oeagrus, a king in Thrace, and is sometimes said also to have been the mother of the poet Linus and of the Thracian Rhesus who went to the aid of Hector in the Trojan War. In a dispute between Aphrodite and Persephone over possession of Adonis, Calliope decided that Adonis' year should be divided into three parts: one third to be spent with Aphrodite, one third with Persephone, and one third by himself. See Muses.

Callipolis (ka-lip'ō-lis). In Greek legend, a son of Alcaeus, king of Megara. His older brother, Ischepolis, went to help Meleager capture the Calydonian boar, and was slain in the hunt. Callipolis, who was the first to hear the news, rushed to the Acropolis where Alcaeus was preparing to sacrifice to Apollo, and knocked the logs from the sacrificial fire in token of mourning. Alcaeus, unaware of the death of his son Ischepolis, thought Callipolis had committed an impiety. He struck him on the head with one of the green logs from the sacrificial fire and killed him.

Callipolis. [Modern name, Gallipoli.] Seaport on a rocky island in the Gulf of Tarentum, connected with the mainland by a bridge, founded by Dorian colonists from Tarentum. It submitted to Rome in 266 B.C., but supported the Carthaginians in 214; passed finally to the Romans in 213 B.C. It was known to the Romans as Anxa.

Callipolis. [Modern names, Gelibolu, Gallipoli.] Seaport in the Chersonesus Thracica, on the Hellespont.

Callippus or Calippus (ka-lip'us). Greek astronomer, born at Cyzicus, Asia Minor; fl. in the 4th century B.C. He instituted the "Callippic" cycle of 76 years, formed by quadrupling the Metonic cycle (19 years) and subtracting one day.

Callirrhoe (ka-lir'ō-ē). In legend, a daughter of Scamander, the god of the great river of Troy. She was the wife of Tros and the mother of Cleopatra, Ilus the Younger, Assaracus and Ganymede. She was an ancestor of Aeneas.

Callirrhoe. In Greek legend, a daughter of the river-god Achelous. She married Alcmaeon, who had abandoned Arsinoë, daughter of King Phegeus, for her, and bore Alcmaeon two sons, Acarnan and Amphoterus. Later she asked Alcmaeon to secure the robe and peplus of Harmonia, which were in the possession of Arsinoë, for her. When he attempted to do so Phegeus learned that Alcmaeon was now married to Callirrhoe. Phegeus, angry at the insult to his daughter, ordered his sons to kill Alcmaeon. When Callirrhoe learned of his death, she prayed to the gods to cause her young sons to grow to manhood in a day's time so that they could avenge their father's death. The gods answered her prayer. Her sons came to manhood, found Phegeus and his sons and killed them.

Callirrhoe. According to legend, a maiden of Calydon who was loved by Coresus, a priest of Dionysus. She scorned his love and Coresus appealed to Dionysus. The god sent a plague of madness on the people, which the oracle said could be relieved only by the sacrifice of Callirrhoe. When preparations for sacrificing Callirrhoe were complete, Coresus, overcome by his love for her, killed himself in her place. When he was dead, Callirrhoe was stricken with remorse and killed herself, and presumably the plague was lifted.

Callirrhoe. Historic fountain at Athens, architecturally adorned and provided with conduits by Pisistratus; the use of its water was prescribed for ceremonial rites. From the earliest study of Athenian topography, this fountain has been identified with the copious spring flowing in the bed of the Ilissus, near the temple of Olympian Zeus. Wilhelm Dörpfeld, however, demonstrated the probability that this identification is incorrect, and that the fountain was in fact situated at the SW angle of the Areopagus, on the border of the Agora. Excavation has revealed a water conduit of the Pisistratid epoch ending at the site indicated, which accords with literary testimony.

Calliste (kə-lis'tē). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Fairest."

Calliste. The ancient name for the island of Thera, one of the Cyclades. It was said to have arisen from the sea when Euphemus the Argonaut cast into the sea a clod of earth that had been given to him as a gift by Triton. It became the home of the sons of Euphemus.

Callisthenes (kə-lis'thē-nēz). Greek philosopher and historian, born at Olynthus, Macedonia, c360 B.C.; died 327 B.C. He was a cousin and pupil of Aristotle, and was educated in the latter's household. He joined Alexander the Great in his campaigns in Asia, and sought to persuade Alexander to rebuild his native Olynthus (destroyed 348 B.C. by Philip II), as Philip had rebuilt and repopulated Stagira, Aristotle's city. Callisthenes would not abandon his austere and moralistic philosophy to curry favor with the young conqueror. He incurred his ill will by his criticism of Alexander's adoption of Oriental customs and by opposing the introduction of the practice of obeisance which was common in the presence of Oriental monarchs. Furthermore, he would not subscribe to the doctrine that "a king can do no wrong." Alexander became convinced, without any grounds, that Callisthenes was involved in a plot against him and had him executed in 327 B.C. This incident ended the friendship between Alexander and Aristotle. Callisthenes wrote a history of Alexander's campaigns in Asia up to the death of Darius III, fragments of which survive. In following years, other histories of Alexander appeared which falsely bore the name of Callisthenes and formed the basis of the popular romances written about the life of Alexander.

Callisto (kə-lis'tō). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Lycaon, a king of Arcadia who had been transformed into a wolf because of his wickedness. Zeus fell in love with Callisto and she bore him a son, Arcas. According to some accounts, Artemis was angry with Callisto, who had been one of her chaste companions, and transformed her into a bear. Others say it was Zeus who transformed her to save her from the wrath of Hera. When Arcas reached young manhood, he was hunting wild beasts in the forest, and seeing a bear, would have killed it, unaware that she was his mother. Zeus rescued Callisto by carrying her off in a whirlwind and translating her to the heavens, where she became the constellation Ursa Major (the Great Bear). Hera was jealous of the honor that had come to Callisto of being placed in the skies, and persuaded Poseidon to forbid Callisto ever to bathe in the sea. For this reason the Great Bear never sinks below the horizon.

Callistratus (kə-lis'tra-tus). Athenian actor who was active toward the end of the 5th century B.C. A friend of Aristophanes, the latter produced several of his pieces under the name of Callistratus, who was consequently proclaimed as the author. Although it was well known that Aristophanes wrote the plays, Callistratus, as the named author, trained the choruses and received the payment from the state for producing the plays.

Callistratus. Greek grammarian; fl. about the middle of the 2nd century B.C. He was the author of commentaries on the major poets of Greece, which were held in considerable repute by the ancients, but which are now lost.

Callynteria (kal-in-ter'i-a). One of the two principal days of a festival celebrated at Athens the 19th-25th of the month Thargelion (last of May and beginning of June). On this day the temple of Athena on the Acropolis was swept and garnished in preparation for the return of the sacred image and for the offering of the first fruits of the harvest to the goddess. The other of the two chief days was the Plynteria.

Calpe (kal'pē). A promontory on the southern coast of the Iberian peninsula, modern Gibraltar, opposite the ancient Abyla (the modern Jebel Musa at Ceuta). It is one of the pillars supposed to have been set by Heracles. See Pillars of Heracles.

Calpurnia (kal-pēr'ni-a). Daughter of Lucius Calpurnius Piso Caesoninus. She was the third and last wife of Julius Caesar. On the night before he was murdered, she dreamed that a temple-like gable dedicated in his honor fell from its place and was smashed, and that Caesar lay dying in her arms.

Calpurnius Siculus (kal-pér'ni-us sik'ū-lus), Titus. Latin pastoral poet who lived about the time of Nero. Seven eclogues and two fragments of bucolic poems are attributed to him. The panegyric, Laus Pisonis, formerly attributed to Calpurnius Siculus, is of uncertain authorship. Four other eclogues formerly regarded as his are now referred to Nemesianus, a poet once thought to be identical with Calpurnius.

Calvus (kal'vus), Caius Licinius Macer. Roman poet and forensic orator; born 82 B.C.; died 47 B.C.

Calyce (kal'i-sē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Aeolus, king of Magnesia in Thessaly, and Enarete. She was the mother of Endymion; according to some accounts, Zeus was the father of Endymion; others say Aëthlius was his father.

Calydon (kal'i-dŏn). In mythology, a son of Aetolus and grandson of Endymion. The city of Calydon, in Aetolia, was named for him. He was the father of Epicaste and Protogonia.

Calydon. In ancient geography, a city of Aetolia, in C Greece, situated near the river Evenus. It is the legendary scene of the hunt of the Calydonian boar (q. v.).

Calydonian Boar. A huge, savage boar sent by Artemis to ravage the land of Calydon in Aetolia because Oeneus, the king, had forgotten to sacrifice first fruits to her when he made offerings to the other gods and goddesses. The boar was wounded by Atalanta and killed by Meleager in a great hunt in which many of the legendary heroes of Greece participated.

Calymna (ka-lim'na). [Also: Kalymna; modern name, Kalimnos.] Dodecanese island in the Aegean Sea SW of Asia Minor, between the islands of Lerus and Cos. According to tradition, some of the Greek heroes returning from the Trojan War were shipwrecked on its rocky coasts. Those who survived founded a settlement there. Sculptured tombs found there indicate that the island was settled from early times. Area, 49 square miles.

Calypso (ka-lip'sō). A nymph who was, according to some accounts, the daughter of Oceanus and Thetis; others say Nereus or Atlas was her father. She lived in a tree-shrouded cavern on the island of Ogygia.

Odysseus drifted to her shores after losing all his ships and men as he attempted to return to Ithaca after the Trojan War. Calypso welcomed him warmly and offered him eternal youth and immortality if he would remain with her. As he had no means of leaving the island, he remained with her seven years and, some say, she bore him Latinus as well as the twins Nausithous and Nausinous. At the end of seven years Athena appealed to the gods on Olympus to allow Odysseus to return to his home. Zeus, taking advantage of the absence of Poseidon who was the enemy of Odysseus, commanded Hermes to go to Calypso and instruct her to provide Odysseus with whatever was needed for his journey. She bowed to the god's command, helped Odysseus to build a raft, furnished stores for his needs on the voyage, and sent him on his way, although she assured him that if he knew the troubles still in store for him, he would prefer to stay with her, notwithstanding the charms of his wife Penelope.

Camares (ka-mā'rēz). See Kamares.

Camarina (kam-a-rī'na). In ancient geography, a city on the S coast of Sicily, about 45 miles SW of Syracuse. It was founded by colonists from Syracuse (599 B.C.), was wrested from Syracuse by Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela (491 B.C.), razed to the ground and its inhabitants moved to Syracuse by Gelon of Syracuse (484), rebuilt, and then (405 B.C.) abandoned by its inhabitants at the instance of Dionysus the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, who betrayed it to Carthage.

Cambyes (I) (kam-bī'sēz). [Old Persian, Ka(m)bujiya.] Persian king whose historical character is doubtful. In the genealogy of Xerxes, as given by Herodotus, both he and his son Cyrus are omitted, and Diodorus, where he gives this name, seems to mean the father of Cyrus the Great. On the other hand, a Cambyes is mentioned whose sister was the ancestress in the fourth degree of one of the seven conspirators who put Darius on the throne. Possibly Cambyes I was one of the sons of Theispes (on the cuneiform monuments Chishpaish), and grandson of Achaemenes.

Cambyes II (or I). Persian ruler, c600 B.C.; the son and successor of Cyrus I, and the father of Cyrus II, called "Cyrus the Great." According to Herodotus he was merely a Persian nobleman. Astyages, king of the Medes, had a wondrous dream about his daughter Mandane which seemed to warn him that her son would dethrone him. He accordingly gave her not to a Median nobleman, but to Cambyes, a Persian nobleman of a conquered race. Their son, Cyrus the Great, did in fact dethrone Astyages. But Xenophon states that Cambyes was king of Persia, and his statement is confirmed by native records. In those chronologies which do not recognize the historically dubious Cambyes covered by the entry immediately preceding this one, he is shown as Cambyes I.

Cambyes III (or II). The son of Cyrus the Great and Cassandane. He succeeded Cyrus and reigned 529-521 B.C. According to some accounts, he suffered from the "sacred disease," epilepsy, and this accounted for his mad periods; others ascribed his eventual madness to the many impieties he committed. He conceived the idea of subjugating Egypt and prepared to march against that country (c525 B.C.), taking Ionian and Aeolian Greeks, vassals of his father, with him. Amasis was king of Egypt at the time. Having crossed the Arabian desert safely he mounted the attack. By this time Amasis had died; his successor was his son Psammenitus (Psammetichus). In the battle at Pelusium (525 B.C.) the Egyptians, after stubborn resistance, were forced to retreat. They retired to Memphis whither Cambyes pursued them, besieged the city, compelled its surrender, and incorporated Egypt in the Persian Empire. The Libyans bordering Egypt, the Cyreneans, and the Barcans surrendered to Cambyes without a struggle. He went to Saïs, ordered the body of Amasis to be brought to him, desecrated it, and finally ordered it burned. This was the most impious act he could commit, according to the laws of both the Persians and Egyptians, for the Persians looked upon fire as a god that they would not desecrate by burning bodies, whereas the Egyptians regarded fire as an animal which devours whatever it can. By his act of ordering the body of Amasis to be burned Cambyes set at naught the most deeply felt of the Egyptian religious convictions. He planned a conquest of Carthage, but gave it up when his Phoenician allies, the backbone of his fleet, refused to attack Carthage. He then set out, without proper provisioning for his forces, to conquer Ethiopia. On the way he detached a large body of his troops and sent them to attack the Ammonians, and to burn the oracle of Zeus there. Before he had proceeded one-fifth of the distance to Ethiopia the supplies for his army were exhausted. Nevertheless Cambyes, madman that he was, persisted in going on. It was only when he learned his men had resorted to cannibalism that he gave up his plan for the conquest of Ethiopia and returned to Egypt, having lost great numbers of his men through starvation, according to Herodotus. The troops which he had sent against the Ammonians never reached their destination and never returned to Egypt. Some say they were buried in a sandstorm.

Returned to Memphis, Cambyes committed many outrages against the Egyptians as well as against members of his own entourage. According to Herodotus, he opened the ancient tombs, insulted the images in the temples, went into the most sacred enclosures and burned the statues, and in every way outraged the religious laws and feelings of the Egyptians, to no purpose. While he was in Agbatana, in Syria, heralds reported that Smerdis had seized his throne in Persia. His instant reaction was that Prexaspes, whom he had ordered to slay Smerdis, had betrayed him and had not slain his brother. Prexaspes convinced him that the Smerdis who had seized the throne was an imposter. Cambyes determined to proceed at once to Susa and expose the false Smerdis. In leaping to his horse he pierced his thigh. The wound did not heal, and when he realized he was in Agbatana in Syria he recalled an old oracle that foretold his death in Agbatana. When he first heard the oracle he assumed that it meant Agbatana in Persia. Now he realized that his end had come. He called his chiefs before him, told them he was dying, revealed that his brother Smerdis had been slain at his command, and urged them with the threat of unending curses, to regain the throne for the Persians. Shortly thereafter he died (521 B.C.), having reigned about seven and a half years, and leaving no son to succeed him.

Camenae (kə-mē'nē). In Italian mythology, four prophetic divinities, identified by Roman poets with the Muses.

Camilla (kə-mil'ā). In Roman legend, a virgin warrior of the Volscian nation. She had been consecrated to Diana in her childhood owing to the following circumstances: Her father, Metabus, a tyrannous ruler, fled from Privernum, carrying his daughter with him. He was pursued and about to be overtaken when he came to a stream, the Amasenus River. He fastened the infant Camilla to his spear and, vowing to dedicate her to Diana if he was successful, hurled the spear carrying his daughter across the stream. He then jumped into the flood and swam across. Upon reaching safety with his child, he dedicated her to Diana as he had vowed. She grew up to be skilled in the arts of war, an expert horsewoman and, as she was devoted to Diana, an excellent archer. In the war that the Latins fought against Aeneas, she led a troop under the command of Turnus. When Aeneas besieged Latinus' capital, she commanded the cavalry and Turnus commanded the infantry. Fighting with one breast bared to give freedom to her bow arm, she was a merciless killer and slew many. But she fell at last to a spear hurled by Arruns. As she was dying, she sent word to Turnus to take her place in the defense of the city.

Camillus (kə-mil'us), Marcus Furius. [Called "The Second Founder of Rome."] Roman general and statesman; died 365 B.C. The traditional accounts of his career probably contain many embellishments to suit the purposes of various authors. In his early years he served with distinction in a war against the Aequi and Volscians (429 B.C.), in which he was wounded in the thigh by an enemy javelin, but he plucked it out and continued to fight. He was made censor and in this important post one of his acts was to compel bachelors to marry, for there were many widows in Rome as a result of the frequent wars. In 396 B.C. he was appointed tribune, and then dictator, to bring an end to the siege of Veii. The Romans had been besieging that Etruscan city for seven years, and were getting discouraged. He renewed their flagging spirits, vowed games to the gods, and promised to consecrate the temple of Mater Matuta if he was victorious. After defeating the Faliscans, he went to Veii, mined the walls, and took the city which he allowed his troops to plunder. As he stood on the citadel of Veii, he wept and prayed that if the gods must send a misfortune to balance the good fortune of the Romans in taking the city, such misfortune would fall on him personally and not on the Roman people. Finishing his prayer, he turned, stumbled, and fell. His associates were alarmed, but Camillus was delighted. The trifling inconvenience to him, he said, was the misfortune that balanced the good fortune of Rome. He resolved to carry the image of Juno in Veii to Rome, and prayed to her, inviting her to take up her abode in Rome. According to legend, the image replied softly that she was ready and willing to go to Rome. For his capture of Veii (c396 B.C.) he was honored with a triumph, but incurred the displeasure of the Romans by riding into the city in a chariot drawn by white horses, which no commander had ever done before, as white horses were used only to draw images of Jupiter. The ungrateful citizens were also angered because he, with other leading citizens, thought it would be harmful to Rome if half her people were removed to Veii, as they wished to do in order to relieve the overpopulation of Rome, and he opposed it. In addition, they were irate because he had not carried out his vow to give one-tenth of the plunder of Veii to Apollo. It was decided to make a golden bowl and dedicate it at Delphi, and when it was found that there was not enough gold in Rome for the purpose, the ladies of the leading families contributed their golden ornaments. In a war with the Falisci, Camillus was again tribune and laid siege to Falerii. The Falerians felt so secure within their walls that life was carried on as usual. A schoolmaster of Falerian boys resolved to betray the city. He led his charges outside the walls and into the camp of Camillus, where he presented them as hostages to the Romans. Camillus was incensed at the treachery. "War," he said, "is indeed a grievous thing, and is waged with much injustice and violence; but even war has certain laws which good and brave men will respect . . . the great general will wage war relying on his own native valor, not on the baseness of other men." So saying, he gave the Falerian schoolboys rods and ordered them to flog their schoolmaster back into the city. The Falerians were so struck with his honor in this instance that they surrendered to him. Camillus exacted an indemnity from the Falerians and made an alliance with them. His soldiers were disappointed because they were not allowed to plunder the city, and brought a charge of fraud against him, saying he had taken booty for himself. When he found that he could not be acquitted of the charge, he chose to go into exile (389 B.C.). On reaching the gates of Rome, he prayed that if he had been driven out unjustly, the Romans would quickly repent of it and express to the world their need of him.

His prayer was swiftly answered. The Gauls, under Brennus, attacked and defeated the Romans at Allia (389 B.C.). They marched on the city, which had been almost abandoned by the terrified Romans, plundered and burned it, and put all who were taken captive to the sword. Only a handful, under Marcus Manlius, resisted them successfully on the Capitol. Camillus, living in exile at Ardea, rallied the young men there. Brennus had divided his forces and sent half of them to ravage the country, while the others remained in Rome. Part of the barbarians were encamped outside the walls of Ardea. In the night Camillus led out the Ardeans and killed them in their camp while they slept. News of his victory came to the Romans, who were forced to remember and long for him. They named him dictator, but he would not accept the office until he was properly appointed by the citizens of Rome on the Capitol. This posed a great difficulty, since the Capitol was surrounded by the forces of Brennus. Pontius Cominius volunteered to go through the enemy lines to the Capitol to secure the appointment, and he was successful. Camillus collected a great force and prepared to free Rome. In the meantime, the citizens on the Capitol were suffering from lack of provisions; the Gauls were suffering from the unaccustomed heat and from disease. Brennus agreed to withdraw on receipt of 1000 pounds of gold. As the gold was being weighed out, Camillus entered with his forces. He took the gold from the scales and gave it to an aide, saying to Brennus that Rome was accustomed to deliver herself with iron, not with gold. He was dictator, he announced, and agreements made with any other were invalid. After a skirmish Brennus withdrew and made camp outside the city. The next day Camillus and his Romans, now full of courage, attacked and routed the forces of Brennus with great slaughter. Camillus was honored with a triumph, made sacrifices to the gods, purified the city, restored the temples, and raised a temple of Aius Locutius. He set the Romans to rebuilding the city, but they were discouraged by the overwhelming task, and talked again of Veii. They wished to occupy that city and abandon the ruins of Rome. Their clamor was so great that Camillus brought up the subject for debate in the Senate. In the silence before the vote was taken on whether or not Rome should be abandoned, the voice of a centurion outside the chamber was heard. He commanded the standard bearer of his squad to halt, "for this is the best place to settle down and stay." The senators interpreted this as divine intervention and all voted to stay in Rome. Now the Romans fell to rebuilding their city with new courage and hope. They built feverishly and without plan, so that the city was honeycombed with narrow lanes, crooked passages, and winding streets; nevertheless, the city was raised again within a year, and Camillus was named "The Second Founder of Rome." Before the city was completely restored, the Aequians, Volscians, and Latins rose against Rome. Camillus was appointed dictator again and defeated them. When he was quite an aged man, the Volscians rose against Rome again, and Camillus was made tribune for the sixth time, although he at first refused the post because of his age and ill health. He defeated the Volscians and returned to the city with great booty. He took Tusculum and gave its people Roman citizenship. Word now came that the Gauls were on the move. Camillus was again appointed dictator, although he was nearly 80 years old, and defeated them at Anio. Shortly thereafter, plague struck Rome.

Many citizens succumbed to it, including Camillus, but he was, as Plutarch says, "full ripe for death, if any man ever was, considering his years and the completeness of his life." In the time of Camillus the selection of consuls was changed so that thereafter one of them was chosen from the plebeians. Camillus himself, though he was tribune six times, dictator five times, and celebrated four triumphs, never served as consul.

Camirus (kə-mī'rus). In Greek mythology, a son of Cercaphus and Cydippe, and a grandson of Helius. Some say the town of this name on the island of Rhodes was named for him. Others say the town was built by the Telchines and named for one of the daughters of Danaus who died there on the flight from Egypt to Argos. According to Homer, Tlepolemus, son of Heracles founded the town.

Campagna di Roma (käm-pā'nyä dē rō'mä). Large plain in C Italy, surrounding Rome, lying between the Mediterranean Sea and the Sabine and Alban mountains. It corresponds in great part to the ancient Latium. It is of volcanic formation, and has been for centuries noted for its malarial climate, though in antiquity it was covered with villas and towns and was brought to a high state of cultivation. It has been largely reclaimed.

Campania (kam-pā'ni-ä). In ancient geography, a region in S Italy, lying between Latium on the NW, Samnium on the N and E, Lucania on the SE, and the Mediterranean Sea on the W. Its original inhabitants were probably of the Oscan or the Ausonian race; it was settled later by the Greeks, and submitted to Rome in 343 B.C. It contained the ancient cities of Cumae, Capua, Baiae, Puteoli, Herculaneum, and Pompeii. Ever since Roman times the region has contained numerous seaside resorts. Campania came to include Latium in early imperial times and the name was gradually restricted to Latium (see immediately preceding article).

Campaspe (kam-pas'pē). [Also: Pancaste, Pacate.] Favorite concubine of Alexander the Great. She is said to have been the model for the picture Venus Anadyomene of Apelles.

Campe (kam'pē). In Greek mythology, the aged jailer of Tartarus. She guarded the Hecatonchires and Cyclopes when Cronus cast them into Tartarus. Zeus slew her in order to get her keys and free the Cyclopes to help in his war against the Titans.

Campus Martius (kam'pus mär'shus). [Italian, Campo Marzio (käm'pō mär'tsyō); Eng. trans., "Field of Mars."] Historic area in ancient Rome, lying between the Pincian, Quirinal, and Capitoline hills and the Tiber River. Throughout the early history of Rome this plain remained free of buildings, and was used for popular assemblies and military exercises. During the reign of Augustus it had become encroached upon from the S by the building up of the Flaminian Meadows, and from the E by public and other buildings on the Via Cata, corresponding closely to the later Corso. Under Augustus, however, a great extent of the plain still remained free, and served for chariot races and horse races, ballplaying, and other athletic sports; it was surrounded by the finest monuments of the city, and presented an imposing spectacle. It is now occupied by one of the most important quarters of modern Rome, including the Pantheon and the parliament buildings.

Canace (kan'ä-sē) or Canache (kan'ä-kē). In Greek mythology, one of the six daughters of Aeolus and Enarete. She killed herself at the command of her father, after bearing a child to her brother Macareus.

Canachus (kan'ä-kus). Greek sculptor (6th century B.C.), of Sicyon in Achaea. Little is known of his work except that, according to Pausanias, he executed two famous statues of Apollo, one in bronze for the city of Miletus in Asia Minor, and one in cedar for Thebes. The former is represented on some of the coins of Miletus.

Canathus (kan'a-thus). A spring near Argos where, according to some accounts, Hera bathed regularly to renew her virginity.

Cancer (kan'sér). A constellation and also a sign of the zodiac. It shows the limits of the sun's course northward in summer; hence, the sign of the summer solstice. It is represented in the form of a crab. According to the Greeks, Hera sent a huge crab to help the Hydra with many heads that Heracles was attempting to kill for Eurystheus. Heracles crushed the crab, and Hera rewarded it by translating it to the heavens, where it became the constellation Cancer.

Candaules (kan-dô'lēz) or Myrsilus (mēr-sī'lus). King of Lydia in the 8th or 7th century B.C. He was the last Heraclid king of that country. According to Herodotus, he compelled his aide and friend Gyges to spy on his beautiful wife. When she discovered that Gyges had watched her with Candaules' consent, she forced Gyges to murder Candaules, to marry her, and to succeed Candaules on the throne.

Candia (kan'di-a). See Heracleum.

Canens (kan'ēnz). In Roman mythology, reputed to have been a daughter of Janus. She was the wife of Picus, a king of Italy. When her husband disappeared while hunting boars (he was transformed into a woodpecker because he spurned the love of Circe), Canens sought him for six days and nights, then dissolved in tears and disappeared on the banks of the Tiber River at a spot which afterward bore her name.

Canidia (ka-nid'i-a). Neapolitan courtesan; fl. in the 2nd half of the 1st century B.C. She was loved by Horace. When she deserted him, he reviled her as a sorceress. Her real name is said by some authorities to have been Gratidia.

Caninefates (ka-nin-e-fā'tēz). [Also: Canninefates.] German tribe, first mentioned by Tacitus, on the North Sea, to the north of the Rhine delta, closely related to the Batavi, their neighbors on the south. The Caninefates were subjugated to the Romans by Tiberius, but took part in the rising of Civilis. With the Batavi they were originally a part of the Chatti. They were ultimately merged with the Salic Franks.

Canis Major (kā'nis mā'jor). The Great Dog, a constellation SE of Orion, and containing Sirius, the brightest star in the sky.

Canis Minor (mī'nor). The Little Dog, a small ancient constellation following Orion and S of Gemini. It contains the star Procyon, of the first magnitude.

Cannae (kan'ē). In ancient geography, a town in Apulia, Italy, situated S of the river Aufidus. Near here (and N of the river), Hannibal with a Carthaginian force of about 50,000 men virtually annihilated (216 B.C.) the Roman army of about 80,000–90,000 under Varro and Aemilius Paulus. It was one of the greatest military disasters ever suffered by the ancient Romans, and the site is still called locally the "Field of Blood" (Italian, Campo di Sangue). The Battle of Cannae remains even to this day of interest to military historians from the fact that it provides (with the earlier victory at Lake Trasimene) clear evidence of Hannibal's military genius. Carthaginian fortunes were at their peak after Cannae, but lack of support from Carthage made it impossible for Hannibal to press his advantage and led finally to the defeat (201 B.C.) of Carthage by Rome in the Second Punic War.

Canopic Mouth of the Nile (ka-nō'pik). In ancient geography, a branch of the Nile River, NE Africa, the westernmost of the important mouths.

Canopus (ka-nō'pus). [Also: Canobus.] In ancient geography, a seaport of Egypt, about 15 miles NE of Alexandria, on the Canopic Mouth of the Nile. It had considerable trade and wealth.

Cantharus (kan'thā-rus). [Also: Kantharos.] In ancient Greece, a wide-mouthed cup or vase, with a foot, and two handles rising above the rim. It was used especially for drinking wine.

Canthus (kan'thus). In Greek legend, an Argonaut from Euboea. He was slain in Libya, on the return from Colchis, by a shepherd whose sheep he was trying to steal for his comrades.

Capaneus (kap'a-nūs). In mythology, the son of Hipponous and the father of Sthenelus. He was an Argive chieftain, and marched against Thebes as one of the Seven against Thebes. As he climbed the wall of Thebes, he was struck by a thunderbolt because he had boasted that not Zeus himself could stop him. When his body was returned to his homeland for funeral honors, his wife Evadne, who had been watching from a rocky height, leaped down on to his funeral pyre and was consumed by the flames.

Caphaurus (ka-fô'rus). A Libyan. According to legend, he was a son of Amphithemis and a Tritonian nymph, and the grandson of Apollo and Acacallis. He slew the Argonaut, Canthus, in Libya, to prevent him from stealing his sheep.

Caphyae (ka-fî-ē). In ancient geography, a city in Arcadia. It was said to have been founded by fugitives from Aegeus of Athens. Cepheus, king of Arcadia at the time, received them kindly, and they founded this city whose name is a form of Cepheus in the Arcadian dialect. The people of Caphyae annually celebrated mysteries of Artemis on their mountain, Cnacalus, for which reason they called her Artemis Cnaclesia. The people of the town believed that Menelaus came here when he was collecting his army to go to Troy, and planted a plane tree beside a spring outside the walls of their city.

Capitoline Museum. One of the chief museums of antiquities of Rome. It was founded in 1471 by Pope Sixtus IV, who presented the papal collections to the Roman people, and designated the Capitol as the place where the art treasures of Rome should be preserved. The museum was greatly enriched by Popes Clement XII and Benedict XIV. The collections now occupy the palace on the left-hand side of the Piazza del Campidoglio, which was built in the 17th century from modified designs of Michelangelo. Among the most noted of the antiquities acquired by the Capitoline Museum are the colossal statue of Mars in armor, the Dying Gaul, the Satyr of Praxiteles, the Centaurs by Aristes and Papias, and the Capitoline Venus (after Praxiteles).

Capitolium (kap-i-tō'li-um), Capitol. 1) At Rome, one of the traditional seven hills, Rome's inner citadel, with two summits, sometimes distinguished as Arx et Capitolium, the northern summit being the arx or citadel proper, the southern the Capitolium, dominating from the west the Forum Romanum. On the arx stood the temple of Juno Moneta, on the Capitolium the ancient triple-cella temple to the Capitoline Triad of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, Juno, and Minerva, focus of Roman state worship. With its religious, political, and military associations, it was regarded as the historic center of Rome, symbol of Rome's greatness. It is also referred to as Mons Capitolinus or Capitoline Hill. In modern Rome, the name has been corrupted to Campidoglio; the Piazza del Campidoglio, designed by Michelangelo, approached from the west by a monumental stairway, occupies the saddle between the two peaks; it contains the Museo Capitolino or Capitoline Museum, the Palazzo del Senatore, the Palazzo dei Conservatori, the fine bronze equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius, other sculptures, milestones, etc.; near the site of the temple of Juno Moneta stands the church of S. Maria in Aracoeli; on the summit of the arx is the dazzling Victor Emmanuel Monument; on the southern summit, partly built over by the Palazzo Caffarelli, are the tufa foundations of the temple of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. 2) The term Capitolium was also applied to the triple-cella temple to the Capitoline Triad, Jupiter Optimus Maximus, Juno, and Minerva, alternatively known as the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, said to have been dedicated in the first year of the republic, 509 B.C., rebuilt after fires in 83 B.C., 69 A.D., and 80 A.D., repeatedly repaired and embellished, and systemically vandalized from the 5th century on. Only a few courses of the tufa foundations remain. 3) Outside of Rome, at first in Roman colonies and eventually elsewhere, the term capitolium was applied to a temple with three cellas, or with tripartite division indicated by chapels or niches, dedicated to the Capitoline Triad in emulation of Rome; examples at Ostia, Cosa, Minturnae, Pompeii, and elsewhere. (JJ)

Cappadocia (kap-ā-dō'shā). In ancient geography, a country in the E part of Asia Minor, lying W of the Euphrates, N of Cilicia, and E of Phrygia; in a wider sense, the territory in Asia Minor between the lower Halys and Euphrates rivers, and the Taurus mountains and Euxine Sea; an elevated tableland intersected by mountain chains. The inhabitants of this region were called Cappadocians by the Persians and Syrians by the Greeks of Herodotus' time. Before the rise of Persia the area was subject to the Medes.

It was invaded by Croesus and then came under the control of Persia under Cyrus. As warriors, the Cappadocians wore braided helmets, carried small shields, and fought with spears, javelins, and daggers. Under the Persians the area constituted two satrapies, afterward two independent kingdoms; they were Cappadocia on the Pontus, later called Pontus; and Cappadocia near the Taurus, called Great Cappadocia, the later Cappadocia in a narrower sense. In 17 A.D. Cappadocia became a Roman province. It had then only four cities, Mazaca, near Mount Argæus, the residence of the Cappadocian kings, later called Eusebia, and by the Romans Caesarea, the episcopal see of Saint Basil (modern Kayseri); Tyana; Garsaura, later called Archelais; and Ariarathea. Of its other cities, Samosata (Samsat), Myssa, and Nazianzus, the birthplaces or seats of celebrated ecclesiastics, are noteworthy.

Cappotas (ka-pō'tas). Epithet of Zeus. Orestes, driven mad and fleeing from the Furies, sat down on a rough stone near Gythium in Laconia, and there temporarily his madness left him. For this reason the stone was named Zeus Cappotas (Reliever).

Capreae (kap'rē-ē). [Modern name, Capri.] Island off the coast of Campania, S Italy, situated about 19 miles S of Neapolis. It was famous in antiquity for the beauty of its scenery and its caves, especially the Blue Grotto. It was used as a resort by Augustus, and the emperor Tiberius spent his last ten years on Capreae, communicating by letter with the Senate at Rome. Area, five square miles.

Capricorn (kap'ri-kōrn) or Capricornus (-kōr'-nus). The tenth sign of the zodiac—the Goat—which the sun enters about the 22nd of December, the winter solstice. Also, an ancient zodiacal constellation between Sagittarius and Aquarius, represented on ancient monuments by the figure of a goat, or a figure having the fore part like a goat and the hind part like a fish.

Capua (kap'ū-ā). Ancient city in Campania, Italy, about 17 miles N of Neapolis, famous for its wealth and luxury. It was founded by the Etruscans (c600 B.C.), was taken (c440 B.C.) by the Samnites, and came (c343 B.C.) under Roman rule. It opened (216 B.C.) its gates to Hannibal, whose army wintered there (216–215 B.C.). In 211 B.C. it was retaken by the Romans, and severely punished. It afterward flourished until sacked (456 A.D.) by Genseric. It was destroyed (840) by the Saracens, and its inhabitants colonized modern Capua. Its site is occupied by the village of Santa Maria di Capua Vetere. It contains the ruins of a triumphal arch and of a Roman amphitheater which dates from the early empire. The amphitheater was an imposing monument, much resembling the Roman Colosseum, and nearly as large. The axes of the outer ellipse are 557 and 458 feet; of the arena, 250 and 150 feet.

Capys (ka'pis). In mythology, a son of As-saracus, and a descendant of Dardanus, Tros and Ilus, the founders of the Trojan race. He was the father, by Themiste, of Anchises, and the grandfather of Aeneas. Anchises pointed out his shade to Aeneas when the latter visited Anchises in the Underworld.

Capys. In legend, a Trojan who mistrusted the Wooden Horse when it was first seen outside the walls of Troy, and advised that it be cast into the sea. When the city fell he accompanied Aeneas on his flight from Troy, and eventually became the founder of the city of Capua.

Car (kär). In mythology, a son of Phoroneus and the nymph Cerdo. His brothers were Pelasgus, Iasus, and Agenor. Some say he founded the city of Megara in Greece, and that the acropolis of the city was called Caria for him. Another Car, mentioned by Herodotus, was the brother of Lydus and Mysus. Three peoples of Asia—the Carians, Lydians, and Mysians—were named for these three brothers.

Carbo (kär'bō), Cnaeus Papirius. Roman plebeian leader, soldier, and consul; born c130 B.C.; died 82 B.C. A member of one of the most prominent of the plebeian families, Carbo vigorously supported Marius and fought in the Marian forces against Sulla. In 85 B.C. he became consul with Cinna and remained as sole consul after Cinna's murder. In 82 B.C. he checked Sulla near Clusium (modern Chiusi), but suffered disastrous defeat at the hands of Metellus Pius, one of Sulla's lieutenants, near Faventia (modern Faenza). Carbo fled abroad but was taken by Pompey on the island of Pantelleria near Sicily and was put to death.

Cardamyle (kär-dam'i-lē). A city of Laconia, on the Messenian Gulf. It had formerly belonged to Messenia. This was one of the "gift" cities which Agamemnon promised to Achilles if he would return to the battle and forget his quarrel with Agamemnon. Near here, according to some accounts, the Nereids came up from the sea to see Neoptolemus when he was on his way to Sparta to wed Hermione.

Cardea (kär'dē-ā). In Roman mythology, a household goddess. She was loved by Janus. In return for her favors he made her protectress of door hinges and gave her the power to prevent evil spirits from passing through doorways. She was thus a protectress of family life, and was especially the protectress of young children at night, when it was supposed that they were the most vulnerable to evil spirits that might suck their blood.

Cardia (kär'di-ā). In ancient geography, a city on the Thracian Chersonesus, founded by colonists from Miletus and Clazomenae.

Cardo and Decumanus (kär'dō, dek-ū-mā'nus). In Roman surveying, the cardo was a north-south line, crossing the decumanus, or west-east line, at right angles. The resulting + is the basis of all Roman land surveys and measurement, and becomes particularly important in city-planning and the laying-out of new settlements. The intersection of the streets corresponding to the principal cardo and principal decumanus was regarded as the center of the city, and minor cardines and decumani were marked out parallel to the principal ones, at regular intervals, to form a grid or checkerboard as large as required, extending where desired beyond the walls into the countryside. In practice, any north-south street may be called a cardo and any west-east street a decumanus. It is usually easy to distinguish the principal decumanus of a Roman city as at Ostia and Minturnae: it transects the city from gate to gate, forms the main through artery, and is bordered by important public buildings. Identification of the major cardo is not always so easy, unless the locations of north and south gates are known. It should be remarked that in the observation of the north-south line Roman surveyors were prone to err, the direction of the major cardo often varying considerably from true north. Lacking the compass, which had not been invented, the most reliable determination was the observation of the pole-star, Polaris, at night; perhaps observations made at night were not trusted by day.

The word cardo means "door-post," the timber extending above and below the door into lintel and threshold on which the door turned, and the north-south line represented by the cardo as surveyed was thought of as parallel to the cardo of the earth, the pole or axis, real or imaginary, on which the earth was believed to rotate in space. Surveys were carried out with the aid of a groma (Greek gnomon), a crude sort of transit which may be roughly described as consisting of two alidades fixed at right angles to each other. Roman surveyors' manuals, the Agrimensores, were illustrated with tantalizing diagrams of cardo-and-decumanus grids laid out with the groma, and in some manuscripts these diagrams have been preserved, but archaeology has still to confirm them by actual excavation. Caresus (kär-ē'sus). Named by Homer (Iliad), as one of the rivers in the Troad which Apollo and Poseidon diverted from its course to break down the Greek wall, after the war was over and the Greeks had sailed for home. See Rhesus, river.

Caria (kär'i-ā). In ancient geography, a division of Asia Minor, lying between Lydia on the N, Phrygia and Lycia on the E, and the Aegean Sea on the S and W. The Maeander (modern Menderes), a noted river,

flows through it. According to Herodotus, the Carians went to the mainland of Asia Minor from the islands, where they were formerly called Leleges and were subjects of King Minos of Crete. They were noted sailors and served brilliantly in the navies of Minos. They were the first to put crests on their helmets and devices on their shields, and they invented handles for shields, which were formerly worn suspended by straps around the necks of warriors. The Greeks borrowed these usages from the Carians. Herodotus says the Carians were driven from the islands by the Dorians and Ionians and settled on the mainland. The Ionians of the islands and of Asia Minor insisted that they were of pure stock, but in fact, says Herodotus, they were a mixture from the mainland of Greece. When they came among the Carians, they killed the men and forced marriage on the women; their descendants were thus inevitably of mixed race. The Carian women, compelled to marry the Ionians, vowed they would never sit at table with their husbands, or call them by name, because they had slain their fathers, sons, and husbands, and they handed this practice down to their daughters. But the Carians themselves, according to Herodotus, say they were aboriginal to the mainland and never bore any other name. They claimed they were named for Car, and showed a temple of Carian Zeus in which the Mysians and Lydians, brother races of the Carians as the descendants of Mysus and Lydus, had the right to worship along with the Carians, and no other people could worship in that temple. In the Trojan War the Carians were allies of Troy. In the time of recorded history, Caria became subject to Croesus and later to Cyrus, falling to the Persian forces without much of a fight. Under Darius Caria was part of the first of the 20 satrapies into which Darius divided his empire, and paid a tribute to him of 400 talents of silver annually. In the Ionian revolt against Persian domination the Carians fought valiantly but were subdued. They furnished 70 ships to the Persian navy in the Persian Wars. The chief cities of Caria were Miletus, Myus, Halicarnassus, and Priene. The area fell to Alexander the Great and was later incorporated by the Romans into the province of Asia (129 B.C.).

Carius (kār'i-us). Epithet of Zeus, from his temple at Mylassa in Caria. This temple was shared by the brother races—Carians, Lydians, and Mysians. Zeus Carius was also worshiped in Thessaly and Boeotia.

Carmania (kär-mā'ni-a). In ancient geography, a division of Ariana on the plateau of what is now Iran. It was a province of the Persian Empire, bounded on the N by Parthia, on the E by Drangiana and Gedrosia, on the S by what is now known as the Persian Gulf, and on the W by Persis and Media. Alexander the Great passed through it on his return from India (325 B.C.) and added it to his empire. Carmania occupied about the same area as the modern Iranian region of Kerman.

Carmanor (kär-mā'nôr). Legendary Cretan king who is said by some to have received Apollo and Artemis and to have purified them after they had slain the Python at Delphi. While he was at the house of Carmanor, Apollo fell in love with Acacallis, who later bore him a son. Carmanor was the father of Eubulus and Chrysothemis. The latter, a son, was said to have been a poet, and to have won the first victory at the Pythian Games with a hymn to Apollo.

Carne (kär'mē). In mythology, a daughter of Eubulus. She was the mother by Zeus of the Cretan goddess Britomartis.

Carmenta (kär-men'tä). In Roman mythology, one of the Camenae, fountain nymphs of Italy who could foretell the future and who were goddesses of healing as well. Her sister Roman divinities were Antevorta, Postvorta, and Egeria. Carmenta had a temple at the foot of the Capitoline Hill at Rome, and altars near the gate called after her. Some claim Carmenta was originally an Arcadian, named Nicostrate, who was given the name Carmenta because of her prophetic powers. This Carmenta was said to be the mother by Hermes of Evander, with whom she fled from Arcadia to Italy, where she gave her oracles, to Heracles among others. It is also said of her that she changed the 15 characters of the Greek alphabet, brought with her from Arcadia, to the Roman letters. Some say she was slain in very old age by her son, who then awarded her divine honors.

Carnea (kär-nē'a). Ancient Spartan festival

actor; up, lüte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ç as d or j, ş as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z as z or zh.

(observed also by some of the other Doric peoples), lasting nine days in the month of Karneios (a sacred month, approximating the modern August), held in honor of Apollo Carneus, in his aspect of god of flocks and fertility (Carneus probably being a more ancient fertility god assimilated to Apollo by the Dorians).

Carneades (kär-nē'a-dēz). Greek Skeptic philosopher and rhetorician; born at Cyrene, 213 B.C.; died 129 B.C. He was called the founder of the Third or New Academy. Holding a firm belief in the necessity for suspending judgment at all times, he advocated probability in its various degrees as the only truly practical basis for human action. Excavators have found in the Athenian Agora the base of a statue of him.

Carneus (kär-nē'us). Epithet of Apollo. Some say it was an epithet of the god in his role as protector of flocks and herds. Some say he was given this epithet because the Greeks in Troy cut down some cornel trees in a grove sacred to Apollo. The god was angry at the violation of his grove. To propitiate him, the Greeks made sacrifices and called him "Carneus" from the cornel trees.

Carnus (kär'nus). In Greek legend, an Acarnanian soothsayer. He came to the army that the sons of Aristomachus—Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus—had gathered at Naupactus for the invasion of the Peloponnesus. Carnus recited frenzied verses to them and they killed him, thinking he was a magician sent by the Peloponnesians to destroy them. In his anger at the death of his seer, Apollo caused the fleet the Heraclidae had assembled to be destroyed and the army was so afflicted by famine that it was disbanded. Temenus consulted the oracle and learned that these calamities resulted from the slaying of Carnus. He was told to banish the slayer for ten years and take the "Three-eyed One" for a guide. From this time forward the Dorians continued to offer sacrifices to Carnus to propitiate him. Some say Apollo's epithet, Carneus, under which he was especially worshiped by the Spartans, came from this incident.

Carnutes (kär-nū'tēz) or Carnuti (-tī) or Carnutae (-tē). Ancient tribe of central Gaul, living in the vicinity of what are now Orleans and Chartres, and involved (52–51 B.C.) in wars against Caesar. The Carnutes, who lived in an area distinguished for its forests, are considered the center of Druidic worship. Carpathus (kär'pā-thus). [Greek, Karpathos; Italian, Scarpanto; Turkish, Kerpe.] Island in the Aegean Sea, about 30 miles SW of Rhodes; one of the Dodecanese group. According to some accounts, it was here that Aristaeus caught Proteus and compelled him to tell him why it was that all of his bees had died. Proteus told him it was because Aristaeus had caused the death of Eurydice, wife of Orpheus. In ancient times the island was under the rule of Rhodes. Area, about 108 square miles; length, about 32 miles.

Carpo (kär'pō). A goddess of summer fruits. She was worshiped at Athens as one of the Horae.

Carpophorus (kär-pof'ō-rus). Epithet, meaning "Fruit-bringer." It was applied equally to Demeter and her daughter Persephone, called "The Maid."

Carrhae (kar'ē). [Also: Charran; modern name, Haran.] In ancient geography, a city of Mesopotamia, situated on the Bilichus River (Belikh), a small affluent of the Euphrates, about 23 miles SE of Urfa. It was the city named Haran in the Old Testament. Nearby was the scene of the defeat (53 B.C.) of Crassus by the Parthians, who killed him shortly thereafter while he was engaged in an interview with one of their satraps.

Carthage (kär'thāj). [Latin, Carthago; Phoenician, Karthadasht, meaning "New Town."] Ancient city and state in N Africa, situated on the Mediterranean, a few miles NE of modern Tunis, and not far from the ancient city of Utica. It was founded by Phoenicians about the middle of the 9th century B.C. (According to tradition, Dido founded the city, having bought as much land as could be circumscribed by a buffalo hide; this she cut in strips with which, laid end to end, she encircled a sizable piece of ground and on it built the citadel called Byrsa, from the Greek word "hide.") It was a great commercial and colonizing center as early as the 6th century B.C., and was one of the largest cities of antiquity. It had two harbors, a naval and a mercantile. Its first treaty with Rome was made in 509 B.C. It was defeated at Himera in Sicily in 480 B.C., but overthrew

Selinus and other Sicilian cities c400 B.C. It was the rival of Syracuse under Dionysius, Agathocles, and others. At the height of its power it had possessions in Sicily, Corsica, Sardinia, N Africa, and Spain. Its wars with Rome have the following dates: First Punic War, 264–241 B.C.; Second Punic War, 218–201 B.C.; Third Punic War, 149–146 B.C. It was recolonized as a Roman city by Caius Gracchus and successfully by Augustus c29 B.C., was taken by the Vandals in 439 A.D., and was retaken by Belisarius in 533. At present some cisterns, broken arches of an aqueduct, the Roman Catholic monastery of Saint Louis, and a museum mark the site of the former rival of Rome.

Carthaginian Wars (kär-thä-jin'i-an). See Punic Wars.

Carus (kär'us), Titus Lucretius. See Lucretius.

Carvilius (kär-vil'i-us), Spurius. Roman freedman, in the second half of the 3rd century B.C. He is noted as one of the first to open a public school at Rome (meaning here a school open to those members of the public who paid its fees rather than one supported by public funds). He is credited, by Plutarch and others, with having devised the letter G for the Roman alphabet. (The differentiation between C and G has also been attributed to Appius Claudius.) The need for this letter arose from the fact that C was employed ambiguously to denote both the sound of K (as in kin) and "hard G" (as in gap). Carvilius, by a slight modification of the sign for C, produced the G, and put it in the alphabetical place of the little-used Z (which was only restored, together with Y, in the time of Cicero, when they were placed at the end of the alphabet). But such spellings as Caius (abbreviated C.), Caia, and Cnaeus (abbreviated Cn.) persisted through the empire.

Carya (kar'i-a). In mythology, a Laconian maiden who was loved by Dionysus. When she died suddenly at Caryae, the god changed her into a walnut tree. Artemis brought the news of the death of Carya to the Laconians and they built a temple to her, Artemis Caryatis. It is from this temple that Caryatids, female statues that act as columns, get their name.

Caryae (kar'i-ē). A place in Laconia sacred to Artemis and the nymphs. Here Carya, daughter of a Laconian king died, and the Laconians had the news of her death from Artemis. The Laconians built a temple of Artemis, the columns of which were made in imitation of the dancing girls who performed at the annual festivals of Artemis. There was an image of Artemis Caryatis in the open. The dance the Spartan maidens performed at their annual festival was originally taught them by the Dioscuri. The name Caryae means "walnut trees," and was associated with Carya, the beloved of Dionysus, who was transformed into a walnut tree.

Caryatid (kar-i-at'id). See Caryatis.

Caryatis (kar-i-at'is). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Of the Walnut tree." Artemis received the name for bringing news of the death of Carya to the Laconians. They raised a temple of Artemis Caryatis in which female statues served as columns, hence the name "caryatid" by which such columns came to be known (especially those of the Erechtheum on the Acropolis in Athens).

Carystius (kə-ris'ti-us), Diocles. See Diocles Carystius.

Casca (kas'ka), Publius Servilius. Roman politician; died after 42 B.C. He was one of the conspirators against Caesar (44 B.C.), and was the first of them to strike Caesar with his dagger at the base of Pompey's statue in the Senate house.

Casilinum (kas-i-lī-num). An ancient name of Capua.

Casius (kā'si-us). [Also: Bargylus.] Ancient name of the mountainous region in Asia Minor S of Antioch. According to Greek mythology, here the monster Typhon overcame Zeus in his battle against the gods and cut the sinews of his hands and feet.

Caspiae Portae or Pylae (kas'pi-ē pōr'tē, pī'lē). [Also: Albanian Gates; Caspian Gates; Latin, Albaniae Pylae; Caucasiae Portae.] An old name of the defile of Derbent between the Caucasus and the Caspian Sea. It has long been a trade route.

Caspian Gates (kas'pi-an). See Caspiae Portae.

Caspium, Mare (kas'pi-um, mā'rē). [Also: Mare Hyrcanum; modern, Caspian Sea.] Salt inland sea N of Media and Hyrcania. Length, 760 miles; greatest width, about 270 miles; area 169,330 square miles; elevation at surface, 85 feet below sea level.

Cassander (ka-san'dër). King of Macedonia; born 358 B.C.; died 297 B.C. He was the eldest son of Antipater, who had been made regent of Macedonia while Alexander the Great was engaged on his Asiatic campaigns. Olympias, mother of Alexander, was constantly sending accusations against Antipater to her son. Cassander went to Babylonia to meet Alexander and defend his father. On the death of Antipater (319 B.C.), Cassander waged war on the successors of Alexander, especially on Polysperchon, who had been appointed regent of Macedonia by Antipater. Ptolemy Soter and Antigonus were in alliance with him, and most of the Greek states, including Athens, came under his dominion. He made an alliance with Eurydice, wife of Philip Arrhidaeus of Macedon, but Olympias soon had them slain. Cassander then marched against Olympias, compelled her to surrender at Pydna, and put her to death (316 B.C.). In 311 B.C. he was made regent for Alexander IV, the young son of Roxana and Alexander the Great. In the same or the following year, he had them both slain. After the battle of Ipsus (301 B.C.) and the death of Antigonus, he was recognized as king of Macedonia and ruler of Greece. He married Thessalonica, sister of Alexander the Great, restored Thebes, which had been destroyed by Alexander, changed the name of Therma to Thessalonica, and rebuilt Potidaea, which was thereafter known as Cassandrea.

Cassandra (ka-san'dra). In Greek legend, one of the 12 daughters of Priam, king of Troy. Her mother was Hecuba, and she was the twin of Helenus. According to some accounts, the children fell asleep in the temple while their parents were celebrating a festival of Apollo. Sacred serpents came and licked their ears as they slept, but on being discovered by Hecuba, who screamed in terror at the sight, the serpents glided away. However, because they had been ministered to by sacred serpents, from that time forth both children were endowed with the power of divination. Other accounts say that Apollo fell in love with Cassandra and promised to give her prophetic powers in return for her love. The god thereupon taught her the art of prophecy but Cassandra refused to carry out her end of the bargain. Apollo could not withdraw the gift he had given her, but in revenge he turned it into a curse by decreeing that although she would correctly foretell the future, no one would ever believe her. Her name has become synonymous for those prophets of doom whose warnings go unheeded until it is too late. The more accurately she predicted disaster, the more convinced her hearers were that she was mad. She predicted that if Paris carried out his intended voyage to Sparta he would bring ruin to Troy. Her father ignored her warnings and provided the fleet in which Paris subsequently abducted Helen. From the beginning of the Trojan War Cassandra incessantly prophesied that it would end in disaster. She was scorned and kept as a virtual prisoner so that the Trojans would not have to listen to her gloomy predictions. In appearance Cassandra, the fairest of Priam's daughters, was described as a rival of Aphrodite, and she had many suitors. Towards the end of the Trojan War, Priam promised her to Eurypylus, descendant of Heracles, in return for assistance in the defense of Troy, but he was killed. Cassandra protested violently against bringing into the city the Wooden Horse which had been left outside the walls of Troy by the Greeks. She said there were armed men in it and predicted that Troy would become dust, Priam and Polyxena would die, Hecuba would be metamorphosed into a dog, and she herself carried off into slavery. Priam rebuked her for her raving and the Horse was dragged into the city. The Trojans wreathed it with garlands and offered sacrifices. The sacrificial fires poured forth blood-red smoke and then fizzled out. The statues of the gods wept. Cassandra correctly interpreted these omens of disaster but no one heeded her. In desperation she tried to set the Horse afire, but was prevented from doing so by her countrymen. In the sack of Troy she sought refuge at the altar of Athena. There, according to some accounts, Ajax the Lesser seized her and violated her. Others say no such thing happened, and that this was a malicious lie spread by Odysseus, and indeed, Cassandra did not claim that Ajax had injured her. In the awarding of captives Cassandra was taken by Agamemnon as his concubine and, according to some, subsequently bore him twin sons. Before she left Troy, she promised to destroy her most bitter foes by her alliance with Agamemnon. In a spell of what seemed to be madness, she declared that Agamemnon had lost what he loved most—his wife and his children—and declared that the Greeks fought and died in foreign lands, while the Trojans had the glory of dying in defense of their homeland. She predicted the death of Agamemnon, the long wanderings of Odysseus, and her own death, and then left her mother to go off as a captive to Greece. On his arrival in Argos Agamemnon was royally acclaimed by Clytemnestra. Cassandra remained mute until the reunited pair entered the palace for the feast which Clytemnestra said she had prepared for her returning husband. Then Cassandra broke into frenzied speech. She cried out at the smell of blood that came from the palace; she expressed horror at the frightful deeds kinsmen were committing on kinsmen. In this she was saying that Clytemnestra was murdering Agamemnon, as was, in fact, the case. But the citizens who had come to the palace to welcome Agamemnon home listened compassionately, convinced that her sufferings had unhinged her mind, and made no effort to go to Agamemnon's assistance. However, when she alluded to the ghastly feast which Thyestes, uncle of Agamemnon, had made on the flesh of his own sons, and recalled his curse, they were filled with foreboding and uneasy wonder that one from so far away should know the horrible history of the House of Atreus. Again she spoke of the death of Agamemnon and foretold that one (Orestes) would some day come to avenge him. Then, knowing her own death to be at hand, she appealed to the gods to make it swift and entered the palace. There Clytemnestra, who had just murdered Agamemnon, set upon Cassandra and killed her. In the mêlée which followed the murders, the sons of Cassandra and Agamemnon were slain. Cassandra was known sometimes as Alexandra. Her character, with its tragic element of impotent wisdom, has been variously introduced into later literature.

Cassandra (kă-săn'dră). [Also: Kassandra, Pallene.] Westernmost peninsula of Chalcidice, NE Greece.

Cassandra, Gulf of. See Toronaicus, Sinus.

Cassandrea (kas-an-drē'a). The name Cassander gave to Potidaea, a Macedonian city, when he rebuilt it after its destruction. See Potidaea.

Cassiopea (kas'i-ō-pē'a) or Cassiopea (kas'i-e-) or Cassiope (kă-sī'ō-pē). In Greek legend, the wife of Cepheus, king of Joppa in Ethiopia, and the mother of Andromeda. Her boasts that she and her daughter were more beautiful than the Nereids angered Poseidon and he sent a sea monster to devastate the land. To appease Poseidon, Andromeda was offered to the monster in accordance with an oracle. She was saved by Perseus, however, and became his bride. Cassiopea was unwilling to have Perseus for a son-in-law, as she preferred Phineus, brother of Cepheus, in that role. At the wedding of Perseus and Andromeda she supported the cause of Phineus when he burst in on the festivities and attempted to seize Andromeda. Perseus turned Phineus and his other enemies, including Cepheus and Cassiopea, into stone by exhibiting the head of Medusa. Poseidon set the image of Cassiopea among the stars, but in such a way as to humiliate her, for at certain times of the year she appears hanging in the heavens upside down.

Cassiopea or Cassiepea. A circumpolar constellation, supposed to represent the wife of Cepheus seated in a chair and holding up both arms. It contains 30 stars brighter than the sixth magnitude, and is always found opposite the Great Bear on the other side of the pole-star. In this constellation there appeared in 1572 a temporary star brighter than Venus at its brightest.

Cassius Dionysius (kash'us dī-ō-nish'us). Greek writer on botany and materia medica; fl. c88 B.C. His works include a translation from Punic to Greek of the Carthaginian Mago's great treatise on agriculture (to which he added many Greek examples), a work on roots, and a reported illustrated pharmacopoeia.

Cassius Longinus (lon-jī'nus), Caius. Roman general and politician, who died near Philippi, Macedonia, 42 B.C. He was distinguished in the Parthian war of the period 53-51 B.C. A participant in the battle of Pharsalus, he was subsequently pardoned by Caesar. Nevertheless, in 44 B.C. he was one of the leading conspirators against Caesar. A commander in Syria and Asia (44-42 B.C.), he was defeated by Antony at Philippi in 42 B.C. and killed himself.

Cassius Longinus, Quintus. Roman politician; died 45 B.C. Although he was accused of corruption during his tenure of the quaestorship in Spain in 54 B.C., he became a tribune, and with his colleague in that office, Mark Antony, in 49 B.C. vetoed a decision of the Senate to order Julius Caesar to relinquish command of his army. When the Senate nevertheless persisted in its purpose, Cassius and Antony joined Caesar, who thereupon crossed the Rubicon and began the campaign which made him master of Rome. In 47 B.C. Cassius was given a command in Spain, and presently was faced with a rebellion which he was unable to handle, so that Caesar had to come to his rescue.

Cassius Parmensis (pār-men'sis), Caius. Roman poet, born at Parma in Italy (whence his surname). He was one of the conspirators against Julius Caesar. He fled to Athens where, by order of Octavian, c30 B.C., he was executed.

Cassius Viscellinus (vis-ē-lī'nus), Spurius. Roman reformer; died c485 B.C. There is little doubt that Spurius Cassius Viscellinus was a historic person, though so much legend has gathered about him as to give him an almost mythical character. He appears to have held the consulship several times, and is named as the negotiator in 493 B.C. of treaties between Rome and the cities of Latium. Trouble between the Roman patricians and the lower orders had long been festering because of the continual arrogation of public lands by the patricians. Cassius, while consul in 486 B.C., proposed a redistribution of lands, but the patricians accused him of courting popular support with the object of becoming king, and brought about his death in the following year.

Cassotis (kas'ō-tis). [Also: Kassotis.] Spring at Delphi on the slopes of the hill above the theater. According to some accounts, it was named for a nymph of Mount Parnassus. The waters of the spring were said to sink into the ground and flow into the shrine of the priestesses of Apollo who, on drinking of them, were then inspired to prophecy.

Castalia (kas-tā'li-ā, -tāl'yā). A fountain at the eastern foot of the deep gorge that separates the rocks known as the Phaedriades, on the slopes of Mount Parnassus, Greece. The fountain was sacred to the Muses and to Apollo. Its waters were said to have the power of inspiring those who drank of them. Some say the fountain was named for a native woman, or for a man named Castalius. Others say it was named for Castalia, a daughter of the river-god Achelous. They say the spring was given to Castalia by the river-god Cephissus. On certain days the people of Lilaea threw cakes into the waters of the Cephissus River on the other side of Mount Parnassus. These cakes were said to reappear in the fountain of Castalia. The fountain was sealed off by earthquakes for centuries and its site was lost. Ensuing earthquakes opened it up and caused its waters to flow again. The basin, to the west on a slope above Castalia, where rites were performed before pilgrims approached the sanctuary of Apollo, may still be seen with streams from the fountain trickling into it.

Castalides (kas-tal'i-dēz). A name for the Muses, derived from the fountain of Castalia on the slopes of Mount Parnassus, Greece. sacred to them.

Castel Sant' Angelo (än'jā-lō). [Also: Hadria-

neum, Moles Hadriani, Hadrian's Mole, Hadrian's Tomb.] The name by which the mausoleum of the emperor Hadrian, together with the medieval and renaissance fortifications which enclose it, on the right bank of the Tiber in Rome, are now known. Begun by Hadrian in 136 A.D., the mausoleum was completed in 139 A.D. by his successor Antoninus Pius, and used as a place of burial for all the emperors and members of their families from Hadrian to Caracalla. It was originally about 165 feet high, in the form of a cylinder c220 feet in diameter on a base c280 feet square, faced with marble revetment which has now almost entirely vanished, and decorated with columns, statues, and a cupola on which stood a quadriga with the emperor. Soon after 400 A.D. the tomb was converted to a fortress. It was said that in 590 A.D. Pope Gregory the Great, returning from a procession to pray for deliverance from a plague then raging, saw in the skies above the fortress the figure of the Archangel Michael sheathing his sword, a sign that the plague would shortly cease. In commemoration of this Pope Boniface IV built, c610 A.D., on the summit of the tomb a chapel of Sanctus Angelus inter Nubes, from which the modern name is derived. After the return of the papal court from Avignon to Rome in 1377 the popes established their residence at the Vatican, to which the Castel Sant' Angelo was connected by a covered passage. The bronze statue of the Archangel Michael sheathing his sword, which now stands on the summit, dates from 1752. In addition to its original tomb chambers and the apartments, tribunals, storerooms, and dungeons associated with the papal occupancy, the Castel Sant' Angelo now contains a museum of engineering. Castor (kas'tor). The twin brother of Polydeuces (Pollux). See Dioscuri.

Castores (kas-tôr'ez). A Roman name for the Dioscuri, Castor and Polydeuces (Pollux).

Castrum Inui (kas'trum īnō-i). "Fort of Inuus," a town in Latium near Antium and Ardea. It was a nameless site at the time when Aeneas visited his father in the Underworld. Anchises pointed out to him the shade of the man waiting to be born who would found the city.

Casuentus (kas-ū-en'tus). [Modern: Basento or Basiento.] River in S Italy which flows into the Gulf of Tarentum (now Taranto) near Metapontum about 27 miles SW of Tarentum.

Cataebates (kat-ē-bā'tēz). An epithet of Zeus, meaning "Descender," because he descends in the thunderbolt. The Greeks enclosed places that had been struck by lightning, as they considered such spots sacred.

Catamitus (kat-a-mī'tus). A Roman name for Ganymede, the pretty Trojan youth said to have been carried off to Olympus to be the gods' cup-bearer and Zeus' favorite, whence the disparaging term "catamite." (JJ)

Catana (kat'a-nā) or Catina (kat'i-nā). [Greek, Katane; modern, Catania.] City on the island of Sicily, situated on the Gulf of Catana on the E coast of the island. Founded by Greeks from Naxos in 729 B.C., the city lies in a very fertile plain at the foot of Mount Aetna, and because of its location and rich soil has often been contested. When the Athenians sent an expedition against Syracuse under the command of Alcibiades (415-413 B.C.), Catana was allied with Athens and served as a base for the Athenian fleet. In 404 B.C. Catana allied itself to the neighboring city of Leontini for protection against Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse. However, the city fell into the hands of Dionysius by treachery. Traitors, bribed by Dionysius, opened the gates of the city to his forces (403 B.C.); he plundered the city, rounded up its inhabitants and sold them into slavery, and gave what remained of the city to his Italian allies, the Campanians. In the First Punic War (264-241 B.C.), Catana was one of the first Sicilian cities to be taken by the Romans (263 B.C.), and later, from the time of Augustus, it became one of the first cities of Sicily as an ally of Rome. Remains of a theater, odeum, and amphitheater of Roman times have been found at the site.

Catania (kā-tā'nyā). See Catana.

Catharsius (ka-thār'si-us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Purifier." There was an altar of Zeus Catharsius at Olympia.

Catiline (kat'i-lin). [Full name, Lucius Sergius Catilina.] Roman politician and conspirator, born c108 B.C.; killed at Faesulae (now Fiesole), Italy, 62 B.C. He was of an old but impoverished patrician family. As a partisan of Sulla he rendered himself in-actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ḡ as d or j, š as s or sh, ṭ as t or ch, ḡ as z or zh.

famous by his complicity in the horrors of the proscription, destroying with his own hand his brother-in-law, Q. Caecilius. He was praetor in 68 B.C. and governor of Africa in 67 B.C. After an abortive attempt, in conjunction with P. Autronius, to murder the consuls-elect for 65 B.C., with a view to seizing power, and after an unsuccessful candidacy in the consular elections of 64 B.C., he organized a widespread conspiracy against the republic, whose object is said to have been the cancellation of debts, the proscription of the wealthy, and the distribution among the conspirators of all offices of honor and emolument. It was defeated by the vigilance and eloquence of Cicero, who was then consul. The rebellion having broken out in Etruria on Oct. 27, Cicero pronounced in the Senate on Nov. 8, his first oration against Catiline, which caused the latter to leave the city. On Nov. 9 Cicero delivered in the Forum his second Catilinian oration in which he acquainted the people with the events in the Senate and the departure of Catiline from Rome. On Dec. 3 documentary evidence of the conspiracy was obtained from an embassy of Allobroges, which had been tampered with by the Catilinians, and in the evening Cicero delivered in the Forum his third oration, in which he acquainted the people with the events of the day and the seizure of the conspirators remaining at Rome. On Dec. 5 Cicero delivered in the Senate his fourth oration, which was followed by the execution in prison of some of the conspirators. Meanwhile Catiline had assumed command of the revolutionary force, which amounted to about two legions, but was overtaken by the army of the Senate as he was attempting to escape into Gaul, and was defeated and slain in the battle which ensued.

Catina (kat'i-nā). A Latin name of Catana (q.v.).

Cato (kā'tō), Marcus Porcius. [Called Cato the Elder and Cato the Censor; surnamed Priscus.] Roman statesman, general, and writer, born at Tusculum, Italy, 234 B.C.; died 149 B.C. He was quaestor under Scipio in 204 B.C., served as consul in 195, served in Spain in 194 and against Antiochus in 191, was censor in 184, and was ambassador to Carthage in 157 or 153 B.C. He sought to restore the integrity of morals and the simplicity of manners prevalent in the early days of the Republic, his severity as a censor earning him the epithet "Censorius." The prosperity of Rome's old enemy Carthage led him to advocate a third Punic war. In his effort to initiate this war, for years he closed every speech in the Senate with the words, "Ceterum censeo Carthaginem esse delendam" ("Furthermore, I am of the opinion that Carthage ought to be destroyed."). He wrote voluminously; his De Agri Cultura survives, but of his historical Origines, in seven books, and his speeches, letters, and essays, only fragments have reached us.

Cato, Marcus Porcius. [Called Cato the Younger; surnamed Uticensis, meaning "Of Utica."] Roman patriot and Stoic philosopher; great-grandson of Marcus Porcius Cato (234-149 B.C.), born at Rome, 95 B.C.; committed suicide at Utica, North Africa, 46 B.C. He fought under Gellius Publicola against Spartacus in 72 B.C., served as military tribune in Macedonia in 67, and was quaestor in 65, tribune of the people in 62, and praetor in 54 B.C. He supported Cicero against the faction of Catiline, and sided with Pompey against Caesar on the outbreak of the civil war in 49 B.C. After the battle of Pharsalus he retired to Utica, where he put himself to death on receiving intelligence of the victory of Caesar at Thapsus. He had a reputation for scrupulous fairness and honor, and his death was considered noble and courageous.

Catreus (kā'trūs). In Greek legend, a son of Minos, king of Crete, and Pasiphaë. He was the father of three daughters, Aërope, who married Atreus and became the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus, Clymene, who married Nauplius and became the mother of Palamedes and Oeax, and Apemosyne. He had one son, Althaemenes, whom he dearly loved. An oracle predicted that he would die at the hands of one of his own children. To avoid being the instrument that would fulfill the oracle, Althaemenes and Apemosyne went into voluntary exile at Rhodes. Catreus, on discovering his daughter Aërope entertaining a lover, proposed to cast her into the sea. But as Catreus suspected both Aërope and Clymene of plotting against his life, he was instead persuaded to sell them as slaves to Nauplius on condition that they never return to Crete. Years later, Catreus went to Rhodes, seeking his beloved and pious son. He landed on Rhodes at night and in the darkness was mistaken for a pirate. Although he tried to explain who he was, the uproar drowned his voice. Althaemenes, rushing up and unaware of the stranger's identity, hurled a spear at him and killed him, thus fulfilling the oracle.

Catullus (kə-tul'us), Caius Valerius. Roman poet; born at Verona, Italy, c84 B.C.; died c54 B.C. Particularly effective in simple short lyric poems, he is ranked by many with Sappho and Shelley. Coming to Rome, he became acquainted with the most celebrated men of his day, including Julius Caesar (whom he attacked in his verses but to whom he later was reconciled), Cicero, Asinius Pollio, Cornelius Nepos, and Calvus. His love poems are addressed to Lesbia, whose real name, according to Apuleius, was Clodia, the beautiful and fascinating, as well as ambitious and unscrupulous, wife of Caecilius Metellus and sister of the demagogue Clodius, Cicero's enemy. The stormy love affair (which gave to some of the poems a bitterness not usually found in lyric verse) ended in unhappiness for Catullus. The extant poems number 116 (3 are considered spurious), and include lyrics, epigrams, elegies, and even a short epic ("epyllion") of 408 lines about the marriage of Peleus and Thetis. They fall into three groups: short lyrics, four longer poems (including two wedding hymns and the epic), and a group of epigrams and elegies. The themes of some of his most famous and charming poems are the death of Lesbia's pet sparrow, the "thousand kisses," the dinner invitation, the homecoming to Sirmio, the love of Acme and Septimius, the marriage of Torquatus, the death of a brother. The Attis, in galloping galliambics, is a metrical tour de force of extraordinary effectiveness. Catullus greatly influenced Horace in his Odes, Vergil in the Aeneid, Ovid and the other elegists, and the epigrammatist Martial.

Catulus (kat'ū-lus), Caius Lutatius. Roman general; fl. 3rd century B.C. He was chosen consul for the year 242 B.C. When he entered office, the First Punic War had been waged since 264 B.C. and the Senate, discouraged by numerous losses, had abandoned the war at sea. He obtained command of a fleet built by wealthy patriots at Rome, and in 241 B.C. gained the decisive victory at the Aegadian Islands which resulted in a treaty of peace favorable to Rome.

Catulus, Quintus Lutatius. Roman general; born c152 B.C.; died 87 B.C.; father of Quintus Lutatius Catulus (died 60 B.C.). He was consul with Marius in 102 B.C., and was associated with him in the victory over the Cimbri at Vercellae in 101 B.C. He joined Sulla in the civil war and, having in consequence been proscribed by Marius, he is said to have committed suicide in 87 B.C.

Catulus, Quintus Lutatius. Roman politician; died 60 B.C.; son of Quintus Lutatius Catulus (c152-87 B.C.). Consul in 78 B.C. and censor in 65 B.C., he was a strong supporter of Cicero against the conspiracy of Catiline in 63 B.C.

Caucasus (kô'kə-sus) Mountains. Mountain system between the Black and Caspian seas. On a crag in these mountains, according to legend, Prometheus was chained at the command of Zeus, and eagles daily gnawed at his liver. Heracles at last freed Prometheus, with the consent of Zeus. The mountains extend SE and NW and are often taken as the conventional boundary between Europe and Asia. There are numerous passes, some of them reaching an elevation of 10,000-11,000 feet. The glaciers rival those of the Alps, but lakes are almost entirely lacking. The mountains have been extremely important historically as a barrier to migrations. Length of the system, about 800 miles; greatest width, about 120 miles.

Caucon (kô'kon). According to tradition, a son of Lycaon, but others say Poseidon was his father. He brought the mysteries of the Great Goddess (Demeter) from Eleusis to Messenia. The Messenians sacrificed to him, but the chief seat of his worship was at Lepreus in Elis, a city built by his son.

Caudine Forks (kô'din). [Latin, Furculae Caudinae.] Two passes in the mountains of ancient Samnium, Italy, leading to an enclosed valley between Capua and Beneventum. Here the Romans under the consuls Spurius Postumius Albinus and T. Veturius were forced (321 B.C.) to surrender to the Samnites under Pontius. The Romans were forced to swear to a treaty of peace, and to give 600 Roman equites (knights) as hostages, while the whole Roman army was sent under the yoke (thus symbolizing their collective submission). Infuriated by this last humiliation, which was one of the worst ever accepted by a Roman military force, the Roman Senate refused to approve the treaty, and delivered the consuls to the Samnites, who refused to accept them.

Caulonia (kô-lô'ni-ă). In ancient geography, a city in Bruttii, S Italy, situated on a rocky elevation near the Mediterranean Sea. According to the Aeneid, Aeneas passed by Caulonia on his way to his destined homeland in Italy, and saw the temple of Juno there. The city was founded by Achaeans, perhaps from Croton or from Greece itself, in the 7th century B.C. It was captured by Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, in 389 B.C. He destroyed the city and gave its territory to the neighboring city of Locri. It was soon after restored, but was again taken by Pyrrhus, king of Epirus (c318-272 B.C.), and thereafter was almost abandoned. Excavations at the site have revealed remains dating from the 7th and 6th centuries B.C., and part of a temple of the 5th century B.C.

Caunians (kô'ni-anz). A people of Caunus in S Asia Minor south of Caria. Herodotus thought they were autochthonous but recorded that they themselves claimed to have come from Crete. Their language was similar to that of the Carians. According to Herodotus they decided they would no longer worship in the foreign temples that had been established for a long time among them, but would worship only their own ancient gods. The youths of the land armed themselves, and beating the air with their spears they marched to the frontiers, declaring that they were driving out the alien gods. The Caunians fell under the dominion of the Persians in the reign of Cyrus the Great.

Caunus (kô'nus). In legend, a son of Miletus of Caria and Cyaneë. He was the brother of Byblis, who fell in love with him. He rebuffed her advances and fled to Lycia when he became aware that she could not overcome her guilty love for him.

Cavo (kă'vô), Monte. [Also: Monte (or Mount) Albano.] Highest summit of the Alban Hills, situated about 13 miles SE of Rome. On it are the ruins of the temple of Jupiter Latiaris. Height, 3115 feet.

Caÿster (kă-is'tér). The river-god of the Caÿster River in Lydia. Some say he was the son of Achilles and the Amazon queen Penthesilea, and the father, by Derceta (the Syrian Aphrodite) of Semiramis of Babylon. Caÿster. [Also: Caÿstrus (kă-is'trus).] In ancient geography, a river in Lydia, Asia Minor, which flows into the Aegean Sea about 35 miles S by SE of Smyrna (Izmir); now called the Bayindir or, sometimes, the Little Menderes. The ancient city of Ephesus was near its mouth.

Cebes (sē'bēz). Greek philosopher; fl. at Thebes, Boeotia, in the 5th century B.C. He was a friend and pupil of Socrates; in Plato's Phaedo he is one of the interlocutors. Three works were ascribed to him, probably erroneously, one of which, Pinax, is a philosophical explanation of a table symbolically representing the dangers and vicissitudes of life.

Cebriones (seb-rī'ō-nēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a brother of Hector who became Hector's charioteer when the regular driver was slain by Teucer. He was the leader of a group who assaulted the Greek fortifications, and was later slain by Patroclus before the walls of Troy.

Cecropia (sē-krō'pi-ă). An ancient name for Attica, from the ancient king Cecrops.

Cecrops (sē'krops). In Greek mythology, a son of Gaea. He was a man in his upper parts and a serpent in his lower parts. He is said to have been the first king of Attica and the land was sometimes called Cecropia in his honor. It was Cecrops who divided Attica into the 12 demes. He also built temples and established the worship of the gods, especially Athena and Zeus. He established the custom of monogamy and abolished human sacrifices. Some say he also gave the people their institutions of burial and writing. By his wife Agrauros (or Aglauros) he was the father of three daughters, Agrauros II (or Aglauros), Herse, and Pandrosos. During his reign Athena and Poseidon struggled for control of Athens. Poseidon struck the rock of the Acropolis with his trident and salt water gushed out and formed a deep well. This was his gift to the people. (Some say a horse came forth when he struck the rock.) But Athena

gave the people the olive tree and Cecrops, who was to judge which gift was more valuable, according to some accounts, awarded the city to her. Others say the women, who outnumbered the men, voted to give Athena control of Athens. A second Cecrops was a son of Erechtheus, and was made king of Athens by his brother-in-law Xuthus, but his brothers quarreled over this decision and to save him Athena, disguised as a bird, carried him off under her wings to safety.

Cedalion (sē-dā'li-on). According to legend, one of the workers at the forge of Hephaestus on the island of Lemnos. He was seized by Orion, who had been blinded, and compelled to act as Orion's guide to farthest Ocean, where Orion's sight would be restored as the rays of Helios, rising from the sea, fell on his eyes.

Cedreatis (sed-rē-ā'tis). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Of the Cedar Tree." It was given to her because of an image of the goddess set in a cedar tree.

Cefalù (chā-fā-lō'). See Cephaloedium.

Celaenae (se-lē'nē). In ancient geography, an important and large city of Phrygia, situated at the source of both the Marsyas and Maeander rivers. Traditionally, Apollo flayed Marsyas here after he had beaten the latter in a musical contest. The city was the site of a royal residence in the time of Xerxes. The modern town on the ancient site is Dinar, Turkey.

Celaeno (se-lē'nō). A daughter of Pleione and Atlas; one of the Pleiades. By Poseidon she was the mother of Lycus and Nycteus, or, as some say, the mother of Lycus by Prometheus. With her sisters, her image was placed among the stars. See Pleiades.

Celaeno. In the Aeneid, one of the "bird-bodied, girl-faced" Harpies. She told Aeneas, when he landed in the Strophades, that famine would force him and his men to eat their tables before he would be able to build his walled town in Italy. The prophecy was fulfilled when Aeneas and his men ate the thin cakes made of meal on which their food was served when they landed in Italy.

Celer (sē'lēr), Quintus Caecilius Metellus. See Metellus Celer, Quintus Caecilius.

Celeus (sē'le-us). In Greek legend, a king of Eleusis whose wife and daughters, unaware of her true identity, offered hospitality to the goddess Demeter when she was searching for Persephone. Later, the goddess revealed herself and, at her command, Celeus helped to build a temple in her honor at Eleusis. In return he was initiated into the sacred rites and mysteries of Demeter by the goddess herself. See Demophoön and Triptolemus.

Celeuthea (sel-ū-thē'ā). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Lady of the Road." In gratitude to Athena for his success, Odysseus set up several sanctuaries of Athena Celeuthea along the road in Laconia on which he had raced for the hand of Penelope.

Cella (sel'ā). The room or chamber which formed the nucleus of an ancient Greek or Roman temple and contained the image of the deity, as distinguished from the additional rooms, porticoes, etc., often combined with the cella to form the complete temple.

Celsus (sel'sus), Aulus Cornelius. Roman writer; fl. in the first half of the 1st century A.D. He was the author of a comprehensive encyclopedia treating of farming, medicine, military art, oratory, jurisprudence, and philosophy. The medical part, the only one extant, is a fundamental source for the history of Alexandrian medicine, surpassed only by the works of Hippocrates and Galen. Celsus' attitude was one of moderation between empiricism and methodism; theory and practice to him were equally indispensable.

Cena Trimalchionis (sē'na trī-mal'ki-ō'nis). The longest episode in Petronius Arbiter's novel (which is commonly known as the Satyricon and was composed probably before 61 A.D.), this passage (discovered c1650 at Trau, Dalmatia) describes the Feast or Dinner-Party given by Trimalchio, a wealthy freedman, to a number of his fellow-freedmen and a group of educated but dissolute scholars (accompanied by one full and one assistant professor). A plethora of rich, frequently fantastically disguised viands is accompanied by musical and acrobatic performances. The host recites miserable doggerel and shows off both his wealth and his ludicrous pretensions to learning. All this satirizes the conspicuous bad taste of the newly-rich—criticism for which Petronius, actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

Nero's "Arbiter of Elegance," was particularly fitted. As host and guests grow more intoxicated, they swap riddles, anecdotes, stories of werewolves and witches, until the rising uproar finally alerts the fire brigade, and the feast ends. The Cena is remarkable not only because of its high literary merit as a thoroughly amusing piece of characterization, but also from the linguistic viewpoint. For the first time in Latin literature, educated and vulgar speech levels are clearly distinguished and reproduced. The spoken Latin of the lower classes (which had been banned from the literature of the classical period but had, of course, been vigorously alive all along) emerges from its underground existence to supply invaluable information on Roman slang, proverbs, everyday speech, and thereby on the eventual development of the Romance languages. See also, Petronius Arbiter, Satyricon, Trimalchio. (HS)

Cenaeum (sē-nē'um). A promontory on the northwestern tip of Euboea. It was here that Heracles prepared to sacrifice to Zeus and donned the shirt poisoned with the blood of Nessus which led to his death.

Cenchreae (seng'krē-ē). In ancient geography, the harbor of Corinth, named for Cenchrias, a child of Poseidon and Pirene. Nearby was a temple of Artemis, and in the town, a temple and stone image of Aphrodite. The region was sacred to Poseidon, and a mole running out into the sea was crowned by a bronze image of him. Opposite Cenchreae was a stream of warm salt water that flowed from a rock into the sea and was known as Helen's Bath. Near Cenchreae was the common grave of the Argives who conquered the Lacedaemonians at Hysiae in the 7th century B.C.

Cenchrias (seng-krī'as). In Greek mythology, a child of Pirene and Poseidon. He was unintentionally killed by Artemis and his mother's tears flowed unceasingly in her grief. She was changed into a fountain and the place where he died was named Cenchreae.

Cenomani (sen-ō-mā'nī). Celtic people, a part of the army of Bellovesus, which with his sanction crossed (c400 B.C.) the Alps under a legendary leader, Etitovius, and settled north of the Padus about Brixia (Brescia) and Verona, according to the detailed account of Livy. They were a branch of the Aulerci. Their original seat in Gaul, where they were called Aulerci Cenomani, was on the Sarthe River near what is now Le Mans. The Aulerci were included among the tribes constituting the Armorici.

Censor (sen'sor). One of two superior magistrates of ancient Rome, who in the latter half of the 5th century B.C. succeeded to certain powers which had before been exercised by the consuls. Their functions included—1) the keeping of a register (census) of all Roman citizens, with the amount of their property, for the purposes of taxation, and for the classification of the citizens according to their possessions, from the rank of senator down; 2) the disciplinary control of manners and morals, in which their power was absolute, both in sumptuary matters and in the degradation of any citizen from his proper class for reasons affecting the moral or material welfare of the state, or in the imposition of fines at will upon those deemed by them to be offenders; 3) the practical administration of the public finances, including the control under the Senate of both direct and indirect taxation, the determining of the expenditures of the state other than fixed charges, the letting of public contracts, and the supreme direction of public works. The magistracy of the censors was interrupted at the time of the civil wars, and under Augustus and succeeding emperors was reestablished at various times, but with greatly diminished powers.

Centaurs (sen'tôrz). In mythology, the descendants of Ixion and Nephele, a cloud-born woman. They dwelt in Thessaly and were conceived of as being half man and half horse. In general, they were wild and savage, more like beasts than men but some of them, notably Chiron, had close associations with men as friends and teachers. The centaurs were invited to the marriage of Pirithous, king of the Lapithae, and Hippodamia. There, inflamed by wine, they attacked the women, in particular, the bride. A fierce battle took place in which the Lapithae succeeded in driving off the cen-

taurs. On another occasion the centaurs, again maddened by the fumes of wine, attacked Heracles as he visited Pholus, one of their number, in a cave near Mount Pholoë. Nephele sent a violent rain to help her descendants. The centaurs, being four-footed, had an advantage over Heracles in the slippery mud. Nevertheless, Heracles slew many of them and drove the rest away. In later times the centaurs were thought of as peaceful followers of Dionysus and Eros. Centaurus (sen-tō'rus). In mythology, the son of Ixion and Nephele, a woman who was shaped from a cloud. By Magnesian mares he became the father of the centaurs. (See preceding article.)

Centaurus. An ancient southern constellation, situated between Argo and Scorpio, pictured to represent a centaur holding a Bacchic wand. Its brightest star is third brightest in the sky. Its second star is about as bright as Betelgeuse, and is reckoned the eleventh in the heavens in order of brightness. The two stars are situated near each other on the parallel of 60° S, a little E of the Southern Cross. Centaurus has, besides, two stars of the second magnitude and seven of the third. Alpha Centauri and Proxima Centauri, a faint star within the constellation, are thought to be the closest (4.3 light years) stars to our solar system.

Centimani (sen-ti-mā'nī). A Roman name for the hundred-handed monsters whom the Greeks called Hecatonchires: Briareus (also called Aegaeon), Cottus, and Gyges (or Gyes).

Centumcellae (sen'tim-sel'ē). Also: [Portus Trajani; modern name, Civitavecchia or Civita Vecchia.] In ancient geography, an Etruscan town in C Italy, situated on the Mediterranean Sea, NW of Rome. The port was constructed in the time of the emperor Trajan.

Centuripae (sen-tū'ri-pē). [Also: Centorbi; modern name, Centuripe.] In ancient geography, a very old Sicel city in Sicily, in the eastern half of the island near Mount Aetna. It was allied with Athens against Syracuse in the Peloponnesian Wars, and was later allied to Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, in his wars against the Carthaginians. It was an independent city up to the time of the First Punic War (264-241 B.C.). It flourished under the Romans, and a number of antiquities of this period are preserved.

Century. [Latin, Centuria.] In Roman antiquity: 1) A division of the people (originally so called, probably, with reference to the approximate number of its members, though there was no fixed limit), instituted by Servius Tullius, formed with reference to taxation and to the election of magistrates and enactment of laws. All the citizens were divided into classes, according to their wealth, and each of the classes was divided into from ten to 40 senior and junior centuries, according to age, in all 193 or 194. Each century had one vote in the comitia centuriata, the wealthier classes voting first and generally controlling the others. 2) A subdivision of the legion, corresponding to a modern military company of infantry, and consisting nominally of 100 men.

Ceos (sē'os). [Also: Keos, Kea, Tzia, Zea, Zia.] Island of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea about 13 miles SE of Attica. According to legend, the island suffered a terrible scorching drought which afflicted it because the murderers of Icarus had taken refuge there. On learning from the oracle at Delphi that he would find honor there, Aristaeus went to Ceos, offered sacrifices to Zeus, and by killing the murderers of Icarus appeased the Dog-Star (the faithful hound of Icarus which had been translated to the heavens), which was causing the drought. From that time on cooling winds, the Etesian winds, now annually strike the islands for 40 days. Ceos formerly contained four cities, and was the birthplace of the poets Simonides and Bacchylides. Area, about 65 square miles.

Cephalenia (sef-ə-lē'ni-ə). [Modern Cephalonia; also: Kefallinia, Kephallenia.] The largest of the Ionian Islands, W of Greece. Its surface is mountainous. Some say the island is the one called Same or Samos by Homer who, some think, meant this island as the center of the Kingdom of the Islands of which Odysseus was the ruler. There were four main cities there in ancient times: Cranii, Pale, Same, and Pronni. Remains of Cyclopean walls have been found at the sites of each of these cities. Tombs and graves of the Mycenaean period and the period of the Trojan War have revealed a rich store of vases and other objects that indicate a flourishing state of civilization from most ancient times. In later centuries, the 13th and 12th centuries B.C., rivals of Cephallenia—Mycenae, Thebes, Athens—waged war against her. According to legend, Amphitryon of Thebes, the foster father of Heracles, waged war on the Taphians and Teleboans, aided by Cephalus. Because of the assistance of the latter, Amphitryon awarded the island of his defeated enemies to Cephalus and its name was changed to Cephallenia in his honor. At the outbreak of the Peloponnesian War (431 B.C.), Cephallenia was allied to Corinth, but was forced to change its allegiance to Athens. It became subject to Rome in 189 B.C. Length of the island, 30 miles; area, about 300 square miles.

Cephaloedum (sef-ā-lē'di-um). [Modern name, Cefalù.] In ancient geography, a city on the N coast of the island of Sicily, situated at the foot of a headland over 1200 feet above sea level, from whence it derived its name (Greek, kephale, "head"). It was founded by the Sicels, one of the earliest tribes in the island and from whom the whole island ultimately took its name. The city was conquered by Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, c395 B.C., by the Romans in 254 B.C., and by the Saracens in 858 A.D. Among the ancient remains to be seen there are fortifications, a primitive sanctuary known as the "Temple of Diana," and a fine Norman church with superb Byzantine mosaics.

Cephalus (sef'ā-lus). According to some accounts of the legend, a son of Hermes and Herse, daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens. Others say he was a son of Deion. He was married to Procris, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and loved her deeply. One day while he was hunting, Eos saw him and fell in love with him. She carried him off, offering her love. Cephalus rejected her advances, saying he had sworn undying fidelity to Procris. Eos, the dawn-goddess, scoffed at his pledge and mocked his belief that Procris was equally faithful. To prove her contention, she transformed him into a handsome youth with the name Pteleon, and sent him back to Procris. In this guise he approached his wife, who was grieving for her lost husband, and finally persuaded her with rich gifts and ardent protestations of love to weaken and yield to him. Immediately he revealed himself, denounced her for infidelity, and deserted her. Later he met a handsome youth, Pterelas, who was the owner of a hound, Laelaps, that could not fail to catch its quarry, and of a spear that could not fail to reach its target. He offered Pterelas a large sum for these two marvellous aids to hunting, but was told that Pterelas would only give them up for love. Cephalus then offered his love. At this Pterelas threw off his disguise and was revealed as Procris. The couple was reconciled and Cephalus enjoyed many successful hunts with his hound and spear, and recovered his devotion to Procris. But Procris, who had not forgotten his absence with Eos, was jealous and thought when she overheard him calling for a breeze to cool him that he was calling a lover. She followed him and hid in a thicket to watch him. Cephalus' keen eye detected a slight movement of the bushes in which she was hidden, and thinking it was caused by a wild beast, hurled his spear. It went straight to the mark and transfixed Procris. Afterward, Cephalus was banished from Athens for murder. He went to Thebes, and loaned his hound to Amphitryon, foster father of Heracles, to catch the Teumessian fox that was ravaging the countryside. Since the fox, by decree of the gods, could not be caught, and the hound must catch its quarry, both were turned to stone by Zeus. Cephalus also helped Amphitryon in his war against the Taphians and Teleboans. In return for his aid he was awarded the island which was named Cephallenia in his honor. But he never recovered from the death of Procris, and blamed himself for the disguise which he had assumed to test her, as well as for her death. He built a temple to Apollo on Cape Leucas and one day went there and, calling his wife's name, leaped into the sea.

Cepheus (sē'fūs, -fē-us). In Greek legend, a son of King Belus and Anchinoë, and brother of the twins Danaus and Aegyptus. He was king of Joppa in Ethiopia and was the father of Andromeda by his wife Cassiopea. He was turned to stone when Perseus exhibited the head of Medusa. Poseidon set the image of Cepheus among the stars. See Andromeda.

Cepheus. In Greek mythology, a son of Aleus, king of Tegea in Arcadia, and the brother of Amphidamas. He went to Calydon and joined Meleager in the hunt for the Calydonian Boar, although he had at first refused to take part when he learned that Atalanta was also a member because he did not like to hunt with women. He was also one of the Argonauts who joined Jason on the expedition to Colchis in quest of the Golden Fleece. He became king of Tegea and, reluctantly, joined with Heracles when the latter waged a war to punish the sons of Hippocöon. Cepheus and 17 of his 20 sons fell in the war.

Cepheus. One of the northern constellations, recognized in ancient times, between Cassiopea and Draco. It is figured to represent the Ethiopian king Cepheus wearing a tiara and having his arms somewhat extended. Its brightest stars are of the third magnitude. The Cepheid variables, a class of stars varying in brightness because of internal pulsation, are called after one of the stars in this constellation.

Cephisodotus (sef-i-sod'ō-tus). Name of two Greek sculptors, often confused with each other, of the 4th century B.C. One was a relative, possibly the father or a brother, of Praxiteles, and something is known of his work from a copy, at Munich, of a statue of Pluto, or Wealth, as an infant in the arms of Irene, or Peace. The other Cephisodotus was a son of Praxiteles; it is known that he made portrait sculptures, but no examples of his work survive.

Cephisus (sē-fis'us). [Also: Cephisus, Kephisos.] In ancient geography, a river in Attica, Greece, flowing through the plain of Eleusis into the Gulf of Eleusis.

Cephisus. [Also: Cephisus, Kephisos.] In ancient geography, a river in Attica, Greece, flowing through the plain of Athens into the Saronic Gulf.

Cephisus. [Also: Cephisus, Kephisos.] In ancient geography, a river in Phocis and Boeotia, Greece, flowing into Lake Copais. This was the sacred river of the shrine of Delphi. Beside it was the shrine of Themis, where Deucalion and Pyrrha went after the great flood to pray to the gods, and where they learned how to repopulate the world.

Cer (sēr) or Ker (kēr). In Greek mythology, a goddess of violent death, according to some accounts, a daughter of Nyx, and the sister of the Moerae. There were several goddesses representing different sorts of death, and together they were called Ceres. They were described as hateful and dreaded because they carry man off to the hopeless halls of Hades. But it was thought that the Ceres were not entirely free agents; Zeus and the other gods could control them, and sometimes even men could do so. In battle the Ceres were accompanied by Eris, and wandered about in blood-stained garments, quarrelling among themselves over the wounded and the dead. Epidemic diseases were sometimes associated with them, and they came in time to be regarded as goddesses who punish men for their crimes. For this reason they came to be identified with the Erinyes.

Cerambus (sē-ram'bus). In Greek mythology, a man of Pelion who was changed into a beetle by the nymphs and flew to Mount Parnassus to escape the flood which Zeus sent to destroy mankind for its wickedness. This was the same flood from which Deucalion and Pyrrha were spared because of their piety.

Ceramicus (ser-a-mī'kus). Large area on the NW side of ancient Athens, Greece, so named from the early gathering in it of potters, attracted by the presence of water and excellent clay. It was divided into parts, the Inner Ceramicus, within the walls, traversed by the Dromos Street from the Dipylon Gate, and including the Agora; and the Outer Ceramicus, continuing the first division outside of the walls. The Outer Ceramicus became a favorite place of burial for the Athenians, and here were interred those honored with a public funeral. The tombs were ranged beside and near the various roads which radiated from the Dipylon Gate. Little trace of them remains, except of the unique group upon and near the inception of the Sacred Way to Eleusis, a group which was preserved by being buried in 86 B.C. in the siege agger (earthwork) of Sulla, and contains historical and plastic memorials of very high value, among them the sculptured monument of Dexileus, who fell (393 B.C.) before Corinth, and tombs of Euphrosyne, Hegeso, Aristion, Demetria, and Pamphile.

Ceramus (ser'a-mus). In Greek mythology, a son of Dionysus and Ariadne. According to some accounts, the district called the Ceramicus at Athens was named for him.

Ceraunii Montes (sē-rō'ni-i mon'tēz). [Also: Ceraunian Mountains; Acroceraunia or Acroceraunian Mountains.] In ancient geography, a chain of mountains in NW Epirus, terminating in the promontory Acroceraunia.

Ceraunian Mountains. In ancient geography, a range of mountains in the E part of the Caucasus system, exact position undetermined.

Cerberus (sēr'bér-us). In Greek mythology, the watchdog at the entrance to the Underworld, whose duty it was to devour the living who attempted to invade the infernal regions or the shades that attempted to escape from them. Orpheus, Aeneas, and Odysseus successfully passed Cerberus on visits to the Underworld. He was an offspring of Typhon and Echidna, and was usually represented as having three heads, a serpent's tail, and a mane of serpent's heads. As one of their burial customs, the Greeks buried with the corpse a honey cake with which the spirit was to quiet Cerberus so that it might pass the monster-dog on its way to Elysium; thence the expression "a sop to Cerberus." The last labor of Heracles was to bring Cerberus up from the Underworld. Hades permitted him to do this if he could take Cerberus without weapons. Heracles grasped him firmly around the neck, disregarding the stings of the serpent's tail with which Cerberus lashed him, and choked him until he yielded. As Cerberus faced the light of earth for the first time, either at Troezen or at Heraclea on the Euxine Sea, foam fell from his jaws onto the ground. From the foam sprang the poisonous plant aconite, which, it was claimed, flourished ever after around Heraclea.

Cercinitis Lacus (sēr-si-nī'tis lā'kus). [Also: Cercinites, Kerkinitis, Limne Kerkinitis.] In ancient geography, the lake or enlargement near the mouth of the river Strymon in Macedonia.

Cercopes (sēr-kō'pēz). A legendary race of men in Lydia. They are sometimes conceived of as mischievous gnomes, who attacked Heracles as he slept, when he was serving Queen Omphale, and stole his weapons. Awakened, Heracles was amused by their attempts. He gathered them up in his lion's skin and took them to Omphale. Others say that they were deceitful men who were changed into apes by Zeus, and that Heracles captured them and carried them, head down on a pole, to Omphale. The Pithecusae (Ape) islands of Ischia and Procida, off the coast of Naples, were named for them.

Cercops. Greek poet of Miletus, of the 6th century B.C. A poem on the war of Aegimius, king of the Dorians, against the Lapithae is assigned by some to him; by others it is attributed to Hesiod.

Cercyon (sēr'si-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Hephaestus or of Poseidon. He was a king in Arcadia and the father of Alope, whom he imprisoned because she bore a son to Poseidon. He ordered her son, Hippothous, exposed to die but the child was rescued. Cercyon was in the habit of challenging strangers in Eleusis to wrestle with him, whereupon he crushed them to death in his powerful arms. When Theseus passed through Eleusis, he met Cercyon on the road between Eleusis and Megara near Alope's grave, accepted his challenge to wrestle, and killed him by dashing him to the ground.

Cercysera (sēr-sī'sē-ra). One of the names under which Achilles is said to have been known when he lived at the court of Lycomedes in Scyrus disguised as a girl.

Ceres (sir'ēz, sē'rēz). In ancient Italian mythology, the goddess of grain and harvest, later identified by the Romans with the Greek Demeter. Her cult was quite old; one of the flamens (15 priests, each assigned to one god and his cult observance) was the flamen Cerealis.

Cerveteri (cher-ve'tā-rē). See Caere.

Cerynean Hind (ser-i-nē'an). A fabled creature in Greek mythology, referred to in the legend of Heracles. With golden horns and hoofs of bronze, this creature, sacred to Artemis, was as fleet as the wind. Its capture was one of the 12 labors imposed upon Heracles. Some say he pursued it through Arcadia and finally transfixed its forefeet with one arrow as it stopped at the Ladon River to drink. He then carried it to Eurystheus. Others say that after a long pursuit, he drove it into a deep drift of snow in a northern region and thus captured it without injuring it.

Cerynia (ser-i-nī'a). In ancient geography, one of the 12 towns in Achaea occupied by the Achaeans after the Ionians had left the land. It was built on a high hill between the Cerynites River and Mount Cerynia, from which it took its name according to some accounts. The sanctuary of the Eumenides in Cerynia was said to have been founded by Orestes. Of this sanctuary it was said that whoever entered it, guilty of murder or impiety, at once became insane with fright.

Cerynitia (ser-i-nish'a). Forested region in Arcadia where Heracles found the golden-horned, bronze-hoofed Cerynean stag (or hind) which he pursued for a year before capturing it alive as his third labor for Eurystheus.

Ceryx (sē'riks). In Greek mythology, a son of Hermes and Herse. Some say he was the first herald of the Eleusinian Mysteries.

Cestrinus (ses-trī'nus). In Greek legend, said to have been a son of Andromache and Helenus, born in Epirus after the Trojan war and the death of Neoptolemus. After the death of his father he took land beyond the Thyamis (Calamas) River in Epirus and settled there.

Cestus (ses'tus). Aphrodite's magic girdle, which had the power of enhancing the beauty of any who wore it and of inspiring love in those who beheld the wearer of it. Hera borrowed the cestus from Aphrodite to charm Zeus, during the Trojan War, so that he would forget about helping the Trojans in his aroused love for her, and thus give her favored Greeks a chance to drive back the Trojans. The cestus played an important role in many of the myths.

Cethegus (sē-thē'gus), Marcus Cornelius. Roman general; died 196 B.C. He was curule aedile (213 B.C.), praetor (211), censor (209), and consul (204 B.C.). In the following year he commanded as proconsul in Cisalpine Gaul, where, with the aid of the praetor Quintilius Varus, he defeated the Carthaginian general Mago, brother of Hannibal.

Ceto (sē'tō). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Gaea and Pontus. By her brother Phorcys she was the mother of the Graeae, the gray-haired sisters who share one eye and one tooth between them, and of the Gorgons, winged sisters who dwelt in Libya. According to some accounts, Ceto and Phorcys were also the parents of Echidna, an immortal monster, half-maiden and half-serpent; the Hesperides, who dwelt in the garden called by their name; and of Ladon, a many-headed monster who guarded the Apples of the Hesperides.

Cetus (sē'tus). A southern constellation—the Whale—situated west of Orion. It was anciently pictured as some kind of marine animal, possibly a seal.

Ceyx (sē'iks). In Greek mythology, a son of Phosphorus, the Morning-Star. He was a king in Trachis who welcomed Heracles when he went into exile there with his wife Deianira for an accidental murder, but was not strong enough later to defy the order of Eurystheus to banish Heracles' children. Ceyx was celebrated for the tender love he bore his wife Alcyone. On a journey to Clarus to consult the oracle of Apollo, he was drowned at sea. His wife, who had pleaded to accompany him, was informed in a dream sent by Hera that her husband was dead. She went to the water's edge to weep and discovered her husband's body, which had been washed to his native shores. Alcyone grieved so over the loss of her husband that the gods in pity changed her and Ceyx into kingfishers (alcyones), whose affection for each other in the mating season is proverbial. The Halcyon Days, a period of 14 days when the sea is calm, are named for them. According to another version of this myth, Ceyx and Alcyone were so happy that they dared to compare themselves to Zeus and Hera. Their arrogance so annoyed the gods that Zeus sent a storm which wrecked the ship in which Ceyx was sailing to consult the oracle, and he was drowned. According to this version also, the gods in pity for Alcyone's grief changed the pair into kingfishers, or into a sea-mew (Ceyx) and a kingfisher (Alcyone).

Chabrias (kā'bri-as). Athenian general; fl. 388–357 B.C.; killed near Chios, 357 B.C. In 388 B.C. he was sent to the assistance of Evagoras, king of Cyprus, against the Persians. On the way he landed at the island of Aegina, which the Spartans were using as a base, and by an ambush defeated the Spartans in battle and seized and killed Gorgopas, the Spartan commander. In 378 B.C., in a campaign against Agesilaus, he acquired great celebrity by the adoption of a new maneuver, which consisted in receiving the enemy's attack on one knee with spears presented and shields resting on the ground. In 376 B.C. the island of Naxos revolted against the reconstituted Athenian Confederacy. Chabrias sailed against the island to put down the revolt. The Spartans sent a fleet to the relief of Naxos. Chabrias engaged their fleet and utterly defeated the Spartans. Eleven Spartan ships were allowed to escape while Chabrias, mindful of the fate of the Athenian victors at Arginusae (406 B.C.), stopped to rescue from the water his men whose ships had been wrecked. Thus the Spartan fleet was not completely destroyed, but the victory was impressive. Chabrias sailed about the Aegean and enrolled new members in the Athenian Confederacy. He acted as military adviser to the king of Egypt (c373 B.C.). The island of Ceos revolted from the Confederacy (364 B.C.), and was subdued by Chabrias in the same year. On the outbreak of the Social War (357 B.C.) he was placed in command of the Athenian fleet, which coöperated with the army under Chares. Chios revolted. He was sent to put down the revolt and was killed at the siege of the island (357 B.C.).

Chaereas and Callirrhoe (kē'rē-as; ka-lir'ō-ē). Greek romance (c2nd century A.D.) by Chariton Aphrodisiensis, only a part of which is extant.

Chaeremon (ker-ē'mon). Greek tragic poet, a contemporary of Plato, and active at Athens early in the 4th century B.C. A few fragments of his work remain.

Chaeronea (ker-ō-nē'a). [Also: Chaeroneia.] In ancient geography, a town in W Boeotia, Greece. Some say it was once called Arne, after the daughter of Aeolus, who also gave her name to a city in Thessaly. Others say the city was named for Chaeron, a son of Apollo. The Chaeroneans claimed they found on their borders the scepter Hephaestus made for Zeus, who sent it by Hermes to Pelops, and that was ultimately held by Agamemnon. They worshiped it under the name "Spear." It was not kept in a public temple. Priests of the "Spear" took turns keeping it in their own houses for a year each. Sacrifices were offered to it daily. Offerings of meats and all kinds of cakes were placed on a table near it. Chaeronea was the birthplace of Plutarch and it was here that he spent most of his life and did his work. It was a dependency of Orchomenus. Here Philip of Macedon defeated (338 B.C.) the Thebans, Athenians, and their allies. The Thebans gathered the bodies of those of the Sacred Battalion who had fallen in the battle and buried them in a common tomb. Over it the famous marble Lion of Chaeronea was raised as a memorial. The monument was broken apart by a chieftain who thought to find treasure there and it was not until 1818 that the lion was found lying in a field. In the early part of the 20th century it was restored and remounted on its ancient base. Nearby the lion a small theater was cut into the rocks of the hill called Petrachus. This hill was, some say, the place where Rhea deceived Cronus by handing him a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes in place of her new-born son Zeus. Chaeronea was the place where Sulla (86 B.C.) with 30,000–40,000 men defeated the army of Mithridates VI (about 110,000) under Archelaus. In ancient times the Chaeroneans were noted for their skill in distilling unguents from the lily, rose, narcissus, and iris, that cured many human ills.

Chair of Forgetfulness. A seat in the Underworld to which whoever sat on it was irrevocably fastened. The stone of the chair grew up around the sitter's body. On a journey to the Underworld to abduct Persephone, Pirithous was tricked into sitting on this chair and remains there forever.

Chalcedon (kal'sē-don, -dōn; kal-sē'dōn). [Modern Turkish name, Kadiköy.] In ancient geography, a town in Bithynia, situated on the Bosphorus opposite Byzantium. It was founded (c685 B.C.) by Megarian colonists.

Chalcenterus (kal-sen'tēr-us). Surname of Didymus.

Chalcidice (kal-sid'i-sē). [Also: Chalkidike, Khalkidhiki, Khalkidike, Khalkidiki.] In ancient geography, the chief peninsula of Macedonia, terminating in the three smaller peninsulas of Pallene, Sithonia, and Acte, projecting into the Aegean Sea. It was settled (c7th century B.C.) by Euboeans. Its chief cities were Olynthus and Potidaea.

Chalciope (kal-si'ō-pē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Aeëtes, king of Colchis, and the nymph Asterodia. She was the sister of Medea. Aeëtes gave her in marriage to Phrixus when he alighted in Colchis on the ram with the golden fleece. Her four sons by Phrixus (Argus, Cytissorus, Melas, and Phrontis) were shipwrecked while on their way from Colchis to Hellas after the death of their father, and were rescued on the island of Ares by Jason and the Argonauts, with whom they returned to Colchis. In gratitude to Jason for saving her sons, Chalciope persuaded Medea to help Jason to win the Golden Fleece.

Chalcis (kal'sis). In Greek legend, a daughter of the river-god Asopus and Metope. According to some accounts, she was the mother of the Curetes, who were the earliest inhabitants of Chalcis, and of the Corybantes. The town of Chalcis in Euboea is said to have been named for her.

Chalcis. [Also: Chalkis, Egripo, Evipos, Negropont.] City in C Greece, situated on the W coast of the island of Euboea on the Euripus strait about 34 miles N of Athens. It was the chief town in ancient Euboea, and sent out many colonial settlers. Cumae in Italy and Naxos in Sicily were colonized by Chalcidians, and the colonies of Chalcis in Italy and Sicily exceeded in number those of any other state. Chalcis was subdued (506 B.C.) by Athens, and was an important trading and colonizing center. Isaeus the orator and Lycophron the poet were born in Chalcis, and Aristotle died here in 322 B.C.

Chalinitis (kal-i-ni'tis). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Bridler." She is credited with having invented the bridle, and assisted Bellerophon in his attack against the Chimaera by bridling the winged horse Pegasus and giving him to Bellerophon. There was a temple of Athena Chalinitis near the tomb of Medea's children in Corinth.

Chalybes (kal'i-bēz). A people of Pontus, near the Euxine Sea. They were noted as ironworkers, living entirely from the work of their forges. Jason and the Argonauts sailed by their land on their way to Colchis. The Chalybes were subdued by Croesus.

Chamyne (kam'i-nē). Epithet of Demeter. There was a sanctuary of Demeter Chamyne at Olympia. The priestess of Demeter Chamyne at Olympia had a marble altar from which she could watch the Games. Some say the name Chamyne was given to this sanctuary at Olympia because here the earth opened (chainein) for the chariot of Hades to emerge, and closed (mysai) to swallow up the chariot when Hades had seized Persephone. Others say the name comes from a man, Chamynus, who was put to death by a tyrant of Pisa, and whose property was used to build the sanctuary.

Chaon (kā'on). Named in the Aeneid as a brother of Helenus of Troy. Helenus accidentally killed him while hunting, and to commemorate his name Helenus named a part of his country, which he ruled in Epirus after the Trojan War, Chaonia.

Chaos (kā'os). In Greek mythology, the original formless state of the universe; or, the diety presiding over it. Perhaps no other myth exhibits quite so much confusion and variety as are found in the concepts of Chaos. The one thing common to all versions was the idea of infinite space in which matter existed without form and in complete darkness; to some of the ancient poets, this was Chaos, and alone existed, but others said that Earth and Eros were coeval with Chaos. In some cosmogonies, the first of all things was Chronos (Time), from whom proceeded Chaos and Aether (Light, or the upper air). But in another formulation, Chaos was the deity presiding over the formless mass with his wife Nyx (Night). Their son Erebus (Darkness) slew or dethroned Chaos and married his mother; from this union came Aether and Hemera (Day), who with the aid of their son Eros (Love) created Pontus (the Sea) and Gaea (the Earth). But in other accounts, Gaea proceeded directly from Chaos, and was the mother of Eros as well as of Tartarus (the Nether World).

Chares (kā'rēz, kā'rēz). Athenian general; died after 332 B.C. In 357 B.C. he captured Sestus in the Chersonesus, put the inhabitants to the sword, and regained the Chersonesus for Athens. In the same year he was sent to put down a revolt of the Athenian ally Chios with Chabrias as his co-general. Chabrias was killed in attempting to force a landing. Chares withdrew but later returned, sharing the command with two admirals. They refused to support his plan for attacking Chios. He attacked without them and was driven off with loss. He accused them of treachery; they were tried on a charge of bribery and Chares was vindicated. As sole commander, he now went to Asia Minor to subdue the revolting Athenian allies. In Asia he helped a rebellious satrap of the Persian king to a brilliant victory (355 B.C.) and was rewarded by the grateful satrap with the money he urgently needed to maintain his army. But the Persian king made strong representations against the Athenians for helping his satrap in a rebellion. Peace was made (354 B.C.) between Athens and her revolting allies, and Chares was recalled. He went next (349 B.C.), to help the Phocians against Philip II of Macedon, but accomplished little. In 340 B.C. he was sent to aid Byzantium to resist a siege by Philip. The Byzantines, mindful of his ruthlessness at Sestus, refused to receive him in their city. He was one of three Athenian commanders at the Battle of Chaeronea (338 B.C.) in which the Greeks were overwhelmed by Philip. After Alexander the Great conquered Thebes, he demanded the surrender of Chares, but the latter fled to the east and, some say, entered the service of the Persian king, Darius III.

Chares. Rhodian sculptor, born at Lindus, Rhodes; active c292–c280 B.C. He is noted as the creator of the Colossus of Rhodes. He was a pupil of Lysippus and is considered the founder of the Rhodian school. The Colossus of Rhodes was made to commemorate the successful defense of that place against Demetrius I (Demetrius Poliorcetes) in 305 and 304 B.C. It required 12 years for its completion, and was probably finished before 280 B.C. Representing the Rhodian sun-god, Helios, it was over 105 feet high, and was considered one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Its cost is said to have been defrayed from the engines of war which Demetrius was obliged to abandon.

Chariclo (ka-rik'lō). A nymph who was dear to Athena and accompanied the goddess everywhere. She was the mother by Everes of Tiresias the seer. Athena blinded Tiresias, according to some accounts, because he had inadvertently surprised the goddess while she was bathing in the Hippocrene Spring with Chariclo. Chariclo reproached the goddess for blinding her son, at that time only seven years old. Athena could not restore the sight she had taken away, but in answer to Chariclo's plea gave Tiresias long life and the gift of understanding the prophetic birds, or the power of prophecy and divination.

Charidemus (ka-ri-dē'mus). Greek mercenary captain; executed 333 B.C. He served under the Athenian general Timotheus in an unsuccessful attempt to recapture the city of Amphipolis (364–362 B.C.). After being dismissed by Timotheus, he went over to the Thracian king Cotys, one of whose daughters he married, and opposed the Athenians. After the murder of Cotys, he became the chief minister of his son, Cersobleptes, and defeated an Athenian fleet that was sent to take over the Chersonesus (c359 B.C.). When the Chersonesus was at length retaken by the Athenians (357 B.C.), Charidemus was able so to twist the appearance of his activities that the Athenians not only again invited him to serve them but honored him as well. In following years he commanded Athenians against Philip II of Macedon, who had now won control over large parts of Thrace, but without great success. He was one of those whose surrender Alexander the Great demanded after his capture and destruction of Thebes. He escaped and fled to Darius III, king of Persia, whom he served as a mercenary. According to some accounts, he was put to death by the Persians (333 B.C.) for insubordination concerning the preparation Darius was making to meet Alexander the Great before the battle of Issus.

Charila (kar'i-lā). According to Plutarch, a maiden of Delphi. Delphi was afflicted by a famine. The people went to the gates of the king's palace with their wives and children as suppliants. The king gave grain and oil to the noblest of the suppliants, as there was not enough to go around. Among the suppliants was a young orphan girl. When she appealed to the king, he struck her with his shoe and then hurled it in her face. Humiliated, the child went off into the woods and hanged herself. Afterward pestilence was added to the famine that afflicted Delphi. The Delphians consulted the oracle and learned that they must appease the shade of Charila, a maiden who died by her own hand. No one knew who Charila was at first, but after some time it was discovered that she was the child into whose face the king had flung his shoe and who subsequently hanged herself. A ceremony of appeasement was enacted in which the king distributed the grain to the people as before. An image of Charila was brought before him and was struck by the king's shoe. The leader of the Thyiades then took the image and hanged it in a cavern. Afterward, the image was cut down and buried where the child Charila was buried. This ceremony of appeasement was performed by the Delphians every nine years.

Charillus (kar-il'us) or Charilaüs (kar-i-lā'us). A Spartan king of the Eurypontid house. He was the son of Polydectes and the father of Nicander. In his time he devastated Argolis. Then the Spartans wished to conquer Arcadia and went to consult the oracle at Delphi on the matter. Persuaded by a deceptive oracle, they attacked Tegea. The reply that the priestess had given them was as follows:

"Cravest thou Arcady: Bold is thy craving.

I shall not content it.

Yet I do not begrudge thee:

I will give thee Tegea to beat with the feet in dance,

And the fair plain thereof to measure off with line."

Feeling that he had the sanction of the oracle, Charillus attacked. While the men of Tegea fought valiantly, the women armed themselves and lay in ambush under a hill, called afterward Phylactris (Sentry Hill). In the midst of the battle the women rushed out and put the Lacedaemonians to flight. Charillus himself was taken prisoner, but was freed without ransom on his pledge never again to attack Tegea. The Spartans who were taken captive were bound in the fetters that they had brought with them to bind the Tegeans, and fulfilled the oracle of Delphi when they were forced to measure the plain of Tegea as they tilled it as slaves. The Tegeans later dedicated the fetters in the temple of Athena Alea.

Charis (kā'ris). According to Homer, one of the Graces and the wife of Hephaestus.

Charites (kar'i-tēz). The Greek name for the Graces, goddesses of the beauty, brightness, and joy in nature and humanity. Some say they are the daughters of Helius and Aegle, a naiad. Others say they are the daughters of Zeus and Eurynome. Their most familiar names are Aglaia (Brilliance), Euphrosyne (Joy), and Thalia (the Bloom of Life). The Charites are associated with the Muses, with whom they dwell on Mount Olympus, as the inspiration for music, poetry, the arts of painting and sculpture, beauty and knowledge. They are also associated particularly with Aphrodite, Eros, and Dionysus. Their shrine at Orchomenus in Boeotia, where they were worshiped with Aphrodite and Dionysus, was said to be the oldest there. In it were ancient stone images, said to have fallen from heaven. In Athens, where only two graces, Auxo (Increase) and Hegemone (Queen), were recognized, the Athenian youths, on first receiving their shields and spears, swore by these goddesses to be loyal to their country. The Charites were worshiped in Athens, Sparta (where also only two were recognized), Messene, and elsewhere in Greece.

Chariton of Aphrodisias (kar'i-tōn; af-rō-diz'i-as). [Also Chariton Aphrodisiensis.] Greek novelist who flourished c2nd century A.D. He was the author, probably under an assumed name, of the well-constructed and naturally-expressed romance of Chaereas and Callirrhoe (q.v.).

Charmides (kār'mi-dēz). Dialogue of Plato, the narration by Socrates of a conversation on the subject of temperance (moderation or practical wisdom) between himself, Charmides (a beautiful youth renowned for his moderation), Critias, and Chaerephon, which took place at Athens at the Palaestra of Taureas near the porch of the King Archon immediately after the battle of Potidaea, from which Socrates had just returned. Charmides was an Athenian, son of Glaucon, cousin of Critias, and uncle of Plato.

CHARON RECEIVING A DEAD SOUL FROM HERMES Attic lecythus, early 4th century B.C. Munich

Charon (kār'on). In Greek mythology, a son of Erebus. He is the ferryman who transports the souls of the dead (but only of those who have been properly buried) across the river Styx to the Underworld. His fee is an obolus or other coin, and this is placed for him in the mouth of the dead at the time of burial. Few have passed Charon in defiance of the rules concerning proper burial. Orpheus so charmed him that he was ferried over; Heracles terrified him into taking him across; and Aeneas bribed him with the Golden Bough. There were, however, several back entrances to the Underworld, and by using these Charon and his fee could be avoided.

Charon. Greek chronicler of Lampsacus, active in the middle of the 5th century B.C. He wrote about his own town, about Persian and Ethiopian history, voyages beyond the Pillars of Heracles, and incidents in the life of Themistocles.

Charon. Theban patriot; fl. in the first half of the 4th century B.C. At great risk to himself he made his house available as a hiding place for Pelopidas, a Theban exile, and five of his colleagues. These had secretly returned to the city with the intention, which they successfully carried out, of ridding Thebes of its pro-Spartan polemarchs and their Spartan garrison (378 B.C.).

Charondas (kā-ron'das). Sicilian lawgiver, born at Catana, Sicily; active c500 B.C. He legislated for the cities of Chalcidian origin in Sicily and Italy.

Charops (kā'rops). An epithet of Heracles, meaning "With bright eyes." The Boeotians raised an image of Heracles Charops on Mount Laphystium in Boeotia, because they said that here Heracles ascended from Hades, dragging the hound Cerberus with him.

Charybdis (kā-rib'dis). In Greek mythology, a monster, the daughter of Gaea and Poseidon. Because of her greed Zeus struck her with his thunderbolt and hurled her into the sea near Sicily. There, three times a day she gulps in the waters and spews them out again. Odysseus twice narrowly escaped death passing by Charybdis. In later times Charybdis was identified as a whirlpool in the Straits of Messina.

Chatti or Catti (kat'i). German tribe, a branch of the Suevi, first mentioned by Strabo. They originally occupied the Taunus region N of the Moenus (Main) River, but were assigned by Drusus to the old territory of the Sugambri further northward, back from the Rhenus (Rhine), in the region about the middle Visurgis (Weser) River. They took part in the rising under Civilis, and were afterward, down into the 3rd century A.D., in frequent conflict with the Romans. They were one of the most powerful of the German inland tribes. Two minor tribes of the Chatti, the Batavi and the Canninefates, were ultimately merged with the Salic Franks. Those left behind in the old territory became finally the Hessians, a name which first appears early in the 8th century A.D.

Chauci (kô'si). German tribe, first mentioned by Strabo, in the region along the Mare Germanicum (North Sea), on both sides of the Visurgis (Weser) River from the Amisia

(Ems) River to the Albis (Elbe) River. Pliny divides them into "greater" and "lesser." They were brought by Drusus and Tiberius into subjection to the Romans. In the 3rd century A.D. they became part of the confederation of the Franks, and thereafter gradually lost their tribal identity in history.

Chelidon (ke-lí'don) or Chelidonis (-dō'nis). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pandareus of Ephesus, and the sister of Aëdon. She was violated by her brother-in-law Polytechnus as he was escorting her on the journey from her father's house to Aëdon. Polytechnus disguised her as a slave and gave her to Aëdon, his wife. Chelidon revealed herself to her sister and helped her to punish Polytechnus. She was transformed into a swallow by Artemis. See Aëdon.

Chelone (ke-lō'nē). In Greek legend, a maiden who refused to attend the wedding of Zeus and Hera. To punish her, Hermes cast her house into a river and transformed Chelone into a turtle, which carries its house on its back.

Chelydorea (kel'i-dō'rē-ā). In ancient geography, a mountain in Arcadia, on the boundary between Pheneus in Arcadia and Pellene in Achaea. The inhabitants were mostly Achaeans. The mountain, near Mount Cyllene, the birthplace of Hermes, was said by some to be the place where Hermes found the tortoise from which he constructed the first lyre. The name Chelydorea means "Mountain of the flayed tortoise."

Chemmis (kem'is). [Also: Panopolis; modern Akhmin.] An ancient city on the right bank of the Nile, in Upper Egypt, between Asyut and Thebes. It was the seat of the cult of Ammon Chem. Chem was identified with Pan and the city was called Panopolis by the Greeks and Romans. According to legend, Perseus stopped in the city as he returned from Libya after securing the head of Medusa. There was a precinct sacred to Perseus in the city, and an image of him in the temple. The people of Chemmis declared, in the time of Herodotus, that Perseus often appeared to them. They said also that frequently a huge sandal belonging to Perseus was found, and on those occasions all Egypt prospered. The people of Chemmis claimed that Perseus himself had ordered them to establish the festival in his honor which they celebrated annually in the Greek manner with games and other contests. This honoring of Perseus was all the more unusual in that the Egyptians were decidedly averse to adopting the customs of other nations, and were especially hostile to Greek customs. It was accounted for by their belief that Perseus was of Egyptian origin through his ancestor Danaus, who was said to have been native to Chemmis before he fled with his daughters to Argos.

Chersiphron (kér'si-fron). Cretan architect, born at Cnossus, Crete, active c576 B.C. He is traditionally considered the designer of the first Artemisium (temple of Artemis) at Ephesus. He was associated with his son Metagenes, and with Theodorus. The Artemisium was more than 100 years in building, and was finished c456 B.C. It was later destroyed by fire, and rebuilt about the time of Alexander the Great by Dinocrates; this building, usually called the Temple of Diana of Ephesus, was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world.

Chersonesus (kér-sō-nē'sus). [Also: Chersonese.] Ancient Greek word for peninsula, specifically applied to the following: 1) Chersonesus Aurea, the modern Malay Peninsula. 2) Chersonesus Cimbrica, the modern peninsula of Jutland, Denmark. 3) Chersonesus Taurica or Scythica, the modern Crimea, U.S.S.R. 4) Chersonesus Thracica, the modern Gallipoli Peninsula, between the Hellespont and the Gulf of Saros.

Chersonesus. [Also: Cherson, Chersonesus Heracleotica.] Ancient city situated on the SW tip of the Crimean Peninsula, near what is now Sevastopol, founded by the Ionians at the beginning of the 5th century B.C. Because of its situation, it soon became an important trading city-state. Alliance with the kingdom of Cimmerian Bosphorus was followed by subjection to the Roman Empire. It is archaeologically of interest, containing the remains of city walls and towers of the Byzantine era, foundations of some private dwellings, and foundations of basilicas, with mosaic floors and traces of frescoes. Many old Greek inscriptions were found here, and the necropolis contains numerous objects of the Greco-Roman and Byzantine periods. Some traces of a neolithic culture have been found here.

Cherusci (ke-rus'i). German tribe, in the time of Caesar, dwelling about the middle Visurgis (Weser) River in territory extending as far E as the Albis (Elbe) River. They were subjugated to the Romans by Drusus Germanicus and Tiberius, but rose (9 A.D.) against Varus under the leadership of their own countryman, Arminius. In the time (c100 A.D.) of Tacitus they had sunk into comparative unimportance. They are thought to have become ultimately a constituent part of the Saxons.

Children of Heracles, The (Heraclidae). A drama by Euripides, produced about 430 B.C. It is concerned with the war which Athens undertook to protect the rights of suppliants, the noble sacrifice which the gods required as the price of victory, the gift of rejuvenation to an aged warrior, and the vengeance claimed by Alcmene, the mother of Heracles. The scene is a court in the temple of Zeus to which the children of Heracles, accompanied by their father's faithful friend, Iolaus, have come as suppliants. Eurystheus, their father's enemy, has ordered them banished from all the cities of Hellas. In despair they have sought sanctuary at Marathon, a dependency of Athens. Copeus, herald of Eurystheus, enters the court. He knocks down Iolaus and seizes the children to take them to his master. Iolaus, now a very aged man, calls for help. A chorus of old men of Marathon enters and hears the story of the persecutions with which Eurystheus has harried the children of Heracles. The chorus tells the herald that suppliants at an altar cannot be surrendered. Demophon, son of Theseus, now appears and hears the story. To his charge that Copeus, though dressed as a Greek, must be a barbarian, Copeus answers arrogantly, naming his land, his king, and his errand—to seize the children of Heracles. He threatens Athens with war if the Heraclidae are not surrendered. Iolaus appeals to the pride of Athens; if the city is really free, it will not bow to the demands of Eurystheus. He reminds Demophon of the kinship between the sons of Theseus and the sons of Heracles, and recalls that Heracles rescued Theseus from Hades. He pleads with Demophon not to disgrace Athens by surrendering them to Eurystheus. Demophon cites these very remarks as reasons why he will refuse the demands of Eurystheus and sends Copeus back to his master, scorning his threats of war. In thanking Demophon, Iolaus says noble birth makes noble men, and adds that in all Hellas only Demophon has dared defy Eurystheus and protect the Heraclidae. The chorus states that Athens has always been a friend to the helpless, even if it means war, as it will in this case. Demophon departs to gather his forces.

As Iolaus and the Heraclidae wait at the altar, Demophon returns. All is in readiness. The forces of Eurystheus have appeared on the plain. But Demophon is troubled: an oracle has told him that Athens will be victorious in the war only if a high-born maiden is sacrificed. He would do almost anything for the children of Heracles, but he is not willing to sacrifice his daughter, nor is he willing to ask another to make a sacrifice which he will not make. His city is on the verge of civil war, one faction insisting on war to protect the rights of suppliants, and the other fearing disaster without the sacrifice and insisting on peace. Iolaus understands the position of Demophon but he finds this fresh disappointment too heavy to bear just when he thought they were safe. He volunteers to go as a captive to Eurystheus. But Demophon tells him that Eurystheus is not interested in the capture of an old man, he wants to annihilate the descendants of Heracles.

In the midst of this discussion Macaria, daughter of Heracles, comes from the temple. She learns of the oracle and immediately offers herself. It would be cowardly and unjust, she says, to seek the assistance of Athens, and then to expect Athens to risk defeat because one was unwilling to carry out the instructions of the oracle. To Iolaus' suggestion that lots be drawn, she has a proud answer: she will die of her own free will and choice and not as a plaything of chance. She bids goodbye to Iolaus and her brothers and leaves to be sacrificed.

Presently a messenger from Hyllus, Heracles' oldest son, comes with good tidings. Alcmene, mother of Heracles, comes from the temple to hear the news. When Iolaus learns that Hyllus has arrived with an army, he announces that he will join the army.

The others think he is joking, but he persists and arms himself with weapons taken from the temple (as Heracles had done so many years before at Thebes). Alcmena and the chorus try to dissuade him, it is madness for a weak old man to think of going to war. Iolaus pays no attention, he arms himself, prays, listens to the chorus pray for success in the war to defend the right of sanctuary, and departs.

Soon a servant comes to tell Alcmena that the Athenians have won and Iolaus has fought gloriously. Hyllus had offered to settle the war by a duel but Eurystheus was afraid to meet him. Both armies were engaged. Iolaus jumped into a chariot and pursued Eurystheus, praying to the gods for one day of youthful prowess. In answer two stars lit on the yoke of his chariot and threw him into shadow. When the shadow lifted, Iolaus had become young again. He overtook Eurystheus, captured and bound him, and is even now bringing him into the city. Alcmena asks why Iolaus had not slain Eurystheus. Because, the servant replies, he wanted to bring Eurystheus to her. In her joy Alcmena frees the servant who has brought her the good news. Now Iolaus enters with Eurystheus. Alcmena is to have the privilege of deciding his fate. She tells him that in Athens he found free men and a free city who feared him not. To fight Athens was a different matter from fighting against an old woman and helpless children, and now he must die. The chorus objects to her sentence of death; no one who has been captured in war can be killed. But Eurystheus interrupts. He is not afraid. He acted only at the instigation of Hera. It was the goddess who caused him to torment Heracles and his children after him. Alcmena is implacable. She orders the death of Eurystheus and frees Athens of the blood-guilt by assuming it herself.

Chilon (kī'lon) or Chilo (kī'lō). Spartan sage; fl. in the first part of the 6th century B.C.; noted as one of the Seven Sages of Greece. He was ephor eponymus at Sparta in 556 B.C. and is said to have died of joy caused by the victory of his son in boxing at the Olympic Games.

Chimaera (kī-mē'ra, ki-). In Greek mythology, a fire-breathing monster of divine origin. It had the head of a lion, the body of a goat, and the tail of a serpent. It dwelt in Lycia and was slain by Bellerophon. Hesiod says it was the offspring of Echidna and Typhon and described it as having three heads: a lion's, a goat's and a serpent's. It was supposed by the ancients to represent a volcanic mountain of the same name in Lycia, the top of which was said to be the home of lions, the middle that of goats, and the foot that of serpents.

Chione (kī'ō-nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, and the mother, by Poseidon, of Eumolpus. Fearing her father's anger, she cast her infant son into the sea. He was rescued by Poseidon and washed ashore on the coasts of Ethiopia.

Chione. In Greek mythology, a beautiful daughter of Daedalion. She won the love of Apollo and Hermes, who both visited her on the same night. By them she was the mother of twin sons; Apollo was the father of Philammon and Hermes was the father of Autolycus. Chione boasted that she was as beautiful as Artemis, and was slain by the goddess for her arrogance.

Chionides (kī-on'i-dēz). One of the earliest (early 5th century B.C.) writers and founders of Attic comedy.

Chios (kī'os). [Also: Khios; Italian, Scio; Turkish, Saki-Adasi, Saki-Adassi.] Greek island in the Aegean Sea, situated W of Asia Minor. It is 30 miles long and has an area of 355 square miles. The surface is hilly and rocky. The island has been noted in ancient and modern times for wine and fruit. The inhabitants are mostly Greeks. According to legend, the island was named for a son of Poseidon, who seduced a nymph here. When the time came for her to bear her child, snow (chion) fell. Poseidon named his son Chios, and from him the island took its name. Oenopion and his sons sailed to Chios from Crete and settled there. Orion the mighty hunter was said to have fallen in love with his daughter and to have slain all the wild beasts of the island for her sake. But Oenopion refused to fulfill his promise and give Orion his daughter in marriage. Instead, he got him drunk and blinded him. It was from Chios that Orion set out for the East to recover his sight. In later times, Carians and Abantes from Euboea settled in the island. In the 6th century B.C. it came under Persian rule and revolted against Persian rule at the beginning of the 5th century B.C. In 494 B.C. the Chians, deserted by their Samian and Lesbian allies, fought with splendid valor against the Phoenician fleet that had come to the siege of Miletus, but were forced to withdraw, after inflicting great damage on the enemy ships and losing many of their own. After the Persian War Chios joined the Confederacy of Delos but revolted in 413 B.C. and was laid waste by the Athenians. Chios was noted in the ancient world as a center of art and literature, particularly for its school of epic poets.

Chios. [Also: Kastro, Khios; Italian, Scio.] Chief city of the island of Chios, E Greece, situated on the E coast. It is one of seven cities which claimed to be the birthplace of Homer.

Chiron or Cheiron (kí'ron). In Greek mythology, a wise and just centaur, the friend and teacher of many of the heroes of Greece, and renowned for his powers of healing and prophecy as well as for his skill in hunting and music. In his gentle and beneficent qualities he was the direct opposite of his wild and unruly brothers. Some say Cronus consorting with Philyra on a tiny island which afterward bore her name, was surprised by Rhea. He transformed himself into a stallion.

The child which Philyra subsequently bore was half-man and half-horse, the kindly centaur Chiron. Others say that Zeus was Chiron's father. But still others say that he was a descendant of Ixion, who fathered Centaurus on the cloud Nephele. Centaurus in his turn fathered the race of centaurs on mares and Chiron, the king of the centaurs, was one of these. Many instances are recorded of Chiron's kindness to and friendship for men. He saved Peleus when he was abandoned by Acastus and attacked by centaurs; he told Peleus how he could capture the sea-goddess Thetis by holding fast to her no matter what transformations she might assume to escape his embrace. Peleus, successful, was married to Thetis in Chiron's cave on Mount Pelion; Chiron gave him an ashen spear for a wedding gift, which was afterward used by Achilles at Troy. When Thetis deserted Peleus, he gave his infant son Achilles into Chiron's charge, and the centaur reared him. He taught Achilles to ride and hunt, and instructed him in the arts of healing. Later, he is said to have restored the sight of Phoenix, who became Achilles' tutor and second father. He reared and instructed Jason and, some say, his son by Medea, Medeus. Others he nurtured were Asclepius, who excelled his teacher in the art of healing, Castor and Polydeuces, and Actaeon. When the centaurs were driven away from Mount Pelion by the Lapiths, Chiron went to Malea and dwelt in a cave there. Hither his friend Heracles pursued the centaurs who had attacked him in Pholoë. By accident, one of Heracles' poisoned arrows pierced Chiron's leg. Heracles immediately withdrew it but nothing could heal the wound. Chiron suffered unbearably, and could not be released from his sufferings by death as he was immortal. Zeus, at the plea of Heracles, offered to release Prometheus from his chains on the rock if he could find someone to take his place in Tartarus. Chiron offered his immortality to Prometheus and went to Tartarus in his stead, and won release from his suffering at last. Zeus set his image among the stars.

Chiusi (kyō'sē). See Clusium.

Chlidanope (klī'dā-nō'pē). A naiad. According to mythology, she was the wife of the Lapith Hypseus and the mother of Cyrene.

Chloë (klō'ē). An epithet of Demeter, meaning "Green." There was a sanctuary of Demeter Chloë near the entrance to the Acropolis at Athens, whose priestess had a reserved seat in the theater of Dionysus and received certain allowances of meat, wheat, honey, oil, and firewood. At Myconus two sows (one of them pregnant) were sacrificed annually to Demeter Chloë, and in the spring all men joyfully sacrificed to her because of their joy at the sight of the green earth and the promise of new crops.

Chloris (klōr'is). In Greek legend, the wife of Neleus and the mother of his children. According to some accounts, she was the daughter of Amphiön and Niobe, and was spared by timely supplication, when the other daughters of Niobe were slain by Artemis for Niobe's insult to Leto. Her name, according to these accounts, was Meliboea but she turned so pale with fear when her sisters were falling before the bow of Artemis that she was given the name Chloris. Some say Chloris was the first victor at the games established in honor of Hera by Hippodamia, wife of Pelops.

Choëphoroe (kō-ef'ō-rē), The, or The Libation-Bearers. A tragedy by Aeschylus, so named because of the chorus bearing vessels with offerings to the tomb of Agamemnon (the name literally meaning "bearers of a drink-offering," or "libation-bearers"). It is the second of a trilogy, known as the Oresteia, with which Aeschylus won first prize in 458 B.C., and deals with the vengeance Orestes took on his mother, at the command of Apollo, for the murder of his father.

The scene is at the grave of Agamemnon outside the walls of Argos. Orestes and Pylades, his friend, stand near the burial mound. Orestes calls on Hermes, who guides dead men's souls below the earth, to hear his prayer and win the sanction of Agamemnon for the deed of vengeance he is about to undertake. He sees Electra approaching the grave, prays to Zeus to grant him vengeance, and withdraws to eavesdrop on Electra. She and a chorus of female servants enter. The chorus sings that it has been sent by Clytemnestra, who was frightened by a dream, to offer libations to appease Mother Earth, but they regard it as blasphemous for one who murdered her husband to command these rites, and predict that Justice will crush the evil-doers. Electra asks the women what she can say as she offers these false libations. They advise her to pray for all who hate Aegisthus, her mother's lover, reminding her that her brother Orestes is one of these. They tell her to pray for one to come and shed blood for the blood that has been shed by Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. Electra addresses her father's spirit. She asks aid for herself and for the exiled Orestes, and she calls for vengeance. The chorus joins in the prayer for an avenger. Electra notes that the wine she has poured on the earth has been absorbed. She further notices locks of hair left as an offering on her father's grave, and in great excitement decides that it must be from Orestes' head, as no one else would make such a sacrifice. She is certain Orestes has returned when she discovers footprints shaped like her own. At this Orestes and Pylades emerge from their hiding place. Orestes tells her that the prayers she has uttered are now about to be answered. He reveals himself as her longed-for brother. She doubts him and he chides her with being able to recognize his hair and footprints but not his person. She is convinced and welcomes him rapturously. Orestes invokes Zeus to help the "eagle's brood" avenge their dead father. He has been commanded by Apollo on pain of dire punishment if he disobeys, to shed blood for blood. Even if he cannot trust such oracles, Orestes says he must obey, and in addition free the proud citizens who conquered Troy from the slavery imposed by a woman, or two women, for Aegisthus is a weak woman in his eyes. Electra, Orestes, and the chorus alternately invoke the spirit of Agamemnon. Electra grieves for her father, his miserable death, and her own state as a virtual slave of her mother. Orestes prays to avenge his dishonored house and reclaim his inheritance. The chorus demands retaliation. All seek by prayers to rouse the dead, that the wrongs suffered by Agamemnon and his children may be righted with the blood of Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. They end by naming the curse that lies on the house of Atreus and demanding to know when the suffering will end. The chorus bids Orestes plan his course. Orestes agrees it is time to act, yet he wonders why his mother at this late date, seven years after his father's murder, has sent an offering to the grave of Agamemnon. The chorus tells him her act was inspired by a dream. She dreamed that she bore a serpent, lulled it in her bosom, and that it sucked blood from her breast. The terror of the dream compelled her to order the libations. Orestes prays the dream will come true; he is the snake she dreamed of and the dream commands that he must be her murderer. They make their plans and depart. The chorus sings of man's rash heart and stubborn will, of woman's desperate love and hate. They cite Althaea who caused her own son's death, Scylla who killed her father, and the Lemnian massacre, as examples of woman's wild passion when she is scorned, disfranchised and dispossessed by men.

The scene changes to the front of the palace. Orestes knocks at the door and calls out to be admitted. Clytemnestra comes and welcomes him. He tells her (she has not recognized him) that he is from Phocis and bears the message that Orestes is dead. Clytemnestra mourns, or seems to, at the news that her son is dead. She invites Orestes into the palace. The chorus gird themselves to help Orestes in any way they can. Presently an old nurse comes weeping from the palace and tells them Orestes is dead, and that she is on her way to fetch Aegisthus, who will hug himself for joy at the news. The chorus, who know she nursed Orestes as a baby and hates Aegisthus, tells her to instruct Aegisthus to come without his armed guard to the palace. The chorus then prays to the gods for help in the deed of vengeance, and call on Orestes not to be softened by his mother's prayers but to redeem the house of Atreus from the curse. Aegisthus approaches, speaks of the news, and asks if it is true that Orestes is dead. The chorus advises him to go into the palace and ask the man who brought the news himself. He goes in. Almost at once Aegisthus is heard to shriek. A servant rushes out and says Aegisthus is dead. Clytemnestra comes out. The servant tells her the dead have come to life to kill the living. Clytemnestra understands; she killed by craft and by craft she is to die. She calls for a weapon; the whole bitter story is about to reach its end, she says. Orestes strides out and tells her she is to die as Aegisthus died. She exerts her authority as a parent and orders her son to put down his sword. Orestes refuses and she appeals to him to spare the mother who gave him life. Orestes is shaken by her appeal but Pylades firmly reminds him of Apollo's command. Orestes agrees that he must kill her and rejects every claim Clytemnestra makes as a parent. He will be pursued by his father's curse if he relents, and so he does not fear his mother's curse. He drives her into the house. The chorus exults that Justice has at last triumphed. The scene changes. Orestes is shown standing over the bodies of Aegisthus and Clytemnestra. He exhibits the blood-stained, netlike robe in which Clytemnestra had entangled Agamemnon and then killed him. He calls the gods to view it so that when he goes on trial for murdering his mother, they will understand that he had to do it; it was she who planned the horrible crime of Agamemnon's murder and had made the robe to trap him. But he says his victory over his mother tortures him, pollutes his life. The chorus reminds him that no man can pass through life untouched by pain. He is afraid he is going mad; before he does, he wants to proclaim that it was no sin to kill his mother who was marked with his father's blood, and that he had acted on the command of Apollo. He will now depart to Apollo's shrine for refuge, as he had been told to do. The chorus does not understand his doubts and misgivings. He has set Argos free, they say, and should not fear that ill will come. But Orestes sees the Furies who have come to hound him for killing his mother, and with a cry of despair he rushes away. The chorus recalls the ancient curse, and says it has now struck three times: first, Thyestes' children were murdered, then Agamemnon, and now Orestes is pursued by the Furies. When will the fury of the curse be spent? The fate of Orestes is the subject of the third play of the trilogy, Eumenides (q.v.).

Choerilus (kē'ri-lus). Athenian tragic poet who flourished in the 6th century B.C. He was a contemporary of Aeschylus and Pratinas, and was most popular as a writer of satyr-plays.

Choerilus of Samos (sā'mos). Greek epic poet, born in Samos c470 B.C. He lived at Athens for a time, later was a member of the entourage of the Spartan general Lysander, and afterward went to the court of Archelaus in Macedon, where he died. Because he thought that the subjects of mythology and legend had been exhausted, he turned to poems on historical subjects. Like his friend Herodotus, he took the Persian invasion as his subject. His epic, Perseis or Persica, was the first historical epic.

Choerilus the Younger. Greek epic poet of little ability, of Caria (4th century B.C.), who celebrated the achievements of Alexander the Great. Alexander is said to have offered to pay him a gold coin for every good line he wrote about him, but this same story has been told of others. This Choerilus may be the grandson of Choerilus of Samos.

Chronicle of Paros (pā'ros, pā'ros). Greek historical inscription found on the island of Paros, and now preserved among the Arundel marbles in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. It extended originally from the mythical reign of Cecrops, king of Athens, taken as c1581 B.C., to the archonship of Diogenetus, 264 B.C.; but the end is now lost, and the surviving part extends only to c354 B.C. The chronicle embraces an outline of Greek history, with special attention to festivals, poetry, and music. Political and military events are less carefully recorded, many of importance being omitted entirely. A second, similar marble, of later date and covering a subsequent period (c365-c299 B.C.) is in a museum on Paros.

Chrysaor (krī-sā'ôr, kris'ā-ôr). In Greek mythology, a warrior who sprang fully grown from the body of Medusa when Perseus cut off her head. Poseidon was his father. Chrysaor was the father by Callirrhoë, daughter of Oceanus, of the three-headed Geryon and dwelt in Erythea. According to later accounts, Chrysaor was a king in Iberia who had three stalwart sons, symbolized in the three-headed Geryon.

Chryse (krī'sē). See Comana.

Chryseis (krī-sē'is). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a daughter of Chryses, priest of Apollo on the island of Sminthus. Known also as Astynome, she was taken captive by Achilles in the Trojan War and was awarded to Agamemnon as his share of the spoils. Apollo sent a plague of arrows against the Greeks because Agamemnon refused to accept a rich ransom for her from her father, and to appease the god Agamemnon sent her back to Chryses by Odysseus, although she was perfectly willing to remain where she was, according to later accounts. The return of Chryseis to her father caused the famous quarrel between Agamemnon and Achilles, for to make up for her loss Agamemnon took Achilles' captive, Briseis.

Chryses (krī'sēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a priest of Apollo on the island of Sminthus, and father of Chryseis (q.v.).

Chrysippus (krī-sip'us, kri-). In Greek legend, a bastard son of Pelops and the nymph Astyoche, a Danaid. Laius, king of Thebes, fell in love with the boy and carried him off to Thebes. Hera sent the Sphinx, a monster that devoured those who could not answer the riddle she propounded, to punish Thebes because its king had abducted Chrysippus. Hippodamia, wife of Pelops, killed Chrysippus, either alone or with the aid of her sons Atreus and Thyestes, because she feared that Pelops might leave his kingdom to him rather than to her own sons.

Chrysippus. Greek Stoic philosopher; born at Soli, Cilicia, c280 B.C.; died at Athens, c207 B.C. He was a disciple of Cleanthes, whom he succeeded as head of the Academy. He was considered, next to Zeno, who founded the Stoic school and who died in the early 3rd century B.C., the most eminent of the Stoic philosophers. He is said to have died from an immoderate fit of laughter on seeing an ass eating some figs destined for his (Chrysippus') own supper. (In one account, the sight of the ass solemnly eating human food so delighted him that he cried, "Give him a bumper of wine," to the old woman who was attending him, and thereupon sank, exhausted by his merriment, into death.)

Chrysopolis (kri-sop'ō-lis). In ancient geography, a city on the Bosphorus, opposite Byzantium. From ancient times it was important as a center of traffic from the Euxine Sea. In the last years of the Peloponnesian War Athens seized it and set up a toll-station there at which ships coming from the Euxine had to pay a percentage of the value of their cargoes.

Chrysostom (kris'os-tōm, kri-sos'tōm) or Chrysostomus (kri-sos'tō-mus), Dio. See Dio Chrysostomus.

Chrysothemis (kri-soth'e-mis). According to Homer and Sophocles, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. In the Iliad, Agamemnon offered her or either of her two sisters to Achilles as part of a rich peace offering if Achilles would forget his quarrel with Agamemnon and take up his arms again to help the Greeks defeat the Trojans. When Agamemnon returned from Troy and was murdered by his wife and Aegisthus, Chrysothemis and her sister Electra remained in their mother's house. She shared Electra's hatred of Clytemnestra and Aegisthus, but felt that she was helpless to do anything about it and accepted her fate with resignation. She urged Electra to refrain from publicly accusing their mother and Aegisthus of being murderous adulterers and to make the best of her lot. She thought Electra's desire for vengeance for her father's death was mad and refused to help Electra kill Aegisthus on the ground that she was only a weak woman, who would rather be miserable and alive than heroic and dead.

Chrysothemis. According to some accounts, a son of Carmanor, the Cretan who purified Apollo for the murder of Pytho. According to tradition, Chrysothemis was the first winner of the musical contests held in what later became the Pythian Games at Delphi. Chthonia (thō'ni-a). In Greek legend, one of the seven daughters of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and his wife Praxithea. She married her uncle, Butes.

Chthonia. Epithet of Demeter, meaning "Of the Lower World." Some say the sanctuary of Demeter Chthonia at Hermion was founded by Clymenus and Chthonia, the children of Phoroneus. But the Argives told a different story. They said that when Demeter came to Argos in her search for her daughter, some welcomed her, but Colontas did not receive her or pay her any mark of respect. His daughter, Chthonia, rebuked her father for his conduct, but he ignored her. Colontas was punished for his presumption but Chthonia was spared. Demeter took her to Hermion and there she founded the sanctuary of Demeter Chthonia. At the annual festival that had the same name, Chthonia, there was a great procession. First came the priests, next the civil officers, then the townspeople, followed by children dressed in white and wearing wreaths made of the iris. The iris, marked with the letters of mourning, commemorated Demeter's grief when she lost Persephone. When the procession arrived at the temple, four cows in succession were driven into the temple; there they were killed by four elderly women. But, according to Pausanias, the thing they worshiped most in the temple had never been seen by any man. Demeter Chthonia was also widely worshiped by the Spartans.

Chthonius (thō'ni-us). One of the Sparti who sprang from the earth when Cadmus sowed the dragon's teeth. His name means "Sprung from the earth." See Sparti.

Chthonius. Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Of the Lower World." Under this epithet the powers and functions of Zeus extended to the death of vegetation and its renewal from the lower world. Among other places, there were altars of Zeus Chthonius at Olympia and Corinth.

Cibalis (sib'a-lis). [Also: Cibale (-lē).] In ancient geography, a town in Pannonia, near what is now Osijek in Yugoslavia. Here Constantine defeated Licinius (314 A.D.).

Cibyra (sib'i-ra). [Called Cibyra Magna (mag'na).] In ancient geography, a town in Phrygia, Asia Minor, near the site of the Turkish village of Korzum, about 65 miles NW of Antalya. It was surnamed "Magna" to distinguish it from a smaller town of the same name in Pamphylia. Its ruins comprise an odeum, 175 feet in diameter, with 13 tiers of seats visible above ground. The front wall is noteworthy, and is practically complete; it has five arched doorways between two square ones. There are also an ancient theater of some size and considerable interest, and a stadium, in part excavated from a hillside. There are 21 tiers of seats in marble, which remain in place around the curved end. There was a monumental entrance, consisting of three lofty arches.

Cicero (sis'e-rō), Marcus Tullius. [Formerly called Tully.] Roman orator, philosopher, and statesman; born at Arpinum, Italy, Jan. 3, 106 B.C.; assassinated near Formiae, Italy, Dec. 7, 43 B.C. He was the son of Marcus Tullius Cicero and Helvia. His father, a member of the equestrian order and a man of comfortable means, wished to give his sons a sound education, and to that end took young Marcus and his younger brother Quintus Tullius (102-43 B.C.) to Rome. There Cicero came into contact with some of the foremost intellects of the time: the poet Archias of Antioch who, according to Cicero, gave him a love for literature; the celebrated orators Lucius Licinius Crassus (140-91 B.C.) and Marcus Antonius (143-87 B.C., grandfather of the triumvir), who interested him in oratory and a legal career; the noted jurists Quintus Mucius Scaevola the Augur (c159-c88 B.C.) and Quintus Mucius Scaevola the Pontifex Maximus (died 82 B.C.); the philosophers Diodotus the Stoic, Phaedrus the Epicurean, and Philo of Larissa, who was head of the Academy; and the rhetorician Molo of Rhodes. In the course of a two-year journey (79-77 B.C.) which he took for his never robust health, he went to Athens where he attended the lectures of Antiochus of Ascalon, to Rhodes, where he heard Posidonius the Stoic, and once more studied with Molo. That master chided him for his florid style. Cicero took his comments to heart, pruned the excesses of which Molo complained, and thereafter assiduously cultivated the style that made his the classic pattern of oratory. Before returning to Rome

he visited Asia Minor, where he heard the lectures of the Greek rhetorician and historian, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and those of Menippus of Cadara, the Cynic. Some time before 68 B.C. he met Pomponius Atticus who became his lifelong friend and confidant, and the recipient of many revealing letters.

Earlier, Cicero had fulfilled his military service in the Marsic War (89 B.C.), under Pompeius Strabo and Sulla. He had also delivered (81) his earliest extant oration, Pro Quinctio (For Quinctius). In 80 he had defended Sextus Roscius (Pro Sextus Roscio) on a trumped-up charge of murdering his father. To defend Roscius and oppose Chrysogonus (a favorite of Sulla) took courage on Cicero's part, as Sulla was dictator at the time. He won his case and shortly after (79) went on the journey for his health, not entirely, as it was sometimes said, to escape Sulla's possibly wrathful notice. When he returned to Rome (77) he married Terentia, a strong-willed woman who subsequently bore him his beloved daughter Tullia (c76-45 B.C.) and a son Marcus (born 65 B.C.). In 75 he went to Lilybaeum in Sicily as quaestor and won admiration there for honest and conscientious administration of his office—a rare experience for Sicilians under Roman officials. The following year he entered the Senate and energetically embarked on his legal career in Rome. In 70 he was asked to lead the prosecution of Verres, who as governor of Sicily had ravaged that province for three years. Hortensius, the most famous orator in Rome at the time, defended Verres. Cicero marshaled such testimony in the first action (In Verrem) against Verres that the latter decided to go into voluntary exile. The material prepared for the second action against Verres was not delivered, but was subsequently published in five parts by Cicero. He was curule aedile (69) and praetor (66). As praetor he favored (De Lege Manilia, For the Manilian Law), the proposal by the tribune Caius Manilius to give Pompey vast power as general in command of the Mithridatic War. His argument dealt less with the constitutional questions posed in awarding such great power to one man than with the virtues and qualities of Pompey, among which he named the good luck with which Pompey seemed to be blessed.

Devoted to the principles of the Republic and the maintenance of order, Cicero's natural sympathies were with the optimates (the aristocratic and conservative party). However, he was regarded with some hostility by them as a "new man," and had won influence with the populares (popular party) by his victory in the prosecution of Verres. Seeking the consulship, he wavered for a time between the two, but when, with the help of the optimates he defeated Catiline and became consul (63), his loyalty to the optimates never thereafter failed. As consul he was at the height of his power and influence. But in this turbulent period between civil wars the cause for which he lived, and ultimately died, was already almost lost. The great days of the Republic, which in any event existed only in an idealized version in his mind, were irretrievably lost. He delivered three speeches, Contra Rullum (Against Rullus) or De Lege Agraria (On the Agrarian Law), against a proposal by the tribune Servilius Rullus, who sought to win popularity by a distribution of land to the poor. The proposal lost, and Cicero lost favor with the populares. He defended the aged Rabirius (Pro Rabirio), who was charged with having illegally put to death Saturninus in 100 B.C. This old charge was revived to warn those in authority against dealing summarily, as Rabirius had done, with suspected rebels. Rabirius was not acquitted, but after some complicated maneuvering went free, and Cicero shortly proceeded to ignore the warning presented by the charge against Rabirius. The most dramatic episode of his consulship was his discovery, energetic exposure, and suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy. Catiline, a renegade aristocrat, plotted to overthrow the government, and kill the most prominent men of Rome, including Cicero. The night of Nov. 7, 63, was fixed for the murder of Cicero. He learned of the plot, as he had of other intrigues by Catiline, and took steps to protect himself. On Nov. 8 he rose in the Senate, in the presence of Catiline himself, and delivered the first of four orations In Catilinam (Against Catiline). He accused him, and urged him and his followers to withdraw, that Rome might be relieved of the fear that had gripped it since Catiline first organized his band of rebels and rumors of his intentions had got abroad. Cicero noted that it was once considered virtuous for patriotic men to punish a traitorous citizen even more harshly than a foreign foe. However, he sought the withdrawal of Catiline with his followers lest the well-deserved execution of the latter leave embers which his supporters, if still in the city, might fan to a conflagration of revolt at a later time. Catiline fled to Etruria that same night. On Nov. 9 Cicero delivered the second oration to a tremendous gathering, in order to quiet the fears which the flight of Catiline to his camp outside Rome had aroused. On Dec. 2 it was learned from the Allobroges, with whom Catiline was conspiring to attack Rome, that Catiline meant to strike on Dec. 19. The third oration, in which these plans were exposed, was delivered, Dec. 3, to another huge crowd. Some of the conspirators, not including Catiline, were seized. The fourth oration, in which Cicero favored the death penalty for the conspirators, was delivered before the Senate on Dec. 5. Subsequently, they were put to death without trial, and early in the next year Catiline and his followers were destroyed in battle. Although he was given the title pater patriae for his services, on leaving the consulship Cicero was increasingly subject to attack. He prosecuted (61) Clodius Pulcher on a charge of impiety: that of invading the ceremony of the Bona Dea (a sacred festival from which men were excluded) disguised as a woman. Clodius was acquitted and became Cicero's mortal enemy. Amid rising disorder, Caesar and Pompey approached him and invited him to join a secret coalition to control Rome. After great hesitation, he refused (Dec., 60) and opposed them. In 58 Clodius, who was tribune, proposed a law that any Roman who had put citizens to death without trial should be outlawed. This was directly aimed at Cicero, for his part in the death of the Catilinarian conspirators. Having put himself at odds with Pompey and Caesar, they now left him to his fate at Clodius' hands, and he went into exile at Thessalonica. His property in Rome was seized and destroyed; the site of his house was consecrated to Liberty by Clodius. The next year he was recalled to Rome and was greatly honored. However, he was out of favor with the Triumvirate (formed 60 B.C., by Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus), and so played small part in political affairs. Instead, he occupied himself with his legal career and with literary pursuits. In 53 he was elected augur; in 51 he was made proconsul of Cilicia. Although he had not wanted a province, he carried out his office efficiently and honestly, put down a revolt in Cappadocia, and waged successful war on the tribes of Mount Amanus. By 50, when he returned to Rome, the differences between Caesar and Pompey made civil war inevitable. After great vacillation, for Cicero recognized the vigor and qualities of Caesar, he elected to join Pompey in Greece. Following the latter's defeat by Caesar at Pharsalus (48), Cicero, who had not taken part in the battle because of illness, abandoned Pompey and went to Brundisium, where he waited a year for Caesar's forgiveness. When it came he returned to Rome, was generously treated by Caesar but kept apart from public affairs. Private sorrows occupied him. He divorced Terentia (46), made a disastrous marriage with his young and wealthy ward, and lost his beloved daughter Tullia (45). In this period he consoled himself with literary work and the study of philosophy.

The murder of Caesar (March 15, 44 B.C.) brought him once more from retirement. His great aim was to restore order and to bring about a reconciliation between the rival factions. To this end he secured an amnesty for the conspirators. However, the intrigues of Caesar's partisans caused him to leave Rome. He was recalled, and began to express his intense hostility to Mark Antony in the first of the 14 Philippicae (Philippics). Cicero put his hopes in Octavian (Caesar's heir), who had always shown him the greatest respect, and while Octavian struggled to enter into his inheritance Cicero became the acting head of state, although he held no office. In his optimism, he thought he could influence Octavian to restore the Republic. He realized to what extent he had deluded himself when Octavian formed the Second Triumvirate (43) with Antony and Lepidus. Cicero, who had shown unrelenting hostility to the last two, prepared to fly. His ship was driven back by contrary winds, he was seized by agents of the triumvirs (but against the wishes of Octavian, it is said), and put to death near Formiae, Dec. 7, 43 B.C. His head and right hand were cut off and sent to Rome, where Antony caused them to be nailed to the rostra.

For all his great activity in public affairs, Cicero could not shape the time in which he lived. His monument rests in the contributions he made as the greatest enricher and stylist of the Latin language that Rome had ever produced. His contributions and example were consciously employed in the next 15 centuries to shape literary and linguistic expression. Aside from some early attempts at verse-writing and the translations from the Greek which he made from time to time throughout his life, his literary output may be divided into four groups. The Orations, of which 58 survive, in whole or in part: Pro Quinctio (81); Pro Sextus Roscio (80); Pro Roscio Comoedo (77); Pro Tullio (71P); In Caecilium Divinatio, In Verrem (The First Action against Verres, the Second Action against Verres, six speeches altogether) (70); Pro Fonteio, Pro Caecina (69); Pro Lege Manilia, Pro Cluentio (66); Contra Rullum (three speeches), In Catilinam (four speeches), Pro Murena (63); Pro Sulla, Pro Archia (62); Pro Flacco (59); Post Reditum ad Quirites, Post Reditum in Senatu, De Doma Sua (57); De Haruspicum Responso, Pro Sestio, In Vatinius, Pro Caelio, De Provinciis Consularibus, Pro Balbo (56); In Pisonem (55); Pro Plancio, Pro Rabirio Postumo (54); Pro Milone (52); Pro Marcello, Pro Ligario (46); Pro Rege Deiotaro (45); Philippicae I-XIV (44-43). In Pro Fonteio he defended Marcus Fonteius, former governor of Gaul, on charges similar to those on which he had secured the conviction of Verres the year before. Pro Cluentio was notable for the clever handling of a highly equivocal case in behalf of a client for whom Cicero had little use. The two speeches, Post Reditum ad Quirites and Post Reditum in Senatu, were addressed to the Roman people and Senate on his recall from exile. De Doma Sua was a plea for the restoration of his house, and De Haruspicum Responso was a dissertation on an Etruscan soothsayer's interpretation of an earthquake, which Clodius had taken to mean disapproval

of the restoration of Cicero's property. In Pro Caelio he defended Marcus Caelius Rufus who was charged, among other things, with an intention to poison Clodia, sister of Clodius Pulcher, and with having bought the poison with gold given to him by Clodia herself. In the speech Cicero defended the sowing of wild oats by the young man and castigated Clodia for her morals and manner of living. With the two speeches De Provinciis Consularibus and Pro Balbo, Cicero made his peace with Caesar and Pompey; in the first he dealt with the command in Gaul, and in the second he upheld the claim to citizenship of Pompey's protégé Lucius Cornelius Balbus. The published speech Pro Milone is not the same as that delivered in defense of Titus Annius Milo, accused of slaying Cicero's old enemy Clodius Pulcher. Milo was condemned and went into exile. Pro Marcello, Pro Ligario, and Pro Rege Deiotaro were addressed to Caesar in behalf of former supporters of Pompey.

Rhetoric: De Inventione (84); De Oratore (55); Oratoriae Partitiones (c54); De Optimo Genere Oratorum (52); Brutus or De Claris Oratoribus (46); Orator (46); and Topica (44), which last was an adaptation and exposition of a work by Aristotle. These works form a compendium of Cicero's ideas and conclusions on the subject of oratory. They include observations on style, the arrangement of subject-matter, use of language, manner of delivery, the qualities the orator himself must have, and a form of history of oratory in Greece and Rome.

Philosophy. Through Cicero Greek philosophy passed to western Europe. He did not claim to be an original thinker. On the contrary, he said of his philosophical writings that they were just copies; that he supplied nothing but the words, of which he had plenty. "Supplying the words" may be taken quite literally, for Latin, lacking a philosophical tradition, also lacked the words with which to express philosophical concepts. Cicero provided them, as well as clear, simple expositions of the concepts themselves. In periods of political inactivity he turned to philosophy. De Republica (54), in six books, is a blueprint for the best constitution for Rome, and ends with the famous "Dream of Scipio." De Legibus (of which three books survive) discusses the function of law and sets forth laws as he thinks they should be. Hortensius (45?) and De Consolatione (45) have been lost. The first concerned the orator Hortensius and is said to have caused St. Augustine to study philosophy. The second is Cicero's consolation to himself on the death of his daughter. Paradoxa Stoicorum (46?) deals with certain Stoic maxims. Academica (45) in two books, is an exposition of the Academic school, descended from Plato, which most nearly coincided with Cicero's own conclusions. De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum (45?) discusses Epicureanism and Stoicism in the first four books, and ends, in the fifth book, with statements of Academic ideas. Tusculanarum Quaestionum (45?), in five books, treats fear of death, pain, grief, other disturbances of the soul, and virtue, which last is declared to be sufficient for happiness; the whole is ornamented with many quotations from Greek and Roman writers and with many examples. In the three books of De Natura Deorum (45?) the Epicurean, Stoic, and Academic precepts are again set forth. De Divinatione, in two books, argues the validity of oracles; De Fato discusses whether man's fate and actions are predestined. Cato Major or De Senectute is an essay in which Cicero has Cato the Elder describing the advantages and comforts of old age to Laelius and the younger Scipio. The work was dedicated to Cicero's friend Atticus. Laelius or De Amicitia (44) is concerned with friendship. For his son Marcus, who stood in need of it, Cicero wrote De Officiis (44), in three books, on duties.

Letters. Cicero was a tireless letter writer. Thirty-seven books of his letters are extant, and represent only a part of the letters known to antiquity. From those that have been preserved, especially those to such intimates as Atticus, emerges a vivid picture of turbulent Rome, and a portrait in depth of the hopes and fears, weaknesses and strength, of its most articulate citizen.

Cicero, Quintus Tullius. Roman commander; born 102 B.C.; killed 43 B.C. He was a younger brother of Marcus Tullius Cicero. He distinguished himself in Gaul in 54 B.C. He was condemned to death by the same proscription issued against his brother. He was the author of letters and an epistle to his brother.

Cicones (sik'ō-nēz) or Ciconians (si-kō'ni-anz). In Homer, a people of Thrace, dwelling on the shores of the Aegean near the Hebrus River. Orpheus settled among the Cicones, and it was the Ciconian women, either inspired with madness by Dionysus, or enraged because he scorned them, who set upon Orpheus, a priest of Apollo, and tore him limb from limb. According to some accounts, it was the practice thereafter for the Ciconian women to be tattooed as a warning against the murder of priests. Odysseus, on his way home after the Trojan War, landed on their shores and plundered their chief city of Ismarus. The Ciconians rallied their neighbors and made an attack on the forces of Odysseus who, in spite of his urgings for a speedy departure, lingered and enjoyed themselves over their wine. The Ciconians killed six men from each of Odysseus' ships before he was able to withdraw. A priest of the Ciconians, Maro, grateful that he and his family had been spared in the attack on the city, gave Odysseus several skins of a special wine which Odysseus later used to good advantage when he was confined by Polyphemus, the Cyclops. The Ciconians had been allies of Troy in the Trojan War, which was enough reason for Odysseus to plunder their city.

Cilicia (si-lis'a). In ancient geography, a province in SE Asia Minor, separated by the Taurus range from Lycaonia and Cappadocia on the N, and by the Amanus range from Syria on the E, and extending toward the sea. This describes the general area of Cilicia, but in fact the boundaries were subject to several shifts. According to some accounts the inhabitants were anciently called Hypachaeans. They took the name Cilicians from Cilix, a son of Agenor, who came into the land in search of his sister Europa and, abandoning his search, settled there. During the Syrian period many Greeks and Jews settled in Cilicia. It was repeatedly invaded by the Assyrian kings, but was one of the few areas west of the Halys River that did not fall to Croesus, king of Lydia. It was conquered by the Persians and constituted the fourth of the 20 satrapies into which Darius divided his empire. The Cilicians paid a tribute to Darius of 360 white horses and 500 talents of silver annually. In the Persian Wars they furnished 100 ships. Cilicia later fell under Macedonian, Syrian, and Roman dominion. The dreaded Cilician pirates were subdued (67 B.C.) by Pompey.

Cilician Gates (si-lis'an). [Also: Beilan Pass, Syrian Gates; Latin, Pylae Ciliciae.] Pass between the Taurus mountains and the NE angle of the Mediterranean, about 25 miles N of Tarsus, leading from Cilicia to Syria. The pass has been in use for almost 3000 years as a passageway through the Taurus.

Cilissa (si-lis'a). According to some accounts, the name of Orestes' nurse. Some say that she placed her own son in Orestes' bed and allowed him to be murdered by Aegisthus, after the murder of Agamemnon, in order to protect Orestes. It was she who recognized him when he returned many years later to avenge his father's death, and told Aegisthus, falsely, that he could go unarmed to the palace and thus made it possible for Orestes to capture and kill Aegisthus.

Cilix (sil'iks). In Greek mythology, a son of Agenor of Canaan (afterward Phoenicia) and Telephassa. He was the brother of Cadmus, Phineus, Phoenix, Thasus, and Europa. When Europa was carried off by Zeus in the form of a bull, Agenor sent his sons to search for her. Cilix journeyed to Asia and there, wearying of his search, settled in the land of the Hypachaeans. The name of the country was changed to Cilicia in his honor.

Cilla (sil'a). According to legend, the daughter of Laomedon and the sister of Priam, king of Troy. Priam interpreted a prophecy that a mother and son of the royal house would cause the destruction of Troy to mean Cilla and her son, who was born the same day as Paris was born to Hecuba and Priam. Priam had Cilla and her child slain.

Cillus (sil'us). In Greek mythology, Pelops' charioteer. On the journey to Elis in Pelops' winged chariot, Cillus died on the island of Lesbos, some say, because the flight across the sea was so swift. He appeared to Pelops in a dream and asked to be given funeral honors. Pelops performed the rites and founded a sanctuary of Cillaean Apollo near his barrow on Lesbos. Some say the ghost of Cillus aided Pelops in his race for the hand of Hippodamia.

Cimbri (sim'brī). Ancient people of central Europe, of uncertain local habitation and ethnographical position. They probably pushed into the Roman provinces in 113 B.C., and in company with the Teutons and Gauls engaged with and defeated Roman armies in southern Gaul and elsewhere (the most notable defeat being that at Arausio of Caepio and Mallius in 105 B.C.) until 101 B.C., when they were defeated and virtually exterminated by Marius near Vercellae in the Padus Valley, N Italy. The peninsula now known as Jutland was named by ancient geographers the Chersonesus Cimbrica (peninsula of the Cimbri) after them.

Cimmeria (si-mir'i-a). Country of the legendary Cimmerians of ancient Greek tales, fabled to be a place of perpetual darkness. Odysseus sailed to the edge of the world to the mist-enshrouded land of the Cimmerians where he made his descent to Tartarus, as instructed to do by Circe, when he was trying to get home to Ithaca after the Trojan War. The Cimmerians of legend are not to be confused with the historical Cimmerians who lived near the Euxine Sea.

Cimmerian Bosphorus (si-mir'i-an bos'pō-rus). [Also: Bosphorus Cimmerius.] In ancient geography, the name of a kingdom in S Sarmatia and also of the strait (modern Kerch Strait) between the Euxine Sea and the Palus Maeotis (now Sea of Azov). The Crimean side was colonized (c600 B.C.) by a Greek expedition from Miletus which founded Panticapaeum (now Kerch) there. It flourished until absorbed in the dominions of Mithridates VI of Pontus, and for some centuries afterward experienced alternating periods of hardship and prosperity. Close relations were early established with Athens, which sent oil, jewelry, and works of industrial art in return for Crimean wheat. The chief city was Panticapaeum, the center of the highly important archaeological discoveries which have been yielded by this region as well as by the territory around it. The first systematic excavations were made in 1816. After 1832 explorations were regularly conducted by the Russian imperial government, and their results, rich in Greek industrial antiquities, were placed in the Hermitage Museum at St. Petersburg. The architectural remains are scanty, perhaps the chief of them being the fine revetment, in quarry-faced ashlar with margin-draft, of the so-called Tumulus of the Czar at Kerch. The sculpture found, too, is scanty in quantity, late in date, and poor in style. The great archaeological wealth of the region lies in its abundant burial tumuli and catacombs. It was the practice of the ancient inhabitants to bury with their dead a large part of their possessions; hence the remarkable harvest of jewelry, vases, implements, and even textile fabrics and a pair of woman's leather boots, found in these graves. Little or nothing discovered is older than the 4th century B.C.; the finest specimens of jewelry and pottery are Athenian, and include some of the most beautiful work known in their classes. Many of the vases are decorated in brilliant polychrome; others have gilded ornament, and others bear figures in relief. Some of the tomb chambers bear interesting mural paintings.

Cimmerians (si-mir'i-anz, ki-). [Older variant names: Gimir, Kimmerians.] Early inhabitants of the N shore of the Euxine Sea, between the Ister (Danube) and Tanais (Don) rivers. The Cimmerians were forced into Asia Minor by Scythian pressure during the 8th century B.C. They plundered the cities of Asia Minor and entered Asia as far as Sardis. They came into conflict with the Assyrians and Phrygians, and after they were defeated by the Lydians in the 7th century B.C., disappeared from history. In the time of Herodotus there were still traces of the Cimmerians in Scythia. He mentions Cimmerian walls and speaks of a settlement the Cimmerians made in the peninsula where the city of Sinope was later situated. Herodotus also says that the strait which unites the Palus Maeotis and the Euxine Sea was called the Cimmerian Bosphorus. In the Old Testament the Cimmerians are mentioned by the name of Gomer (Gen. x. 2).

Cimon (sī'mon). An Athenian noble, father of Miltiades who commanded the Athenians at Marathon. According to Herodotus, he won the four-horse chariot race at the Olympic Games and was banished by Pisistratus. At the next Olympiad he won again with the same team, but he had the victory declared in the name of Pisistratus because he had agreed with the latter that he would do so in exchange for being allowed to return to Athens. Later he won again with the same mares, and the sons of Pisistratus sent men to lie in wait for him and kill him. He was buried outside the city. According to Herodotus, only one other man had ever won the four-horse chariot race three times with the same horses.

Cimon. Son of Miltiades, who gained the victory at Marathon, and Hegesipyle, daughter of Olorus, prince of Thrace. It is said that he led a gay and irresponsible life as a young man, but when Aristides recognized his latent ability and encouraged him to enter public life, he gained popularity quickly with his generosity and his honesty, and added to it with his military victories. One of his first acts was to pay the 50 talents his father had been fined for having deceived the Athenians about the use he intended to make of the 70 ships they had granted him some time after his victory at Marathon. Payment of this sum was a heavy financial burden, but Cimon managed it. He served under Aristides in the Athenian fleet and later (477 B.C.) was made head of the Confederacy of Delos to carry on the war against Persia. He commanded a squadron sent out by the Athenians against Pausanias, the Spartan hero of Plataea, who at this time seemed ready to betray his country to the Persians. Cimon seized Sestos on the Hellespont and drove him out of Byzantium (476 B.C.). He captured Eion (476-5 B.C.), a fortress at the mouth of the Strymon River, from its Persian governor, Boges, and wrested all the cities of the seaboard of Thrace, except Doriscus, from the Persians. After the battle of Marathon, in which the image of Theseus was said to have aided the Athenians, the priestess of Delphi had ordered that the bones of Theseus be recovered from the island of Scyrus and brought to Athens. Scyrus was infested with Dolopian pirates, who continually preyed on Athenian commerce, and the Athenians were warned that the raids would continue so long as the bones of the Athenian hero remained in Scyrus. Cimon led an expedition against Scyrus (c474 B.C.), cleared the pirates from the island, and reduced the natives to slavery. But the inhabitants would not tell him where Theseus was buried. According to tradition, Cimon saw an eagle tearing at the earth with its talons. He regarded this as a sign from heaven, went to the spot, and dug in the hole started by the eagle. A stone coffin was revealed, in which rested the bones of a very tall man and a bronze spear and sword. As the bones of Theseus, these were reverently carried back to Athens and reburied with a great public ceremony in the sanctuary of Theseus. The recovery of the bones of Theseus added greatly to the popularity of the already popular general. As a final blow at Persian power he led an expedition against the Persians in southern waters off Asia Minor, in which he delivered the Greek towns of Caria from Persian rule, brought the Lycian cities into the Confederacy of Delos, and overcame the Persian land and sea forces at the battle of the Eurymedon (468 B.C.). Plunder taken in the expedition was used to rebuild the walls of the Acropolis at Athens. About 463 B.C. he put down a revolt on the island of Thasus and forced the inhabitants to pull down their walls, surrender their ships, and pay tribute to Athens. After the death of Themistocles and Aristides, Cimon had become the dominant figure in Athens and was elected general of the Confederacy year after year. He was a noble and, conservative in his views, did not forward the democracy that was developing in Athens, although by his victories he helped to make it possible. With the rise of Pericles his influence was threatened. He was accused of having accepted a bribe from the Macedonians, but was acquitted. When he led a force to aid Sparta to put down a revolt of the helots, the Athenians were rebuffed by Sparta, who feared the rising power of Athens, and Cimon's policy of friendship with Sparta was repudiated by the Spartans themselves. In his absence from Athens, Pericles and Ephialtes, his political enemies, made many democratic and popular reforms. When Cimon returned, his Spartan policy discredited and Athens insulted, he was denounced as a lover of Sparta and was ostracized (461 B.C.). At the battle of Tanagra (457 B.C.), Cimon appeared at the Athenian camp and asked permission to fight for his country against Sparta, but permission was denied. Nevertheless, his supporters fought so stubbornly that although Athens was defeated, the Spartans were forced to withdraw. Cimon's action in this case prepared the way for his recall. Athens was exhausted by the long war with Sparta and wanted a truce; Cimon was recalled to bring it about (451 B.C.), after which he retired to a place outside Athens. Later he was recalled by Pericles to command an expedition against Persia. At the head of a large fleet he sailed to Cyprus to attack the Phoenician fleet gathered there to keep Cyprus under Persian control. He died at Citium in Cyprus (c450 B.C.) and was buried in Athens. The main points of Cimon's policy were to prosecute the war against Persia, which he did successfully, and to remain on friendly terms with Sparta, for with Athens as a great sea power and Sparta a great land power, a united Greece would be invulnerable. Because of Sparta's fear of the growing power of Athens, this part of Cimon's policy was a failure. One of the main effects of his dominance in Athens was the change in the voluntary nature of the Confederacy of Delos; it became an organization in which membership was compulsory. Carystus, Naxos, and Thasus were forced to pay tribute to it. This marked the emergence of Athens as an empire.

Cimon of Cleonae (klē-ō'nē). Greek painter, born at Cleonae, in Chalcidice, famous in antiquity. He is mentioned in two epigrams of Simonides.

Cincinnatus (sin-si-nā'tus, -nat'us), Lucius Quinctius. Roman hero, to whose life later writers have added embellishments, born c519 B.C.; fl. 1st half of the 5th century B.C. He was consul suffectus in 460 B.C. and distinguished himself as an opponent of the plebeians in the struggle between them and the patricians in the period 462-454 B.C. In 458 B.C. a Roman army under Lucius Minucius having been surrounded by the Aequi in a defile of Mount Algidus, he was named dictator by the Senate whose deputies, dispatched to inform him of his appointment, found him digging in the field on his farm beyond the Tiber. He gained a complete victory over the Aequi, and laid down the dictatorship after the lapse of only 16 days, then returning to his farm. In 439 B.C., at the age of 80, he was appointed dictator to oppose the traitor Spurius Melius, who was defeated and slain. The details of his story vary; the story of the first dictatorship is probably legendary embellishment on a factual basis; that of the second dictatorship is probably wholly false.

Cineas (sin'ē-as). Thessalian politician in the service of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus; died probably in Sicily, c277 B.C. He was ambassador to Rome after the battle of Heraclea in 280 B.C., in which Pyrrhus had defeated the Romans, but could not persuade the Senate to accept his terms.

Cinna (sin'a), Caius Helvius. Roman tribune and poet; a friend of Catullus. On the occasion of the funeral of Julius Caesar (44 B.C.), he was slain by the populace, who mistook him for Lucius Cornelius Cinna (fl. 44 B.C.).

Cinna, Lucius Cornelius. Roman general and statesman; slain in a mutiny at Brundisium, Italy, 84 B.C. He was celebrated as a leader of the popular party and an opponent of Sulla; father of Lucius Cornelius Cinna (fl. 44 B.C.). He was consul with Octavius in 87 B.C., with Marius in 86 B.C., and was also consul in the period 85-84 B.C. During his first consulship he took advantage of Sulla's absence from Rome to recall Marius and attempted to pass a voting bill in opposition to Sulla's partisans. Cinna was defeated in his attempt and was removed as consul. He raised a force and besieged the city. A massacre of Sulla's supporters took place after Marius' return. Cinna's daughter Cornelia was Julius Caesar's first wife.

Cinna, Lucius Cornelius. Roman politician; active 44 B.C. He was the son of Lucius Cornelius Cinna (d. 84 B.C.) and brother-in-law of Julius Caesar. He was praetor in 44 B.C. He sided with the conspirators against Caesar.

Cinyras (sin'e-ras). A mythical king of Cyprus. He was a descendant of Pygmalion and Galatea and established the worship of Aphrodite on the island of Cyprus. It was he who built the famous temple to the goddess there, and it was said that he was the first to use songs in connection with the worship of Aphrodite. For this reason he was noted as one of the earliest musicians. He promised, as one of Helen's former suitors, to send Agamemnon 50 ships to help the Greeks carry on war against Troy. In fact, he sent only one ship and 49 clay models manned with dolls. But he did send a magnificent corselet to Agamemnon, which the latter wore at the siege of Troy. The wife of Cinyras boasted that her daughter Myrrha, or Smyrna as she was sometimes called, was more beautiful than Aphrodite herself. Aphrodite instantly took vengeance on her for her arrogant boast by causing Myrrha to fall in love with her own father. With the aid of a doting nurse Myrrha was brought to her father either in disguise or while he was befuddled by wine. When, after several such meetings, he discovered that his lover was his own daughter, he was filled with horror and tried to kill her. She fled from his sword and was transformed into a myrrh tree, from the trunk of which sprang her child, Adonis, the fruit of her incestuous union with her father. Cinyras was so revolted by the situation that he committed suicide.

Circaeum or Circeium Promontorium (sēr-sē'um prō'mon-tōr'i-um). [Also: Latin, Circeius Mons; modern, Monte Circeo, Circeo or Circello.] Promontory or isolated rock on the W coast of Italy, near ancient Tarracina. It was a frequented resort in ancient times. It has some antiquities of the Roman town Circeii, and abounds in grottoes.

Circe (sēr'sē). In Greek mythology, an enchantress learned in the use of herbs, charms, and spells. She was the daughter of Helius and Persa, and the sister of Aeëtes and Pasiphaë. As it was the custom in Colchis, where she at first dwelt, to bury only women, and as the Colchians did not follow the Greek way of burning bodies on pyres, Circe had a cemetery outside Aea in Colchis where the bodies of men, wrapped in ox-hides, were suspended from willow trees. There as they swayed in the breezes, the birds ate them. Some say that Circe was the daughter of Hecate and Aeëtes, that she was the sister of Medea, and that both sisters excelled in the black arts, but that Circe used her skill for evil purposes, whereas Medea used hers for good. According to these accounts, Circe married a king of Scythia, but poisoned him after a time. She was so wicked and violent she was at last compelled to flee. Some say she went to Italy, and made her home on a promontory which bore her name, Circaeum. But others say she fled to the sea and established her home on an island ringed with alders. This island, which lies at the head of the Adriatic, near the mouth of the Padus, was known as Aea. Circe was noted for her cruel transformations. She fell in love with Picus, and when he spurned her advances, she transformed him into a woodpecker. Glaucus, the sea-god, appealed to her when his love was rejected by Scylla. Circe fell in love with him and suggested that he abandon his love for Scylla and transfer his affections to her. Glaucus refused, saying nothing could change his love for Scylla. Circe was enraged. She could not harm Glaucus, because he was immortal. Therefore she took her revenge on Scylla by transforming her into a hideous and dangerous sea-monster. But she had some loyalty for members of her family. When Jason and Medea visited her island on their way home from Colchis, she purified them of the murder of Apsyrtus by sprinkling the blood of a suckling pig over their hands. On his way home after the Trojan War Odysseus beached his ships on Circe's island. Though they were weary and thirsty, the Greeks hesitated to go ashore in a strange place after the disastrous experiences they had suffered in other unknown lands. By lot, 23 men under the leadership of Eurylochus were chosen to investigate the island. As they approached Circe's palace they were terrified by hordes of lions, wolves, bears, and other animals which came rushing to meet them. But the beasts licked their hands and fawned over them in a most unbestly fashion. The envoys from Odysseus found Circe in her palace. She welcomed them and invited them in. All entered save Eurylochus, who lurked outside to see what would happen. As he watched, he saw Circe give his companions a refreshing drink which they gulped greedily. She then lightly touched their heads and they were instantly turned into swine. Eurylochus fled back to the ship in terror and told all he had seen to Odysseus and begged him to sail with his remaining men at once. However, Odysseus determined to rescue his men. He set out alone for Circe's palace. On the way, Hermes met him and gave him a magic herb which would protect him from Circe's enchantments. He ate the herb, or some say, he merely sniffed actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ċ as d or j, ſ as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

it, and entered the palace. He too was graciously welcomed and given a potion to drink. But when she touched him to transform him, he drew his sword and threatened her. At this Circe fell at his feet and appealed for mercy. She retransformed his men from swine to men again and also at Odysseus' command, transformed the wolves, bears, lions, and other animals back to men. She invited Odysseus and his companions to remain with her and entertained them royally. The Greeks stayed with her a year or more and Circe bore three sons to Odysseus—Agrius, Latinus, and Telegonus. Before Odysseus left Circe to return to Ithaca, she told him that he must go to Tartarus and find Tiresias the seer, who would tell him what to expect in the future. She gave him full directions for the voyage to Tartarus and instructed him what to do when he got there: he must fill a trench with the blood of a young ram and a black ewe; when the shades came to drink of the warm blood, he must keep all except Tiresias away. Tiresias, after drinking the blood, would tell him all he wanted to know. She then sent a fair wind and Odysseus sailed away. But when he was in Tartarus, he met the shade of one of his companions who had been killed on Circe's island and had not been properly buried. So after he had consulted Tiresias, he sailed back to Circe's land to bury the dead sailor. This time she gave him useful advice about how to pass the Sirens in safety and warned him not to harm the cattle of Helius. Some say that Odysseus, having learned from an oracle that his son would kill him, sent Telemachus into exile. He went to Circe's land and married the enchantress.

Circeii (sēr-sē'ī). In ancient geography, a town in Latium, Italy, situated on a former island now attached to the mainland by dune sand, about 57 miles SE of Rome. It belonged (340 B.C.) to the Latin League. Extensive fortifications of the 4th and 3rd centuries B.C. remain.

Circus Maximus (sēr'kus mak'si-mus). Great Roman circus which occupied the hollow between the Palatine and Aventine hills at Rome. According to tradition, the site was already used for athletic exhibitions and provided with wooden seats under the legendary Tarquinius Priscus (c600 B.C.). Under Caesar and Augustus it was for the first time largely built of stone, and splendidly adorned. The present obelisks of the Piazza del Popolo and of the Lateran ornamented its spina (wall within the arena). It was rebuilt by Nero, and again by Domitian and Trajan, and in its final form is said to have accommodated, according to various estimates, from 140,000 to 385,000 spectators. Some of the vaulted substructures which upheld the seats survive, and there are considerable ruins about Santa Maria in Cosmedin of the carceres, or pens, from which the racers were started. The length of the arena was about 2200 ft.

Circus of Romulus (rom'ū-lus) or Maxentius (mak-sen'shus). Roman circus built at Rome in 311 A.D., outside the Porta Appia, considered to be the most perfect ancient circus surviving. It is 1580 feet long and 260 wide. The outer wall remains almost complete, and the central spina (the wall down the center of the arena), 892 feet long, can be traced throughout. At the west end, between two towers, are the chief entrance and 12 pens (carceres) for competing chariots; the east end is semicircular. In the middle of the N side can be distinguished the imperial box. Cirra (sir'a). In ancient geography, the seaport of Crisa (with which it is often confused) in Phocis, Greece. It was destroyed (c575 B.C.) in the First Sacred War, on account of sacrilege in interfering with pilgrims to Delphi.

Cissaea (si-sē'a). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Ivy-goddess." On the citadel at Epidaurus stood a wooden image of Athena Cissaea.

Cisseus (sis'ūs). In Greek legend, a king of Thrace, the father of Hecuba and Theano, Antenor's wife.

Cisseus. In Roman legend (Aeneid), a son of Melampus, the companion of Hercules, and a brother of Gyas. He fought with a club, as did Hercules. He was an ally of Turnus in the war against Aeneas and, in spite of his club, was killed by Aeneas.

Cithaeron (si-thē'ron). In Greek legend, the brother of Helicon. He was a fierce and savage man, who murdered his father and attempted to kill his brother, but as he hurled Helicon from a rocky height, both fell and were dashed to death. The gods changed them both into mountains. Mount Cithaeron

in Boeotia is a wild and rugged mountain, where children were often exposed to die, as was Oedipus. It was also a home of the Furies, and ferocious beasts had their lairs there. Even so, many of the children who were exposed on Mount Cithaeron were saved because of the number of shepherds and herdsmen who watched their flocks on its slopes. Mount Cithaeron was sacred to Zeus and to Dionysus, and its name figures in many Greek myths and legends. According to another account, Cithaeron, a king of Plataea, was loved by the Fury Tisiphone, but he scorned her love and was bitten by one of the serpents of her snaky locks. He died on the mountain and it thereafter bore his name.

Cithaeronian (sith-ér-ō'ni-an). Epithet of Zeus, from Mount Cithaeron in Boeotia, which was sacred to Zeus.

Cithara (sith'ā-rā). A musical instrument with strings and a sounding-board, from which are derived the lute and other instruments, including the cithern, zither, guitar, and others which bear names derived from cithara or kithara. (JJ)

Civilis (si-vī'lis), Julius (or Claudius). Batavian warrior; fl. 70 A.D. He was leader of the Batavian revolt against Rome in the period 69-70 A.D. The uprising, begun in Germany, spread to Gaul. Civilis was successful until defeated by Cerealis in 70.

Civitavecchia (chē''vē-tā-vek'kyä). See Centumcellae.

Clarius (klār'i-us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Of Lots." The spot in Tegea, in Arcadia, where most of the altars of the gods were set up was called the place of Zeus Clarius. Some say the name comes from the casting of lots by which the sons of Arcas divided his kingdom. Here the Tegeans annually celebrated a festival of Zeus Clarius.

Clarus (klār'us). Seat of an ancient oracle of Apollo near Colophon in Asia Minor. Seers at the oracle drank water from a secret well and gave their pronouncements in verse.

Classis (klas'is). In ancient geography, the harbor of Ravenna. Built up by Augustus, it served in Roman times as a port and arsenal.

Claudia Quinta (klō'di-ā kwin'ta). In Roman legend, a woman, probably the sister of Appius Claudius Pulcher. About 204 or 206

B.C., when the ship conveying the image of Cybele stuck fast in a shallow at the mouth of the Tiber and the soothsayers announced that only a chaste woman could move it, she cleared herself from an accusation of incontinency by stepping forward from among the matrons who went forth to receive the image, and towing the vessel to Rome. The story is one of numerous ancient legends in which the woman accused proves her chastity by coming victoriously through some such test, also often called the "act of truth."

Claudius I (klō'di-us). [Full name, Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero; surnamed Germanicus.] Emperor of Rome in the period 41-54 A.D. He was born at Lugdunum in Gaul, Aug. 1, 10 B.C.; died 54 A.D. He was the grandson of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia Drusilla, who afterward became the third wife of Augustus, and son of Drusus Germanicus (sometimes called Drusus Senior) and Antonia, the daughter of Mark Antony. He was excluded from public affairs by Caligula, his predecessor, although the empty honor of consulship was bestowed on him in 37 by his nephew Caligula, on whose murder in 41 he was proclaimed emperor by the praetorian guards. Because Claudius was naturally of a mild and amiable disposition, his accession was signalized by acts of clemency and justice, which, however, under the influence of his third wife, Valeria Messalina, and his favorites, the freedmen Narcissus, Pallas, and others, were subsequently obscured by cruelty and bloodshed. He visited Britain in 43. In 49, after the execution of Messalina, who, during Claudius' absence at Ostia, had contracted a public marriage with Caius Silius, he married his niece Agrippina the younger. She persuaded him to set aside his own son Britannicus, and to adopt her son by a former marriage, Lucius Domitius, as his successor. When he repented of this step soon after, he is thought to have been poisoned by Agrippina, and Lucius Domitius ascended the throne under the name of Nero. The Claudian aqueduct at Rome was built during his reign and named for him. Claudius was noted for his writing, but none of his works is extant.

Claudius, Appius. [Surnamed Sabinus Inregillensis or Regillensis.] Original name, Attus or Attius Clausus. Roman consul.

Coming from Regillum in the Sabine country to Rome c504 B.C., with others of the Claudian family, of whom some were patricians and some plebeians, he seems to have gathered a number of families into a tribe which evidently was a force to be reckoned with, for he was admitted to the ranks of the patricians, at that time taking the name Appius Claudius, and was elected consul in 495 B.C. In that office he applied the laws concerning debts with a severity which caused the plebeians to take refuge on the sacred mount.

Claudius, Appius. [Surnamed Crassus.] Roman consul (471, 451 B.C.). In 451 B.C. he was a decemvir (one of ten magistrates) appointed to draw up a new code of laws. These decemvirs held virtually complete ruling powers during their time in office. In 450 B.C. the group was reconstituted, and Appius Claudius became its leading member, popular with patricians and plebeians alike, although his suggested legislation favoring plebeians roused considerable opposition. He remained in office until the group resigned in 449 B.C. Legend connects Claudius with Virginia, a young woman supposedly killed by her father, Virginius, to save her from being possessed by Appius Claudius, and advances this story as the cause for the public indignation that brought about the fall of the decemvirs. In fact, however, there may not be any connection at all.

Claudius, Appius. [Surnamed Caecus, meaning "the Blind."] Roman statesman, who died after 280 B.C. He was censor in the period 312–c308 B.C., and consul in 307 and 296 B.C. He advised the Romans not to make an alliance with King Pyrrhus of Epirus. He commenced the Appian Way and completed the Appian aqueduct, the first at Rome. He abolished the limitation of the full right of citizenship to landed proprietors.

Claudius, Appius. [Surnamed Pulcher.] Roman politician; brother of Clodius (Publius Clodius Pulcher); died in Euboea, c48 B.C. Before serving as governor in Sardinia he had been praetor in 57 B.C. He was consul in 54, proconsul in Cilicia from 53 to 51, and censor in 50 B.C. In 49 B.C. he was a follower of Pompey.

Claudius, Publius. [Surnamed Pulcher.] Roman consul of the 3rd century B.C.; son of the consul Appius Claudius (surnamed Caecus). While consul in 249 B.C., he commanded the Roman fleet in the course of the First Punic War, and was disastrously defeated at Drepanum. It was believed that this disaster resulted from an impious act by Claudius. Just before the Roman and Carthaginian fleets clashed, the sacred chickens carried on the Roman ships are said to have refused to eat. This act was an alarming omen. Claudius said, "If they will not eat, let them drink," and ordered them thrown overboard. For this and certain other acts, he was accused of treason and heavily fined. It is thought that he died in 246 B.C. or earlier, probably a suicide.

Claudius Ptolemaeus (klō'di-us tol-ē-mē'us). Second century A.D. Alexandrian astronomer and geographer, author of the 13-book System of Mathematics best known by its Arabic title, Almagest, the eight-book Geography, and other works surviving in whole or in part. (JJ)

Claudius Tiberius Germanicus (tī-bir'i-us jēr-man'i-kus). Original name of Britannicus.

Clazomenae (klā-zom'ē-nē). In ancient geography, an Ionian city in Asia Minor, situated about 20 miles SW of Smyrna (Izmir). It was colonized by Cleonaeans and Phliasians who had been driven out of their cities in the Peloponnesus by the Dorians. In its turn it sent colonists to Cardia in the Thracian Chersonese. Clazomenae was conquered by Alyattes, king of Lydia and father of Croesus, and later fell under the dominion of Persia.

Cleanthes (klē-an'thēz). Greek Stoic philosopher, born at Assos, Asia Minor, 331 B.C.; died at Athens, 232 B.C. He was a boxer who attended the lectures of Zeno at Athens, and earned his living at night as a water-carrier. After studying with Zeno for 19 years, he succeeded his master as head of the Stoic school. He is said to have committed suicide by starving himself to death.

Clearchus (klē-är'kus). Greek sculptor of Rhegium, who was active c540–500 B.C. He is said to have made the first image in bronze. According to Pausanias, it was an image of Zeus, made in several pieces, and fastened together with nails. This image was in Sparta. According to legend, Clearchus was a pupil of Daedalus.

Clearchus. Lacedaemonian general, born at

Sparta; executed by Artaxerxes II, 401 B.C. He fought at the battle of Cyzicus in 410 B.C. when the Spartan fleet was destroyed by Alcibiades. In 408 B.C. his tyrannous conduct as governor of Byzantium during the siege by the Athenians led to the surrender of the city by the inhabitants during his absence in Asia, whither he had gone to collect a force to raise the siege. In 406 he fought under Callicratidas at the naval battle of Arginusae, where the Spartans again were defeated, this time by Conon. After the Peloponnesian War he persuaded the ephors (magistrates) to send him as general to Thrace to protect the Greeks against the natives. Having proceeded thither in spite of an order for his recall which overtook him on the way, he was condemned to death. Defeated by a force sent against him, he fled to Cyrus the Younger, who was seeking to wrest the Persian throne from his brother Artaxerxes II. Clearchus offered him his services and raised a force of over 13,000 Greek mercenaries to fight in his cause. A young Athenian officer, Xenophon, later known for his writings, was one of the Greek volunteers in the force. Clearchus, alone of the Greeks, knew that the object of the expedition which now set out under command of Cyrus was Babylon, where Artaxerxes II maintained his forces. When it became apparent to the Greeks that they were on the way to Babylon, a three months' march from the sea, they rebelled. Clearchus, a strict disciplinarian, attempted to put down the rebellion by force, but was unsuccessful. He resorted to a trick. The forces by this time had marched from Celaenae in Phrygia to Tarsus. They were a long way from home. Clearchus called his soldiers together, and then stood before them and wept before he spoke. Then he told them that their rebellion had placed him in an extremely difficult position: either he must break his pledged word to Cyrus or desert the Greeks. What, he asked his men, did they propose to do? They must decide, since he would not command them and could not pay them. They decided to go on as soldiers of Cyrus. Arrived, after a long march, before Babylon, Clearchus refused to adopt the wise plan of battle outlined by Cyrus, but Cyrus did not insist. In the battle against the forces of Artaxerxes II the Greeks were successful, but Cyrus, in his eagerness to slay his hated brother, was slain when he was on the point of victory; his forces fled in confusion. Thus the Greeks found themselves alone in the midst of enemies, and a long march from the sea. Artaxerxes was delighted to get rid of them and let them go. They were to be guided by the Persian satrap Tissaphernes, who marched with his forces ahead of them. On the way the suspicion and hostility between the two forces became so sharp that Clearchus sought a conference with Tissaphernes. Tissaphernes advised him to meet in his tent and to bring the leading Greek generals with him. Clearchus went to the Persian satrap's tent with his principal generals. They were all treacherously seized by Tissaphernes, bound in fetters, and sent to the court of Artaxerxes, where they were executed. The surviving Greeks chose new generals and accomplished the famous retreat known as the "Retreat of the Ten Thousand," the story of which is told in Xenophon's Anabasis.

Cleitias (klī'ti-as). [Also: Kleitias.] Attic vase-painter in the black-figure style, active in the second quarter of the 6th century B.C. The François vase (c570 B.C.), named for its finder and now in Florence, is an amphora signed by Cleitias as the painter and Ergotimus as the potter. There are more than 200 figures on the vase, many of which are identified by inscribed names. The scenes of the decoration include the Calydonian Hunt, Funeral Games for Patroclus, Procession of the gods to the Marriage of Thetis and Peleus, Achilles Pursuing Troilus, Hephaestus Returning to Olympus, Ajax Carrying the Body of Achilles, Battle of the Pygmies and Cranes, and various monsters. A stand in New York and various extant cups also bear the signatures of Cleitias and Ergotimus as painter and potter respectively.

Cleitus (klī'tus). See Clitus.

Clementia (kle-ment'i-a). In later Roman mythology, the personification of forbearance.

Cleobis (klē-ō-bis). See Biton and Cleobis.

Cleobulus (klē-ō-bū'lus, klē-ob'ū-lus). Tyrant of Lindus, born at Lindus, Rhodes, and flourished in the 6th century B.C. He was one of the Seven Sages of Greece. The reputed author of various riddles, he is credited with having formulated the first literary riddle. His daughter Cleobulina shares his reputed skill in riddles, being credited with inventing the riddle on the year: "A father has 12 children, each has 30 daughters, white on one side, black on the other; all are immortal, yet they die."

Cleodaeus (klē-ō-dē'us). In Greek tradition, a son of Hyllus and the grandson of Heracles. Through his grandson Aristodemus he was the ancestor of the two royal houses of Sparta, and the ancestor of many illustrious Spartans.

Cleodice (klē-ōd'i-sē). A daughter of Lacedaemon and Taygete. See Himerus.

Cleombrotus (klē-ōm'brō-tus). Regent of Sparta early in the 5th century B.C. He was the son of Anaxandridas, king of Sparta. Anaxandridas was married to his niece, whom he loved dearly, but as she bore him no children, the Spartan ephors and elders asked him to put her aside and take another wife that he might have an heir to the throne. Anaxandridas refused to give up the wife he loved. He agreed, however, to act on a suggestion of the ephors and elders, which was to take an additional wife, while he continued to love and honor his first wife as before. As a result of this advice he had two wives and lived with them in two separate houses; this was quite contrary to Spartan custom. The new wife bore him Cleomenes, who became his legitimate heir. Then the first wife produced, in rapid succession, Dorieus, Leonidas (the hero of Thermopylae), and Cleombrotus. Cleombrotus was regent of Sparta during the Persian War and commanded the forces that gathered at the Isthmus of Corinth after the death of Leonidas and built a wall across the Isthmus to keep the Persians out of the Peloponnesus. When the wall was built, Cleombrotus sacrificed victims to learn whether he should march against the Persians. As he was offering the sacrifices, the face of the sun was darkened in mid-sky. Cleombrotus interpreted this as a warning and marched his army back to Sparta, where shortly thereafter he died. The prodigy of the darkened sun was a partial eclipse which occurred October 2, 480 B.C.

Cleombrotus I. King of Sparta, 380-371 B.C.;

killed at Leuctra, 371 B.C. He was co-king with Agesilaus, and was sent to Boeotia (378 B.C.) when the pro-Spartan rulers of Thebes were slain and the Spartan garrison expelled from the city as the result of a plot by the Theban patriot Pelopidas. Various maneuvers carried on by Cleombrotus in the vicinity were fruitless. He could not enter Boeotia because the mountain passes of Cithaeron were securely held by the Thebans. In 371 B.C. he led an army from Phocis against Thebes, to free the Boeotian cities from the Boeotian Confederacy which some had joined under compulsion. This march was a distinct violation of the Peace of Callias, concluded in the same year, by which all the signatories, Sparta among them, agreed to bring their armies home and remove their garrisons from foreign cities. Cleombrotus went first to the port of Creusis on the Gulf of Corinth, seized it and captured some Theban ships at anchor there. He then proceeded toward Thebes. The Thebans under Epaminondas marched out against him and barred his way at Leuctra. The Thebans took up position on the hills on one side of the Asopus River; the Spartans ranged themselves on the hills across the stream. When the opposing forces moved down the hills and engaged, the army of Cleombrotus was shattered by the impact of the Thebans, spearheaded by the Sacred Band. Cleombrotus was slain in the fighting and his army admitted defeat by asking for a truce to bury their dead (371 B.C.). This defeat marked the end of Spartan leadership in Greece that had been unquestioned since the end of the Peloponnesian Wars (404 B.C.).

Cleomedes (klē-ō-mē'dēz). According to Pausanias, an athlete of Astypalea who killed his opponent in a boxing match at the Olympic Games. Being fined for foul play and denied the prize, he went mad. He went to a school in Astypalea and pulled down the roof on 60 children. The people of the town stoned him, and he fled to the sanctuary of Athena and hid in a chest there. The people followed him into the sanctuary and tried to pull up the lid of the chest. For a time it resisted them, and when they did succeed in opening the chest, they found no trace of Cleomedes. Being perplexed, the citizens consulted the oracle at Delphi and were told:

"Last of heroes is Cleomedes of Astypalea; Honor him with sacrifices as being no longer a mortal."

Ever after, the people of Astypalea honored Cleomedes as a hero.

Cleomedes. Greek astronomer (c1st century B.C.). His birthplace and residence are unknown. He wrote a treatise on astronomy and cosmography, entitled The Circular Motion of the Heavenly Bodies, in which he maintains that the earth is spherical, that the number of the fixed stars is infinite, and that the moon's rotation on its axis is performed in the same time as its synodical revolution about the earth. His treatise contains also the first notice of the theory of atmospheric refraction.

Cleomenes I (klē-om'ē-nēz). King of Sparta from c519-487 B.C. He was the son of Anaxandridas, king of Sparta, and half-brother to Cleombrotus (q.v.), Dorieus, and Leonidas. He succeeded his father as king. Maeandrius, a man of Samos, fled to Sparta to seek aid against the Persians. He sought to bribe Cleomenes, but the latter refused to accept the bribe and advised the Spartan ephors to send Maeandrius away, lest he succeed in bribing someone else to give aid to Samos. Aristagoras also sought his aid when he was stirring up the Ionian revolt against the Persians. He painted a glowing picture of the ease with which Cleomenes could overcome the Persians and of the treasures he would gain thereby. Cleomenes, on learning that the Persian capital was a three-month march from the sea, refused to consider fighting the Persians and ordered Aristagoras to leave Sparta before sunset. Aristagoras persisted. He took an olive branch and went as a suppliant to Cleomenes' house. He offered him ten talents if he would bring Sparta to the aid of the Ionians. Cleomenes shook his head. Aristagoras raised the offer, and continued to raise it each time Cleomenes shook his head. At last Gorgo, the eight or nine year old daughter of Cleomenes who was present at this interview, interrupted and advised her father to send the stranger away before he was corrupted. Cleomenes thought her advice was good and sent Aristagoras away. At the same time, he again proved his own honesty. In 510 B.C., as a consequence of repeated reminders from the oracle at Delphi to free the Athenians from the tyrannical Pisistratidae, Cleomenes led a force of Spartans against Athens and drove Hippias out of the city. He interfered in a struggle for control of Athens by ordering Clisthenes (one of two men who sought to rule the city) and his followers to leave Athens. He also sent 700 Athenian families into exile at the request of Isagoras and established the latter as ruler of Athens. But when he attempted to dissolve the Athenian council, the council resisted and, supported by the rest of the Athenians, compelled Cleomenes to withdraw. Thus was the oracle fulfilled, for when Cleomenes first went to the citadel of Athens and attempted to enter the temple, the priestess rose up and told him to withdraw. At the time Cleomenes ignored her command, but in the end he was forced to withdraw from the city. Cleomenes felt that the Athenians had insulted him and resolved to punish them. He gathered a large force and invaded Eleusis, where he cut down the sacred grove of the goddess. The Athenians marched to Eleusis to engage him, but as the two forces were about to go into battle, the Corinthian allies of Cleomenes withdrew. Demaratus, co-king of Sparta with Cleomenes, withdrew his forces also, and the other allies, seeing that the kings were not agreed, also withdrew. Cleomenes was compelled to retire. After this Cleomenes contrived the removal of Demaratus as co-king (491 B.C.), on the grounds that Demaratus was not the true son of Ariston, king of Sparta. Cleomenes achieved success in this matter by bribing the priestess at Delphi to say that Demaratus was not the true son of Ariston. After this Leotyichides, son of Menares, became co-king with Cleomenes. When the Spartans learned of the bribe, Cleomenes was forced to flee, first to Thessaly, and then to Arcadia. There he stirred up the Arcadians against Sparta. The Spartans learned of his activities, and fearing that he might raise a war against them, invited him to return to Sparta and be king as before. On his return Cleomenes, who according to Herodotus had never been of very sound mind, was overcome by outright madness. This was caused, according to the Spartans, because of his habit of drinking wine unmixed with water. He struck every Spartan he met on the face with his scepter. The Spartans saw that he was mad and put him in prison, binding him in stocks. From a frightened helot he secured a knife and so gashed himself that he died of the wounds. The Greeks in general thought he had become mad for seducing the priestess of Delphi, but the Athenians considered that his horrible end was a punishment for destroying the sacred grove at Eleusis. The Argives had another account of his end. Once he had thought the oracle at Delphi told him he could take Argos. He led a force of Spartans to the Erasinus River to cross over to Argos. At the banks of the river he offered sacrifices but the victims were not favorable. He therefore embarked this forces on ships and went to Nauplia. The Argives marched to meet him and were defeated. Many of them sought refuge in the sacred grove of Argus. Cleomenes called for the leading Argive warriors by name, one at a time, pretending he had received their ransoms. When they came out of the grove, he treacherously killed them. His treachery being discovered, no more Argives came forth when he called their names. He now ordered his helots to set the grove afire, and some 6000 Argives who had taken refuge therein perished. When he learned that the grove was sacred to Argus, he felt that the oracle that told him he would take Argos had deceived him, and that now the oracle was fulfilled. The Argives said his end at his own hands was caused by his violation of the sacred grove and by his later blasphemy at the temple of Hera in Argos. As he had no son, only the one daughter Gorgo, Cleomenes was succeeded by his half-brother Leonidas, the older half-brother Dorieus having died.

Cleomenes III. King of Sparta, c225-c220 B.C., who died c219 B.C. He abolished the ephorate (a magistracy controlling the kings) in 225 B.C., waged war with the Achaean League and Macedonia in the period 225-222 B.C., and was defeated at Sellasia in 222 B.C.

Cleon (klē'on). Athenian demagogue, killed at Amphipolis, Macedonia, 422 B.C. He was the son of Cleaenetus, a tanner, and was one of a new class of leaders who came to the forefront in Athens during the Peloponnesian Wars. He was of the people as distinguished from the former leaders who had come from the aristocratic class, and won his place by his eloquence, shrewdness, daring, and ability. As unofficial leader of the Athenian Assembly, he was an opponent of Pericles whom he accused of maladministration. After the death of Pericles (429 B.C.) he became one of the foremost men in Athenian public life. He was an imperialist, whose policy it was to keep a tight rein on the Athenian allies and to maintain Athenian power by force. In furtherance of his policy he belonged to the war party that urged and supported continuation of the war against Sparta. In 428 B.C. Mytilene, a free ally of Athens, revolted. The revolt was put down after a siege in 427 B.C. Cleon used his influence in the Athenian Assembly to demand death for all the adult males of Mytilene and enslavement of the women and children. He argued that to be a strong state and rule an empire strong measures must be used to crush opposition. The sentence he urged was so voted, but a reaction immediately set in and the sentence was reconsidered and revoked the next day. In succeeding years Cleon opposed Nicias, one of the chief military leaders of Athens and the head of the aristocratic party, who advocated peace with Sparta and the conclusion of the Peloponnesian War. As leader of the democratic party he called himself "the people's watch-dog" and opposed those whom he suspected of undermining the democracy. Under his leadership the pay of jurors was increased, partly to help the citizens impoverished by the war, the tribute required of the allies was greatly increased, and the temple treasuries were depleted of some of their treasures "borrowed" to help defray the costs of the war. When the Spartans occupied Pylus in Messenia, they were attacked by the Athenians, driven to the island of Sphacteria lying off the shore of Pylus, and blockaded by an Athenian fleet. They asked for a truce and sent an embassy to Athens proposing peace terms that would allow the Athenians to keep the advantages they had won owing, as the

Spartans said, to Spartan "misfortunes." Cleon countered with such terms as he knew the Spartans could not accept. The Spartan embassy returned to Sphacteria and the garrison there submitted to siege (425 B.C.). As the weeks passed and the Spartan garrison continued to withstand the siege, Cleon suffered some loss of popularity because he had prevented peace. He expressed impatience with the delay in taking the island. He criticized the generals in Athens for not going to Pylus and taking charge of the siege themselves, and ended by saying that if he were commander, he would go and capture the Spartan garrison himself. Nicias, the commander, offered to give Cleon whatever forces he required and to send him there. As described by Thucydides, when Cleon saw that Nicias was in earnest, he tried to back out, saying that Nicias, not he, was the general. But Nicias formally gave him the command in the presence of the Assembly. Cleon tried again to withdraw, but the more he shrank from the undertaking, the more the people called on him to head the expedition. Finding himself boxed in by his own words, he asked for certain troops and promised either to take the Spartan garrison on Sphacteria alive or kill them on the spot, and within 20 days. These bold words evoked laughter from the Athenians, for it was well-known that Spartans were never taken alive. In Thucydides' words, "sensible men comforted themselves with the reflection that they must gain in either circumstance; either they would be rid of Cleon, which they rather hoped, or if disappointed in this expectation, would reduce the Lacedaemonians." As it turned out, the latter circumstance was fulfilled. Contrary to all expectations, Cleon brought about the surrender of the Spartan garrison within the promised 20 days, largely, to be sure, through the skill of his colleague, the Athenian general Demosthenes. Two hundred ninety-two Lacedaemonians were taken alive to Athens. Nothing that had happened in the war surprised the Greeks as much as this, for such was the reputation of the Spartans for fighting either to victory or death that it was impossible to believe that Cleon, a man of no military experience, had compelled them to surrender. The victory completely vindicated Cleon, reestablished his popularity, and gave him immense advantage over his political rivals. In the spring of 422 B.C. Cleon sailed as commander of an expedition to recover Amphipolis in Macedonia, which had been taken by the Spartans in 424 B.C. He marched toward Amphipolis, but on observing the Spartan commander Brasidas sacrificing in the city, and noting what seemed to be large forces, he ordered his men to retreat without engaging in battle. Noting the retreat, Brasidas sallied out and fell on the Athenians. They were thrown into confusion by the onslaught and fled. Cleon joined them in panic-stricken flight, and was killed by the enemy as he fled. Cleon was satirized by Aristophanes in the Acharnians, the Wasps, and especially in the Knights (424 B.C.), in which Aristophanes himself was forced to play Cleon, as none of the players dared to take the role that showed the popular hero in an unfavorable light. However, Aristophanes' picture of Cleon was colored by the fact that the latter had hailed him before the courts because of an earlier comedy. Thucydides too, who gives an unfavorable portrayal of Cleon in his history of the Peloponnesian Wars, was undoubtedly prejudiced by the fact that Cleon had caused him to be exiled after the loss of Amphipolis (424 B.C.).

Cleonae (klē-ō'nē). In ancient geography, a city on the road between Corinth and Argos, in Greece. Some say it was named for Cleones, a son of Pelops, who founded the city. Others say it was named for Cleone, a daughter of the river-god Asopus. Here Heracles ambushed Eurytus and Cteatus as they were going from Elis to the Isthmian Games and killed them, and here they had their tomb. Men of Cleonae went to the Trojan War under the command of Agamemnon. In the city was a temple of Heracles. According to some accounts, he established it himself after he had killed Eurytus, son of Augeas, near there. Others say he would not have been so presumptuous as to set up a temple to himself as if he were a god; therefore, it must have been established after his death.

Cleone (klē-ō'nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the river-god Asopus. Some say the city of Cleonae in Argolis was named for her.

Cleopatra (klē-ō-pā'tra, -pat'ra). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Tros and Cal-lirhoë, daughter of the river-god Scamander. She was the sister of Assaracus, Ilus, and Ganymede.

Cleopatra. In Greek legend, a daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, and the sister of Calais and Zetes. She was the wife of Phineus by whom she had two sons. According to some accounts, after the death of Cleopatra, Phineus married Idaea, who falsely accused Cleopatra's sons. Phineus tortured them and cast them in prison. They were freed later, when Phineus learned from Calais and Zetes that the accusations were false. Other accounts say that Phineus cast aside Cleopatra in favor of Idaea, and blinded Cleopatra's sons; and that Calais and Zetes restored the sight of their nephews and gave the kingdom of Phineus to Cleopatra.

Cleopatra. In Greek legend, the daughter of Marpessa and Idas, and the wife of Meleager. According to one account, she persuaded Meleager to resume an active part in the fight, from which he had withdrawn in anger at his mother, to drive off the Curetes who were attacking the gates of Calydon. When Meleager later died as a result of his mother's wrath, Cleopatra killed herself. She was also known as Alcyone.

Cleopatra. Wife of Philip II of Macedon; died c335 B.C. She was the niece of Attalus, one of Philip's generals. Philip divorced his wife Olympias, the mother of Alexander, to marry her. After the murder of Philip (336 B.C.), Cleopatra's father was murdered, her infant was slain in her arms, and she was forced to hang herself. These murders were brought about by Olympias in revenge for being cast aside by Philip. They also removed a possible rival of Alexander for the throne and those who might contest his right to it.

Cleopatra. [In the chronology of Egyptian queens, Cleopatra VII.] Last Macedonian queen of Egypt, born at Alexandria, Egypt, 69 B.C.; died there, 30 B.C. She was the daughter of Ptolemy XII, called Ptolemy Auletes. In accordance with Egyptian tradition, she was wife of and joint ruler with her brother Ptolemy XIII from 51 to 49 B.C., when she was expelled by him. Her reinstatement in 48 B.C. by Caesar gave rise to war between Caesar and Ptolemy. The latter was defeated and killed, and his younger brother, Ptolemy XIV, was elevated to the throne in his stead and married to her. Cleopatra lived with Caesar at Rome from 46 to 44 B.C., and had by him a son, Ptolemy XV, usually known as Caesarion because of his father; the child was afterward put to death by Augustus. She returned to Egypt after the murder of Caesar, and in the civil war which ensued sided with the Triumvirate (Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus). Mark Antony having been appointed ruler of Asia and the East, she visited him at Tarsus in Cilicia in 41 B.C., making a voyage of extraordinary splendor and magnificence up the Cydnus. She gained by her charms a complete ascendancy over him. On her account he divorced his wife Octavia, the sister of Octavian, in 32 B.C. Octavian declared war against her in 31 B.C. The fleet of Antony and Cleopatra was defeated in the same year as the battle of Actium, which was decided by the flight of Cleopatra's ships, Antony being forced to follow. After the death of Antony, who killed himself on hearing a false report of her death (according to some, a report deliberately spread by her in an attempt to win Octavian's favor by causing his death), she poisoned herself to avoid being exhibited at Rome at the triumph of Octavian, but not until she had made an attempt to charm Octavian as she had Caesar and Antony. According to the popular belief, she applied to her bosom an asp that had been secretly conveyed to her in a basket of figs. Octavian was so anxious to have her in his triumphal procession that, some say, he sent a snake charmer to try to revive her by sucking out the poison. Cleopatra had three children by Antony. Besides extraordinary charms of person, she possessed an active and cultivated mind, and is said to have been able to converse in seven languages. Her reputed personality and the events of the latter part of her reign, as described by Plutarch, form the basis of Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra.

Cleophon (klē'ō-fon). Athenian demagogue; executed 404 B.C. He was a lyremaker, and was said to be of Thracian origin. He came to the forefront in the last years of the Peloponnesian War. He favored a strong imperialist policy, was a leader of the war party, and opposed the oligarchical party. As a popular leader he instituted the "two-obol" payment, which is thought to have been a kind of dole to those whose livelihoods had been destroyed by the long war with Sparta, and he provided employment for the impoverished Athenians by a program of public works, among them being the completion of the Erechtheum. After the Athenian victory over the Peloponnesian fleet at Cyzicus (410 B.C.), Sparta made peace offers to Athens which would have ended the war in a draw. Cleophon opposed the terms and they were rejected. Again, in 406 B.C., following the Athenian victory at Arginusae, Sparta proposed peace and again Cleophon used his considerable influence to oppose it. A year later the Spartans defeated the Athenians at Aegospotami and followed up their victory by blockading Athens. Athens was now compelled to seek peace. Cleophon, who had twice prevented the conclusion of an honorable peace, now prevented the acceptance of terms that were humiliating. However, the Athenians, blockaded and starving, had no longer any choice. In a wave of feeling against him, Cleophon was sentenced to death in 404 B.C. by the Athenian council and executed.

Cleophrades (klē-of'ra-dēz). Attic potter, active at the beginning of the 5th century B.C. The painter who decorated his work, in the red-figure style, is known as the Cleophrades Painter. Over 100 large vessels—craters and hydriai—attributed to the Cleophrades Painter are extant. Of these, there are nine Panathenaic amphorae (the ceremonial vessels awarded at the great festival), in the traditional black-figure style. Two calyx craters (New York and Tarquinia) show youths arming. An amphora (Munich) c500 B.C., shows Dionysus with maenads and satyrs on the body of the vessel, and scenes of the palestra on the neck. Of two more amphorae in Munich one shows the departure of a warrior and scenes of the palestra in red-figure, with a hunting scene on the rim of the vessel and a chariot race on the lid, in black-figure. The other amphora has a figure of Heracles on one side, prepared to do battle with the centaur on the other side. An amphora (New York) similarly decorated with a single figure on each side shows Apollo raising his bow on one side, against Heracles, who is carrying off the Delphic tripod on the other. A hydria (Naples) has an Iliupersis (Sack of Troy). The Cleophrades Painter, known by that name for lack of knowledge as to his real name for a long time, has been identified by his real name, Epictetus, but is not to be confused with the vase-painter Epictetus who lived a generation earlier.

Cleostratus (klē-os'tra-tus). Greek poet of Tenedos, active in the 6th century B.C. He observed the stars from Mount Ida, and was the first poet on record to use astronomy as a subject for his poems.

Cleothera (klē-ō-thē'ra). A daughter of Pandareus and Harmothoë. See Merope.

Clepsydra (klep'si-dra). Spring on the slope of Ithome in Messenia. The Messenians say that after the Curetes had stolen him to protect him from his father Cronus, Zeus was brought to Messenia and reared there by two nymphs, Ithome and Neda. The mountain in Messenia was named for Ithome and the river for Neda. The nymphs bathed Zeus in the spring of Clepsydra, and ever after water from this spring was daily carried to the sanctuary of Zeus at Ithome.

Clide (klī'dē). A nymph of the island of Naxos. According to some accounts, she helped care for the infant Dionysus when he was brought to the island of Naxos for safe-keeping.

Clinias (klī'ni-as). Athenian commander; killed at the battle of Coronea, 447 B.C. He was the father of Alcibiades. In the Persian War he furnished a vessel and provided 200 men at his own expense. He served with distinction at the battle of Artemisium in 480 B.C.

Clinias. Pythagorean philosopher; fl. c400 B.C. He was a friend of Plato, and a native of Tarentum.

Clinis (klī'nis). According to legend, a Mesopotamian who lived near Babylon. He was beloved by Artemis and Apollo. He wanted to sacrifice asses to Apollo, as the Hyperboreans did, but Apollo forbade him to do so and commanded him to sacrifice only actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; $\pi\eta$, then; δ as d or j, ς as s or sh, τ as t or ch, ζ as z or zh.

sheep, goats, and heifers. However, the sons of Clinis disobeyed the god's command and sacrificed asses. To punish them, Apollo caused the animals to go into a frenzy and attack the family of Clinis. The other gods took pity on them and transformed them into birds to save them from the maddened animals.

Clio (klī'ō). One of the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne. She is the muse who sings of glorious actions; specifically, the muse of History. She is usually represented with a scroll in her hand and a scrinium (case for manuscripts) by her side, and sometimes with the trumpet of fame in her hand. According to some accounts, as a punishment because Clio had mocked Aphrodite for her attachment to Adonis, Aphrodite caused her to fall in love with Pierus, to whom she bore Hyacinthus. See Muses.

Clisthenes (klis'thē-nēz) or Cleisthenes (klis'-). Tyrant of Sicyon, a city in the Peloponnesus, early in the 6th century B.C. (fl. 580 B.C.). He was leader of the Ionian part of the population, who turned upon the conquering Dorians and subjected and humiliated them. When he was at war with Argos, a Dorian city, he decreed an end to the contests of the rhapsodists at Sicyon because Argos and the Argives figured so prominently in the Homeric poems. He also sought to extinguish the worship of the Argive hero Adrastus in Sicyon. Clisthenes consulted the oracle at Delphi on this matter. The priestess said to him, "Adrastus is the Sicyonians' king, but you are only a robber." After this discouraging reply Clisthenes dared not use direct means to expel Adrastus, and sought to end his worship by establishing a shrine of Melanippus in Sicyon. Melanippus was a Theban hero and a great enemy of Adrastus, having slain his brother and his son-in-law Tydeus. Once Clisthenes had established the shrine of Melanippus he took away all the honors formerly bestowed on Adrastus and accorded them to Melanippus. He also renamed the Sicyonian tribes so that they would not have the same names as the Argive tribes. He had a daughter, Agariste, for whom he wished to find the best husband in Greece. At the Olympic Games, at which he won the chariot race, he had a proclamation made in which he invited all who considered themselves worthy to be his son-in-law to come and visit him for a year in Sicyon, at the end of which time he would choose one of them for his daughter. Many nobles from all over the Greek world accepted his invitation. They assembled from Italy, Aetolia, all over the Peloponnesus, Athens, Euboea, and Thessaly. Clisthenes prepared athletic grounds to test their prowess. In the year following their arrival the suitors were observed and tested as to their backgrounds, characters, accomplishments, and above all, their social accomplishments, and for this reason many hours were spent over the banquet table. During the year Clisthenes watched them closely, and found that the two who pleased him most were Hippocles and Megacles, both of Athens; and of the two he preferred Hippocles. When the time came for him to announce the successful suitor, he sacrificed 100 oxen and gave a great feast. The suitors entertained with speech and song. Hippocles called to the flute players for a dance, whereupon he himself got up and began to dance. Clisthenes observed him with misgiving. Then Hippocles called for a table, leaped upon it and continued to dance wildly. As Clisthenes watched with growing disgust, Hippocles stood on his head on the table and made his feet do a jig in the air. Clisthenes lost all patience with him and called out, "You have danced your wife away." But Hippocles was besotted with his own dancing and replied, "What does Hippocles care?" From then on his reply became proverbial. Clisthenes now announced that the Alcmaeonid Megacles was his choice for a son-in-law. He gave rich presents and many compliments to the unsuccessful suitors and sent them back to their homes. Among the famous descendants of Clisthenes from this marriage were Clisthenes of Athens and Pericles. Clisthenes supported the Amphictyonic League in defending Delphi in the First Sacred War (590 B.C.). The men of Crisa (Cirrha), in whose territory the oracle of Apollo had been founded at Delphi, claimed control of it and levied toll on all visitors passing through their land to Delphi. The Delphian priests wished to be masters of their oracle and sought help from the Am-phictyonic League, to which Clisthenes also gave his aid for the holy war in defense of the oracle. Crisa was taken after a struggle and destroyed. The land around the city was dedicated to the god, and the gulf formerly called Crisean was henceforth known as the Gulf of Corinth. From this time the priests at Delphi became independent, and from this dates the period of the ascendancy of the Delphic oracle. The Pythian Games were splendidly reorganized, and Clisthenes won in the first chariot-race of the reorganized games. Valiant and able in war, Clisthenes was reputed a wise and humane ruler.

Clisthenes or Cleisthenes. Athenian politician of the 6th century B.C. He was the son of Megacles and the grandson of Clisthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, and was the most prominent of the Alcmaeonidae, the noble family important in Athenian politics at that period. Clisthenes and Isagoras struggled for control of Athens after the Pisistratid tyrants had been expelled with the aid of Cleomenes the Spartan (510 B.C.). Clisthenes won the advantage. He developed in a democratic spirit the constitution of Solon (adopted 594 B.C.) by substituting ten new for four old tribes, with a view to breaking up the influence of the landowning aristocracy, the new tribes being composed not of contiguous demes (local administrative communities), but of demes scattered through the area and interspersed with those of other tribes. The new tribes, which he named for native Athenian heroes, included new classes of free inhabitants and, with an enlarged council of 500, formed the basis of a popular government. Clisthenes, his followers, and 700 families who supported him were expelled in 507 B.C. by Isagoras, leader of the aristocratic party, aided by a Spartan army under Cleomenes, but he was recalled in the same year by the populace, which compelled the Spartans to withdraw and sent Isagoras into exile. On regaining his power he feared the Spartans, and sent envoys to King Darius in Susa to ask a treaty of alliance with the Persians. Darius agreed to an alliance provided the Athenians would give him earth and water as tokens of their submission to the Persians. The envoys agreed to this, but when they returned to Athens, they were disgraced for their submission to Darius and the treaty of alliance was abandoned. According to tradition, Clisthenes established ostracism, the power of the sovereign popular assembly, the ecclesia, to decree, by means of a secret ballot, the banishment of any citizen who endangered the public liberty.

Clite (klí'tē). In Greek legend, the wife of Cyzicus, king of the Doliones. She had just married Cyzicus when the Argonauts came to his shores. He welcomed them warmly and they parted on friendly terms, but during the night they were driven back to his shores in a storm and by a tragic mistake they killed Cyzicus. Clite hanged herself in despair at the loss of her husband. The nymphs of the grove wept so for her that their tears created a fountain, to which her name was given.

Clitomachus (klí-tom'á-kus). [Original name, Hasdrubal.] Carthaginian philosopher; born c186 B.C.; died c110 B.C. He settled at Athens about 146 B.C., and succeeded (c127 B.C.) Carneades as leader of the New Academy.

Clitor (klí'tor). In ancient geography, a city in Arcadia, Greece. According to tradition, Clitor, the son of Azan and the grandson of Arcas, was a powerful king in Arcadia, who lived in Lycosura. He founded the city of Clitor and named it for himself. The city was on a level spot surrounded by low hills. It had several temples, of Demeter, Asclepius, Ilithyia, and the Dioscuri, among others, and, according to Ovid, a fountain called the Clitorium, the water from which was said to destroy the desire for wine. The river Clitor flowed nearby. It was supposed to contain dappled fish that sang like thrushes.

Clitumnus (klí-tum'nus). [Modern name, Clitumno.] River in Umbria, Italy, an affluent of the Tinea. It is celebrated (especially through the descriptions of the younger Pliny) for its sanctity and beauty. He mentions especially the existence of shrines to the river deity (Clitumnus) at its source.

Clitus (klí'tus). According to legend, a son of Mantius and the grandson of Melampus the seer. Eos fell in love with his beauty and carried him off.

328 B.C. He was the friend and foster brother, so-called, of Alexander the Great, and accompanied him on the campaigns in Asia. At the battle of the Granicus River (334 B.C.) he saved Alexander's life. As Alexander increased his conquests and penetrated deeper into Asia, he adopted Oriental customs which were greatly resented by many of his Macedonian friends. At Maracanda Alexander summoned his friends, Clitus among them, to a feast. In former years Alexander had been most temperate in his habits, but on the march through Media and into the depths of Asia he and his men became accustomed to drinking the strong wine of the country as the only means of quenching their thirst; since the water in many places was not fit to drink. On this, as on other evenings, much wine flowed. The poets and musicians who accompanied the army sang the praises of Alexander, comparing him to the Dioscuri in whose honor the feast was given. Clitus, having drunk deep, suddenly leaped up and accused the singers of blasphemy. Inflamed by wine and deep resentment, he accused Alexander of preferring the conquered barbarians, who bowed the knee to him, to the company of free-born Greeks who dared speak their minds. Friends of both tried to quiet Clitus, but he insisted on pouring out his grievances and complaints against Alexander and went so far as to imply that Alexander unjustly took credit for victories his friends had won. Elders in the company removed Alexander's sword, but when Clitus reminded Alexander that he had saved his life and recited some verses of Euripides with an implied insult, Alexander seized a spear and ran it through his old friend's body. Although he instantly came to his senses and would have killed himself in his remorse for the death of his friend, the slaying of Clitus by Alexander in a drunken brawl marks the beginning of a definite change, for the worse, in Alexander's relation to his own Macedonians and in his ideas of kingship.

Cloaca Maxima (klō-ā'ka mak'si-ma). Chief drain of ancient Rome, said to have been built by Tarquinius Superbus c600 B.C. Part of it is still in existence and much of it does not pre-date the 3rd century B.C. The outlet on the Tiber River is an arch about 12 feet high with three concentric tiers of massive voussoirs, fitted without cement.

Cloacina (klō-ā-sī'na). See Cluacina.

Cloanthus (klō-an'thus). In Roman legend, a Trojan who accompanied Aeneas in his flight from Troy. His ship was driven apart from the others in a great storm off Sicily, and Aeneas thought that he had perished. But he was saved and, unaware that Aeneas still lived, he arrived at Dido's palace to seek help just as Aeneas was approaching it hidden in a cloud. In the funeral games in honor of Anchises in Sicily Cloanthus won the boat race. He was the legendary founder of the Roman family Cluentius.

Clodia (klō'di-a). Roman woman of patrician family; fl. 1st century B.C. The sister of Appius Claudius and of Publius Clodius (both surnamed Pulcher), she was reputedly of great beauty, intelligence, ambition, and extremely unconventional morals. Among her several lovers was Catullus, in whose poems she appears under the name of Lesbia. She was accused of murdering her husband Q. Caecilius Metellus Celer, and on her part she alleged that one of her lovers, M. Caelius Rufus, tried to murder her.

Clodius (klō'di-us), Publius. [Also: Claudius; surnamed Pulcher.] Roman adventurer and demagogue, born c93 B.C.; died Jan. 20, 52 B.C. He was the brother of Appius Claudius (also surnamed Pulcher) and of Clodia. He fought in the Third Mithridatic War, and when his services were not as well rewarded by Lucullus as he wished, he instigated a revolt, beginning the career of violence which made him notorious. In 62 B.C., disguising himself as a woman, he got admitted to the house of Julius Caesar during the observance of the Bona Dea ceremonies which were for women only. This caused a great scandal; one result was that Caesar divorced his wife Pompeia, who was said to have aided Clodius to gain entrance to the ceremonies. Another result was that Cicero prosecuted Clodius, who won acquittal by bribery and became Cicero's relentless enemy. Clodius, a member of a patrician family, arranged to be adopted by a plebeian so that he might qualify for the office of tribune, which offered the maximum opportunity for demagoguery. He was elected tribune in 58 B.C. and brought about the exile of Cicero and of Cato the Younger, causing Cicero's property, moreover, to be confiscated. Determined to dominate Rome, Clodius not only wooed public favor by demagogic means, but also organized gangs of strong-armed men to assault his enemies. Pompey and Milo organized a rival mob, and Rome was terrorized by the violent conflicts of these opposing forces until Clodius was killed by Milo's adherents. The disorders promoted by Clodius prepared the way for the civil war between Pompey and Caesar.

Cloelia (klē'li-a). In Roman legend, a maiden of Rome, delivered as a hostage to Lars Porsena c508 B.C. She escaped by swimming across the Tiber and returned to Rome. The Romans in all honor returned her into the hands of Porsena. He, however, in token of her courage, released her along with her fellow hostages.

Clotho (klō'thō). In Greek mythology, that one of the three Fates or Moerae who spins the thread of life.

Clouds, The. Comedy of Aristophanes, presented in 423 B.C. Strepsiades (Turncoat) sends his spendthrift son Phidippides to the phrontistery (thinking-shop) of Socrates, who appears as a sophist, to be reformed by training in rhetoric. Phidippides refuses to go; so Strepsiades goes himself and finds Socrates swinging in a basket observing the sun and ether. Socrates summons the Clouds, his new deities, and undertakes to make a sophist of Strepsiades and to free him from the religion of his fathers. Unfortunate results of his new knowledge show Strepsiades his error, and he abandons Socrates and sets the phrontistery on fire.

Cluacina (klū-a-sī'na). A Roman epiethet of Venus, with reference to her purifying powers. When Tatius and Romulus prepared to wage war on each other because of the rape of the Sabine women, they were prevented from fighting by the women themselves. Thereupon, the two opposing armies were purified with sacred myrtle branches, and on the spot where this occurred the temple of Venus Cluacina was raised.

Clusium (klō'zi-um). One of the chief cities of Etruria, located in Tuscany between Sena (Siena) and Volsinii (Orvieto). In the Aeneid, it is named as an ally of Aeneas in his war with the Latins. The town, originally one of the 12 confederated ancient Etruscan cities, is now named Chiusi, and has a museum of Etruscan antiquities. In the neighborhood are notable Etruscan tombs.

Clymene (klim'ē-nē). In Greek mythology, a nymph, the mother of Phaëthon and the Heliades by Helios. She encouraged Phaëthon to seek his father and have all doubts of his parentage removed. This was because some had scoffed at Phaëthon's claim that he was the son of a god. After the death of Phaëthon, while driving the chariot of Helios, Clymene sought his remains throughout the world. She finally found his bones on the banks of the Eridanus River, where nymphs had buried them, and there too she watched his sisters turn into weeping poplar trees before her eyes.

Clymene. In Greek legend, a daughter of Catreus, king of Crete. Her sisters were Aërope, who became the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus, and Apemosyne, and her brother was Althaemenes. Her father had been warned by an oracle that one of his children would kill him and, as he suspected Clymene of plotting against him, he was about to drown her. But Nauplius persuaded Catreus to sell him Clymene as a slave. Catreus did so with the stipulation that she be taken away from Crete and never allowed to return. Nauplius married her and took her to Nauplia, and she became the mother of his sons, Palamedes the inventor, and Oeax.

Clymene. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a handmaiden who accompanied Helen to Troy. She was given to Acamas when the Greeks defeated the Trojans.

Clymene. In Greek mythology, an ocean nymph. According to some accounts she was the mother of Prometheus by Iapetus.

Clymene. In Greek legend, a daughter of Minyas, king of Thessaly. She married Phylacus and bore him Iphiclus and Alcimede. Alcimede was the mother of Jason, according to some accounts, and her descent through Clymene from Minyas accounts for the name Minyans which was sometimes given to the Argonauts.

Clymenus (klī'mē-nus). According to legend, an Arcadian who fell in love with his own daughter Harpalyce, and ravished her. Later he gave her in marriage to Alastor, but did not give up his unnatural passion, and seized her again. Harpalyce bore a son. To punish Clymenus for his evil-doing, she slew her son, cut him up, cooked the pieces, and served them to her father, who was also the father of the child. Harpalyce was transformed into a bird and Clymenus hanged himself.

Clymenus. In Greek mythology, a king of Boeotian Orchomenus. He was accidentally injured by a stone flung in anger by a Theban charioteer at a festival of Poseidon in Onchestus. As he was dying, Clymenus charged his sons to avenge his death. Erginus, his eldest son, fulfilled his promise to his dying father by making war on Thebes and defeating the Thebans. He exacted heavy tribute from them for his father's death. Later, Heracles encountered the heralds who came to collect the tribute, cut off their ears and noses, and led the Thebans in a victorious war against Erginus.

Clytemnestra or Clytaemnestra (kli-tem-nes'tra, klit-em-). In Greek legend, a daughter of Tyndareus, king of Sparta, and Leda. She was the sister of Helen, Castor, and Polydeuces. Clytemnestra married Tantalus, son of Broteas, who was king of Pisa. Clytemnestra had just borne him a son when Agamemnon attacked Pisa, slew Tantalus and the infant at Clytemnestra's breast, and forced her to marry him. Her brothers would have avenged her but Agamemnon appealed to Tyndareus as a suppliant and was purified by him for the murder of Tantalus, and allowed to keep Clytemnestra as his wife. She bore him a son, Orestes, and three daughters: Electra (also known as Laodice), Iphigenia (also known as Iphianassa), and Chrysothemis. When the Greeks were massed at Aulis in preparation for the voyage to Troy to recapture Helen, unfavorable winds prevented them from sailing. Calchas the seer said Artemis had sent the winds because she was angry at Agamemnon for killing one of her sacred creatures. Only the sacrifice of Iphigenia to Artemis, Calchas advised, would appease the goddess and cause her to send favorable winds. Agamemnon sent for Iphigenia with the message that she must come to Aulis to be married to Achilles. Clytemnestra, radiant with joy at this excellent match, accompanied Iphigenia to Aulis and there learned the truth. No pleas of hers could sway Agamemnon from his purpose of sacrificing Iphigenia, although he grieved to do so and had, in fact, tried to stop the messenger who went for her. But once she had arrived and the whole Greek army knew of the oracle he was persuaded by Odysseus that as commander of the 1000 ships assembled to sail to Troy he had a responsibility to do whatever was necessary for the conduct of the war. Thus Clytemnestra lost a second child to her warlike husband's ambition. Aegisthus, a cousin and an enemy of Agamemnon, had not joined the Greeks in the war against Troy. He now came to Argos. Although he had received special warnings from Zeus through his messenger Hermes not to encroach on Agamemnon's household, he now made elaborate plans to seduce Clytemnestra. He dispatched the bard whom Agamemnon had left behind to spy on Clytemnestra and went ahead with his plans. This was the easier to do because Nauplius, to avenge the death of his son Palamedes at the hands of the Greeks, had circulated rumors among the wives of the Greek heroes that their husbands had taken concubines in Troy whom they intended to bring home as wives. Clytemnestra readily believed such a tale of Agamemnon and, after some hesitation, yielded to the embraces of Aegisthus. For his success in becoming her lover Aegisthus offered rich gifts to the gods. To add to her many and painful grievances, Clytemnestra now learned that Agamemnon had taken Cassandra as his concubine. She and Aegisthus plotted to murder them both when they should come to Argos. She established an elaborate system of beacon fires which would inform her of the end of the Trojan War and of Agamemnon's progress towards Argos. A lookout watched from a tower for a year before the flash of fire signalling the approach of Agamemnon blazed over the sea. Aegisthus went to Nauplia to meet him. When he arrived in Mycenae, accompanied by Cassandra, Clytemnestra welcomed him extravagantly. She insisted that so glorious a victor must walk on a purple carpet into the palace. Agamemnon was reluctant to usurp a prerogative that was reserved for the gods but her appeals to his vanity induced him to follow her wishes. As he stepped onto the purple he piously hoped no jealous god would take offense. Clytemnestra led him into the palace for the ritual bath before the great feast which she said had been prepared for him. As he was stepping out of the bath she flung a netlike robe, without sleeves or a neck, over his head, and while he was helplessly trussed in it she, according to some accounts, killed him. Others say Aegisthus slew him and Clytemnestra cut off his head with a double-edged ax. She then, with the same weapon, slew Cassandra. A struggle between the supporters of Aegisthus and the followers of Agamemnon ensued, from which Aegisthus emerged victorious. Clytemnestra proclaimed the day as a monthly festival. Her claim was that the murder of Agamemnon was abundantly justified because he had killed Iphigenia and because of his insult in bringing Cassandra to Argos. For the next seven years she was the actual ruler of Argos, although ostensibly Aegisthus ruled. In fact he lived in terror of vengeance the whole time and did as Clytemnestra told him to do. She bore him three children, among them Erigone and a second Helen. But Clytemnestra's life was by no means serene. Her daughter Electra constantly charged her with being a murderess and an adulteress, and haunted her with the threat of vengeance. Orestes, who had been spirited away at the time of Agamemnon's murder, would surely return, Electra said, and avenge his father's death. In addition to the goading by Electra, Clytemnestra was troubled by dreams which seemed to indicate the furious return of Orestes. Eight years after the death of Agamemnon she received a false message that Orestes was dead. Her soul was divided; as a mother she must grieve at the death of her son, but as the murderer of his father she knew the greatest relief that now Orestes would not come seeking vengeance. The message had been planted by Orestes himself. He was in the neighborhood when Clytemnestra received it. He may, according to some accounts, actually have given it to her himself in disguise.

With the encouragement of Electra and the aid of his friend Pylades, he made himself known to his mother and, despite her pleas to be spared as the mother who had nursed him, he killed her and her lover Aegisthus. Whatever the estimate of Clytemnestra, whether as a strong and purposeful woman whose character was distorted by the wrongs she had suffered, or as a monster who was a disgrace to womankind, she was a fearless, intelligent, and arresting character. She arranged the plot to kill Agamemnon and did not flinch when it came to carrying it out. She ruled Argos with never an apology for the manner in which she obtained her power.

Clytië (klī'ti-ē or klish'i-ē) or Clytia (klish'i-ā). In Greek mythology, a water-nymph so enamored of the sun-god Apollo that every day she watched his course across the sky. The gods took pity on her unrequited love and metamorphosed her into a heliotrope, a flower whose face follows the course of the sun. Hence, the heliotrope has come to symbolize unwavering love.

Clytië. Name sometimes given to one of the daughters of Pandareus. See Merope.

Clytius (klish'i-us). In Greek mythology, one of the giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle he was burned by the torches of Hecate and finished off by Heracles.

Clytius. Named by Homer (Iliad) as a son of Laomedon, and a descendant of Dardanus, Ilus, and Tros. He was the brother of Priam and the father of Caletor. He was slain by Heracles in the first sack of Troy, which only Priam of all the sons of Laomedon survived.

Clytius. In Greek legend, a son of Eurytus of Oechalia. He took part in the Calydonian Hunt and accompanied Jason on the quest for the Golden Fleece. He was killed when Heracles attacked his father's kingdom.

Cnaeus (or Cneius) Pompeius Magnus (nē'us pom-pē'us mag'nus). See Pompey.

Cnagia (nā'ji-ā). Epithet of Artemis, from Cnageus, a Spartan who accompanied the Dioscuri in their war against Aphidna to recover Helen. He was taken prisoner and sold as a slave. As a slave he served in the temple of Artemis in Crete whither he had been transported. He escaped from Crete with the priestess of the temple, who carried the image of Artemis with her, and returned to Sparta.

Cnidia (nī'di-ā). Epithet of Aphrodite, from Cnidus in Caria, where there was a celebrated statue of the goddess by Praxiteles.

Cnidus (nī'dus). Ancient city of Caria, Asia Minor, situated at the end of a narrow peninsula on the SW coast of what is now Turkey, between the islands of Rhodes and Cos. It was a Dorian city settled by the Lacedaemonians, and was a member of the Dorian Hexapolis of Asia Minor. Cnidus was a seat of worship of Aphrodite whom the Cnidians held in especially high honor. Their oldest sanctuary of the goddess was that of Aphrodite Doritis (Bountiful); others were the sanctuary of Aphrodite Acraea (Of the Height), and Aphrodite Euploia (Fair Voyage) or Cnidian Aphrodite. The famous statue of Aphrodite by Praxiteles was here. Some say Cnidus was founded by Triopas, for whom Triopium was named. The Cnidians dedicated an image of him at Delphi. They also dedicated images of Leto, and of Apollo and Artemis shooting Tityus, and of Dionysus. They had a treasury at Delphi, and their Lesche, or Club-room, at Delphi was decorated with paintings by the Thasian Polygnotus. One wall of the Lesche showed the taking of Troy and the Greeks sailing away, and contained figures of those who took part on both sides in the Trojan War. On another wall was depicted Odysseus visiting in Hades. At Triopium in Cnidus was a famous temple in which only the peoples of the Dorian cities of Lindus, Ialysus, Camirus (Dorian cities of Rhodes), Cos, and Cnidus had the right to worship. These were the cities of the Dorian Hexapolis, which had formerly included Halicarnassus. The Cnidians, to escape conquest when the Persians were subduing Ionia in the reign of Cyrus, attempted to make their land an island by cutting a channel across the neck of the promontory on which their city was located. As the work progressed, it was hampered by an unusual number of accidents, many workmen were injured about the eyes by splintering rocks. The Cnidians sent to Delphi to inquire of the oracle why the work of making their country into an island was being impeded. The oracular response was:

"Fence not the isthmus off, nor dig it through—

Zeus would have made an island, had he wished."

On hearing this, the Cnidians at once abandoned the project of making an island, and when the Persians advanced against them they gave up without a struggle. Following the Persian War Cnidus was a member of the Athenian Confederacy, from which it revolted, c412 B.C., during the Peloponnesian Wars. In 394 B.C. a naval battle off its shores saw Conon, the Athenian leader, defeat the Spartans under Pisander. Afterward, Cnidus joined Ephesus, Samos, and Iasus, with Rhodes, in a federation to protect themselves against the Persians and the Spartans. The Federation issued their own coinage on which appeared a figure of the young Heracles strangling the snakes, in a possible allusion to their hope of crushing tyrants. On the site of Cnidus, known at the present time as Cape Crio, are, among other ruins, those of an ancient theater. The cavea is 400 feet in diameter, with 36 tiers of seats divided by two precincts, and survives almost perfect. There are considerable remains of the stage structure.

Cnossus or Knossos (nos'us). [Also: Cnosus, Gnosus.] In ancient geography, the capital of Crete, on the north coast and at the eastern end of the island. It was the site of a series of fabulous Minoan palaces. The site was discovered, 1886, by Heinrich Schliemann but he was unable to obtain the property at a price he considered fair, and abandoned his plan to excavate it. Sir Arthur Evans the English archaeologist visited the island in 1894, subsequently acquired the site of Cnossus, and began his excavations in 1900. His finds there were only equalled in importance by the earlier discoveries of Schliemann at Mycenae. The area of the palaces constructed at Cnossus was a low hill, in the valley of the Caeratus River. The discovery of wooden and bone utensils of the Neolithic Age showed that the site had been occupied since c3000 B.C. In succeeding ages two great palaces were erected at the site, the second of which was rebuilt after being partially destroyed. The first great palace was built about 2000 B.C. It was destroyed, by unknown means, c1700

B.C. Immediately a new and grander palace was erected on the ruins. The second palace was badly damaged, c1600 B.C., and was reconstructed, on a less extensive scale, in succeeding years. When, c1400 B.C., this palace too was destroyed, perhaps by an earthquake or by a sudden enemy raid, the site was thereafter only sparsely occupied. The second Minoan palace is the one associated with King Minos, Pasiphaë, the Minotaur, and the exploits of Theseus. The palaces were built on several levels connected by stairways and without any particular plan. Around a large central court groups of separate buildings were clustered. As more buildings were added, light and air were admitted to them by secondary courts and porticoes. With the passage of time, the buildings were connected by corridors to link them all into the complex that formed the palace. The builders were less concerned with the outside symmetry of the palace than with the comfort within it, and added chambers, courts, and porticoes with their connecting corridors as they were required, with the result that the corridors linking various parts of the palace, the stairways by which different levels were approached, and the series of courts and porticoes, made it into a perfect maze. The double-ax, the word for which was labrys, was a symbol of power, as well as a religious symbol and a mason's mark. It appeared in many places throughout the palace marked on walls and vessels, and double-axes were found in the chamber that came to be known as the "Room of the Double-Axes." The ending -nth, not of Greek origin, means "place of." Hence the palace was called Labyrinth, "place of the double-ax," but because of its mazelike arrangement the word "labyrinth" came to be thought of in succeeding years as a "maze." It may well be, therefore, that the story of Theseus and the Minotaur refers to the success Theseus enjoyed in the sport of bull-leaping in the central court around which the Labyrinth, "place of the double-ax," was built. Captives were commonly trained to take part in this sport, which consisted in baiting a huge bull. At the moment when the animal lowered its head and charged, the performer seized both its horns, turned a somersault over its head, and landed on the animal's back or on the ground behind it. Engravings on gems and other representations of the sport form a vivid basis for the story of Theseus. A small frescoed panel gives a complete picture of the sport. One of the paved courts of the palace is called the dancing-floor that was built for Ariadne by Daedalus.

Rather than attempt an ordered description of the conglomeration of courts, offices, magazines, baths, royal quarters, domestic quarters, treasure chambers, services areas, etc., it must suffice to mention some of the outstanding features of the palaces that sprawled on the hill at Cnossus. The outer walls were of stone or stone facing. The inner walls were of plaster and were decorated with richly colored frescoes. The frescoes have given valuable knowledge of the dress, life, and ceremonials of the times. They have also given names to some of the areas of the palace. A long corridor on the west is called the "Corridor of the Procession," from the fresco showing slim-waisted men, clad in loin cloths, bearing sacred vessels on their heads, and marching in a trim line across the wall. Another fresco shows an audience, including women, watching the sport of bull-leaping; and still another portrays elegant, black-haired ladies of the royal court. Wooden pillars, tapering from the top down and painted a rich terra-cotta color with blue bands at the top, rested on stone bases and supported the roofs and floors of the different levels. Water was brought from the hills by a "siphon" system and distributed through the palace by terra-cotta pipes and stone ducts. The supply was augmented by collecting rain-water from the roofs in shafts and causeways. Light and air were provided by light wells, covered shafts with openings cut into the walls below the roofs. Light and air were also provided by using the roof of one level as a portico for the next one. The great central court, lying N-S on the hill, was the center about which the rest of the palace was clustered.

for the royal visitors. The walls of the throne room were frescoed in strong colors with images of griffins and stylized vegetation. Opposite the throne is a sunken chamber, similar to others throughout the palace, that was probably used for purification rites. Its position so close to the throne indicates the close connection between the religious and temporal power of the king. To the east, the hill on which the palace stands drops away sharply. Here some of the underground rooms of the royal quarters have been preserved in their entirety, such as the Queen's Apartments, with blue-green dolphins leaping and playing on the frescoed walls. Four flights of the grand stairway that led down to the royal apartments have been preserved.

Just off it, on the west side, is a small chamber that has been named the throne room because in it, against the middle of one wall, a gypsum chair with rounded seat and high back was found. This is called the throne of Minos. On each side of it are stone benches

This is a most noble and serenely proportioned structure. Short flights, carefully designed for dignified ascent and set at right angles to each other, rise up the stair well. Pillars set on stone balustrades form an outer rail and add to the beauty of the structure.

Ranged throughout the palace, on varying levels, are magazines under the protection of the double ax, where oil and grain were stored. Huge earthenware storage jars still stand as they were left thousands of years ago. Some of the magazines were used for the storage of treasure, judging by the bits of gold leaf that were found in them. Others were used for the sacred vessels belonging to the snake-goddess. Workshops containing fine painted pottery, unfinished stone vases, and material for producing other objects, were located in the north end of the east wing of the palace. Gathered about the palace were luxurious private villas that shared such features of the palace as light-wells, plumbing, porches, and lively frescoes. To the south of the palace, across a little stream, there are the remains of an inn that housed distant visitors to the palace. Cnossus was the center of a network of roads that radiated out over the eastern end of the island. The palace was unfortified, attesting to the unchallenged supremacy of Minoan sea power, as the richness of the palace, its comfort, and the highly developed techniques that built and furnished it attest to the brilliance of the Minoan civilization. Sir Arthur Evans, to whom the world is indebted for the evidences of this brilliant civilization, made a series of partial restorations of the palace. Following such clues as his excavations gave him he restored some of the frescoes, as that in the Corridor of the Procession (the original pieces of the fresco are in the Museum). Richly painted pillars were set up in certain places to restore porches and porticoes and more importantly, to replace the debris that was all that held up some of the upper floors. His restorations of porches, pillars, light-wells, and frescoes in several areas give a vivid impression of the style of architecture and decoration of the Minoan civilization, so different from those of the Classical Greek period.

Cocalus (kok'a-lus). In Greek legend, a king in Sicily. He welcomed Daedalus who fled to his kingdom when he escaped from Crete. The daughters of Cocalus were enchanted by the inventions of Daedalus and did not want to give him up when King Minos, from whom he had fled, came in search of him. When Minos demanded the surrender of Daedalus, the daughters of Cocalus, instructed by Daedalus, rigged a conduit over the bath in which Minos was resting, and poured boiling water, or as some say, hot pitch, on him and scalded him to death. Cocalus returned his body to his Cretan followers, with a tale that Minos had fallen into a cauldron of boiling water and so died.

Coccygius (kok-sí'ji-us). Epithet of Zeus. When Zeus first courted Hera she rejected his advances. He transformed himself into a cuckoo; Hera took up the bird and held it in her bosom. Zeus then assumed his own shape and ravished her. For this reason Zeus was given the name Coccygius (Cuckoo), and Mount Thornax, where the transformation took place, was renamed Mount Cuckoo. The famous statue of Hera by Polyclitus in the Heraeum at Argos showed the goddess holding a scepter on which a cuckoo perched.

Cocles (kō'klēz), Publius Horatius. Roman legendary hero, whose surname "Cocles" was a corruption of "Cyclops," and was given to him because he had lost one eye. Tarquinius Superbus (Tarquin the Proud), having been driven out of Rome, sought assistance from the Etruscan king, Lars Porsena of Clusium, and marched with a great force against Rome (c508 B.C.). In the battle outside the gates the Romans suffered heavy losses and withdrew inside the walls of Rome. As the Etruscans advanced toward the wooden Sublician bridge over the Tiber, Horatius with Titus Herminius and Spurius Lartius held the entire Etruscan force at bay until the bridge could be destroyed to prevent the Etruscans from attacking the gates. According to most accounts, Horatius alone held the bridgehead to the end. When it was destroyed, he jumped into the Tiber and swam to safety. As he swam, he was wounded in the thigh by an Etruscan spear and was henceforth lame. Publius Valerius (Publicola), who was consul at the time, passed a decree that every Roman should give him one day's provisions, that he be given as much land as he could encircle with a plough in one day, and that a bronze statue of him be erected in the temple of Vulcan. The statue was to be in the temple of Vulcan because that god, like Horatius, was lame.

was the so-called Wailing River. The other four were: the Styx (Hateful), Acheron (Woeful), Pyriphlegethon (Fiery), and Lethe (Forgetful).

Codex (kō'deks). A form of book which made its first appearance in the 1st century B.C. or earlier, the ancestor of the modern book. It consisted of sheets of papyrus, vellum, or parchment folded once, arranged in quires, and assembled like the sheets of a modern newspaper. For economy (the text being written on both sides of the material), for convenience of storage and reference, and for durability, because it could be protected in a leather binding, the superiorities of the codex were substantial and it gradually superseded the older volumen or scroll. (JJ)

Codomannus (kō-dō-man'us), Darius. See Darius III (of Persia).

Codrus (kod'rus). Son of Melanthus, Messenian king who was driven from his land and became king of Athens. Codrus succeeded him and was the last king of Athens. He reigned (according to tradition) c1068 B.C. One legend is that Dorian invaders of Attica were assured by the Delphic oracle that success would come to that side whose king died. Codrus, having heard of this prophecy, disguised himself, and in unrecognizable, humble garb provoked a quarrel with some Dorian soldiers, taunting them until they killed him. This destroyed the premise by which the Dorians hoped to win, and Codrus thus saved his country by his own death. No one was considered worthy to succeed such a king. The archonship was established in Athens thenceforth, and Medon, son of Codrus, was appointed archon. But some say Codrus fell in battle. The sons of Codrus were the supposed founders of various Ionian cities, and thus connected Attica with Ionia. Among his sons was Neleus (or Nileus), named for the father of Nestor. He was said to have founded Miletus in Asia Minor. Other sons, and the cities they founded in Ionia, were Androclus (Ephesus), Damasichthon (Colophon), Andraemon (Lebedus), Damasus (Teos), Cyarethus (Myus), Cleopus (Erythrae), Prometheus, and Naoclus.

Coes (kō'ēz). A Mytilenean general, contemporary with Darius the Great. He led the Mytileneans as allies of Darius when the latter bridged the Ister (Danube) and attacked Scythia. Coes advised Darius not to destroy the bridge after the crossing of the army as he had proposed to do, but to leave a detachment to guard it so that it would provide a means of return. Darius was so pleased by his advice that he promised to give Coes any boon he asked. On the return of the Persians from Scythia Coes asked to be made king of Mytilene. Darius remembered his promise and granted his request. Coes was later stoned to death by the Mytileneans when Ionia revolted against Darius.

Coeus (sē'us). In Greek mythology, one of the Titans, children of Uranus and Gaea. He became the husband of Phoebe and father of Leto and Asteria. According to the Romans, he was the brother of Enceladus and Fama (Rumor), and the father of Latona.

Colaenis (kol-ē'nis). Epithet of Artemis, the name was derived from Colaenus, said to have been a king of Athens before Cecrops. Artemis Colaenis was worshiped in Myrrhinus, one of the small divisions of Attica.

Colaxais (kol-ak-sā'is). A son of Targitaus, who was said by the Scythians to be a son of Zeus and a daughter of the river-god Borysthenes, and the first inhabitant of Scythia. Colaxais was the youngest of the three sons of Targitaus. While they were in the land four golden objects, a plow, yoke, battle-ax, and drinking cup, fell from the sky. Lipoxais, the eldest of the three sons, ran to pick them up, but as he approached they blazed with fire and he was driven back. Next Arpoxais, the second son, approached and the same thing happened. But when Colaxais went near them the flames died out, he seized the golden objects and carried them away to his house. After this, the two older brothers acknowledged Colaxais as the king of the land, and from him sprang the tribe of Scyths called the Royal Scythians. The Royal Scythians kept the sacred golden objects and guarded them with the utmost care. At the annual festival, at which great sacrifices were offered in their honor, if the man guarding them fell asleep in the open air it was thought that he would not live the year out. Lipoxais was the founder of the Scythian tribe known as the Auchatae. The Catiari and Trasprians sprang from Arpoxais. Colchis (kol'kis). [Modern name, Mingrelia.]

In ancient geography, a country in Asia, lying between the Caucasus on the N, Iberia on the E, Armenia on the S, Pontus on the SW, and the Euxine (Black) Sea on the W. It was watered by the Phasis River (the modern Rion in Georgia, U.S.S.R.). Herodotus claimed that the Colchians were of Egyptian origin, descended from an Egyptian king, Sesostris (the exploits attributed to this king by Herodotus probably represent the combined efforts of Senusret I, Senusret III, and Ramses II), who journeyed into the land and left settlers there. He allied the Colchians to the Egyptians because of the similarity of their languages, because the two peoples, from ancient times, followed the practice of circumcision, and because the linen for which the Colchians were famous was woven in a manner used only by the Egyptians of all other peoples. At the time when Phrixus, riding a golden-fleeced ram, fled to Colchis from Orchomenus, the Black Sea was known as the Axine, or "Unfriendly" Sea. The land about it was inhabited by wild people who, nevertheless, received Phrixus kindly. The ram was sacrificed and its fleece hung in a sacred grove guarded by a fabulous monster. Nearby was a magnificent palace of Helius. Jason and the Argonauts journeyed to Colchis to recover the Golden Fleece. With the aid of Medea Jason was successful and escaped with the Fleece and Medea from Colchis. According to Herodotus, the abduction of Medea by Jason at her own request was one of the ancient causes of enmity between Europe and Asia that culminated in the Persian Wars. The Colchians, known to the Greeks as a barbarous and unfriendly people, did not bury or burn their male dead. Only women were buried. The men were wrapped in ox hides and exposed on trees to be eaten by the birds. Outside the city of Aea, Aeëtes' home in Colchis, Jason and his companions passed by such a cemetery, sacred to Circe, on their way to recover the Golden Fleece.

Colias (kō'li-as). Epithet of Aphrodite, from the promontory of that name in Attica where there was an image of Aphrodite Colias.

Coliseum (kol-i-sē'um). See Flavian Amphitheater.

Collatinus (kol-a-tī'nus), Tarquinius. Roman nobleman, fl. end of the 6th century B.C. His wife Lucretia was ravished by Tarquinius Sextus, son of the king Tarquinius Superbus. Collatinus, with others, vowed to punish the Tarquins whose harsh rule had made them very unpopular, and with Brutus and others he drove the Tarquins out of Rome. He was chosen (509 B.C.) with Brutus to be one of the two consuls who were to rule Rome in the place of the kings, and thus to transform it into a republic. Collatinus, though a nobleman and a relative of the Tarquins, was chosen because he would have the greatest reason for enmity to the Tarquins. However, when a plot by members of the Aquilii and Vitellii families to kill the consuls and restore Tarquin was exposed, Collatinus would have allowed the plotters, many of whom were related to him, to leave the city. In this he was opposed by Publicola and the conspirators were slain. Collatinus, who showed himself less hostile to the Tarquins than he was expected to be, resigned as consul and withdrew from the city.

Colline Gate (kol'in) or Porta Collina (pōr'ta kō-lī'nā). Gate at the NE extremity of ancient Rome. Near here, in November, 82 B.C., Sulla defeated the Samnites under Pontius.

Colone (kō-lō'nē). In ancient geography, a small town in the Troad, in Asia Minor. It was seized and sacked by Achilles.

Colonna (kō-lō'nā), Cape. See Sunium.

Colonus (kō-lō'nus). [Also: White Hill of Colonus; Kolonos Hippios.] Site about one and a half miles NW of Athens, Greece, N of the Academy, on the banks of the Cephissus. It was the birthplace of Sophocles, and is immortalized by his description in the Oedipus at Colonus. It was a place sacred to the Furies in their later role of benign goddesses. Oedipus fled there with his daughter Antigone, and died there, comforted by the oracle. Upon the hill now stand the tombs of two noted archaeologists, the German Hellenist Karl Otfried Müller and the French Orientalist Charles Lenormant.

Colophon (kol'ō-fon). In ancient geography, one of the 12 Ionian cities of Asia Minor, situated near the coast, N of Ephesus. According to the Colophonians, the first Greeks who came there were colonists from Crete, who landed under their leader Rhacius and drove out the native Carians. Rhacius later married Manto, daughter of the seer Tiresias, and was, some say, the father of the seer Mopsus. Rhacius allowed the Thebans who came to Colophon with Manto to settle there, and his son Mopsus drove out the last remaining Carians. After the Trojan War Calchas the seer went overland to Colophon, since he knew by his prophetic powers that heavy storms would assail the Greeks who sailed home from Troy. In Colophon he met Mopsus and, being defeated by him in a divining contest, died there and was buried at nearby Notium. In later years Ionians came to Colophon. They swore an oath of friendship with the Greeks already there and lived on equal terms with them. Some think that Gyges, the Lydian king, may have captured Colophon when he expanded his empire southward in the 7th century B.C., but he was forced to withdraw when the Cimmerians invaded his own country. The Colophonians took part in the Ionian revolt against Persia at the beginning of the 5th century B.C., and were subdued. Lysimachus, one of Alexander's bodyguards, completely destroyed the city (c302 B.C.), because its inhabitants fought against the Macedonians. At Clarus near Colophon was a famous oracle of Apollo.

Colossae (kō-loś'ē). In ancient geography, a city in SW Phrygia, Asia Minor, situated on the Lycus. It was the seat of the early Christian church to which Paul wrote the Epistle to the Colossians.

Colosseum (kol-ō-sē'um). See Flavian Amphitheater.

Colossus of Rhodes (kō-loś'us rōdz). Large bronze statue of the sun god Helios, which anciently stood adjacent to the harbor of Rhodes on the Greek island of that name. Known in ancient and medieval times as one of the Seven Wonders of the World, it was designed by Chares of Lindus, and under his supervision erected between 292 and 280 B.C. It is reputed to have been 70 cubits high, or more than 100 feet, and is said to have been built from the abandoned bronze weapons and armor left by the soldiers of Demetrius I, king of Macedon, when they retired in defeat from their siege of Rhodes. The tradition that ships could sail between the colossal legs is erroneous. In 224 B.C. it was toppled by an earthquake. For many centuries great bronze fragments of the statue lay where they fell.

Colotes (kol-ō'tēz). Greek sculptor, a pupil of Phidias, who worked with him on the great statue of Olympian Zeus. He also made the table on which rested the victors' crowns at Olympia.

Column of Marcus Aurelius (mār'kus ô-rēl'yus). [Also, Antonine Column.] A marble column erected in the Campus Martius at Rome between 175 and 193 A.D. to commemorate the victorious campaigns of Marcus Aurelius against the Dacians and Marcomanni in 172-175 A.D., similar to the Column of Trajan, having like the latter a shaft 100 Roman feet high on a high square pedestal, sculptured in spiral relief with scenes from the wars; the concept is of an artist's sketchbook in scroll form, unrolled to its full length and wound spirally around the shaft. The shaft is about 13 feet in diameter; within is a spiral staircase lighted by rectangular loop-holes. On its Doric capital originally stood statues, long since vanished, of Marcus Aurelius and Faustina; the statue which now crowns it, of St. Paul, was placed there by Pope Sixtus V. It stands in what is now known as the Piazza Colonna. (JJ)

Column of Trajan (trā'jan). Monument at Rome, dedicated in 114 A.D. in honor of the emperor. It is a Roman Doric column of marble, on a square basement, the total height, exclusive of the present statue of Saint Peter, being about 127½ feet. The base bears reliefs of warlike trophies and an inscription; the entire shaft is occupied by vigorous and lifelike reliefs ascending in a spiral, representing Trajan's campaigns. The reliefs contain about 2500 human figures, besides those of animals and inanimate objects.

Comaetho (kom-ē'thō). In Greek legend, a daughter of Pterelaus, king of the Taphians. Out of love for Amphitryon, who was attacking her father's kingdom, she cut off the lock of golden hair which rendered her father immortal and thus caused his death. Amphitryon ordered her killed for betraying her father, though he was victorious as a result of her treachery.

Comaetho. In Greek tradition, a priestess of Artemis in Patrae. She fell in love with Melanippus, but their love was opposed by both their parents. In defiance of their parents and religious custom, they profaned the sanctuary of Artemis by making love in it.

Artemis sent a punishment on all the inhabitants of Patrae, the land became barren and strange sicknesses afflicted the people. Envoys were sent to appeal to the oracle at Delphi, to learn how the plagues could be lifted. The priestess told the envoys these evils came because of the impieties of Comaetho and Melanippus, and advised that in order to be free from them the Patraeans must sacrifice Comaetho and Melanippus to the goddess. Furthermore, each year they must crown a youth and a maiden with wreaths of ivy and grain and sacrifice them to Artemis Tridaria (Threefold Assigner of Lots). The practice of human sacrifice continued until Eurypylus arrived in the land, after the Trojan War, bearing a chest with the image of Dionysus. Thenceforth human beings were no longer sacrificed.

Comana (kō-mā'na). [Also: Chryse.] In ancient geography, a city in Cappadocia, Asia Minor, situated on the river Sarus. It was noted for its great temple to Ma, the Cappadocian mother goddess, with its elaborate festivals and great retinue of temple prostitutes and attendants, said to have numbered in the thousands.

Comana. In ancient geography, a city in Pontus, Asia Minor. It was perhaps a colony of the Cappadocian city of the same name and it was sacred to the same goddess, Ma.

Cometes (kom-ē'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Diomedes' good friend Sthenelus. His father accompanied Diomedes to Troy and Cometes was left in charge of Diomedes' household. Thanks to the rumor Nauplius was spreading that the Greeks were taking concubines in Troy whom they would bring back as wives, Aegialia, wife of Diomedes, became the mistress of Cometes. When Diomedes returned from the Trojan War Cometes and Aegialia drove him out of his own country.

Cominius (kō-min'i-us), Pontius. Roman hero who volunteered to go through the enemy forces of the Gauls who had sacked and occupied Rome (389 B.C.), to the Capitol, which still held out under the command of Marcus Manlius. His mission was to secure an appointment as dictator for Camillus who would not accept the post until he was legally appointed by the citizens on the Capitol. Cominius took a number of pieces of cork and set out. When he came to the Tiber, he tied the cork about his body, leaped into the river, and propelled himself across. He made his way to the Capitoline Hill and up the lower slopes, using the bushes and shrubs to pull himself up. When he came to the steepest part of the hill, he called to the citizens on top. They hauled him up, gave him the appointment Camillus desired, and he returned the same way he had come.

Comitia (kō-mish'i-a). In Roman antiquity, assemblies of the people. They were of three kinds: 1) The most ancient assembly, that of the 30 curiae, or comitia curiata, in which the old patrician families found representation. Each curia had one vote, and the assembly acted on matters of state and affairs of family and religion. 2) The comitia centuriata, the assembly of the whole people by five fiscal classes, divided into centuries in the form of a military organization, according to the property census. There were 193 or 194 centuries, of which the first class had 98, so that the controlling vote lay with it. This assembly passed on laws and propositions with reference to which the Senate had the initiative, and had jurisdiction of capital offenses. 3) The comitia tributa, the assembly of the people by tribes or neighborhoods (a local division), 30—later 35—in number, without reference to rank. This assembly made nominations to the magistracy, had certain judicial powers extending to the imposition of fines and exile, and voted the laws called plebiscita. Under the empire the comitia were deprived of their judicial power, and of all influence upon foreign affairs, but retained a voice in the nomination or confirmation of certain magistrates.

Comitium (kō-mish'um, -mish'i-um). Paved area in ancient Rome, between the NE side of the Forum Romanum and the Curia, where the comitia curiata, or assembly of the patricians, met, and where the most important legal cases were tried. On the Comitium stood the original rostra, or official speakers' platform, and close to it was the graecostasis, the platform provided for foreign envoys.

Commagene (kom-a-jē'nē). [Called Kummuh in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions.] In ancient geography, a district in N Syria, between the Euphrates on the E and Cilicia on the W. At one time tributary of the Assyrian empire, it fell to Alexander, then to the Seleucids after his death, and was an independent kingdom from 65 B.C. to 17 A.D. Comus (kō'mus). In late Roman mythology, the god of mirth and drunken revelry, represented as a white-clad winged youth carrying a torch.

Concordia (kon-kôr'di-a). In Roman mythology, the goddess of harmony and peace. There were several temples to her at Rome, the one on the Capitoline Hill dating from 367 B.C. She is represented as a buxom matron with an olive branch in her right hand, the cornucopia in her left.

Condylea (kon-dil'ē-a). A town in Arcadia, Greece. Here there was a temple of Artemis Condyleatis. According to Pausanias, one day some children, playing about the sanctuary, took a rope and put it about the neck of the image in the temple and said that the goddess had been strangled. The people of the town, considering that the children had profaned the image, stoned them to death for impiety. Afterward, the women of the town gave birth to dead babies, and when they consulted the Delphic oracle they were told this was a punishment for having unjustly killed the children. The priestess ordered them to honor the children as heroes, and the stillbirths would cease. From this incident the image of Artemis came to be known as "The Strangled Lady."

Condyleatis (kon-dil'ē-ā'tis). An epithet of Artemis, from the place, Condylea (q.v.).

Confederacy of Delos (dē'los). See Delian League.

Conius (kon'i-us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Dusty." There was a temple of Zeus Conius at Megara.

Conon (kō'non). Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian War. He succeeded to command of the Athenian fleet, 407 B.C., and shortly thereafter lost 30 of his 70 ships in an engagement with the Spartans at Mytilene. The Athenians melted down the gold and silver offerings that had been dedicated in the temples of the Acropolis and bought a new fleet with which (406 B.C.) he defeated the Spartans at Arginusae, south of Lesbos. Following the battle a fierce wind sprang up, and the Athenians did not rescue the crews of 25 of their own wrecked ships. When news of the loss of these men reached Athens, the city went into mourning, and a great hue and cry arose; the Athenian commanders were accused of negligence or worse, were tried, condemned to death, and six of them were executed. Conon, however, was not included in the charges and no blame was attached to him. In 405 B.C. the Athenian fleet under his command was disastrously defeated at Aegospotami by the Spartans. Conon prudently decided not to return to Athens on the heels of such a disaster. He went to Salamis in Cyprus with part of the fleet and made plans and preparation to avenge the defeat. He won the support of the king of Salamis and also at length received ships and money from the Persian court to wage war on the Spartans. With such Persian aid he met an inferior Spartan fleet off Cnidus (394 B.C.), destroyed it and Spartan sea power, and avenged the disaster of Aegospotami. He returned to Athens, rebuilt the Long Walls, and raised a temple to Cnidian Aphrodite at the Piraeus as a memorial of his victory. In 392 B.C. Conon went as an envoy to parley with a Persian satrap friendly to Sparta. The satrap treacherously imprisoned him. He was released when the satrap was recalled and removed from power. Conon went to Cyprus where he died soon afterward in the same year.

Conon. Greek mathematician and astronomer, fl. 3rd century B.C. A native or at least in early life a resident of Samos, and a friend of Archimedes, he traveled widely through the Greek world before settling at Alexandria. He was a student of solar eclipses and of the constellations, and in the history of mathematics is noted for his studies of conic intersections.

Consentes Dii (kon-sen'tēz dī'i). The Roman name for the gods of Olympus.

Constitution of Athens. A monograph on the government of the Athenian state, by the 4th century B.C. philosopher Aristotle, lost for 1800 years and only recently recovered from the sands of Egypt. Its reconstruction in almost complete form, a brilliant achievement of classical scholarship, was made possible by the contents of four papyrus rolls from Hermopolis in Egypt, identified at the British Museum in 1890. These rolls had been used first for the accounts of the steward of an estate near Hermopolis; somewhat later, about 100 A.D., the Constitution had been written on their backs, and was buried with the owner in his grave. (JJ)

Consul. One of the two chief magistrates of the ancient Roman Republic annually chosen in the Campus Martius. In the first ages of Rome they were both elected from patrician or noble families, but about 367 B.C. the people obtained the privilege of electing one of the consuls from amongst themselves, and sometimes both were plebeians. The office of consul was retained under the empire, but was confined chiefly to judicial functions, the presidency of the Senate, and the charge of public games, and was ultimately stripped of all power, though remaining the highest distinction of a subject; it was often assumed by the emperors, and finally disappeared in the 6th century A.D.

Consus (kon'sus). In Roman mythology, a god, commonly called the god of good counsel, but having also certain very ancient agricultural and chthonian aspects. In his agricultural aspect of guardian of grain, the goddess Ops was his consort. His two festivals occurred in August and December. His underground altar in the Circus Maximus probably led the Romans to associate horses and horse racing with his festivals.

Copae (kō'pē). In ancient geography, a town on the shore of Lake Copais, in Boeotia, Greece. According to legend, Athamas settled on the plain before the town after he had killed his son in a fit of madness. Boeotians from Copae accompanied the Greeks to Troy. Among the temples of the ancient town were sanctuaries of Demeter, Dionysus, and Serapis.

Copais (kō-pā'is). In ancient geography, a lake in Boeotia, into which emptied the sacred river of Delphi, the Cephissus. Completely ringed by mountains, the Copaic Lake has no surface outlet, drainage in ancient times having been provided by natural tunnels ("katavothrae") in the limestone, whose choking was often followed by disastrous floods. Efforts to channel the waters and promote drainage began as early as the Bronze Age. From the lake bed rises a low rocky hill crowned with the massive defenses of a late Bronze Age palace, now known by the Albanian name of Gla or Goulas, the ancient name being unknown. Finally drained at the end of the last century by a British engineering firm, Lake Copais has yielded to reclamation nearly 100 square miles of extremely fertile agricultural land. In antiquity, the lake was celebrated for its eels, pickled Copiac eels being a special delicacy. (JJ)

Copreus (kop'rōs). In Greek legend, a herald, the son of Pelops and Hippodamia. He was purified of murder by Eurystheus and became his herald. It was Copreus who transmitted the orders of Eurystheus to Heracles and, according to some accounts, it was Copreus who threatened war, in the name of Eurystheus, against the Athenians for giving asylum to the children of Heracles. Copreus was at one time the owner of the marvelous horse Arion.

Cora (kō'ra), Core (-rē), or Kora, Kore. A name meaning "Maiden," which was applied particularly to Persephone.

Cora. [Modern name, Cori.] Town in C Italy, situated about 30 miles SE of Rome. It was a town of the Volsci in Latium. Anchises predicted the founding of the town when Aeneas visited him in the Underworld, according to the Aeneid. It contains many Roman antiquities, such as columns, walls, and a temple of Hercules.

Corbulo (kōr'bū-lō), Cnaeus Domitius. Roman soldier and administrator, died 67 A.D. As legate under Claudius he governed Lower Germany, and caused a canal to be dug between the Rhenus (Rhine) and the Mosa (Meuse) which is still in service. Given command of Roman forces in the East, he waged successful campaigns against the Parthians and Armenians; but Nero, succeeding Claudius as emperor, seems to have suspected Corbulo of conspiracy, recalled him in 67 A.D., and compelled him to take his own life.

Corcyra (kōr'sī-ra). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the river-god Asopus and Metope. Poseidon fell in love with her and carried her off to an island on the west coast of Greece which was subsequently named after her.

Corcyra. [Modern name, Kerkyra, Corfu.] The largest and most northern of the seven Ionian islands, separated from the coast of Epirus, Greece, by a broad channel. According to tradition, Poseidon fell in love with Corcyra, daughter of the river-god Asopus, and brought her to the island, which was then named for her. She bore Poseidon a son, Phaeax, who was the ancestor of the Phaeacians, according to some accounts. The island to which Corcyra was taken is a hilly land, heavily wooded with cypress trees, and was called "Black Corcyra" because of its somber woods. Some say the island was once visited by Demeter, and for this reason it was sometimes called Drepana, for Demeter's sickle. Others say it was called Drepana (Drepane or Drepanum) because Cronus threw the sickle with which he mutilated Uranus into the sea there and thus formed the island. The island was visited by Jason and Medea on their journey back from Colchis and it was here, in a cave of the nymph Macris, that they were married. Later, Odysseus was cast ashore here on his way home from the Trojan War and was graciously received by King Alcinous, a descendant of Corcyra and Poseidon. Hence, this island has been identified with Scheria and Phaeacia mentioned in the Odyssey.

The fertile soil and mild climate of Corcyra attracted settlers from an early time. Among the first to occupy it were the Eretrians. They were driven out when the island was colonized by Corinth, traditional date 734 B.C. The colony prospered and built up a strong fleet that dominated the surrounding waters. The Corcyraeans were said to take special pride in their fleet because they considered themselves to be descendants of the prime sailors of antiquity, the Phaeacians. As they increased in wealth and power, the Corcyraeans threw off their dependence on the mother city and defeated Corinth in a naval battle in the first half of the 7th century B.C. This was thought to be the first naval battle between two Greek powers. Subsequently, in their pride, the Corcyraeans denied Corinth the honors due a mother city and took every opportunity to show their contempt. Cypselus, tyrant of Corinth, brought them to heel and restored the sovereignty of Corinth over her colony. Corcyra incurred the wrath of Periander, son of Cypselus, by sheltering his son Lycophron. Lycophron refused all his father's pleas to return to Corinth while Periander was still there. At last Periander agreed that he himself would go to Corcyra and allow Lycophron to take his place as ruler of Corinth.

To keep Periander away, the Corcyraeans killed Lycophron, to whom they had hitherto granted asylum. Periander punished Corcyra by seizing 300 Corcyraean boys and sending them to Alyattes, king of Lydia, as eunuchs. On the way, the Corinthian ship carrying the boys touched at Samos, and the Samians, touched by the plight of the boys, and probably also to annoy the Corinthians, freed them and told them to seek sanctuary at the temple of Artemis in Samos. The Corinthians dared not violate the sanctuary, and attempted to force the boys out by cutting off their food supply. The Samians invented a festival in which Samian youths and maidens daily carried cakes of sesame and honey to the temple. The Corcyraean boys there in the sanctuary were allowed to snatch the cakes and so kept themselves alive. The festival continued to be observed long after the Corinthians, despairing of ever recapturing the boys, had given up and departed. When the Persians were invading Greece, 480 B.C., the assembled defenders sent to Corcyra, urging them to send help. The Corcyraeans readily promised to give assistance for, they said, if Greece fell, Corcyra would also fall. They manned 60 ships, but delayed putting them to sea. When at last their fleet did sail, it went only to the Peloponnesus and waited there to see how the war would go. For they fully expected the Persians to overwhelm the Greeks and wanted to be in a position to win Persian friendship when that result occurred. When the war was over, the successful Greeks reproached the Corcyraeans, who replied that they had indeed sent a fleet but that the Etesian winds had prevented it from rounding Cape Malea and joining the Greeks at Salamis.

Before the Persian War Corcyra had founded the colonies of Epidamnus and Apollonia in Epirus (7th century B.C.). Epidamnus was subsequently weakened by wars with her neighbors and by internal strife, and appealed to Corcyra for aid (436 B.C.). Corcyra rejected the plea. The Epidamnians next sought advice from the oracle at Delphi, and were told to put themselves under the protection of Corinth. The Epidamnians obeyed. Corinth sent an expedition to their relief. This infuriated the Corcyraeans. They commanded the Epidamnians to expel the Corinthian garrison, and when they refused, sent a fleet, besieged the city, and defeated the Corinthians at sea (435 B.C.). This was one of the precipitating causes of the Peloponnesian Wars, for the Corinthians drew Sparta to their side as allies and the Corcyraeans appealed to, and received the aid of Athens. In the long wars that followed, Corcyra was weakened by internal strife and finally destroyed by revolution. In the next century the island was taken by Sparta, and it ultimately fell to the Romans.

Corcyraean (kôr-sî-rē'an) Bull. According to Greek tradition, a great bull on the island of Corcyra took up the custom of leaving the cows in the pasture and going down to the seashore, where he would stand and bellow at the sea. When the herdsmen one day followed him they saw the water in front of him swarming with fish. They reported this to the Corcyraeans, but when the fishermen tried to net the fish they were unable to do so. They sent an envoy to Delphi to inquire about this circumstance. The oracle instructed them to sacrifice the bull to Poseidon. They did so, and immediately they netted the fish. With a tithe of their catch the Corcyraeans dedicated offerings at Olympia and Delphi. To Delphi they sent a bronze image of a bull, and set it up beside the Sacred Way to Apollo's temple. The pedestal on which the image stood was seen by Pausanias.

Cordaca (kôr-dā'ka). An epithet of Artemis in Pisa. This epithet was given to the goddess because the followers of Pelops celebrated their victory over Oenomaus by dancing the cordax, a dance peculiar to the natives of Mount Sipylus, from which Pelops had come.

Coresus (kôr-ē-sus). In Greek legend, a priest of Dionysus who loved Callirrhoë and killed himself for her sake. See Callirrhoë, a maiden of Calydon.

Corfinium (kôr-fîn'i-um). In ancient geography, a town in C Italy, near the modern Sulmona. It was the capital of the Paeligni, and of the confederates in the Social War (90-88 B.C.).

Corfu (kôr-fö', kôr-fū). See Corcyra.

Cori (kôr-rē). See Cora.

Corinna (kô-rin'a). Greek lyric poetess, born at Tanagra in Boeotia, and active early in the 5th century B.C. She is sometimes called a Theban from her long residence at Thebes, whose local mythology formed the subject of her work. She was a contemporary of Pindar, from whom she is said to have won the prize five times at the public games. Although she wrote on mythological subjects herself in the Boeotian dialect, she is said to have advised Pindar not to overdo his use of mythological allusion in his works, telling him "to sow with the hand, not with the whole sack." A few fragments of her poems have been preserved.

Corinth (kôr'inth, kor'-). [Also: Gorthos; Greek, Korinthos; Latin, Corinthia, Corinthus; ancient name: Ephyra.] City "in the corner of Argos" in the Peloponnesus, situated near the Isthmus and Gulf of Corinth. According to tradition, it was founded c1350 B.C., some say by Sisyphus. Poseidon and Helius contended for control of Corinthia, and Briareus acted as arbitrator of their dispute. He awarded the Isthmus and adjoining land to Poseidon, and the height above the city (the Acrocorinthus) to Helius. Thereafter, the Isthmus was sacred to Poseidon, who had a temple there in which were altars and images of various sea-deities. The body of Melicertes, son of Ino and Athamas, was washed ashore on the Isthmus and buried there, and Isthmian Games were established in his honor. The graves of Sisyphus and Neleus were on the Isthmus, but their exact whereabouts were a well-kept secret. The region was also the scene of some of the exploits of Theseus. Theseus, Poseidon, and Corinthus represent the original Ionian inhabitants of Corinthia. Sisyphus, Jason, and Neleus represent the Aeolians who immigrated there. Cencreae was the east port and Lechaenum was the west port of the Isthmus. A coin of the time of the emperor Hadrian represents the two harbors as two nymphs facing opposite ways with a rudder between them. In ancient times, ships were sometimes placed on rollers and dragged across the Isthmus, to save the long voyage around the Peloponnesus. Periander, tyrant of Corinth (c625-585 B.C.), planned to breach the Isthmus with a canal, but gave up the idea. Much later, the emperor Nero began to cut a canal, but he too abandoned the project. (The existing canal was completed in 1893.) In the Persian Wars, the Peloponnesians, under the leadership of Sparta, built a wall across the Isthmus as a fortification against the Persians. Some say the land about the Asopus River, in the NE corner of the Peloponnesus, was divided by Helius between his son Aeëtes to whom he gave Ephyraea (ancient name for Corinthia), and Aloeus to whom he gave Sicyonia. Aeëtes migrated to Colchis and left his kingdom in trust with Bunus, son of Hermes. After the death of Bunus the kingdom fell successively to the rule of Epopeus, then to his son Marathon, and then to his grandson Corinthus, for whom the name of the city was changed from Ephyra to Corinth. Corinthus died childless just at the time when Medea arrived from Colchis with Jason. She claimed the throne for Jason. Some say that when she was forced to flee from Cor-

lowed by Bacchis (926-891 B.C.) and his descendants, the Bacchiadae, who were overthrown by Cypselus c657 B.C. The city of Corinth was well supplied with water. According to tradition, the river-god Asopus gave Sisyphus the never-failing Pirene spring in return for information about the whereabouts of one of his daughters, Aegina. It was at this spring that Athena bridled Pegasus for Bellerophon. In memory of the event, a temple of Athena Chalinitis (Bridler), was raised. The well of Glauce at Corinth was said to be the one in which Glauce, daughter of Creon, flung herself to get relief from the burning poison of the robe Medea had sent her. Nearby the well was the tomb of Medea's children. Some say they were stoned to death by the Corinthians in revenge for the death of Glauce. Afterward the Corinthians were punished until, at the command of the oracle, they offered annual sacrifices in honor of the dead children and set up a figure of Terror. As they were subject to Argos and Mycenae, the Corinthians had no leader in the Trojan War, but took part in it under the command of Agamemnon.

Corinth was noted in ancient times as a center of commerce, literature, and art, and as one of the wealthiest and most powerful of the ancient Greek cities. It sent colonies to Corcyra (Corfu) and Syracuse in 734 B.C., and founded Potidaea in Chalcidice and Apollonia on the coast of Epirus. During the rule of Periander (c625-585 B.C.) son of Cypselus, Corinth had reached a peak of cultural and commercial prosperity. The rise of Athens following the Persian Wars threatened the commercial supremacy of Corinth. A struggle over the Corinthian city of Potidaea, which was a tributary ally of Athens, was one of the precipitating causes of the Peloponnesian Wars, in which Corinth sided with Sparta against Athens. The alliance with Sparta disintegrated after the defeat of Athens in the Peloponnesian Wars, and Corinth engaged (395-387 B.C.) in the "Corinthian War" against Sparta. It was defeated by Sparta in 394 B.C. It later fell to the Macedonians and was held by them until 243 B.C., when it joined the Achaean League of which it was the capital. In 146 B.C. it was captured, sacked, and burned by the Romans, under Mummius; it was rebuilt by Julius Caesar in 46 B.C. Pausanias visited the rebuilt city in the 2nd century A.D. and has left descriptions of the monuments of the restored city. He tells, for example, of an image of Dionysus in the market-place that was supposed to have been made from the tree from which Pentheus spied on the maenads as they celebrated their revels, and from which he was dragged to his death. He mentions a temple of Palaemon (the name by which Melicertes was known when he became a god), and of Aphrodite Melaenis (Black). Still to be seen are the ruins of an archaic temple of Apollo, a Roman theater, an odeum, the agora with basilicas, colonnades, a hostelry, fountains, and other public buildings, the Fountain of Pirene, and much besides, excavated since the 1890's by the American School of Classical Studies at Athens.

Corinth, Gulf of. [Also: Gulf of Lepanto; Latin, Corinthiacus Sinus.] Arm of the Mediterranean Sea, with which it is connected by the Gulf of Patras. It separates central Greece from the Peloponnesus.

Corinth, Isthmus of. Isthmus which connects the Peloponnesus with central Greece. It is now pierced by a canal. Width, 4-8 miles.

Corinthia (kō-rin'thi-ā). [Also: Corinth; Greek, Korinthos.] In ancient geography, a division of Greece, lying between the Gulf of Corinth on the N, Megaris on the NE, the Saronic Gulf on the E, Argolis on the S, and Argolis and Sicyonia on the W.

Corinthian Order (kō-rin'thi-ān). In architecture, the most ornate of the classical orders, and the most slender in its proportions. The capital is shaped like a bell, adorned with rows of acanthus leaves, and less commonly with leaves of other plants. The usual form of abacus (q.v.) is concave on each of its sides, the projecting angles being supported by graceful shoots of acanthus, forming volutes which spring from stalks originating among the foliage covering the lower part of the capital. These stalks also give rise to lesser stalks and to spirals turned toward the middle, and supporting an anthemion or other ornament in the middle of each side of the abacus. In the best Greek examples, the shaft is fluted like the Ionic, and the base called Attic is usual. The entablature also resembles the Ionic. The Corinthian order is of very early origin, though it did not come into favor among the Greeks until comparatively late. The legend of the evolution of the Corinthian capital by Callimachus, in the 5th century B.C., from a calathus (woman's basket) placed on a maiden's tomb and covered with a tile, about which the leaves of a plant of acanthus had grown, is a fable. Among notable Greek examples of the order are the Tholos of Polyclitus at Epidaurus (5th century B.C.), the choragic monument of Lysicrates at Athens (c335 B.C.), and the temple of the Olympian Zeus at Athens (columns of which are a feature of the Athenian landscape), finished by the emperor Hadrian. The rich character of the order commended it to the Romans, who used it freely, and modified it in accordance with their taste.

Corinthus (kōr-in'thus). In Greek legend, a son of Marathon or, as he claimed, a son of Zeus. According to the Corinthians he was the founder of the city of Corinth. Others say he usurped the throne when Bunus, in whose care Aeëtes had left the kingdom when he migrated to Colchis, died. Some say Corinthus died childless, and that on his death Medea, as daughter of Aeëtes, claimed the throne and made Jason the king.

Coriolanus (kō'ri-ō-lā'nus, kōr'i-, kor'i; kō'rī-ō-lā'nus). [Surname of Cnaeus or Caius Marcius.] Roman legendary hero who was active in the first half of the 5th century B.C. He is represented as the champion of the patricians, and afterward as leading a Volsian army against Rome. He was the conquerer of the Volsian city of Corioli (whence his surname).

Corioli (kō-rī'ō-li). In ancient geography, a city in Latium, Italy. Cnaeus Marcius conquered it c493 B.C., and took from it his name Coriolanus. Its exact site is unknown, but is probably not far from Ariccia.

Cornelia (kōr-nēl'ya). Roman matron of the 2nd century B.C. She was the daughter of the elder Scipio Africanus, wife of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, and mother of the Gracchi, the tribunes Tiberius and Caius Gracchus. She was celebrated for her accomplishments and virtues as a mother. After the death of her husband, she refused to marry again but devoted her life to her children. The story is told of her answering the boasts of another Roman matron about her jewels with the simple "These are my jewels," and pointing to her children.

Cornelian Laws (kōr-nēl'yan). [Latin, Leges Corneliae.] Body of laws introduced at Rome by the dictator L. Cornelius Sulla c80 B.C., with a view to restoring the aristocratic form of government, whose power had been weakened by the democratic legislation of the Gracchi and of Marius.

Cornopion (kōr-nō'pi-on). Epithet of Heracles. The people of Oeta in Euboea worshiped Heracles as Cornopion because he delivered them from a plague of locusts.

Cornucopia (kōr-nū-kō'pi-a). [Latin: Cornu Copiae.] See Horn of Plenty, which is the literal translation of the Latin phrase.

Cornutus (kōr-nū'tus), Lucius Annaeus. Roman Stoic philosopher, and commentator on Aristotle. He was born at Leptis Magna in Libya, c20 A.D., and died after 68 A.D. He was the friend and mentor of Persius, who dedicated his fifth satire to Cornutus.

Coroebus (kō-rē'bus). In Greek legend, a son of Mygdon, who allied himself with the Trojans in the hope of winning Cassandra, daughter of Priam, as his bride. He was killed by Diomedes in the sack of Troy.

Coroebus. In Greek legend, an Argive hero who killed the monster Poena, sent by Apollo to punish Argos for the deaths of Psamathe and her son Linus. After the slaying of the monster Argos was ravaged by a plague. Coroebus went to Delphi and confessed that he had killed Poena and asked that the plague be lifted. The priestess instructed him to carry a tripod from the shrine at Delphi. Where the tripod fell from his hands, he was to build a temple to Apollo. Coroebus did as he was bid. The tripod fell from his hands at Mount Gerania, and there he built the temple. The tomb of Coroebus, upon which was represented Coroebus slaying Poena, was at Megara.

Corona Australis (kō-rō'nā ôs-trā'lis). An ancient southern constellation—the Southern Crown—about the knee of Sagittarius, represented by a garland.

Corona Borealis (kō-rō'nā bō-rē-al'is, -ā'lis). [Also: Ariadne's Crown and The Northern Crown.] A northern constellation recognized by the ancients, between Hercules and Boötes, and represented as a garland with two streamers. According to mythology, it was the crown that Dionysus gave to Ariadne for a wedding present. When she died, he set it among the stars.

Corone (kō-rō'nē). Later name that was given to the ancient Messenian city of Aepaea. Some say it was given this name because when the people were digging the foundations for the wall of the city they unearthed a bronze crow. Near this seacoast city, nestled under an overhanging mountain, the Messenians say Ino came ashore when she came from the sea transformed as the sea-goddess Leucothea. The spring where the inhabitants got their drinking water rose in a hollow plane tree. See also, Aepaea.

Coronea (kor-ō-nē'a). In ancient geography, a small town in Boeotia, Greece, situated W of Lake Copais. It was famous for two battles, in one of which (447 B.C.) the Boeotians defeated the Athenians, and in the other (394 B.C.) the Spartans under Agesilaus defeated the Thebans and other allied Greeks.

Coronis (kō-rō'nis). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Phlegyas, king of the Lapiths. She was beloved by Apollo, and during the absences of the god was guarded by his bird—a raven with pure white feathers.

During one of Apollo's absences Coronis fell in love with Ischys and was unfaithful to Apollo. The raven flew off to tell him, although, according to some accounts, the raven was warned by the crow, which had also once been white, not to be so anxious to be the bearer of bad news. On hearing the tale Apollo was enraged and turned the raven's snowy feathers black; some say because the raven had not driven off Ischys by pecking his eyes out; others say it was done because Apollo was so angry with the raven for bringing bad news. Either Apollo or his sister Artemis, to whom he had complained of Coronis' unfaithfulness, shot an arrow into the breast of Coronis. As she was dying Apollo repented of his anger, and in remorse tried to save her and his unborn child, but it was too late. He sorrowfully watched as her body was laid on the funeral pyre, then hastily called Hermes and asked him to snatch the unborn child free from its mother's womb. In this manner Asclepius, for so the child was named, was saved.

Coronis. A Lapith princess, according to some myths, or one of the nymphs of Naxos to whom Zeus entrusted the care of the infant Dionysus. Butes of Thrace, a son of Boreas, compelled her to marry him and she appealed to Dionysus. In answer to her pleas Dionysus drove Butes mad, and he cast himself into a well and drowned.

Coronis. According to some accounts, a daughter of Coroneus, king of Phocis. Poseidon pursued her and she appealed to Athena for help. Athena heard her prayers and transformed her into a white crow, so some say. Afterward, Coronis spied on the daughters of Cecrops, who disobeyed Athena's orders and looked inside the chest she had given them to guard. The chest contained the infant Erichthonius. Coronis flew off and told Athena of their disobedience. In anger at her talebearing, Athena forbade her to visit the Acropolis in future. But some say Athena turned Coronis' feathers black as a punishment.

Coronus (kō-rō'nus). In Greek legend, the son of Caeneus, the king of the Lapithae. He accompanied Jason on the quest for the Golden Fleece. Later he became king of the Lapiths and was killed by Heracles, who aided the Dorians in a dispute with the Lapithae.

Corsica (kôr'si-kā). [Greek, Cynos.] Mountainous island in the Mediterranean Sea, N of the island of Sardinia. Phoenicians, Tyrrhenians, Etruscans, Greeks, Carthaginians, and Romans invaded the island, no one group ever completely suppressing the others. After the beginning of the First Punic War the Romans took the island from the Carthaginians. Remains of the ancient invaders have been found there. The Roman philosopher Seneca the Younger was banished (41 A.D.) to Corsica by the emperor Claudius, and had some very unkind things to say of the inhabitants, namely: that their first law consisted in avenging themselves, the second in living by rapine, the third in lying, and the fourth in denying the gods—but it must be remembered that Seneca's stay among the Corsicans was involuntary. Strabo speaks admiringly of their refusal to act the slave for Roman masters, who found them so intractable that they soon regretted the little they had spent in buying them.

Cortona (kôr-tō'nā). An ancient city of C Italy, in Tuscany, situated above the Mucellia River, about 50 miles SE of what is now Florence. It was one of the 12 great Etruscan cities. Important Etruscan and Roman antiquities, as well as ancient walls and a temple, remain.

Corvus (kôr'vus), Valerius. See Valerius, Marcus.

Corvus. An ancient southern constellation—the Raven or Crow—S of Virgo. A constellation anciently recognized, it presents a characteristic quadrilateral configuration of four stars of the second and third magnitude.

Corvus. The "Crow," a device for boarding an enemy warship, invented or perfected by the Romans and first used by them in the First Punic War (264–241 B.C.). It consisted of a hinged bridge or gangplank, which could be dropped on an enemy deck, fitted with a metal spike to embed in the planking and hold it in position while marines crossed to engage the enemy crew in the hand-to-hand combat at which Roman troops excelled. The Roman victory off Mylae, in 260 B.C., the first serious challenge to Carthaginian supremacy at sea, was credited to Duilius and his new corvus-equipped fleet. (JJ)

Corybantes (kor-i-ban'tēz). Priests of the Great Mother goddess in Phrygia, whose worship they celebrated by orgiastic dances. From the identification of Rhea with the Asiatic Great Mother, they are often equated with the Curetes, Rhea's satellite deities, since the priests were themselves representatives of these minor fertility gods. Some say the Corybantes were the children of Apollo and the Muse Thalia; others say they were the sons of Helios and Athena, or of Zeus and the Muse Calliope, or of Cronus. Still others say their mother was Rhea, and that she took them to the Holy Isle of Samothrace, and that the name of their father was revealed only to those who were initiated into the Samothracian mysteries.

Corycia (kō-rish'a). In Greek legend, a nymph beloved by Apollo, to whom she bore a son. The Corycian cave on Mount Parnassus was said to have been named for her.

Corynetes (kōr-i-nē'tēz). The nickname of Periphetes, meaning "Club-bearer," because he carried a bronze club. See Periphetes.

Coryphaea (kōr-i-fē'a). An epithet applied to the goddess who dwells on the top of the mountain. There was a sanctuary of Artemis 'Coryphaea (Of the peak) on Mount Coryphaeum near Epidaurus. The epithet was also used to designate the highest or supreme god, and was consequently sometimes given in the masculine form, Coryphaeus, as an epithet of Zeus.

Coryphasia (kōr-i-fā'sha). Epithet of Athena, from her temple at Coryphasium, the promontory on which Pylus in Messenia lies.

Coryphasium (kōr-i-fā'shi-um). Promontory in Messenia which became the site of Pylus, and which was afterward called Pylus.

Corythus (kōr'i-thus). A mythical king in Laconia whose herdsmen found Telephus, the son of Auge and Heracles, who had been born and abandoned on Mount Parthenius. The herdsmen took the infant to Corythus who reared him as his own son. At the same time, some of the shepherds of King Corythus found the infant Parthenopaeus, the child of Atalanta and Meleager, on the same mountain, and took him also to Corythus for shelter.

Corythus. The son of Paris and the nymph Oenone. Enraged that Paris had deserted her for Helen, Oenone sent Corythus to guide the avenging Greeks to Troy. There he was slain by his father because he too fell in love with Helen and aroused her interest.

Corythus. An ancient city of Etruria. Named, in the Aeneid, as the place in Italy where Dardanus was born and from which he emigrated to the Troad. The city was named for Corythus, a son of Zeus, and the father by Electra of Dardanus and his twin brother Iasion.

Cos (kōs) or Kos. One of the Dodecanese islands in the Aegean Sea, near the coast of Asia Minor. According to Homer, Hera raised a great storm and shipwrecked Heracles on this island. It is celebrated as the birthplace of the painter Apelles, Ptolemy Philadelphus, and the physician Hippocrates, and also for its sanctuary of Asclepius, a large and well-organized sanatorium and medical school established and directed by Hippocrates. Area, about 111 square miles.

Cosa (kos'a). A settlement on the coast of Etruria, founded as a Latin colony by Rome in 273 B.C. It stands on the hill of Ansedonia, between the Laguna di Orbetello and the Lago di Burano, some 85 miles northwest of Rome. Surface exploration combined with photographic reconnaissance from the air revealed the city walls, gates, street plan, forum, arx, Capitolium, and other buildings of the 3rd century B.C., and excavations directed for the American Academy in Rome by Frank E. Brown and Lawrence Richardson, beginning in 1948, have brought to light foundations of republican temples and public buildings, fragments of architectural decoration, and other finds. Air reconnaissance has also revealed the now silted port of Cosa, engineering measures taken in ancient times to prevent silting, and the secondary roads which linked colony and port with the Via Aurelia. The type of polygonal masonry represented by Cosa's massive limestone fortification walls was formerly assumed, on mistaken analogies with early walls in Greece, to belong to a relatively early period, the 6th century B.C. or earlier. This, plus its name, referred to a hypothetical Etruscan Cusi, and its location led earlier generations of scholars to assume that Cosa's walls were in fact of Etruscan construction and date, and that excavation within them would reveal Etruscan buildings and an Etruscan town plan. Professor Brown's demonstration that Cosa's walls actually date from the 3rd century, and that no construction earlier than 273 B.C. can be identified in the town, is a milestone in the unraveling of Etruscan and Italic chronology. The community which grew up at the foot of Ansedonia, around the port, appears to have been called Succosa, i.e., Sub-Cosa. (JJ)

Cosmetas (koz-mē'tas). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Orderer." Near the temple of Zeus Cosmetas in Sparta was the tomb of Tyndareus.

Cossaeans (ko-sē'anz). An ancient Elamitic hill tribe which, when Sennacherib attacked it in 702 B.C., was living in the NW mountains of Elam. It played an important part in the history of Babylonia and in the course of centuries was absorbed into the Babylonian population. In the time of Alexander the Great the Cossaeans occupied the region (Luristan, in modern Iran) lying about midway between the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulf, and existed by preying on their neighbors and travelers. Alexander conquered the tribe (c324 B.C.) and put many to the sword, when he was on his return journey from India. Some say he fell upon the Cossaeans and killed them as an offering to the shade of his friend Hephaestion who had just died, for the oracle of Ammon in Libya instructed him to make sacrifices to Hephaestion and to worship him as a hero. The Cossaeans are also known as Kassites.

Cossura (kō-sō'ra) or Cossyra (kō-sī'ra). [Modern names, Pantalara or Pantelleria.] Island in the Mediterranean Sea, off the W tip of Sicily. The surface is rocky and volcanic. It was early occupied by the Carthaginians, but was taken by the Romans in 217 B.C. It was highly favored as a place to which members of the imperial family and other prominent persons were banished in the time of the Roman empire.

Cossutius (kō-sō'shus). Roman architect, engaged by the Seleucid emperor Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) to prepare new designs and resume construction, in the Corinthian order, of the vast temple of Zeus Olympius at Athens, which had been begun as a Doric temple by the Pisistratids in the 6th century B.C. and abandoned on the exiling of Hippias in 510 B.C. On Antiochus' death construction was halted again and the temple was completed only c132 A.D. during the reign of the Roman emperor Hadrian. The employment of a Roman to design a major Greek temple has been taken to indicate that Cossutius was an architect of extraordinary ability, or that he was really a Greek who had gained Roman citizenship and name. (JJ)

Cottus (kot'us). In Greek mythology, one of the Hecatonchires, the 100-handed giants who were the children of Uranus and Gaea. His brothers were Gyges and Briareus.

Cotyleus (kot'i-lūs). Epithet of Asclepius, meaning "Of the Hip-joint." Heracles, engaged in a war with Hippocoön and his sons, was wounded in the hip-joint and compelled to retire. Asclepius healed his wound, and to him Heracles gave the name "Cotyleus," and in gratitude raised a temple of Asclepius Cotyleus near the Eurotas River in Laconia.

Cotys (kot'is) or Cotyto (kō-tit'ō). In ancient Greek mythology, a Thracian goddess, resembling the Phrygian Cybele. Her festival, the Cotyttia, was riotous and, later, licentious.

Cotys (kot'is). Any of several kings of Thrace, but especially one who reigned between 382 and 358 B.C. One of his daughters married the Athenian commander Iphicrates; another married the mercenary captain Chari-demus. Cotys was an enemy of the Athenians and succeeded in wresting Sestos and also all of the Thracian Chersonesus from them. He was murdered in 358 B.C., and his kingdom was divided between his three sons.

Cranaë (kran'ā-ē). [Modern name, Marathonisi.] A small island in the Gulf of Laconia, off the coast of Gythium. Here Paris and Helen are said to have made their first stop when they eloped from Sparta, and here Helen first yielded in love to Paris. A sanctuary of Aphrodite Migonitis (Uniter) on the mainland opposite the island, commemorated the event, and the fulfillment of Aphrodite's promise to Paris to give him the most beautiful woman in the world in return for his award to her of the Apple of Discord.

Cranaus (kran'ā-us). In Greek mythology, an earth-born man of what came to be known as Attica. He succeeded Cecrops on the throne. Cranaus had a daughter Atthis who died a maid. In her honor he named his land (formerly called Cecropia after Cecrops) Attica, after this daughter. It is said that it was during his reign that the flood of Deucalion took place in Thessaly. Amphictyon, said by some to be a son of Deucalion, and by others to be earth-born, rose against Cranaus and expelled him from Attica.

Crannon (kran'on) or Cranon (krā'nōn). [Also: Ephyra.] In ancient geography, a city in Thessaly, Greece, about ten miles SW of Larissa; its exact site is not known. Here, in 322 B.C., Antipater defeated the confederated Greeks.

Crantor (kran'tōr). Philosopher of the Old Academy (c335-c275 B.C.); born at Soli in Cilicia. He was the first commentator on Plato, and wrote a treatise, On Grief, from which Cicero borrowed extensively in his Tusculan Disputations.

Crassus (kras'us), Lucius Licinius. Roman orator and statesman; born 140 B.C.; died 91 B.C. He was consul in 95 B.C. and censor in 92 B.C. He is one of the chief speakers in Cicero's De Oratore.

Crassus, Marcus Licinius. [Surnamed Dives, meaning "the Rich."] Roman general and politician, born probably c112 B.C.; died 53 B.C. His father had been a censor and praetor, and he was reared modestly. His habits of life were temperate in the main. He married his brother's widow, entertained frugally, studied history and philosophy, and by cultivating the art of oratory made himself one of the most powerful public speakers in Rome. He was generous to strangers and educated his slaves for greater usefulness. But all his good qualities were obscured as he grew older by his great vice of avarice. He fattened on public calamities. It was said that when there was a fire in Rome, as often happened, he rushed to buy the burning property and then put out the fire with his own private fire brigade. The disorders of war and civil war afforded him opportunities to increase his wealth. Yet the men he most despised were those whom he deemed guilty of avarice. Besides the great amount of real estate he owned in Rome he was the owner of silver mines, of valuable lands outside Rome, and of great numbers of slaves.

In the civil wars his father opposed Marius and finally committed suicide (87 B.C.) to avoid falling into his hands. The brother of Crassus also perished in the civil war. Crassus fled to Spain with some of his retinue to escape the proscriptions of Cinna, and hid in a cave for eight months. An acquaintance his father had made when he served as praetor in Spain sent food and other necessities and comforts of life to him during the whole period, but never allowed himself to see Crassus. When Crassus learned of the death of Cinna, he ventured out of the cave, gathered a band of followers, and marched about Spain. Some say he plundered Malaca (Malaga), but he denied it. He went to Africa and joined Metellus Pius, but failed to reach an accord with him and went over to Sulla, under whom he served in the campaigns of 83-82 B.C. During the proscriptions by which Sulla got rid of his enemies and seized their property Crassus enriched himself, profiting by the liberality of his chief and by the opportunities which the war offered for speculations in confiscated property. He became the richest man in Rome and used his colossal fortune to further his political ambitions. His great rival was Pompey, whom Sulla honored for his military victories. Since he could not equal Pompey in war, he turned to politics. He headed a moderate party between the aristocratic conservative party of Pompey and the radical party of Julius Caesar. Yet, says Plutarch, he was "neither a steadfast friend nor an implacable enemy, but readily abandoned both his favors and his resentments at the dictates of his interests." It is thought that he had some connection with the conspiracy of Catiline, and that for a time he secretly supported Publius Clodius, the enemy of Cicero. He won influence by the favors he granted and by the fear which the power of his wealth inspired. In 72 B.C. he was appointed by the Senate to put down the revolt of the gladiators under Spartacus, which two consuls had been unable to quell and which spreading rapidly posed a great threat to Rome. In the course of fighting Spartacus one of his lieutenants disobeyed his orders, engaged Spartacus, was defeated, and fled with his men. Crassus chose 500 of those who had shown cowardice, divided them into 50 groups of ten men each, took one man from each group by lot and had him put to death as an example. He then pursued Spartacus to Rhegium and defeated a large part of his forces. In a succeeding engagement Spartacus was killed and the revolt was put down, but Pompey shared in the credit for the victory because he came upon those of the rebels who were fleeing from Crassus and killed them. Pompey was given a triumph, and Crassus had to be content with the knowledge that he had done his job well. This added to the jealousy he felt for Pompey and when, 70 B.C., he became consul with Pompey, he publicly disagreed with him on all matters. In 65 B.C. he was made censor but quarreled with his colleague and resigned. Caesar, who needed the military prestige of Pompey and the wealth of Crassus, succeeded in reconciling them and in winning their support. The three formed the First Triumvirate in 60 B.C., but when Caesar left for Gaul, the quarrels between Pompey and Crassus broke out anew. In 56 B.C. Caesar summoned them to Luca and again reconciled them, and urged them to run for the consulship again. There was some objection to this in Rome because they had accomplished so little when they earlier shared the consulship, but with liberal bribery, threats, and promises, as well as some juggling of the laws, they were elected (55 B.C.). In the division of spheres Crassus was awarded the province of Syria, Pompey got Spain, and Caesar was named proconsul of Gaul. Crassus was delighted. He meant to make war on the Parthians and win at last the military triumphs that would make him the equal of Pompey. Because there was no ground for a war against the Parthians his program was unpopular, and one of the tribunes of the people tried to prevent him from leaving Rome. The tribune was unsuccessful. Crassus sailed from Brundisium (54 B.C.) for the East. On the way he lost many vessels in a storm at sea. In the East he marched to the Euphrates River, crossed it, and took several cities in Mesopotamia. At Zenodotia 100 of his soldiers were slain. He captured the place, plundered and sacked it, and sold the inhabitants into slavery. He then went into winter quarters in Syria, plundered the temple at Jerusalem, and devoted himself to adding up the wealth he had taken. In the meantime the Parthians, thoroughly warned of his approach, made their preparations to resist him. A story is told that at a temple of Venus in Syria, Publius the son of Crassus stumbled and his father fell over him. He ignored the dire warning. His soldiers were terrified at the news they had of the Parthians, but Crassus was determined to proceed. His path was strewn with unfavorable omens. When he was crossing the Euphrates at Zeugma, a strange thunderstorm broke; the place where he intended to make camp was struck by two thunderbolts; the first Roman eagle set up turned around of its own accord and faced in the opposite direction; when rations were distributed to the men, lentils and salt, offerings customarily made to the dead, were offered them first. But most unfavorable of all was the combination in Crassus of military inexperience and unbridled ambition. He allowed himself to be duped by a barbarian chieftain pretending to be his friend into leaving the friendly valley of the Euphrates and striking out across the desert. The Parthians waited for him. When he was practically at a stand in the desert, his men weary from marching in sand and from thirst, the Parthians attacked. Publius, the son of Crassus, fought bravely. Crassus learned that he was in danger and rushed to his aid. But in the meantime Publius was wounded, and rather than submit to capture, he ordered his shield-bearer to kill him with his sword. When Crassus came up to aid him, he was met by the Parthians waving his son's head on the point of a spear. The battle was carried on furiously all day. Crassus suffered heavy losses. At night he retreated to Carrhae (modern Haran) in Mesopotamia, leaving his wounded behind to the mercy of the Parthians, who killed them all. After some days a message came to him in Carrhae, inviting him to a peace parley with the Parthians. He accepted the invitation and was treacherously slain. From the beginning to the end of the campaign, Crassus had displayed the utmost ignorance of military affairs and an obstinacy that resulted in disaster. Some 20,000 Romans are said to have lost their lives in the expedition that was undertaken to satisfy his ambition. According to Plutarch, the Parthians cut off his head and his hand, and carried the head to the pavilion of the Parthian king. The king was presiding over a banquet, at which a tragic actor was singing the lines of Euripides' tragedy, The Bacchae. As he came to the lines describing the frenzied Agave entering with the head of her own son, the head of Crassus was flung in and presented to the king.

Crataeis (krā-tē'is). Named by Homer (Odyssey), as the mother of the sea-monster Scylla.

Crater (krā'tér). An ancient southern constellation south of Leo and Virgo. It is supposed to represent a vase with two handles and a base.

Crater. [Also: Krater.] In ancient Greece, a large vessel or vase in which, as was Greek custom, water was mixed with wine according to accepted formulas, and from which it was dipped out and served to the guests in the smaller pouring-vessels (oinochoë). There are at least three types of craters. The bell crater is open and bell-like, with a foot, and a small handle placed very low on either side. The column crater, also footed, curves inward near the top to form a shoulder from which rises a neck of somewhat smaller diameter that ends in a rim; the handles rise as columns from the shoulder of the vessel to the rim. The volute crater, also footed, and like the column crater ending in a neck, has handles that rise from the shoulder and curl in a volute well above the rim. Many beautiful examples, richly decorated, are preserved.

Craterus (krat'er-us). Macedonian general, killed in Cappadocia, 321 B.C. He served Alexander the Great with distinction on the campaigns in Asia. He was one of Alexander's ablest and most trusted generals, and was often given the position of second in command as at Tyre (332 B.C.), Gaugamela (331 B.C.), and at the Hydaspes River (326 B.C.). Craterus built two cities—Bucephalia and Nicaea—on the banks of the Hydaspes while Alexander went on to the Indus River and into India. Craterus also prepared a fleet for transporting the army down the Hydaspes to the Indus and to the ocean when Alexander returned from India. From the mouth of the Indus Craterus marched inland on the homeward journey, to Arachosia to quell a revolt there and continued through Drangiana and Carmania, where he rejoined Alexander. In Asia Alexander increasingly adopted barbarian (Persian) customs to the dismay and resentment of his Macedonian veterans and friends. Craterus did not follow his commander in this, but maintained his Macedonian ways, and though he was highly respected by Alexander for his capacity, he did not enjoy the intimate affection with him that was shared by others. Nevertheless, on the occasion of a quarrel between Craterus and Hephaestion, Alexander rebuked them both, told them they were the two men he loved most in the world, but if such a quarrel ever arose again, he would kill them both, or, at least, the aggressor. In 324 B.C. Craterus was one of the leaders of the group of veterans Alexander sent home with rich rewards. Following the death of Alexander (323 B.C.) he became co-ruler with Antipater of his empire. The Greek states rebelled when they learned of Alexander's death. Craterus marched into Thessaly and defeated them at Crannon (322 B.C.). The next year he was killed in Cappadocia (321 B.C.).

Crates (krā'tēz). Greek comic poet and actor of the 5th century B.C. He is said to have performed in the plays of Cratinus. He wrote comedies in which he presented subjects of a general character rather than a series of disparate antics and attacks on individuals, and is said to have been the first to produce plays in which drunken men appeared. Only fragments of his work survive.

Crates. Greek Cynic philosopher; born in Thebes; fl. c320 B.C. He was a disciple of Diogenes.

Crates. Athenian, the pupil and successor of Polemo in the Academy; fl. c270 B.C. The friendship of Crates and Polemo was famous in antiquity, and they were said to have been buried in the same tomb.

Crates of Mallus. Greek grammarian, born in Mallus in Cilicia; fl. c150 B.C. He was the founder of the Pergamene school of grammar. His chief work was a comprehensive critical and interpretive commentary on Homer. He went to Rome in 168–167 B.C., and during a long stay there gave lectures which aroused an interest in the study of philology and literary criticism among the Romans. Only fragments of his work survive.

Cratinus (krā-tī'nus). Athenian comic poet, born c484 B.C., died c419 B.C. He was a bitter enemy of Pericles. His writing was forceful but it is said he suffered from overfondness for wine. Aristophanes alluded to him in the Knights as a fine man ruined by drink. Nevertheless, Cratinus exhibited 21 plays and was victor nine times. His last victory was won over Aristophanes with a play in which he answered Aristophanes' allusion to him in the Knights by writing a satirical play against himself, in which his wife of the play rescues him from the clutches of Pytine (Wine-jug). He was called by Mahaffy "the real originator—the Aeschylus—of political comedy." The titles and many fragments of his plays have survived.

Cratippus (krā-tip'us). Greek historian who continued the history of Thucydides. Although he is given as a contemporary of Thucydides in at least one source, it is felt that he is a much later writer and the claim of antiquity was made in order to secure greater authority for his work. (AH)

Cratippus. Peripatetic philosopher of Mytilene; fl. c45 B.C. He was the friend and instructor of Cicero, who accounted him one of the first philosophers of the Peripatetic school. He accompanied Pompey in his flight after the battle of Pharsalus, and endeavored to comfort and rouse him by engaging him in philosophical discourse. He opened a school at Athens c48 B.C., which was attended by many eminent Romans, including Brutus during his stay at Athens after the murder of Caesar. He is thought to have written a work on divination.

Cratus (krā'tus). In Greek mythology, a son of Uranus and Gaea. He was the personification of strength or force, and in the Prometheus Bound of Aeschylus, Cratus goaded Hephaestus into binding Prometheus. Some say Cratus was a son of the Titan Pallas and Styx.

Cratylus (krat'i-lus). Greek philosopher, an elder contemporary of Plato. He was a disciple of Heraclitus. Plato introduces him as the principal speaker in one of his dialogues (the Cratylus).

Cremera (krem'e-rā). In ancient geography, a small river in Etruria which joins the Tiber a few miles N of Rome. It is the traditional scene of the defeat of the Fabii in c477 B.C.

Cremona (krē-mō'nā; Italian, krā-mō'nā). City in NW Italy on the Po River. It was founded by the Gauls and became a Roman colony in 218 B.C. The old city, on the site of modern Cremona, was destroyed in 69 A.D. in a struggle between Vitellius and Vespasian.

Creon (krē'on). In Greek legend, a son of Menoeceus of Thebes and a brother of Jocasta, mother and wife of Oedipus. He was ruler of Thebes after the death of Laius but when Oedipus came to Thebes and freed it of a plague by killing the Sphinx, Creon gave him the throne and his sister, the widow of Laius, in marriage, as he had promised he would do for whoever rid Thebes of the Sphinx. Plague again struck Thebes, some years later, and ominous signs pointed to

Oedipus as the reason for it. He accused Creon of treachery and of spreading lies about him. But Creon was his loyal friend and when Oedipus left Thebes, having by this time learned the true reason for the plague, he left his children in Creon's care. Creon ruled until Eteocles was old enough to take the throne. In the war of the Seven against Thebes it was prophesied that Thebes would be victorious if a royal prince voluntarily sacrificed himself to Ares. Menoeceus, son of Creon, killed himself before the walls. In the fighting Eteocles was killed, Creon took command and drove the Argives back and Thebes was saved. He ordered a magnificent funeral for Eteocles, defender of the city, but forbade anyone, on pain of death, to bury Polynices, his other nephew who had inspired the attack on Thebes. Antigone, sister of Polynices, defied his order. She crept out of the city and buried her brother. When Creon learned of her defiance he ordered her to be buried alive. His son Haemon, to whom Antigone was betrothed, killed himself on her tomb. Theseus and the Athenians, some say, compelled Creon to yield the bodies of the other Argive dead and to restore them to their families for burial. To deny proper burial to the dead was the most wicked punishment that could be devised against an enemy, because the unburied had to wander for many years on the near side of the Styx before they could be ferried across to their final resting place in Hades. Creon ruled Thebes after the death of Eteocles until Laodamas, the son of Eteocles, grew up and assumed the throne.

Creon. In Greek legend, a king of Thebes. He was the father of Megara, whom he gave to Heracles in gratitude for his defeat of the Minyans under Erginus. According to some accounts he was slain in an uprising while Heracles was in the Underworld fetching Cerberus.

Creon. In Greek legend, a king of Corinth, father of Creusa, or Glauce, the intended wife of Jason. He perished when he tried to save his daughter, who was burning from the poisoned robe Medea had sent her. Creon attempted to pull the robe from his daughter and was destroyed with her.

Creontides (krē-on-tī'ā-dēz). According to some accounts, the second son of Megara and Heracles. He was to have become king of Thebes but Heracles, in a fit of madness inspired by Hera, slew him and his other children by Megara.

Cresilas (kres'i-lās). Greek sculptor; born at Cydonia, Crete; active in the second half of the 5th century B.C. His career was made at Athens, where he was a contemporary of Phidias, and where he executed a portrait statue of Pericles. Copies exist of a figure of a wounded Amazon, which Cresilas carved at Ephesus in a competition with Phidias and Polyclitus.

Cresius (krē'shi-us). Epithet of Dionysus, meaning "Cretan." In the temple of Dionysus Cresius at Argos, some say, Ariadne was buried.

Cresphontes (kres-fon'tēz). According to legend, a son of Aristomachus, a descendant of Heracles, and brother of Temenus and Aristodemus. The brothers, as leaders of the Heraclidae (Dorians), conquered the Peloponnesus and decided to divide it between them by lot. Aristodemus having died, his share was to go to his twin sons, Eurysthenes and Procles. Lots were to be cast into an urn, and he whose lot came up first was to receive Argos, second Laconia, and third Messenia. The lot of Temenus came up first and he was assigned Argos. The sons of Aristodemus won dominion over Laconia. Cresphontes, who greatly desired the rich land of Messenia, won it by a trick. He put a clod of earth in the urn and poured water on it. As it was melted by the water, his lot came out last. After the lot-drawing, the Heraclidae set up three altars to Zeus Patrous (Pater-nal) and on the altar of each a sign appeared. On the altar of Cresphontes there was a fox. The seer interpreted this to mean that his people would be wily. In future wars between the Spartans and the Messenians, the Spartans based their claim to Messenia on an ancient right, saying Cresphontes had won it by trickery. Cresphontes was killed in a rebellion with two of his sons. A third son, Aepytus, was spared because he had been sent into Arcadia and later regained the throne.

Cressid (kres'id) or Cressida (kres'i-dā). Mythical daughter of the Trojan priest Calchas, whose supposed infidelities have made her name a byword for female faithlessness. The name represents the accusative case of Chryseis (q.v.) The story of Cressid is believed to have originated with Benoît de Sainte-Maure, a 12th-century trouvère, who called his character Briseida (she was thus identified with Homer's Briseis). Guido delle Colonne later reproduced the story in a popular Latin work, the Historia Trojana. The story was later taken up by Boccaccio, Chaucer, and Shakespeare. A modern version may be found in Christopher Morley's The Trojan Horse (1937). Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida is probably the best-known version of the tale.

Creta (krē'ta) or Crete (-tē). In Greek mythology, a nymph who bore Pasiphaë, wife of Minos, to Helius. She was also known as Perseis. Some say she was a daughter of Asterius, and the wife of Minos.

Cretan Bull, The. In Greek mythology, a magnificent fierce bull, given to Minos, king of Crete, by Poseidon. Minos refused to sacrifice it to Poseidon, as he had promised to do, and as a punishment Poseidon caused Minos' wife to fall in love with the bull and to become by the bull the mother of the Minotaur. Heracles captured the bull as one of his labors for Eurystheus, and rode on its back as it swam from Crete to Greece. The bull was turned loose in Greece and roamed the countryside until it came to Marathon, where it terrified the populace. It then became known as the Marathonian Bull, and was responsible for the death of Androgeus, son of Minos. Theseus finally slew the bull.

Crete (krēt). [Also: Candia; Greek, Kriti, Krete; French, Crète, Candie; Italian and Latin, Creta; Old Turkish, Kirid, Kirit.] Island in the Mediterranean Sea, situated SE of Greece and SW of Asia Minor. It has an area of 3235 square miles, is 160 miles long, and 35 miles wide in its greatest width. Sharply rising mountain ridges separate the parts of the island from each other. The mountain slopes, once covered with cedar and cypress, are now largely bare. In the fertile plains and river valleys wheat, fruit, wool, olives, and wine are produced. According to legend, the inhabitants of Crete sprang from the soil. Their first king was Cres, for whom the island was named. Some say the Idaean Dactyls, who discovered the use of fire and metal-working, were born in Crete. The nine Curetes, either sprung from the earth or born of the Dactyls, originated in Crete, and the Titans, especially during the Golden Age of Cronus when men lived like gods, were associated with the island. In a cave on Mount Ida the Curetes protected the infant Zeus by clashing their shields to drown out his cries, while nymphs nourished him with milk and honey. To memorialize the contribution of the bees Zeus changed their color to copper that gleamed like gold in the sun, and made them impervious to changes in the weather, an important consideration in Crete. Athena was said by some to have been born from the head of Zeus at the source of the Triton River in Crete, where a temple was raised to her. The marriage of Zeus and Hera was also said by some to have taken place on the island. Cretans annually reenacted the ceremony at a temple that commemorated this event. Teucer, the ancestor of the Trojans, came from Crete, and Minos, Daedalus, Pasiphaë, the Minotaur, and many other figures of mythology and legend are associated with the island. Long before the Greeks on the mainland had developed their ideas of the great god Zeus, however, the Cretans had elaborated their own concepts of the gods. The chief figure in their worship was the Great Mother, who had power over life and death, who was the goddess of the forest and of wild beasts, and who occupied the central place in Cretan religion. Her attributes were the double ax, the labrys, a symbol of power, and the Horns of Consecration, which may have been connected with the bull, an animal that appears later in connection with the story of Europa. The Great Mother was a triple goddess, who ruled in heaven, on earth, and under the earth. The animals sacred to her came from each of her kingdoms—the dove from the air, the bull or lion from the earth, and the snakes from the underworld. Joined to the Great Mother was a male figure, a son-husband, he who was first named Zagreus by the Greeks and later developed by them into the great sky-god Zeus, whom the Cretans claimed was born on their island. They also claimed his tomb in the hill of Iuktas, the outline of which appears to be a giant lying on his back, pointing his great bearded profile at the sky. It was because the Cretans claimed to have the tomb of Zeus that the Greeks called them "liars," and gave them a bad reputation throughout the Greek world. Obviously, Zeus, being a god, could not have died and been placed in a tomb. Because Crete was subject to frequent earthquakes, there was a strong chthonic element to Cre-tan religion. The Cretans explained the earthquakes as the tossing of the earth on the great bull's horns, and propitiated him by offering him sacrifices of bulls.

The Cretans are thought to be of Libyan or Anatolian stock. Homer names them as Achaeans, Cydonians, Dorians, Pelasgians, and Eteocretans, the last of whom are believed to be the original non-Hellenic inhabitants. But Homer wrote long after the greatest ages of Cretan civilization had passed away. Cretan civilization existed before 3000 B.C., and was in a continuous state of development thereafter, reaching its height in the period 3000-1400 B.C. The German archaeologist Heinrich Schliemann believed that Crete was the legendary isle of Atlantis. He thought Crete might be the origin of the highly developed art he had found in Greece. He discovered the site of the palace of Knossos in 1886, but was unable to carry out his plan for excavating it. It remained for Sir Arthur Evans the British archaeologist, who had visited the island in 1894, to acquire the site and, in 1900, to begin his excavations. Other excavations in various parts of the island have been carried on by the Italians, by the French School, the English School, by Americans, and by the Greeks. Sir Arthur Evans classified the distinctive periods into which Cretan civilization falls according to ceramic development, as follows:

Early Minoan I (E.M.I)	3400-2800 B.C.
" " II (E.M.II)	2800-2400 B.C.
" " III (E.M.III)	2400-2100 B.C.
Middle Minoan I (M.M.I)	2100-1900 B.C.
" " II (M.M.II)	1900-1700 B.C.
" " III (M.M.III)	1700-1580 B.C.
Late Minoan I (L.M.I)	1580-1450 B.C.
" " II (L.M.II)	1450-1375 B.C.
" " III (L.M.III)	1375-1100 B.C.

The relatively strict dates for each period are possible because of close synchronization with Egyptian history, for Cretan external relations were oriented toward Egypt from an early date. Habitations have been discovered beneath the palaces of Knossos (q.v.) and Phaestus that date from the Neolithic Age, before 3000 B.C. Wooden

and bone utensils, and polished and incised pottery of this period have been found on these and other sites. In the period from 3000–2000 B.C. two great centers of civilization developed, that around the plain of Mesara, on the southern side of the island, and that at the eastern end of the island. In this period close commercial relations were held with the islands of the Cyclades, with Egypt, and with Asia Minor. This period saw the development of gray incised pottery, decorated with simple figures—zig-zags, herring-bones, groups of parallel lines, and rows of dots (E.M.I); pottery decorated with red and black on a natural clay ground (E.M.II); and pottery painted in white on a black glazed ground on which new patterns were introduced (E.M.III). Also in this period, great progress was made in metal-working and in the art of carving stone vases, employing the natural strata of the stone as decoration. In the Middle Minoan periods the polychrome style, called “Kamare ware” (because first examples of it were found by the English in a cave at Kamare, on the south slope of Mount Ida) was developed, with white, red, and yellow decorations on a black glazed ground. By the Middle Minoan periods I and II (2100–1700 B.C.), a brilliant civilization had evolved. The first palaces were built at Knossos and Phaistos; the polychrome Kamare ware had become highly decorative with stylized figures, such as the octopus motif; and the refinement developed in the techniques of the potter’s wheel led to the production of “egg-shell” vases, so named for their thinness with fluted bodies and rims of great delicacy. A system of hieroglyphic writing was in use; commercial relations in the Aegean were widened, continued with Egypt, and extended into Asia. At the end of this era of the fabulous development of a civilization far in advance of any that had developed on the Greek mainland at this time, some unknown catastrophe struck all the centers of Cretan civilization and destroyed them, about 1700 B.C. The interruption was temporary. Between 1700 and 1400 B.C. new and grander palaces were raised at Knossos, Phaistos, and Mallia; comfortable private houses with oiled parchment for window panes were built around the palaces; new cities were founded; relations with Egypt and the Near East flourished; and Cretan colonies were sent out to the neighboring islands and to the Greek mainland. Cretan civilization and power was at its height. The age was characterized by the figure of King Minos, who had the largest and most powerful navy in existence and controlled the waters of the Mediterranean. Some say that the name “Minos” was a title similar to the Egyptian word “Pharaoh,” and that it applied to at least two Cretan kings, and perhaps to a series of them. Palaces and houses were decorated inside and out with brilliantly colored frescoes that depicted naturalistic scenes, such as the human figure, sacrificial processions, and religious gatherings, thus recording much of the Cretan way of life. Sculptured stone vases, decorated pottery jars, some of great size, and golden cups worked in relief with consummate artistry, were in use in the palaces. Fragile vases and delicate figurines played a part in religious ceremonies or served for ornamentation. The king and others had exquisite seals cut in gems for sealing their documents. Seal engraving was developed to perfection in the Middle Minoan and following periods. Animals at rest and in action, birds in flight, human figures, were engraved with exquisite grace and fidelity on ivory, steatite, crystal, jasper, and other hard surfaces. From the miniature seal engravings of ceremonial scenes comes much of our knowledge of Minoan ritual. Relief decorations on cups and carving reached a peak of refinement. These are exemplified by the famous Vaphio cups (so-called because they were found at Vaphio, near Sparta, whither they had been carried from Crete), with their scenes of the bull hunt and of the bulls in pasture beautifully worked in repoussé, and by the extraordinary figure of the bull-leaper carved in ivory. Frescoes show large audiences, including women, watching the sport of bull-leaping, which differed from the bull-fight in that the performer must catch the horns of the bull as the animal charged, leap over its head, and land on his feet on its back. Many scenes and stories, as well as religious ceremonies, centered about the bull. Two styles of linear writing were in use in this period—the Linear Script A and Linear Script B—and indicated that the Cretans had an alphabet long before Cadmus introduced the Phoenician alphabet into Greece. The Linear Script B was deciphered, half a century after the first examples of it had been found, by the Englishman Michael Ventris, in 1952. In 1957 Prof. Cyrus H. Gordon of Brandeis University announced that an adaptation of Accadian was the language of the Linear Script A. In the houses and palaces of this era brilliant use of "light-wells" was made for ventilation and illumination; ingenious "siphon systems" brought water from the hills to the palaces, where it was then distributed by means of terra-cotta pipes and stone ducts. The household water supply was also augmented by rain water drained from the roofs. This period, so briefly described, was the era of Cretan supremacy, in commercial and maritime power, and in the refinement and brilliance of its civilization. About 1400 B.C. general catastrophe overcame the flourishing civilization and destroyed it, apparently at once. Some think it must have been a great natural disaster, as an earthquake, that put such a sudden end to the great palaces and Minoan cities. Others think it was perhaps a swooping raid by Achaeans from the mainland that utterly overthrew the Cretan civilization. The Athenian legend is that Theseus caused the overthrow of Cretan civilization, for when he fled with Ariadne, the Cretan fleet pursued him and in its absence the island was beset by enemies. Others say the island was exposed to raiders when King Minos sailed off in his fleet to recover Daedalus, who had escaped on waxen wings to the kingdom of Cocalus in Sicily. In the following centuries, 1400-1100 B.C., Crete was dominated by the Mycenaean culture. Its own became decadent, the palatial sites were not reoccupied to any great extent; the importance of Crete as a center of art, culture, and commerce declined completely. Homer mentions in the Iliad that Crete, "century-cities," sent soldiers against Troy under the leadership of Idomeneus and Meriones. In the Odyssey he describes the palace of Alcinous, with its gold and silver doors, and its decorations of blue enamel, and though some think the island home of Alcinous was Corcyra or Corfu, the description of the palace might equally well apply to the palaces of Crete. After the time of the Trojan War the "hundred cities" of Crete warred so among themselves that they became an easy prey for the Dorians, who invaded their island, c1100 B.C., and put a period to the Minoan civilization. At the beginning of the era that culminated in the Classical period, c750 B.C., Cretan culture enjoyed a renaissance. Cretan archaic art and skilled craftsmanship, heirs of the master smith Daedalus, influenced developments on the Greek mainland. Independent cities coined their own money, and it was in this time that the famous Gortynian Code of Laws was promulgated—an extraordinary document that detailed all kinds of social and economic laws, and was engraved on the walls of a portico or arcade near Gortyna. Crete played no role in the Persian and Peloponnesian Wars. Its relations with the mainland were slight. By the height of the great Classical period its artistic developments had come to a halt. Its age of greatness was far in the past. In 66 B.C. the island fell, but not without difficulty, under the domination of the Romans.

Cretea (krē'tē-ā). In ancient geography, a place on Mount Lycaeus, in Arcadia. The Arcadians said that here, in a place where no living creature casts a shadow, Zeus was born to Rhea. According to the Arcadians, this name Cretea was afterward taken to mean the island of Crete. But as far as they were concerned Zeus was born in Arcadia.

Cretheïs (krē'thē-is). In Greek mythology, the wife of Acastus, son of Pelias. Her name is also given as Astydamia (q.v.) and Hippolyta. She fell in love with Peleus, who had come to her husband's court to be purified for a murder, and when he rebuffed her advances she accused him to his wife Polymela of plotting to desert her and marry her (Cretheïs') daughter, Sterope. Polymela believed the lies of Cretheïs and hanged herself in despair. Cretheïs then made the same accusations against Peleus to Acastus and asked him to avenge the insult. Acastus was reluctant to kill a man he had purified and sought, unsuccessfully, to get rid of Peleus in another way. Some time later Peleus returned, attacked the kingdom, slew Acastus and Cretheïs, dismembered her body and drove his chariot through its scattered pieces into the city.

Cretheus (krē'thūs). In Greek legend, a son of Aeolus, king of Magnesia in Thessaly, and Enarete. He was the founder and king of Iolcus. He married his niece Tyro, daughter of Salmoneus, and adopted her twin sons Pelias and Neleus. By Tyro he was the father of Aeson, Pheres and Amythaon.

Cretheus. In the Aeneid, a Trojan companion of Aeneas on the flight from Troy to Italy. He was the darling of the Muses; his heart was given forever to song and the lyre. He was totally unequipped for war, and in the battle between the forces under Aeneas and those under Turnus in Italy he was slain by Turnus.

Creticus (krē'ti-kus), Metellus. See Metellus, Quintus Caecilius (d. c56 B.C.).

Creus (krē'us). See Crius.

Creusa (krē-ō'sa). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and Praxithea. Apollo fell in love with her while she was still a very young girl and ravished her. Deserted by the god, whom she had called on for aid in vain, when her time came she bore Apollo a son in secret, and abandoned the child in the cave where he was born under the Acropolis. She was soon overcome by remorse and concern for her baby and returned to the cave to recover him but he had disappeared. Even the tapestried coverlet in which he was wrapped was gone, and there were no traces of blood to show that he had been devoured by animals. Creusa carried her sad and guilty secret alone. She later married Xuthus, the son of Hellen, who had fled to Athens from Thessaly and had helped Erechtheus in a war. The Athenians looked down on him as an alien, and thought it was just as well when some time had passed and no children were born to the couple. Xuthus longed for a son and went with Creusa to consult the oracle at Delphi. He was told that he should consider the first person he met on leaving the sanctuary as his son. Ion, a young and handsome priest of Apollo, was the first person he met and Xuthus joyously claimed him. Creusa, jealous because Xuthus had a son and she didn't know what had become of her child, and also incensed to think that Xuthus had a child by another woman, resolved to slay the youth. She offered him a cup of poisoned wine, but as he poured out part of it as a libation to the gods a dove sent by Apollo flew down, drank of the wine, and instantly expired. Creusa's plot against him being exposed, Ion pursued her to the altar where she fled and would have killed her, but the priestess of Apollo appeared. She told Creusa and Ion how he had been brought by Hermes as an infant from a cave to Delphi. When she showed the coverlet in which he had been wrapped Ion was overjoyed as he thought now he would be able to trace his mother. Creusa recognized the coverlet as one she had made herself and wrapped about her new-born child in the cave. She revealed to Ion that she was his mother and a reconciliation was effected. On instructions from the priestess Creusa did not tell Xuthus that Ion was her child. She allowed him to go on thinking that he was a gift to her husband from the oracle. Later she bore Xuthus two sons, Achaeus and Dorus.

Creusa. In the Aeneid, the daughter of Priam and Hecuba. She was the wife of Aeneas and the mother of Ascanius. During the flight through the burning city of Troy she was separated from Aeneas. He retraced his steps into the city but never saw her again. Her ghost appeared to him as he searched and told him to go without her, and to fulfill his destiny by establishing a race in another land.

Creusa. [Also: Glauce.] In Greek legend, daughter of Creon, king of Corinth. Jason the Argonaut, tiring of his wife Medea, fell in love with Creusa and planned to marry her. Medea sent Creusa as a wedding gown a magic robe which, when she put it on, burned her flesh and caused her to die in terrible convulsions.

Crimisus (kri-mī'sus). [Also: Crimissus.] In ancient geography, a river in W Sicily, probably near Segesta. Here Timoleon with 11,000 men defeated (339 B.C.) 70,000 Carthaginians. In the Aeneid, the river-god Crimisus is named as the father of Acestes by the Trojan woman Egesta or Segesta, for whom the town is named.

Criophorus (krī-of'ō-rus). An epithet of Hermes, meaning "Ram-bearer." It was given him by the people of Tanagra because he averted a pestilence by making a circuit of the city carrying a ram on his shoulders, one actor; up, lūte, pūll; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ḡ as d or j, ṣ as s or sh, ṭ as t or ch, ḡ as z or zh.

of the many instances in Greek lore of the apotropaic Magic Circle. Thereafter, at the feast of Hermes at Tanagra the handsomest youth marched around the walls carrying a ram on his shoulders in commemoration of this event. In his role as savior Hermes was also called Promachus (Defender). In many places Hermes was called Criophorus to signify his role as protector of flocks.

Crisa (krī'sa). [Also: Crissa.] In ancient geography, a city in Phocis, Greece, situated SW of Delphi. It was styled "the divine" by Homer. It is often confused with its port, Cirrha.

Crispus (kris'pus), Caius Sallustius. See Salust.

Critias (krish'i-as, krit'i-as). Athenian orator and politician, disciple of Socrates, and distinguished poet and orator. He was one of the Thirty Tyrants who governed Athens, opposed the revolution of 411 B.C., and proposed the recall of Alcibiades. He fell with the Tyrants in 403 B.C., perishing in the battle for the citadel of Piraeus. His reputation as a cruel, rapacious, and dissolute man may be unjust, as Plato seemed to admire him and introduced him in a dialogue which bears his name. He wrote on historical and political subjects, and was the author of several tragedies. Fragments of his political elegies survive.

Critius (krish'i-us, krit'-) and Nesiotes (nes-i-ō'tēz, nē-shi-). Greek sculptors of the 5th century B.C. Critius is thought to have been a pupil of Antenor, creator of the famous statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which were carried off from Athens by Xerxes and later recovered. Meanwhile Critius and Nesiotes executed new figures to replace those taken away by the Persians. Two sculptures at Naples have been identified as copies of these works, one of which, however, has been restored with a head of 4th century workmanship. Very little is known about Nesiotes, but Critius had a school of sculpture at Athens and among his works was a statue of Apollo with the lyre.

Crito (krī'tō). Athenian, a friend and follower of Socrates; fl. c400 B.C. He is a prominent character in the dialogue by Plato named for him.

Critolaus (krit-ō-lā'us). Achaean demagogue; died 146 B.C. He was the last strategus of the Achaean League, and was defeated by Quintus Caecilius Metellus at Scarphea near Thermopylae in 146 B.C.

Critolaus. Greek Peripatetic philosopher; fl. 2nd century B.C. He was sent to Rome in 156-155 B.C. as a member of the embassy of philosophers.

Crius (krī'us). In mythology, a Titan, the son of Gaea and Uranus. By Eurybia, the daughter of Pontus, he was the father of Astraeus, Pallas, and Perses.

Croceatas (krō'sē-ā'tas). Epithet of Zeus, from his image at Croceae, a place in Laconia.

Crocus (krō'kus). According to some accounts, a youth who loved the beautiful youth Smilax. Smilax did not return his love, and the gods changed the unhappy Crocus into a saffron plant. Others say that Crocus was transformed into a saffron plant by Hermes, his friend, who had accidentally killed him while they were playing a game of quoits.

Croesus (krē'sus). King of Lydia in the 6th century B.C. He was the son of Alyattes, whom he succeeded in 560 B.C. He subjugated the Ionian, Aeolian, and other neighboring peoples, and at the close of his reign ruled over the region extending from the N and W coasts of Asia Minor to the Halys River (modern Kizil Irmak) on the E and the Taurus Mountains on the S. According to Herodotus, he was visited at the height of his power by Solon, to whom he exhibited his innumerable treasures. He asked Solon who, of all the men he had seen, he considered the most happy. Solon answered that Tellus of Athens was the happiest. Croesus, incensed because he had expected Solon to name him, a rich lord of many lands, asked why he had named Tellus. Solon replied that Tellus lived at a time when his country was flourishing, had fine sons whom he saw grow up and produce children of their own, and in the end perished gloriously fighting for his country. On being pressed to name the second happiest of mortals, Solon named Cleobis and Biton (q.v.). Croesus was still not satisfied; he thought surely Solon would have named him at the least as the second happiest of mortals, but he had to accept this dictum concerning happiness from Solon, "Account no man happy before his death." "It is the end that counts," said Solon, "for man is often given a gleam of happiness by the gods before being plunged into ruin." Almost immediately Croesus learned the truth of Solon's words. Of his two sons, one was a mute, the other, the apple of his eye, was accidentally slain in a hunting party. Croesus, deceived by a response of the oracle at Delphi to the effect that, if he marched against the Persians, he would overthrow a great empire, made war in 546 B.C. upon Cyrus, by whom he was defeated in the same year near Sardis and taken prisoner. He was, according to Herodotus, doomed to be burned alive, but as he was upon the

and the day, which had been bright, suddenly darkened; a torrential rain fell and extinguished the flames. Cyrus was full of wonder at this and had Croesus brought to his side. As Croesus sat near him, watching the Persians plundering Sardis, he turned to Cyrus and asked if he might speak. Cyrus gave his permission. Croesus asked him what the Persians were doing. "Plundering your city," Cyrus replied, "and carrying off your riches." Croesus corrected him. It was not any longer his city nor his riches, he said; the Persians were plundering a city that now belonged to Cyrus and were carrying off riches that also now belonged to him. Cyrus was so impressed by the wisdom of this view that he kept Croesus henceforward in his train and bestowed upon him distinguished marks of favor. In return he often received valuable advice on military and other matters from Croesus. Later Croesus sent messengers and reproached the oracle at Delphi which had deceived him with a response that encouraged him to go to war against Cyrus. The oracle replied that though Apollo had tried to prevent the fall of Sardis in the lifetime of Croesus, not even a god could delay or deny the course of fate, and that Croesus had been punished, as he was fated to be, for the sins of his ancestors of five generations before. Moreover, said the oracle, Croesus had not taken the trouble to find out what the oracle meant. It had spoken truly in prophesying that a great empire would be destroyed. The empire of Croesus was destroyed and he had only himself to blame. On hearing this from the oracle Croesus humbly acknowledged the justice of it.

pyre he recalled the words of Solon, and exclaimed "Solon! Solon! Solon!" Desired by Cyrus to state upon whom he was calling, he related the story of Solon, which moved Cyrus to countermand the order for his execution. He ordered his men to quench the fire which had already been lighted, but the flames were too hot and the men failed to check them. Thereupon Croesus, fettered to the pyre, called on Apollo to save him

Crommyon (krom'i-on). In ancient geography, a place in the territory of Corinth, named, some say, for Cromus, a son of Poseidon. Here Phaea, the Crommyonian sow, was bred and was later slain by Theseus. Not far from here was an altar of Melicertes, for his body was brought ashore here by a dolphin. Sisyphus found the corpse, buried it on the Isthmus, and established the Isthmian Games in his honor.

Crommyonian (krom'i-ō'ni-an) Sow. In Greek legend, a savage sow that ravaged the countryside. It was killed by Theseus as he journeyed from Troezen to Athens. The sow was sometimes called Phaea after the woman who reared it. But some say this sow was really a fierce female bandit called a sow because of her greed and her notorious habits. Cronia (krōn'i-ā). An ancient Greek festival in honor of Cronus (Kronos), held at Athens in midsummer, and resembling in its character of merriment the Roman Saturnalia.

Cronus (krō'nus) or Cronos (-nos). In Greek mythology, a Titan, the youngest son of Gaea and Uranus; he was the lord of the universe before the time of the Olympian gods. Gaea incited him to attack Uranus because he had imprisoned the Cyclopes, his sons, in Tartarus. She gave Cronus a sickle which had been forged by the Telchines. He used it to cut off his father's genitals and flung them and the sickle into the sea. Once Cronus and the Titans were victorious over Uranus they released their brothers from Tartarus and made Cronus the ruler. But Cronus again bound the Cyclopes and imprisoned them, along with the Hecatonchires, in Tartarus. The reign of Cronus was so peaceful and happy it was known as the Golden Age. Iron had not been beaten into swords and shields, thus there were no wars. There were no laws and no penalties, for men lived justly without them. The earth produced spontaneously, without any effort on man's part, and men ate what the earth of itself gave them. Cronus married his sister Rhea. She bore him Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, and Poseidon. But as both Gaea and the dying Uranus had prophesied that he would be dethroned by one of his children he swallowed them as soon as they were born. When her sixth child was about to be born Rhea fled to Mount Lycaeus in Arcadia and there, where no shadow is cast, gave birth to Zeus. She gave her new-born son to Gaea for safe-keeping and wrapped a stone in swaddling clothes which she presented to Cronus. He instantly swallowed it. Zeus was raised by nymphs in Crete. When he was grown he consulted Metis, a daughter of Oceanus, and learned from her how to compel Cronus to disgorge his sisters and brothers. He gave Cronus a potion which caused him to heave up first the stone which had been substituted for Zeus, and then his children. Zeus and his brothers and sisters then waged war on Cronus and the Titans, who were led by Atlas. The war lasted ten years. Then Gaea advised Zeus to free the Cyclopes and Hecatonchires from their prison in Tartarus and enlist their aid. He acted upon her advice and with their help was victorious. Cronus and the Titans were hurled into Tartarus, according to some accounts, and the Hecatonchires were set to guard them. Others say they were banished and fled to the west, where Cronus established another Golden Age in Italy and became known as Saturn. In Hades Cronus rules over Elysium. By the Oceanid Philyra, with whom he consorted in the form of a horse, Cronus was the father of Chiron the centaur. After the defeat of Cronus the universe over which he had ruled was divided among his three sons; Zeus won the sky, Hades the underworld, and Poseidon the sea. The earth remained common to all.

Cronus or Cronius (-ni-us), Mount. Low wooded hill N of the sacred precinct, the Altis, at Olympia.

Croton (krō'ton) or Crotona (krō-tō'nā). [Modern name, Crotone; former name, Cotrone.] Town in S Italy, in Bruttii, situated on the Ionian Sea N of Catacium (Catanzaro). A Greek colony, one of the most important cities of Magna Graecia, it was noted for its devotion to athletics and as the seat of the Pythagorean school. There is a Greek temple of Hera Lacinia at the extremity of the nearby promontory on the Ionian Sea. This famous shrine has been greatly damaged by vandalism and earthquakes, but its platform of masonry and the results of excavations have supplied data for a partial restoration. It was of the 5th century B.C., Doric, hexastyle, with 14 columns on the flanks, and an interior range of four columns before the pronaos. The Crotonians destroyed the rival town of Sybaris in 510 B.C. but were defeated by the Locrians at the Sagras River in 480 B.C.; later the city submitted to Syracuse. It was occupied by the Romans in 277 B.C. Hannibal embarked here on his return to Africa in 203 B.C. The Romans founded a colony here in 194 B.C. A castle now stands on the site of the ancient acropolis.

Crotopus (krō-tō'pus). In Greek mythology, a king of Argos who was the father of Psamathe. Unbeknown to her father, Psamathe bore a son Linus to the god Apollo.

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hér ardent; pin, pine; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

The child had been exposed to die but was found and brought up by shepherds. In his early youth he was torn to pieces by hounds belonging to Crotopus. When Crotopus became aware through her grief that Psamathe was Linus' mother, he slew her. Apollo sent a plague and a monster to punish the land for these deaths, which was not lifted until Crotopus left Argos.

Crotus (krō'tus). According to some accounts, a son of Pan by Eupheme, nurse of the Muses. He lived on Helicon, the mountain sacred to the Muses, and grew up as their beloved companion. He was a skilled archer and, at his own request, was placed among the stars as the constellation Sagittarius. But some say Crotus was a centaur.

Crow. The bird sacred to Apollo. Its feathers were originally snow white. According to one account, Apollo changed its feathers to black to punish the crow for bringing him the news that Coronis, the mother of Asclepius, was unfaithful to him. Apollo felt the crow would have done better to peck out the eyes of his rival. Others say it was Athena who changed the crow's feathers to deepest black, for bringing her the news that Agraulos and her daughters had leaped from the Acropolis to their deaths on discovering Erichthonius, the serpent child, in the casket Athena had given them to guard. Thenceforth crows were forbidden to visit the Acropolis.

Crown, Oration on the. [Latin, De Corona.] Oration of Demosthenes, delivered in 330 B.C. Ctesiphon had proposed that Demosthenes should be publicly presented with a golden crown as a reward for public services rendered after the battle of Chaeronea (338 B.C.), and for this was indicted by Aeschines as the proposer of an illegal act. In the oration Demosthenes defended his own acts and character, and attacked Aeschines who was defeated.

Crustumium (krus-tū-mē'ri-um). In ancient geography, a city of the Sabines in Latium, Italy, situated a few miles NE of Rome. The town served as an arsenal supplying weapons to Turnus the Rutulian, when he was waging war against Aeneas.

Cteatus (tē'a-tus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Actor and Molione. See Moliones.

Ctesias (tē'zi-as). Greek historian and physician. He was born into the family of the Asclepiadae at Cnidus, Caria, in Asia Minor, and died after 398 B.C. As a member of the Asclepiadae he became physician to Artaxerxes Mnemon, king of Persia, in 416 B.C., and accompanied him on his expeditions, once, it is said, having cured him of a wound he suffered in battle. On his return to Cnidus, Ctesias wrote up the information he had collected on his Persian journeys. His history of Persia (Persica), in twenty-three books, was based on information he collected himself and from the royal archives. He also wrote Indica, a collection of observations he made on his journeys to India. The works of Ctesias were much used by ancient writers, but because of inaccuracies and "improvements" he made on stories such as those told by Herodotus, his work was more a source for romance than for history. Fragments of his works survive, and there is a meager abridgement of the Persica and Indica by Photius.

Ctesibius (tē-sib'i-us). Alexandrian physicist; born at Alexandria; fl. probably c250 B.C. He is noted for his mechanical inventions. He is said to have invented a clepsydra (water clock), a hydraulic organ, and other mechanical contrivances, and to have first applied the expansion force of air as a motive power.

Ctesiphon (tes'i-fon, tē'si-). Athenian of the 4th century B.C. Demosthenes defended him in his Oration on the Crown. (See Crown, Oration on the.) This speech of Demosthenes has sometimes been called the funeral oration on Greek freedom.

Ctesippus (te-sip'us). In mythology, a son of Heracles. His mother was either Deianira or Astydamia.

Ctesippus. Named in the Odyssey as one of Penelope's suitors. When Odysseus returned to Ithaca disguised as a beggar, Ctesippus hurled a cow's hoof at him and struck him. Later, when Odysseus revealed himself and fought to expel or kill the suitors who had taken over his halls, Philoetius, Odysseus' faithful herdsman, killed Ctesippus with his spear and avenged his master for the insult of the cow's hoof.

Ctesius (tē'si-us). Epithet of Zeus. Altars of Zeus Ctesius (God of Gain) were set up in some of the small parishes in Attica to honor

him as the god who, by his will, gives or withholds benefits.

Cuba (kū'ba). In Roman mythology, a divinity who protected infants. See Cunina.

Cumae (kū'mē). In ancient geography, a city on the coast of Campania, Italy, about ten miles W of what is now Naples. It was founded (c1000 B.C.) by Greek colonists from Cyme in Euboea, was one of the chief Greek cities in Italy until the 5th century B.C., and became (338 B.C.) a Roman municipium (a town whose citizens enjoyed certain of the rights of Roman citizenship). Located near the haunted lake Avernus, it was the home of the Cumaean sibyl, the most famous of these prophetesses of antiquity. She gave her prophecies from a cave, in the hill of Cumae, which had 100 approaches from which 100 voices issued. Nearby were temples of Zeus and Apollo and a grove of Diana. Among the remnants of antiquity remaining at Cumae is a Roman amphitheater, imperfectly excavated, but displaying 21 tiers of seats. The axes of the great ellipse are 315 and 255 feet, of the arena 240 and 180 feet. The inhabitants of Cumae founded Neapolis (now Naples) and Puteoli (now Pozzuoli). The Vergilian Society of America maintains a summer school of classical studies in a villa located among the ruins.

Cumaean Sibyl. A seeress who wrote her prophecies on leaves and arranged them in order in the 100-mouthed cave where she gave her messages. If the wind disturbed the leaves, the seeress never bothered to put them in order again, with the result that as time passed it became impossible to unravel the prophecies. As instructed to do by Helenus, Aeneas visited the Sibyl when he landed in Cumae. Phoebus (Apollo) compelled her to give him information and she prophesied that Aeneas would come to power in Lavinium, but not without wars and struggle which would be caused, as was the Trojan War, by a foreign bride. The Sibyl then told Aeneas to find the Golden Bough, sacred to Proserpina, if he wished to go to the Underworld to see his father. She also told him to find and bury the body of a comrade. When he returned to her with the Golden Bough she conducted him to the Underworld, guided him through the different sections of it, and pointed out various great sinners against the gods and the punishments which they were compelled to endure eternally. See also, Sibyls.

Cunaxa (kū-nak'sa). In ancient geography, a place in Babylonia near the Euphrates, probably about 75 miles NW of Babylon. Here, in 401 B.C., a battle took place between Artaxerxes II, king of Persia (with 400,000–1,000,000 men), and his brother Cyrus the Younger (with 100,000 Asiatics aided by 13,000 Greeks). Cyrus was slain and his Asiatic forces fled; the Greek contingent, successful in the engagement, also succeeded in escaping eventually to the Euxine (Black) Sea, as Xenophon, one of their leaders, relates in his Anabasis.

Cunina (kū-nī'na). In Roman mythology, a good genius, one of three, who was worshiped as the guardian of babies sleeping in their cradles and to whom offerings of milk were made. The other two good genii associated with Cunina were Cuba and Rumina.

Cupavo (kū-pā'vō). In Roman legend (Aeneid), a son of that Cycnus who was changed into a swan as he grieved for Phaëthon. He was a Ligurian who came to the aid of Aeneas in his war against Turnus and Mezentius. He wore a swan's plume in his helmet in memory of his father.

Cupid (kū'pid). [Also: Amor; Greek Eros.] In ancient Roman mythology, the god of love, the son of Mercury and Venus. The parallel Greek Eros is similarly son of Hermes and Aphrodite. He is generally represented as a beautiful boy with wings, carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows, and is often spoken of as blind or blindfolded. The bow is used to shoot the arrows, which are invisible and which cause the one shot to fall irrevocably in love. Cupid originally was depicted as a young man, as he is in the story of Cupid and Psyche, but with time developed into the cherubic little scamp of later myth. The name is often given in art to figures of children, with or without wings, introduced, sometimes in considerable number, as a motif of decoration and with little or no mythological allusion.

Cupid and Psyche (sī'kē). Episode in the Golden Ass of Apuleius. The beauty of Psyche, the youngest of three daughters of a certain king, and the homage paid to it, arouse the wrath of Venus, fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pine; not, nōte, möve, nōr, who commands Cupid to avenge her. In the attempt he falls in love with Psyche; she is borne to a lovely valley where every night Cupid, always invisible, visits her and commands her not to attempt to see him. Urged by her sisters and by her own curiosity, she violates this command, and is abandoned by the god. After toilsome wanderings in search of her lover, and many sufferings, she is endowed with immortality by Jupiter and united to Cupid forever. The tale, utilizing themes and motifs familiar in folk tales from all over the world, for example the taboo against looking at the supernatural husband and the search for the lost husband, is the clearest example of unadorned folk tale in classical literature. The story has served as a basis for many later accounts, such as the one by La Fontaine, and for paintings, one of the most familiar by Raphael.

Cupid and Psyche. Copy in marble, in the Capitoline Museum, Rome, of a Greek original of Hellenistic date, representing a boy and a girl embracing. Cupid is nude, Psyche draped from the hips down.

Cures (kū'rēz). In ancient geography, a city of the Sabines, about 24 miles NE of Rome. When Aeneas visited Anchises in the Underworld Anchises told him of Cures, a humble town from which a great law-giver would come. It was a legendary city of Numa Pompilius and Titus Tatius.

Curetes (kū-rē'tēz). In Greek mythology, attendants of Zeus, properly in Crete, who are often wrongly identified with the Corybantes, the Cabiri, and others. The Curetes were probably characters in a ceremony to Zeus the infant, and the myth explained their noisy dance. When Zeus was taken away and hidden from Cronus, who had swallowed his other children, the Curetes danced near him and, with the noise of spears and shields, drowned his infant cries so that his father might not hear them.

Curiatii (kū-ri-ā'shi-i). In Roman legend, three brothers from Alba Longa, who fought against the three Horatii. They killed two of the Horatii, but the third slew the three Curiatii and then, when his sister Horatia grieved at the news because she was betrothed to one of the Curiatii, he slew her.

Curio (kū'ri-ō), Caius Scribonius. Roman general and politician; died 53 B.C. He fought with Sulla against Mithridates II of Parthia, was tribune (90 B.C.), consul (76), proconsul in Macedonia (75-73), and became pontifex maximus, the chief priest of the state religion, in 57 B.C. He was the first Roman general to reach the Danube in Moesia, c73 B.C. He was an opponent of Julius Caesar.

Curio, Caius Scribonius. Son of Caius Scribonius Curio (d. 53 B.C.); a partisan of Caesar in the civil war. After struggling in Roman politics to prevent any action by the Senate against Caesar, he took the field as leader of military forces, taking Sicily and besieging a Pompeian force in Utica, in Africa, where he was killed, 49 B.C.

Curitis (kū-rī'tis) or Quiritis (kwī-rī'tis). In Roman mythology and religion, an epithet of Juno, meaning "Of the Spear." As wielder of the spear or lance, Juno was the chief of the goddesses.

Curium (kū'ri-um). Ancient city in Cyprus, W of the river Lycus, said to have been founded by the Argives. Its ruins contain a Phoenician temple, remarkable especially for its crypt of four rock-hewn chambers, about 23 feet in diameter, connected by doors and a gallery. The objects in gold and silver constituting the "Treasure of Curium" in the Metropolitan Museum, New York, were found in these chambers.

Curtius (kēr'shi-us, -shus), Marcus. Roman legendary hero of the 4th century B.C. In 362 B.C., a chasm having been formed in the Forum by an earthquake, the soothsayers announced that it could be closed only by the sacrifice of Rome's greatest treasure. The people were at a loss to interpret the oracle when Marcus Curtius, a noble youth, stepped forward and, declaring that the state possessed no greater treasure than a brave citizen in arms, leaped, mounted on his steed and in full armor, into the chasm, which closed after him. The Forum stood where a marsh, the Lacus Curtius, formerly existed, and this is simply one of three legends intended to explain the name, the others being that Mettius Curtius, a Sabine, fell here before Romulus' pursuit, and that Caius Curtius was consul when lightning struck here to make the spot sacred.

Curtius Rufus (rō'fus), Quintus. Roman historian of the time of Claudius; fl. c50 A.D. He was the author of a history of Alexander actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ḡ as d or j, ḡ as s or sh, ṭ as t or ch, ḡ as z or zh.

the Great in ten books, of which books 3-10 are preserved. Curtius was probably the first Roman historian to deal with an entirely foreign subject.

Cyane (sī'a-nē). In mythology, a nymph of Syracuse who was a companion of Persephone. She tried to prevent Hades from carrying Persephone to the Underworld. Unsuccessful in this, she wept so that she was transformed into a fountain. Since she had lost the power of speech she could not tell Demeter, frantically searching for her daughter, what had happened to Persephone but she washed Persephone's girdle, which had dropped off as she was carried away, to Demeter's feet when the goddess came to the rim of Cyane's fountain searching for her daughter. On the spot where this occurred, the people of Syracuse annually celebrated a festival, said to have been established by Heracles, in the rites of which a bull was cast into the fountain as a sacrifice.

Cyane. In Greek legend, a daughter of Cyanippus of Syracuse. Unaware that she was his own daughter, her father violated her. The gods punished this act by sending a plague on the people. The people learned that the plague could be lifted only by the sacrifice of a guilty man. Cyane, who had recognized her father by a ring he wore, killed him and then herself, and the plague was lifted.

Cyaneë (sī-an'ē-ē). According to legend, a princess of Caria. She married Miletus and became the mother of the ill-fated twins Caunus and Byblis.

Cyanippus (sī-an-ip'pus). In mythology, a son of Pharax of Thessaly. He neglected his wife, Leucone, in order to indulge his passion for hunting. One day, as she secretly followed him, she was discovered by his dogs and torn to pieces by them. Cyanippus found her body and burned it. Then, in remorse, he killed himself.

Cyathus (sī'a-thus). According to some accounts, a Calydonian youth, cupbearer to Oeneus. When Heracles was visiting Oeneus Cyathus fumbled in serving him. Heracles, in annoyance, struck him with a careless blow, and although it seemed light to Heracles he was so forceful the blow killed Cyathus. A chapel in his honor was built beside the temple of Apollo.

Cyathus. [Also: Kyathos.] In ancient Greece, a form of vase or cup with a long handle, used especially for dipping, as for taking wine from the crater to pour into the oinochoë or directly into the cup. It was often made in the form of a ladle.

Cyaxares (sī-ak'sā-rēz). King of the Medes (625-584 B.C.). In the cuneiform inscriptions his name is Uvakhshtra. He was the son and successor of Phraortes, and may be considered as the founder of Media's power and greatness. According to Herodotus, he was a capable and ambitious ruler. He organized his Asiatic forces into separate divisions of spearmen, archers, and cavalry. At the head of his forces and accompanied by his allies, he marched against Nineveh, where his father had been slain in an attempt to take the Assyrian capital. He had made a successful attack and settled down to besiege the city when Media was overrun by hordes of Scythian invaders. After some years the Scythians were driven out. According to Herodotus, Cyaxares and his chiefs invited a great number of the Scyths to a banquet, got them drunk, and slew them. In any case, having driven them out, he captured Nineveh (608 B.C.), in alliance with Nabopolassar, viceroy of Babylonia, and destroyed the Assyrian empire. Toward the W Cyaxares conquered Armenia, and thus extended his dominion as far as the river Halys in Asia Minor. Herodotus says that Cyaxares received some Scythian suppliants and treated them kindly. He came to respect them and gave the care of a number of Median boys into their hands with instructions to teach them to shoot with the bow. Every day the Scythians went hunting, and every day they brought back game. One day they returned empty handed. In a rage, Cyaxares insulted them. They were so deeply offended that they resolved to punish him. They took one of the Median boys under their care, slew him, and dressed his flesh as if it were game. They cooked it and served it to Cyaxares and his guests and then fled to Sardis, to the court of the Lydian king Alyattes. Cyaxares demanded that Alyattes surrender them. He refused, and this, according to Herodotus, was the reason for the war between the Lydians and the Medians. Fighting continued for five years during which fortune

avored first one side then the other. In the sixth year another battle took place. As the struggle waxed hot, suddenly day was turned to night by an eclipse of the sun (May 28, 585 B.C.). The phenomenon had been foretold by Thales of Miletus, the first man who had learned enough about the stars in their courses to predict such an occurrence. However, the Lydians and the Medians were both so terrified by the portent that they immediately laid down their arms and agreed to a peace. According to the terms of it, the daughter of Alyattes married the son of Cyaxares. This son was Astyages, who became the grandfather of Cyrus the Great.

Cybele (sib'e-lē). [Also known as Berecynthia, Cybebe, Dindymene, and the Great Idaean Mother.] An oriental goddess of Phrygia and Lydia. She came to be identified by the Greeks with Rhea, the wife of Cronus and mother of the Olympian gods, and by the Romans with Ops, wife of Saturn. She was the "Great Mother of the Gods." Early seats of her worship were Mount Ida, Mount Sipylus, Cyzicus, and Sardis. As well as being the "Great Mother of the Gods" she was the great mother of Nature, a fertility goddess symbolizing the powers of reproduction and fruitfulness in man, plants, and animals. As the goddess who presided over the wild forests and fastnesses of mountains she was worshiped on the mountains, and was conceived as traversing them in a chariot drawn by lions. As the goddess and giver of the rich treasures hidden in the earth she was worshiped in caves and grottoes. She came to be regarded as the mother of the arts of civilization and the special protectress of cities. Her priests, called Corybantes and Galli, were emasculated to commemorate the emasculation of Atys, the beloved of Cybele, and dressed like women to achieve unity with the goddess. Her festivals were celebrated with wild dances and orgiastic excesses amid the resounding music of drums and cymbals. From Asia Minor her worship spread through Thrace and thence to Greece, where it was known in Boeotia in the 6th century B.C. During the Second Punic War her cult was brought to Rome in 205–204 B.C. and established in a temple on the Palatine in obedience to a Sibylline prophecy that said that a foreign enemy could be expelled if the Great Idaean Mother was brought to Rome. The Megalesia, and later also the Taurobolia and Criobolia, were celebrated in Rome in her honor. The oak, pine, and lion were sacred to her. Among her other attributes were the drum, cymbals, flute, and horn. She is usually represented enthroned between lions, with a turreted crown on her head and a small drum or cymbal, the instrument used in her rites, in her hand.

Cychreus (sī'krōs). In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon and Salamis, daughter of the river-god Asopus. His daughter was Glauce, who became the wife of Telamon. Cychreus was made king of Salamis, the Serpent Isle, for slaying a destructive serpent that was ravaging the island. Some say he kept a young serpent that caused as much damage until it was expelled by Eurylochus, after which it went to Eleusis and became an attendant of Demeter. Others say it was Cychreus himself, called the "serpent" because of his cruelty, who was banished and went to Eleusis to become an attendant of Demeter. Cychreus was one of the guardian heroes of Salamis. There he was buried, facing the west, and sacrifices were offered at his tomb. In the famous naval battle between the Greeks and Persians in the bay of Salamis in 480 B.C., Cychreus was said to have appeared in serpent form among the Greek ships.

Cyclades (sik'la-dēz). [Also: Kikladhes, Kyklades, Kykladon Nesoi.] Group of islands belonging to Greece, situated in the Aegean Sea. The name, from the Greek word for "circle," derived from the belief that they formed a ring about Delos. Among the major islands are Andros, Tenos, Ceos, Syrus, Naxos, Melos, and Paros.

Cyclic Poets (sī'klik). The authors of Greek epic poems, composed between 800 B.C. and 550 B.C., relating to the Trojan War and the war against Thebes. Among these poems are Cypria (The Cyprian Lays), Aethiopis (The Lay of Ethiopia), Iliu Persis (The Sack of Troy), Ilias Parva (The Little Iliad), Nostoi (The Homeward Voyages), Telegonia (The Lay of Telegonus), all belonging to the Trojan cycle, and the Thebais and the Epigoni, belonging to the Theban cycle. A few fragments of these poems are extant.

Cyclopes/Cycnus

Cyclopes (sī-klō'pēz) or Cyclops (sī'klops). In Greek mythology, three sons of Gaea and Uranus: Argēs, Brontes, and Steropes. They were giants with but one eye, which was circular and in the middle of the forehead. They were great builders, said to have built the walls of Mycenae and other fortifications, and they were master smiths, said by some to have made Artemis' silver bow. Uranus hated his one-eyed sons and hid them away in Tartarus. They were freed temporarily by Cronus after he had overthrown Uranus, but then imprisoned again, along with their brothers the Hecatonchires. Zeus made war on his father Cronus for ten years. At the suggestion of Gaea, his grandmother, he freed the Cyclopes and enlisted their aid against Cronus. The Cyclopes gave Zeus the thunderbolt, forged a trident for Poseidon, and gave Hades a cap of darkness. With these weapons and with the help of the Hecatonchires, whom Zeus also freed, the Olympian gods defeated Cronus and divided up his universe. The Cyclopes dwelt in Thrace, Crete, and Lycia, and their descendants went to Sicily, or islands near Sicily, where Odysseus ran afoul of them on his way home from the Trojan War. Aeneas also landed on the island of the Cyclopes, on his way to Italy, but hurriedly departed on learning on what land he had come ashore. Some say the Cyclopes, or their descendants, worked in Hephaestus' forge. Apollo, to avenge the death of his son Asclepius, killed by Zeus' thunderbolt, slew the Cyclopes. Their ghosts dwell under Aetna in Sicily, and cause it to rumble and roar, and sometimes to spout flames and red-hot boulders.

Cycnus (sik'nus). In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon and Calyce. He was born in secret and exposed by his mother on the seashore. Swans that flew down to comfort him revealed his hiding place to some fishermen, who rescued him and cared for him. He became a king of Colonaē in Phrygia and married Proclea, who bore him Tenes (but some say Tenes was the son of Apollo), and a daughter Hemithea. After the death of Proclea, Cycnus married Phylonome. She tried to seduce Tenes, and when he rejected her advances she falsely accused him to his father, and produced a witness that Tenes had tried to ravish her. Cycnus put his two children in a chest and cast them into the sea. The chest floated safely to an island which Tenes named Tenedos and of which he became ruler. Later Cycnus learned that Phylonome had lied. He buried her alive and sought Tenes to ask his forgiveness. Tenes angrily cut the cables of his ship when he put in at Tenedos, but later was reconciled to him, and Cycnus settled near his son on Tenedos. Cycnus was an ally of the Trojans in the Trojan War, and when the Greeks landed in the Troad he slew them in droves. Achilles rushed up to attack him, but as he was invulnerable neither spear nor sword could make any impression on his body. Achilles flung his spear at him in vain, although each time the spear struck Cycnus, and Achilles blunted his sword on Cycnus' invulnerable flesh. In a rage Achilles battered Cycnus' head with his shield and forced him back. As he retreated Cycnus stumbled over a stone and fell on his back. Achilles planted his knees on Cycnus' chest and strangled him with the straps of his own helmet, but when he went to strip the body of its armor he found the armor empty. Poseidon had transformed his son into a swan and in that form Cycnus flew off.

Cycnus. According to legend, a son of Ares and Pyrene. He challenged Heracles to a duel at the Echedorus River in Macedonia. Heracles had come hither on his way to learn the location of the Garden of the Hesperides. Ares came to aid his son in the fight, but Zeus hurled a thunderbolt between the combatants and stopped the fight. Some say, however, that before the intervention of Zeus Heracles had killed Cynus, and that Ares then transformed his son into a swan.

Cynus. In Greek legend, a son of Ares and Pelopia. Some say this Cynus was in the habit of cutting off the heads of passing strangers. He used the skulls thus acquired to build a temple to his father Ares. Others say he challenged all comers to a chariot duel with him. Apollo, enraged because Cynus stole the cattle that were being sent to Delphi for sacrifice, encouraged Heracles to accept the challenge. Heracles armed himself with the armor the gods had given him and made ready to meet Cynus. Iolaus, Heracles' charioteer, was to fight on his side, and Ares would support Cynus. Athena, the patroness of Heracles, warned him that though he might kill Cynus, he must not attack Ares, a god. She then mounted the war-car with him, to protect him. Both Heracles and Cynus were hurled from their chariots by the shock when they collided at full speed. They then took up the battle on foot. Athena protected Heracles from the sword Ares was aiming at him, and Heracles killed Cynus. Ares rushed to attack him and, forgetting Athena's warning, he defended himself and wounded Ares in the thigh. Since it was not fitting for Heracles to attack a god, Zeus sent a thunderbolt between them and broke up the fight. Athena led Ares away to Olympus to be cured. Heracles and Iolaus stripped Cynus of his armor. Some say this duel took place in Itonus, a city of Phthiotis. Others say it was at the Peneus River, or at Pagasae in Thessaly. And some say Cynus was buried near the Anaurus River in Thessaly, and that Apollo caused the river to rise and wash away the gravestone.

Cynus or Cygnus (sig'-). According to Ovid, a son of Apollo and Hyrie. He compelled his friend Phylus to tame wild birds and a lion for him. Phylus resented the demands of Cynus that he prove his love. When Cynus also demanded that Phylus give him a bull he had won as a prize at funeral games Phylus refused. Enraged at Phylus' refusal, Cynus flung himself over a cliff and was transformed into a swan.

Cynus. In legend, a king in Liguria and a devoted friend of Phaëthon. When Phaëthon was struck by the thunderbolt of Zeus because he could not control the horses of the chariot of the sun, Cynus gave up his kingdom. Grief-stricken, he haunted the banks of the Eridanus River, into which Phaëthon had fallen, and lamented. Apollo took pity on him and transformed him into a swan and placed his image among the stars.

Cydippe (sī-dip'ē). In Greek legend, an Argive priestess of Hera, she was the mother of two sons, Biton and Cleobis. Herodotus says she wanted to go to the Argive Heraeum to take part in the festival of Hera. The oxen could not be brought home from the fields in time to take her there, and so her two devoted sons hitched themselves to the cart and drew their mother in it the five miles to the sanctuary. As a reward for their devotion, Hera agreed to grant whatever their mother wished for them. Cydippe asked for the best gift Hera could offer. Acclaimed by the people for their devotion to their mother, the two youths went to sleep in the temple and never awoke again. Their peaceful death was Hera's best gift.

Cydippe. See under Acontius.

Cydnus (sid'nus). In ancient geography, a river of Cilicia, Asia Minor, flowing into the Mediterranean Sea about 12 miles S of Tarsus.

Cydonia (sī-dō'ni-a). Epithet of Athena. Some say that Clymenus, a descendant of the Cretan Dactyl Heracles, came from Cydonia in Crete and founded a temple of Athena Cydonia in Elis. Pelops sacrificed to Athena Cydonia before he began his race with Oenomaus for the hand of Hippodamia.

Cydonia. [Modern name, Canea.] City and seaport on the N coast of Crete. It was founded by Samians (6th century B.C.), who had been exiled from Samos. They sought to return to Samos with the help of Spartans, but failing in their attack on the island, they sailed to Crete and founded Cydonia. They prospered in Cydonia, and built many temples, among them a famous temple of Dictynna (Britomartis).

Cygnus (sig'nus). An ancient northern constellation representing a bird called a swan by Ovid and others, and now always so considered.

Cyllene (si-lē'nē). In Greek mythology, a nymph who nursed Hermes in a cave on Mount Cyllene in Arcadia. Silenus and the Satyrs, who had undertaken to find Apollo's stolen cattle for him for a reward, were attracted to the cave by strange musical sounds. Cyllene told them of the marvellous infant she was guarding, who grew like a god and who had constructed a musical instrument from a tortoise shell and some hides. Silenus and the Satyrs (The Trackers), suspected this infant of the theft of Apollo's cattle, especially when they learned from Cyllene that he had used hides in the construction of the instrument. She hotly rebuked them for their suspicions, citing Zeus and Maia, the honest parents of her charge.

Cyllene, Mount. In ancient geography, a mountain in Arcadia, Greece, reputed to be the birthplace of Hermes. Elatus, son of Arcas, inherited the region about Mount Cyllene as his share of his father's kingdom and named it Cyllene after his son, Cyllen. The mountain was the highest in Arcadia, and was noted in classical times for the fact that the blackbirds indigenous to the mountain were white. Hermes had the name Cyllenian from his mountain birthplace, and a sanctuary of Cyllenian Hermes stood on it.

Cyllene. In ancient geography, the port of Elis, situated on the Ionian Sea, north of the promontory of Chelonatas (Tortoise Shell). Among its public buildings were sanctuaries of Asclepius and of Aphrodite.

Cylon (si'lon). An Athenian noble of the 7th century B.C. He was married to the daughter of Theagenes, tyrant of Megara. With the advice and help of Theagenes Cylon plotted to make himself master of Athens. He was instructed by the oracle of Delphi to seize the Acropolis on "the greatest festival of Zeus." Accordingly, with the aid of a few Athenian nobles and some Megarian soldiers, Cylon seized the Acropolis (c632 B.C.) at the time of the Olympic festival, which, since he had been an Olympic victor himself, he considered "the greatest festival of Zeus." He and his alien supporters were trapped in the citadel by the Athenians. During a long siege Cylon escaped, but his followers, weakened by failing supplies, sought refuge in the temple of Athena, and finally agreed to surrender under a guarantee of safe conduct. Megacles the archon persuaded the Athenians to ignore their promise to spare the lives of the conspirators, and they were put to death. Cylon was later informed by the oracle that he had misinterpreted the oracle: that "the greatest festival of Zeus" referred to the Diasia, which took place in March and was celebrated outside the city. Because he interpreted the oracle falsely his attempt failed and Cylon and his descendants were banished forever from Athens. But Athens had put itself under a curse by breaking the pledge and insulting Athena, in whose temple the conspirators had taken sanctuary. The Alcmaeonids, of whom Megacles was a member, were tried for sacrilege, their property was confiscated, and they and their descendants were banished forever. The city was finally purged by Epimenides (596 B.C.) but the curse on the Alcmaeonids, who in the course of time returned to Athens, plagued Pericles, a descendant of Megacles, some 200 years after the murder of the followers of Cylon.

Cyme (si'mē). Ancient Greek city in W Asia Minor, about 28 miles N of Smyrna (now Izmir), on a small coastal bay. It was founded in the early Greek colonization of Aeolis, and rose to prominence as the principal city of this region. In the 7th century B.C. Cyme was ruled by a king, but later it had oligarchic rule. It was involved in the intrigues between Athens and Sparta, and changed hands numerous times in the struggles between Greek and Persian empires. In 17 A.D. it was severely damaged by an earthquake. The site of Cyme is supposed to be at the small village of Namúrt Kjöi.

Cyme. In ancient geography, a city on the coast of Campania, settled by Greek colonists from Chalcis in Eretria, and Cyme in Euboea. This is said to have been the earliest (c1000 B.C.) Greek colony on the Italian peninsula. Euboeans from Cyme in Greece brought the alphabet with them to their colony in Italy, and thus introduced the fundamental tool for the creation of the great civilization that developed in Italy. They also brought their Greek religion, gods, and heroes. These were adopted by the Italians so universally and from such an early date that they came to be considered as native Italian divinities.

Among the colonists of Cyme were some Graeans from Euboea. In Italy all the colonists, from peoples who had hitherto been variously called Achaeans, Danaans, Argives, and other names according to locality, came to be named Graeci after these Graeans, and from them the word Greece, a name unknown to Homer, is derived. Cyme appears in Latin as Cumae, and was the seat of the famous prophetess of Apollo, the Cumaean sibyl. See also Cumae.

Cymodoce (sī-mod'ō-sē) or Cymodocea (sī-mod'ō-sē'a). Named in the Aeneid as a Nereid or sea-nymph. She was originally one of the ships of Aeneas, made from the sacred wood of Cybele's forest. Turnus, the Latin enemy of Aeneas, set the ships on fire while Aeneas was absent from his camp. To save them, Cybele transformed the ships into sea-nymphs. Cymodoce met Aeneas as he was returning in his ship and told him what had befallen his camp during his absence. She urged him to hurry back and relieve his besieged garrison. To speed him on his way she rose up from the water and gave his ship such a mighty push that it was propelled swiftly back to the Trojan camp.

Cynaegirus (sin-ē-jī'rus). Athenian soldier; brother of Aeschylus. He distinguished himself at the battle of Marathon in 490 B.C., in which, according to Herodotus, he pursued the Persians to the sea and, having seized one of their triremes to prevent its putting off, fell with his right hand severed. Later writers add that, having lost both his hands, he seized the vessel with his teeth.

Cynaetha (sin-ē'thā). In ancient geography, a city in N Arcadia, Greece. The Cynae-theans dedicated an image of Zeus, bearing a thunderbolt in each hand, at Olympia. At their winter festival of Dionysus, greased men seized a bull from the herd and carried it to the sanctuary of Dionysus for sacrifice. The Cynaetheans had a spring, called Alyssus (Curer of Madness), whose waters would cure one bitten by a mad dog.

Cynics (sin'iks). School of Greek philosophers of whom the earliest may be considered to be Antisthenes of Athens (b. c444 B.C.) who sought to develop the ethical teachings of Socrates, whose pupil he was. The chief doctrines of the Cynics were that virtue is the only good, that the essence of virtue is self-control, and that pleasure is an evil if sought for its own sake. They were accordingly characterized by an ostentatious contempt of riches, art, science, and amusements. The most famous Cynic was Diogenes of Sinope, a pupil of Antisthenes, who carried the doctrines of the school to an extreme and ridiculous asceticism. Although this school is named after Diogenes who was called "kyon" (meaning dog), Antisthenes is considered by many as the founder.

Cynortes (sī-nôr'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Amyclas, king of Sparta, and Diomedes, and the brother of Hyacinthus. He is sometimes named as the father of Perieres.

Cynosarges (sī-nō-sār'jēz). A gymnasium of very early foundation in ancient Athens, combined with a sanctuary of Heracles, and possessing a grove. The philosopher Antisthenes taught here. The Cynosarges lay somewhat high up on the S slope of Lycabettus; its site is now occupied by the Monastery of the Asomatôn and the British and American schools of archaeology.

Cynoscephalae (sin-ō-sef'a-lē). Heights in Thessaly, Greece, between about 10 and 20 miles SE of Larissa. Here the Thebans under Pelopidas defeated (364 B.C.) Alexander of Phrae, and the Romans under Flamininus defeated (197 B.C.) Philip V of Macedon.

Cynosura (sī-nō-shō'ra). A nymph of Mount Ida, who was one of the nurses of the infant Zeus. She was metamorphosed into the constellation Ursa Minor.

Cynosuria (sī-nō-shō'ri-a). See Cynuria.

Cynthia (sin'thi-a). Epithet of Artemis, from Mount Cynthus on the island of Delos where she was born.

Cynthius (sin'thi-us). Epithet of Apollo, the sun god, as the moon goddess is called Cynthia.

Cynthus (sin'thus), Mount. An eminence, conspicuous from the sea (height, 370 feet) and commanding a fine view of the Cyclades, on the small Aegean island of Delos, where according to early legend Leto bore Zeus' twin children Apollo and Artemis. On the western slope of Mount Cynthus are the remains of a primitive rock sanctuary, the Grotto of Apollo, and on the summit was once a shrine of Zeus and Athena. From this Apollo received the epithet Cynthius, and Artemis, Cynthia. (JJ)

Cynuria (sī-nū'ri-ā). [Also: Cynosuria.] In ancient geography, a district in Greece in the E part of the Peloponnesus, situated on the Gulf of Argolis.

Cynurus (sī-nū'rus). In Greek tradition, a son of Perseus. He went from Argos to the valley between Argolis and Laconia, and founded a colony there which he named Cynuria.

Cyparissia (sip-ā-ris'i-ā). Epithet of Athena, meaning the "Cypress-goddess." There were sanctuaries of Athena Cyparissia on the citadel of Asopus, in Laconia, and at Cyparissia in Messenia.

Cyparissia or Cyparissiae (sip-ā-ris'i-ē). [Modern name, Kyparissia or Kiparissia.] In ancient geography, a city of Messenia, situated on the Ionian Sea. Men of the city accompanied Nestor against Troy. The city fell into ruin but was rebuilt by Epaminondas as the port for the new city of Messene, which he built after the battle of Leuctra (371 B.C.). Among the landmarks of the city was a spring that Dionysus caused to gush forth by striking the earth with his thyrsus. Nearby, remains of an ancient temple of Apollo have been found.

Cyparissus (sip-ā-ris'us). According to Ovid, the son of Telephus. He was beloved by the gods. When he accidentally killed his favorite stag, he grieved so that the gods, in pity, transformed him into a cypress tree; thus his mourning for the stag became a symbol of mourning for others.

Cyphanta (sī-fan'tā). A city of Laconia, on the Myrtoan Sea. Here a fountain of clear cold water springs from the rock. It was said that Atalanta, hot and tired from hunting, came to this spot and, being thirsty, struck the rock with her spear; the fountain immediately gushed forth. Nearby was a cave sacred to Asclepius, containing a stone image.

Cypria (sip'ri-ā). [Also: Cyprian Lays.] One of the poems of the Trojan cycle, anciently attributed to Homer, and later to Stasinus. It dealt with Paris' abduction of Helen, with the help of Aphrodite (Cypria), and their flight from Sparta.

Cypris (sī'pris). An epithet of Aphrodite, from the island of Cyprus, to which she is said to have gone after she rose from the foam near Cytherea. The epithet "Cyprian" is also applied to Aphrodite for the same reason.

Cyprus (sī'prus). [French, Chypre; German, Cyperm; Greek, Kypros; Italian, Cipro; Turkish, Kibris.] One of the largest islands of the Mediterranean, situated in its E corner, about 40 miles S of Turkey and about 240 miles N of Egypt, with the mountain range of the Lebanon on the mainland to the E and that of Taurus to the N. Its name is supposed to be derived from its rich mines of copper (Greek, kypros). Cyprus has limestone mountains averaging about 2000 feet in elevation along its N coast, and a higher and more extensive range occupies the S and W parts of the island, culminating in Mount Olympus, or Troodos (6000 feet). Between these ranges lies a fertile plain. Cyprus was celebrated in antiquity as the birthplace and favorite abode of Aphrodite, and was famous for its beauty and wealth, but also for its licentiousness. It was early settled by Phoenicians, who were followed by Greeks. Its principal cities were Paphos (still known by that name) on the W coast (a center of the cult of Aphrodite), Salamis (near modern Famagusta) on the E, Kittim, or Citium (on the site of modern Larnaca) on the SE, and Amathus (near modern Limassol) on the S. In the center of the island were the Phoenician mining cities Tamassus and Idalium (modern Dali), with the celebrated grove of Aphrodite. For a time Cyprus was tributary to Assyria. Its name in the cuneiform inscriptions is Yatnan, and the Assyrian king Sargon relates that seven kings from this island (probably chiefs of the Phoenician colonies) brought him costly gifts and "kissed his feet," i.e., acknowledged his sovereignty. He in turn presented them with a marble stele containing a full-length sculptured portrait of himself, and an inscription commemorating his principal deeds. This monument was found in 1846, well preserved, near Larnaca (the ancient Kittim or Citium), and was acquired by the Royal Museum of Berlin. Cyprus was in succession subject to Persia, Macedon, and Egypt, and in 57 B.C. became a Roman province.

Cypselus (sip'sē-lus). Tyrant of Corinth,

c655–625 B.C.. He was the son of Eëtion, a descendant of the Lapiths, and Labda, a member of the Bacchiadae of Corinth. Before he was born, the oracle of Delphi foretold to Eëtion that the son his wife was about to bear would be a rock on which the Bacchiadae, the ruling oligarchy of Corinth, would founder. This oracle coming to their ears, the Bacchiadae resolved to kill the son of Eëtion. They went to his house and asked to see the child. Labda, thinking there was no harm in it, brought the infant and laid it in the arms of the man nearest her. The plan was for whoever received the child to dash it to its death at once, the infant smiled at the man who received him and so moved him that he could not bear to murder it. Instead he passed the child on to the next man. So the child was passed from hand to hand and none of the ten men there had the heart to murder it. They left the house without accomplishing their purpose. Once outside, they began to dispute together, blaming each other for the failure to kill the child. Labda overheard them and thus learned the purpose of their visit. Lest they return, she hid her baby in a corn-bin. The men did return, but having searched the house in vain for the child, they again took their departure. Because the baby had been hidden in a corn-bin, cypsele, he was given the name Cypselus. When Cypselus grew up, he went to the oracle at Delphi and heard the following response:

"See there comes to my dwelling a man much favored of fortune,

Cypselus, son of Eëtion, and king of the glorious Corinth,

He and his children too, but not his children's children."

This encouraged him to attack the Bacchiadae and gain the throne of Corinth. Successful in this, he enjoyed a prosperous reign of 30 years and was succeeded by his son Periander, thus fulfilling the first part of the oracle.

Cypselus. According to legend, a son of Aepytus, who succeeded his father as king of Arcadia. During the reign of Cypselus, the sons of Aristomachus (Dorians) invaded the Peloponnesus. Cypselus gave his daughter in marriage to Cresphontes, one of the sons of Aristomachus, and so won him for an ally. For this reason Arcadians were not disturbed nor dislodged from their land by the Dorian invasion, as were the other states of the Peloponnesus.

Cyrenaica (sir-ē-nā'i-kā). [Also: Pentapolis.] In ancient geography, a country in N Africa, lying between the Mediterranean on the N, Marmarica on the E, the desert on the S, and the Syrtis Major (modern Gulf of Sidra) on the W. It corresponded closely to the modern territory of the same name, in NE Libya, and was noted for its fertility. It was settled (c631 B.C.) by Thereans, was subject to Egypt from 321 B.C., and formed (67 B.C.) with Crete a Roman province.

Cyrenaics (sī-rē-nā'iks). School of Greek hedonistic philosophers, founded by Aristippus of Cyrene, a disciple of Socrates. Epicureanism was influenced by this school.

Cyrene (sī-rē'nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Hypseus, king of the Lapiths, and Chlidanope, a naiad. She was an ardent huntress and the guardian of her father's flocks and herds near the Peneus River. Apollo watched her wrestle with a lion and fell in love with her. He carried her away to Libya, to the site on which the city of Cyrene was founded, and made her queen of a realm in which hunters and farmers prospered. She bore Aristaeus and Idmon the seer to Apollo. When they needed her advice her sons repaired to a spring where they knew she would be visiting her naiad relatives and consulted her. By Ares, Cyrene was the mother of Diomedes of Thrace, the owner of the man-eating mares.

Cyrene. [Also: Cirene.] In ancient geography, the principal city of Cyrenaica in Africa, situated about ten miles from the Mediterranean coast. It was founded (c631 B.C.) by Thereans under Battus. According to Herodotus, Aristoteles, the son of Phronima of Crete and Polymnestus of Thera, was afflicted by a stammer. He went to the oracle at Delphi to inquire about his speech, and was ordered by the priestess, who addressed him as Battus, or "king," to establish a colony in Libya. Henceforth called Battus, he returned to Thera, and shortly all sorts of evils descended on the island. The inhabitants, unaware of what the priestess had told Battus, sent to Delphi and now learned that if Battus would found a colony at Cyrene in Libya, everything would go well with them. After a false start Battus and the Thereans arrived on the coast of Libya, but were soon persuaded to move by the natives. The Libyans promised them a better site for a colony and undertook to lead them to it. They craftily arranged the journey so that all the most delightful and suitable places were passed during the night. At last the Libyans brought Battus and his companions to a place where there was a spring called Apollo's Fountain. Here, on two hills overlooking a plain, Battus founded Cyrene. Battus ruled 40 years, and was followed by his son Arcesilaus (for generations, the names of the Cyrenaean kings were alternately Battus and Arcesilaus), who reigned for 16 years. In the reign of the second Battus, who followed Arcesilaus, Greeks from many areas began to flock to Cyrene and the colony prospered mightily. The Libyans found themselves pushed back and appealed to Apries, king of Egypt, for aid against the Cyrenaeans. Apries sent an army against them which was utterly defeated. This led to the downfall of Apries. He was succeeded by Amasis II, who made a treaty of friendship and alliance with the Cyrenaeans, and married Ladice, daughter of their king. He was so delighted by her that he honored Cyrene by sending a statue of Athena, overlaid with plates of gold, to the city. In a later generation, the ruler of Cyrene (an Arcesilaus) quarreled with his brothers and they withdrew to another site in Libya and founded Barca. When Cambyses II conquered Egypt, the Cyrenaeans offered to submit to him, and afterward paid tribute to Darius. Cyrene was the only Greek colony in Africa to become strong and wealthy. It was a center of Greek learning and culture. One of her sons, Eugammon the poet, wrote a continuation of the Odyssey, the Telegony. In this work Odysseus was connected with the line of Cyrenaean kings. The Cyrenaeans also claimed Aristaeus as their ancestor, for it was to this spot that Apollo brought Cyrene, for whom the city was named, and it was here that she bore Aristaeus to the god. The Cyrenaeans were celebrated in ancient times as physicians. This was perhaps owing to their connection with Apollo, but it is more likely that it was on account of a medicinal herb that grew in their land, called silphion, which through its export brought wealth to the king. The modern town on the site of Cyrene contains many antiquities. It was the birthplace of Aristippus, Eratosthenes, and other famous men.

Cyrenos (sir'nos, kūr'nos). Greek name of Corsica.

Cyropaedia (sī'rō-pē-dī'ā), The. Work of Xenophon, in eight books, describing the education of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Empire, his great deeds, and his dying advice to his sons and ministers. The work is a highly idealized biography.

Cyrrhestes (sī-res'tēz), Andronicus. See Andronicus of Cyrrhus.

Cyrrhestica (sī-res'ti-kā) or Cyrrhus (sir'us). In ancient geography, a region in N Syria, W of the Euphrates and S of Commagene.

Cyrus (sī'rus). [Called Cyrus the Great; name in the Old Testament, Koresh; in the cuneiform inscriptions, Kurush, Kurshu; Old Persian, Kurush.] The founder of the Persian Empire, who died 529 B.C. All accounts of his birth and early youth are heavily encrusted by legends, among which is the following account given by Herodotus. Before Cyrus was born, his grandfather Astyages, the king of the Medes, dreamed that the child his daughter Mandane was about to bear to her husband, the Persian Cambyses, would be a king if he did not die too soon. Astyages, fearing his grandson would usurp his throne, gave orders for the child to be destroyed as soon as it was born. The man to whom he gave the orders, one Harpagus, did not wish to commit the murder himself. When Cyrus was born, Harpagus gave him into the hands of a herdsman, Mitrdates. He instructed Mitrdates to expose the child on the mountains, and when he was sure it was dead to send word to him. Mitrdates took the infant to his house. There he found that his wife, who was awaiting the birth of her first child, had produced a still-born son. She begged Mitrdates not to expose the healthy child given into their hands, and they decided to dress their own dead child in the robes worn by Cyrus and to lay him in a thicket in the mountains and to keep Cyrus as their own son. After a few days Mitrdates sent for Harpagus and led him to the dead child. Harpagus duly reported to Astyages that the child was dead, and the cowherd's son was given a magnificent funeral, which pleased its parents. Cyrus, brought up with loving care by Mitrdates and his wife, grew into a handsome, intelligent, manly child. When he was ten years old, he was chosen to be their king by a group of his playmates. One of the boys objected bitterly to being ordered about by the son of a cowherd, refused to do as he was bid, and was whipped by Cyrus for his insubordination. The boy complained to his father, who in turn complained to Astyages. Astyages sent for the cowherd and his son. In his own defense the boy said the others had voluntarily chosen him as king, and therefore bound themselves to obey his orders. When this one boy refused, he invited the punishment he received. Astyages was much struck by this speech, but more than that, a suspicion grew in his mind that this was his grandson, whom he had ordered destroyed. He sent Cyrus out of the room and questioned Mitrdates until, by his threats, he forced the truth from him. Astyages now bethought him of his old dream and of the interpretation the Magi had put on it. He summoned them to learn what he should do, now that his grandson was found to be alive. The Magi listened to the whole story and concluded that the oracle had been fulfilled in a very harmless way; that as his comrades had chosen him as their king, Cyrus had already been king and his grandfather need have no further worry on that account. The omens, the Magi assured Astyages, were sometimes fulfilled in most inconsequential ways. Herodotus adds, in connection with the birth of Cyrus, that the report that he was suckled by a bitch was circulated by his parents when they recovered him after the events related above, because Cyrus talked continually of the goodness of Cyno, his foster mother. Cyno means "bitch." However, much information of some historical repute concerning his lineage has been obtained from the inscriptions, among them a cylinder belonging to Cyrus himself, discovered in the ruins of Babylon and Sepharvaim (Sippar), combined with the accounts of the Greek historians (Herodotus, Xenophon, and Ctesiphon). On his cylinder he calls himself the son of Cambyses, grandson of Cyrus and great-grandson of Shishpish (Theispes), who were all "Kings of Anshan." Anshan is evidently identical with Anzan, the plain of Susa, and stands for Elam, which was conquered by Theispes, the son of Achaemenes, founder of the dynasty. But the Magi had been right in their original interpretation of the dream of Astyages. In 549 B.C., Cyrus, after conquering Ecbatana or Agbatana (modern Hamadan), encouraged by Harpagus, who had spared his life, led a revolt of the Persians against their Median rulers. He completely defeated the army Astyages sent against him, and made himself master of the Medes and the Persians. He then directed his arms against the Lydian kingdom of Croesus (q.v.), who made an offensive and defensive alliance with Nabonidus, king of Babylonia, and the reigning pharaoh of Egypt. Croesus consulted the oracle at Delphi several times as he prepared for war against Cyrus, and received what he considered to be most reassuring answers, although in the event it developed that they were equivocal. He asked the oracle if he should attack Persia. The priestess replied that if he attacked the Persians he would destroy a great empire. He further asked if his kingdom would long endure. The priestess replied:

"Wait till the time shall come when a mule is monarch of Media;

Then, thou delicate Lydian, away to the pebbles of Hermus;

Haste, oh! haste thee away, nor blush to behave like a coward."

This was most reassuring to Croesus, for he doubted that a mule would ever be king of the Medes. In the war that he now waged against the Persians Cyrus disastrously defeated him (546 B.C.), captured him, and plundered his capital, Sardis. But Croesus had no complaint against the oracle when the matter was explained to him, for Cyrus, the son of a Median mother and a Persian father, was the mule to which the oracle referred. Cyrus kept Croesus, miraculously saved from the pyre on which Cyrus had meant to burn him, at his side in his court. He treated him with the utmost courtesy and consideration, and often, according to

Herodotus, turned to him for advice or accepted suggestions he volunteered. After the conquest of Lydia by Cyrus, the Ionian and Aeolian Greeks sent envoys to Cyrus and asked him to accept them on the same terms they had enjoyed when they were subject to Croesus. Cyrus listened carefully to their plea, then replied with a parable. Once a piper walking by the sea chanced to see fish swimming in the waters. He took out his pipes and played sweetly to them, hoping they would come out on land in response to his music, but the fish ignored him. Then he took a net, cast it in the sea, netted the fish, and brought them to land. Hereupon the fish began to leap and dance. Then the piper told the fishes they could cease their dancing, as they had not chosen to dance when he piped to them. And so it was with the Ionians and Aeolians: when Cyrus urged them to revolt, before his war with Croesus, they had ignored him, probably on the assumption that Cyrus would never overcome Croesus. Now that he was successful they offered him their allegiance on the old terms, but as his position was now different, he was a conqueror, so would his treatment of the Ionians and Aeolians be different. As it turned out, he was a very mild ruler over them. In the years following the conquest of Lydia, Cyrus consolidated his power in the conquered countries. In 538 B.C. he marched with a great army into Babylonia. Sepharvaim (Sippar) was captured without fighting, Nabonidus, who defended it, fled, and two days afterward Babylon itself, which was held by Nabonidus' son Belshazzar, fell into the hands of the conqueror, likewise "without battle and fight," as he records. According to Eusebius, Nabonidus after the fall of Babylon fortified himself in Borsippa; the city was besieged by Cyrus, and after it had capitulated he treated it and Nabonidus himself with mercy, allowing the latter to make his residence in Carmania (modern Kerman). It is certain that he showed great generosity and consideration to the conquered capital Babylon, sparing its inhabitants and their religious feelings; he even represented himself as having been called by Merodach (Marduk), the god of the city, to avenge his neglect at the hands of the preceding kings. Cyrus' attitude toward the Jewish exiles in Babylonia is well known from the Old Testament (Ezra, i.). He permitted them to return to their own country (thus ending the Babylonian Exile), to rebuild Jerusalem, and to restore the temple, and even returned to them the vessels of the temple which had been carried away by Nebuchadnezzar. According to Herodotus, because of his firm, just, and kindly qualities, he was known to the Persians as "father." His death, like his birth, is shrouded in legend. The most common view is that he fell in battle with the Massagetae, on the river Jaxartes (modern Syr Darya); in this connection, see Tomyris. The tomb of Cyrus was at Pasargadae, a city founded by him near the site where he had defeated his grandfather Astyages, king of the Medes. The tomb was inscribed,

"O man, whosoever thou art, and from whencesoever thou comest (for I know thou wilt come), I am Cyrus, the founder of the Persian Empire; do not grudge me this little earth which covers my body."

His plea was ignored; the officers Alexander the Great left at Pasargadae, 330 B.C., allowed the tomb to be plundered. When Alexander returned and learned that the tomb had been opened and plundered, he put the guardians of the tomb to torture but could not learn who had committed the sacrilege and outrage.

Cyrus the Younger. Persian satrap; killed at Cunaxa in Babylonia, 401 B.C. He was the son of Darius II, king of Persia, and Parysatis. He was sent to Sardis by his father, to be satrap with dominion over Cappadocia, Phrygia, and Lydia, and proved himself an able administrator. There he met the Spartan admiral Lysander, who won his confidence by his personal incorruptibility and his refusal to accept gifts from Cyrus. His contact with Lysander's Spartans gave him great respect for the fighting qualities of the Greeks. He promised money to Lysander to prosecute the war against the Athenians, and left Lysander, whom he trusted more than the Persian nobles, in charge of his satrapy when he was called back to the Persian court to attend his dying father. On the death of Darius his mother intrigued unsuccessfully to secure the throne for him in place of the legitimate heir, Artaxerxes II. Cyrus resolved to win the throne and began to collect a force of Greek mercenaries for the purpose. As finally gathered, the army of Cyrus included about 100,000 Asiatic troops and 13,000 Greeks, among whom was the Athenian Xenophon. Without telling the troops their precise destination, Cyrus led forth his army from Sardis in the spring of 401 B.C. The path wound across Asia Minor, through Lycaonia, the Cilician Gates, the Pass of Beilan, and along the Euphrates River to Babylonia. At the village of Cunaxa outside Babylon, Artaxerxes marched out against him. The two hosts engaged. The forces of Cyrus were immediately successful, and Cyrus was already receiving congratulations when he suddenly spied his hated brother. With a few followers he urged his horse forward intent on killing Artaxerxes with his own hand, and did wound him slightly. But the bodyguard surrounding Artaxerxes wounded him in the eye; he fell from his horse and was instantly slain. As soon as news of his death reached his Asiatic troops, they fled in terror; the victory so quickly won was more quickly turned into a rout. Only the Greek mercenaries stood fast. They did not surrender to Artaxerxes but were allowed to depart and made the famous return described in Xenophon's Anabasis (q.v.).

Cythera (si-thir'a). [Also: Cerigo, Cerigotto; Greek, Kithira, Kythera, Kytherion.] One of the Ionian Islands in S Greece, situated between 8 and 10 miles S of Laconia. It was near this island that Aphrodite was said to have arisen from the foam of the sea, whence her epithet "Cytherea." But some say the worship of Aphrodite was brought to the island by the Phoenicians. The sanctuary of Aphrodite Urania (Heavenly) on the island is the oldest of all the sanctuaries of Aphrodite among the Greeks. A wooden image of the goddess, armed, stood in it. In ancient times the island was known as the "Purple Island" because the shellfish of the region yielded such a fine dye. The island, once an Argive possession, came into the hands of the Spartans, but was wrested from them by the Athenians, 424 B.C., and became a base from which Athens attacked Sparta. This fulfilled the warning made generations earlier by the sage Chilon, that Sparta would gain if Cythera were sunk to the bottom of the sea, for he saw it, by its location, as a dagger pointed at the heart of Sparta. Area of the island, about 110 square miles.

Cytherea (sith-ē-rē'a) or Cythera (si-thir'a). In classical mythology, epithets of Aphrodite, from the island of Cythera, or from a place of the same name which once existed in Crete.

Cytissorus (sī'ti-sōr'us). In Greek legend, a son of Phrixus and Chalciope, and a grandson of Aeëtes, king of Colchis. See Phrontis.

Cyzicus (siz'i-kus). A legendary king of the Doliones in the country of Cyzicus. Jason and the Argonauts landed there on their way to Colchis on the expedition for the Golden Fleece and were hospitably received. When the Argonauts sailed away they were driven back by unfavorable winds and, landing again on the shores of Cyzicus in darkness, were mistaken for enemies. The Argonauts were unaware that the land to which they had been driven was Cyzicus and in the struggle which followed Jason killed Cyzicus, the king who had entertained him.

Cyzicus. [Also: Cyzicum.] In ancient geography, the peninsula projecting from Mysia, Asia Minor, into the Propontis (Sea of Marmara); also, the Greek town on its isthmus, named, according to legend, for Cyzicus, king of the Doliones. Jason and the Argonauts stopped there on their way to Colchis in the quest for the Golden Fleece. Among its ruins are a Roman amphitheater, a temple of Hadrian, and an ancient theater. The Roman amphitheater dates from the 2nd century A.D. The ruins still rise to a height of 65 feet, built of rubble faced with rusticated masonry in granite. There are 32 arched entrances in the lower story. The longer axis of the ellipse is 325 feet. The temple of Hadrian, dedicated in 167 A.D., was greatly admired in antiquity. It was a Corinthian peripteros (building surrounded by a row of columns) of six by 15 columns, of white marble. The cella, or main chamber, was small, without pronaos (vestibule) or opisthodomos (rear chamber); there were four interior rows of columns in front and two behind. The temple measured 112 by 301 feet; the cella 70 by 140 feet. The columns were seven feet in base-diameter and 70 feet high (the highest of any classical temple). The pediments and the cella were richly adorned. The ancient theater, apparently contemporaneous with the amphitheater, was in part built up of rough masonry and faced with marble. The diameter is 328 feet.

Dacia (dā'shā). In ancient geography, a province of the Roman Empire, lying between the Carpathian Mountains on the N, the Tissus or Tisia (Tisza) on the W, the Ister (Danube) on the S, and the Tyras or Danastis (Dniester) on the E. It corresponded approximately to modern Rumania, including Transylvania. The inhabitants were the Getae or Daci. It was invaded by Alexander the Great in 335 B.C., by Lysimachus c292 B.C., and its people defeated the generals of Domitian in 86-90 A.D. It was conquered by Trajan in 101 and succeeding years, and made a Roman province. It was abandoned by the Romans in the reign of Aurelian (270-275), but not before the Romans, during some 200 years of occupation, had left their imprint on the region by establishing the language that has developed into modern Rumanian.

Dactyls (dak'tilz) or Dactyli (dak'ti-li) or Daktyloi (-loi). In Greek and Roman mythology, supernatural and magical beings living on Mount Ida in Phrygia, the discoverers of iron and copper and of the art of working them. They were transferred, in the legends, to Mount Ida in Crete, where they were said to have been born of the nymph Anchiale, as she grasped the earth with both hands, in a cave on Mount Dicte. According to this version, and a similar one in which they were born as Rhea grasped the earth in giving birth to Zeus, there were ten Dactyls, five male and five female. The males were fabulous ironworkers in Crete. The females were experts in the art of making magic spells and dwelt in Samothrace. In Crete, the Dactyls were sometimes identified with the Curetes, Corybantes, and other mountain-dwelling semi-divine beings. Their number, originally three, was increased, in various accounts, to ten, and even to 100.

Daedala (dē'da-lā). A Boeotian festival of the Sacred Marriage, established by Hera to commemorate a reconciliation after one of her quarrels with Zeus. In a fit of jealousy she had left him and gone into hiding in Euboea. Zeus could not persuade her to return to him. He went, some say, to Cithaeron, the despot of Plataea, who was reputed to be very clever, and asked advice. Cithaeron advised Zeus to make a wooden image, dress it up, and transport it on a bullock wagon, in the meantime stating that he was celebrating his marriage with Plataea, the daughter of the river-god Asopus. Zeus followed his advice. Hera learned of the proposed marriage and returned at once, swooping down on the supposed bride as she was carried in procession. When she realized it was a wooden image she was so relieved that she became reconciled with Zeus, and founded this festival, which was named Daedala because that was the name given to wooden images. The Little Daedala was celebrated every six years by Plataeans only. The Plataeans went to an oak grove, spread out cooked meat, and observed the crows that came to take up the meat. They marked the tree which the first crow to take up the meat perched on, cut down that tree and made their wooden image from it. The Great Daedala was celebrated every 59 years. To that festival 14 Boeotian towns sent images. The 14 images were carried in procession to the Asopus River, thence to the top of Mount Cithaeron. There a cow was sacrificed to Hera and a bull to Zeus on a wooden altar. The victims were burned, with other victims contributed by the celebrants of the festival, after they had been anointed with incense and wine, and the altar was burned with them.

Daedalion (dē-dā'li-on). In legend, a son of Phosphorus, the morning star. He was the brother of Ceyx and the father of a beautiful daughter, Chione, who was loved by Apollo and Hermes. Daedalion was a fierce and valiant warrior, but when his daughter was slain by Artemis for her boastfulness he became frenzied with grief. He fled to Mount Parnassus and leaped from its summit. Apollo took pity on him and transformed him as he fell into a hawk, a bird like Daedalion in its ruthless and ferocious character.

Daedalus (ded'ā-lus, dē'dā-lus). A legendary Athenian; son of Metion and grandson of Erechtheus. He was a marvelous smith, having been taught by Athena, and was regarded as the personification of all handicrafts and of art, and as such was worshiped by artists' guilds in various places, especially in Attica, and was a central figure in various myths. He was said to have made various improvements in the fine arts, including architecture, and to have invented many mechanical appliances, as the ax, the awl, and the bevel. For the murder of his nephew Talus, of whose inventive skill he was jealous, he was banished or escaped to Crete, where he constructed, to contain the monster Minotaur, the famous Labyrinth, in which he and his son Icarus were confined for a time. In one legend the reason given for his imprisonment is that he built a cow disguise for Pasiphaë in order that the bull sent by Poseidon might mount her. Escaping, he and Icarus fled over the sea on wings of wax which they had made. Icarus, ignoring his father's warnings, soared too near the sun; his wings melted, and he fell into the sea (which has since been called, after him, the Icarian Sea). Daedalus circled over the waves where he fell, recovered his son's body and took it to a nearby island, now called Icaria. A partridge perched nearby and watched gleefully as he buried Icarus there. It was his sister, Polycaste, who had been transformed into a bird when she hanged herself in grief at the death of her son Talus, and who was now avenged by the sight of Daedalus, the murderer of Talus, burying his own son. In some accounts Perdix ("partridge") is given as the name of Polycaste's son. In his flight from Minos, Daedalus went to Cumae and there built a golden-roofed temple. On the doors of the temple he depicted the story of Androgeus, of the Athenians and the tribute which they paid because of his death, of Pasiphaë, the Minotaur, Theseus, and Ariadne, but he had not the heart to engrave the story of his son's death. From Cumae he went to Sicily and settled in the realm of King Cocalus. Minos, in the meanwhile, had set out in pursuit of him. As a scheme to trap Daedalus, Minos announced that he would give a rich reward to whoever could run a thread through a spiraled triton shell. Cocalus, to whom Minos had given the shell, passed it on to Daedalus. Daedalus attached a thread to an ant. He then bored a hole at the apex of the shell and confined the ant in the mouth of the shell. The scent of honey smeared on the bored hole lured the ant into traversing the coiling chambers of the shell, drawing the thread with it, until it reached the honey at the other end. When Cocalus returned the shell, with the thread running through it, to Minos and demanded his reward, Minos knew that he had found Daedalus. He demanded his surrender. Cocalus, however, refused to give him up. Still seeking the return of Daedalus, Minos died in Sicily, either in a struggle for his recapture or by being scalded to death as he lay in his bath. Daedalus ultimately joined Iolaus, the nephew of Heracles, in the colonization of Sardinia, and ended his days in that island. Many archaic wooden images were, in ancient times, believed to be the work of Daedalus (and figures of the type are still called Daedalian).

Daira (dā-ī'ra). A daughter of Oceanus. Some say she was the mother by Hermes of Eleusis, for whom the town was named. Others say she was a sister of Styx. She was a goddess connected with the Eleusinian mysteries and, some say, this name which means "the Knowing," is simply another name for Demeter, Persephone, Aphrodite, or Hera, or all of those goddesses.

Daemon or Demon (dē'mon). In Greek mythology, a term which had two significances: 1) a supernatural agent or intelligence, lower in rank than a god; a spirit holding a middle place between gods and men, as the Corybantes, Curetes, Dactyls, Satyrs, and Sileni; 2) a ministering spirit, sometimes regarded as including the souls of deceased persons, which was generally considered by the Greeks to be a protective spirit.

Daldianus (dal-di-ā'nus), Artemidorus. See Artemidorus Daldianus.

Damarchus (dā-mār'kus). An Arcadian of Parrhasia. According to legend, he was transformed into a wolf at the sacrifice of Lycaean Zeus. He kept this shape for nine years, at the end of which time, because he had eaten no men, he was restored to his shape as a man. Afterward he took part in the Olympic Games and won in the boxing match. His statue was set up at Olympia. Pausanias, who tells the story of his transformation into a wolf, doubts that the story is true. If it were, he says, it would surely have been inscribed on the pedestal of his image at Olympia.

Damastes (dā-mas'tēz). The real name of Procrustes, the "Stretcher," whom Theseus killed on his way from Troezen to Athens. But some say his name was Polypemon, and that he was the father of Sinis, the "Pine-bender," who was also slain by Theseus. See Procrustes.

Damia (dam'i-ā). Spirit of fertility, worshiped in Epidaurus and Aegina. A famine struck Epidaurus and to learn how they might find relief, the Epidaurians consulted the oracle at Delphi. The priestess told them to set up images of Damia and Auxesia (Increase). To the question whether the images should be of stone or bronze, the priestess replied that they should be made of olive wood. Having no olive trees of their own, the Epidaurians sent to Athens for permission to cut trees there. The Athenians gave permission on condition that the Epidaurians make annual offerings to Athena Polias (Of the City) and Erechtheus. The Epidaurians agreed; the images were made, and the Epidaurians made the annual offerings. Afterward the Aeginetans, subjects of Epidaurus, revolted, attacked Epidaurus and seized the images, which they took to Aegina and set up there. The Epidaurians now ceased their offerings to Athena and Erechtheus. The Athenians demanded offerings from the Aeginetans on the ground that they had the images. The Aeginetans refused, and also refused to give up the images to Athens. Enraged, the Athenians sailed against Aegina, made their way to the temple, and tried to seize the images. They could not move them. They bound them with ropes and tried to haul them from the temple. Instantly a great thunderclap was heard; all the crew of the Athenian ship were struck with madness and fell upon each other with such savagery that all save one were killed. He alone returned to Athens. This is the Athenian story. But the Aeginetans say that as the Athenians made to haul off the images, the statues fell to their knees, in which position they remained ever after. Meantime the Argives, forewarned by the Aeginetans, came and cut off the retreat of the Athenians. Both agree that only one Athenian escaped. He, when he returned, was set upon by the wives of those who had been killed. As each one asked where her husband was, she jabbed the unfortunate man with the pin of her brooch. In this manner the one who had escaped from Aegina was killed by the widows of his fellows. The Athenians were so shocked by this deed of the women that henceforth the Athenian women were compelled to adopt a style of dress which required no brooches.

Damocles (dam'ō-klēz). Syracusan, fl. in the first half of the 4th century B.C., a courtier of Dionysius the Elder. Cicero relates that Damocles, having extolled the good fortune of Dionysius, was invited by the tyrant to taste this royal felicity, and that, in the midst of a splendid banquet and all the luxury of the court, on looking up he beheld above his head a sword suspended by a single horse-hair.

Damon (dā'mon). Greek musician; fl. latter part of the 5th century B.C. He was noted as a master of the theory of music and for his richly endowed intellect. He was one of the most distinguished teachers of Pericles, and because of his supposed influence upon the latter, he was ostracized.

Damon and Pythias (dā'mon; pith'i-as). Pythagorean philosophers of Syracuse; fl. in the first half of the 4th century B.C. They were celebrated for their friendship. Pythias (or Phintias) plotted against the life of Dionysius I of Syracuse, and was condemned to die. As Pythias wished to arrange his affairs,

Damon offered to place himself in the tyrant's hands as his substitute, and to die in his stead should he not return on the appointed day. At the last moment Pythias came back, and Dionysius was so struck by the fidelity of the friends that he pardoned the offender and begged to be admitted into their fellowship.

Damophon (dam'ō-fon). Greek sculptor, born at Messene, Greece; fl. 2nd century B.C. He was one of the masters of Hellenistic art, and his work combines the decorative richness of his period with something of the monumental simplicity of the Phidian epoch. For a sanctuary of Demeter at Lycosura, in Arcadia, he designed a group of cult statues, of Demeter and Persephone, seated, flanked by standing figures of Artemis and the Titan Anytus, from which three heads and other fragments were recovered during excavations at the site. From the quality of the carving, scholars have speculated that the actual carving was done by apprentices from the master's clay models. Damophon is also credited with a statue of the Mother of the Gods for the agora of Messene, an acrolithic Ilithyia for Aegium, an Artemis, and many others. He worked also in gold and ivory, and it was he who restored the cracked ivory of Phidias' chryselephantine Zeus at Olympia. (JJ)

Damysus (dam'i-sus). In Greek legend, a giant. Some say that when Peleus interrupted Thetis as she was burning away the mortal parts of Achilles to make him immortal, all had been made immortal except one ankle-bone. Thetis departed in a rage at the interruption. Peleus took the ankle-bone from Damysus, whose skeleton had been disinterred, and replaced the charred ankle-bone of Achilles. This was his only mortal part and thus his only vulnerable spot.

Danaë (dan'ā-ē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos, and Aganippe. Some say that Proetus, the twin brother of Acrisius, with whom he fought in the womb, seduced Danaë. He was discovered by Acrisius and this brought on a furious quarrel, in which the brothers took up arms against each other, and Proetus was compelled to flee. Later Acrisius, who wanted a son, consulted the oracle. He was told that he would have no sons and that the son of his daughter would cause his death. To prevent the fulfillment of the oracle, Acrisius imprisoned Danaë in a bronze underground chamber so that she should have no traffic with men. His precautions were in vain. Zeus visited Danaë in a shower of gold and embraced her. She subsequently bore him a son, Perseus. Acrisius refused to believe that the child was the son of Zeus and longed for his death. But he dared not risk the wrath of the gods and the avenging Furies by killing his own grandson. He shut Danaë and her child in a chest and cast it into the sea. The chest floated safely to the shores of the island of Seriphus. Dictys, a fisherman, found the chest, opened it, and took Danaë and her son to his house. There he and his wife sheltered them and there they remained as Perseus grew up. Polydectes, king of the island and brother of Dictys, fell in love with Danaë, but as Perseus, now grown to manhood, stood in his way, he got rid of Perseus, as he thought, by sending him to fetch the head of the Gorgon Medusa. During Perseus' absence Polydectes so harassed Danaë that she, with Dictys, went into hiding to escape him. When Perseus returned and learned that his mother and Dictys had fled to a temple for refuge from Polydectes he went to the palace, exhibited the head of Medusa, and turned Polydectes and his unfriendly court to stone.

Danai/Danaus

Danai (dan'ā-i). [Also: Danaoi, Danaans.]

In ancient Greek history, the Argives; used by Homer to denote the Greeks generally.

Danaiidae (dā-nā'i-dē). In Greek mythology, descendants of Zeus and Io, the 50 daughters whom Danaus sired on various women. Their mothers were naiads, hamadryads, princesses, and other mortals. Their uncle, Aegyptus, wished them to marry his 50 sons, but Danaus, fearing a plot and on consideration of an oracular pronouncement, fled with his daughters to the Peloponnesus. With them the Danaidae took the rites of Demeter, called by the Greeks the Thesmophoria, and taught these rites to the Pelasgians (Argives). Later, however, when the inhabitants of the Peloponnesus were harried by the Dorians, the observance of the rites ceased, except in Arcadia. The Danaidae also helped the Argives to find springs, and one of them, Amymone, secured a never-failing fountain from Poseidon which is the source of the Lerna River. Danaus made himself king of Argos, and presently the sons of Aegyptus came from over the sea in pursuit of his daughters. After a siege of the city Danaus yielded to their demands to make his daughters their wives, but in secret he gave each of his daughters a sharp pin and ordered them to kill their husbands on the wedding night. All except Hypermnestra obeyed their father. She, divinely inspired, spared her husband Lynceus. The Danaidae buried their husbands' heads at Lerna and their bodies below the walls of Argos. At the command of Zeus, Athena and Hermes purified the Danaidae of the murder of their husbands. Even so, they were punished in the Underworld for their crimes. They were ordered by the judges in Tartarus forever to fetch water in jars that leaked like sieves. After their purification, Danaus sought husbands for his daughters, and awarded them to various men who took part in a foot race, the winner to have first choice, the runner-up second choice, and so on. The descendants from these marriages were known as Danaans, or Danai, a name given in honor of Danaus and sometimes applied to all Argives, and used by Homer to apply to all the Greeks who fought at Troy. According to some accounts the Danaidae, sisters of Hypermnestra, were slain by her husband Lynceus to avenge the deaths of his brothers.

Danaus (dan'ā-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Belus, king of Egypt, and Anchinoë. He was the twin of Aegyptus. Danaus, who became ruler of Libya, was the father of 50 daughters by various nymphs and mortal women. After the death of Belus, Danaus and his brother quarreled about the inheritance. Aegyptus suggested that the 50 daughters of Danaus marry his 50 sons, and thus consolidate the family power. But Danaus, warned by an oracle that he would die at the hands of a son-in-law, fled with his daughters from Libya. With the aid of Athena he built a ship; according to some, it was the first ship ever built, but others say it was the first 50-oared ship. He put to sea with his daughters and sailed to Rhodes, where he raised a temple to Athena and dedicated an image to the goddess. Some say three of his daughters—Lindus, Camirus, and Ialysus—died in Rhodes and gave their names to three cities there. Danaus next sailed to the Peloponnesus. Landing near Argos he informed the Argives, or the Pelasgians as they were also called, that he had been chosen by the gods to be their king. The Argives, who already had a king, were not disposed to accept this dictum but decided to sleep on the question. During the night a wolf attacked the herds of the Argives and killed the best bull. The Argives took this as an omen warning them to accept Danaus willingly or risk violence. Their king, Gelanor, or as some name him, Pelasgus, stepped aside and Danaus became king. In gratitude for the omen Danaus built the temple of Lycian Apollo in Argos, for he thought the wolf was Apollo in disguise. Danaus became a powerful ruler. He built the Acropolis of Argos and later taught the inhabitants how to dig wells, for Poseidon, enraged that Inachus had awarded the land to Hera instead of to himself, had dried up all the springs. Aegyptus now sent his 50 sons in pursuit of the daughters of Danaus, and ordered them not to return without their brides. Danaus remained adamant in his refusal to let his daughters wed their cousins. The sons of Aegyptus besieged Argos, and since there were no fountains in the citadel, Danaus was compelled to capitulate. He agreed to the marriages of his daughters, but

in secret he furnished each of them with a lethal rapier and ordered them to kill their bridegrooms on the wedding night. All of his daughters except Hypermnestra obeyed his command. The daughters of Danaus buried the heads of their husbands at Lerna. Now Danaus decided to choose other husbands for his daughters. He arranged a race for the suitors of his daughters and announced that the winner would have first choice of a wife, the runner-up second choice, and so on until all his remaining daughters had husbands. This race was run on a street in Argos and was afterward celebrated by the Argives in a contest commemorating it. There were not enough contestants in the first race, as many men were reluctant to wed known murderesses, but ultimately all the daughters were wed. Their descendants were known as Danaans, or Danai, after their ancestor Danaus. Danaus met his end at the hands of the one bridegroom who had been spared among the sons of Aegyptus. He was Lynceus, who after murdering his father-in-law, took the throne.

Daphnaea (daf-nē'a). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Of the Laurel." The laurel was sacred to her.

Daphne (daf'nē). In Greek mythology, a nymph, the daughter of the river-god Peneus, or, in other accounts, of Ladon, an Arcadian. She delighted to spend her days in the forest hunting, as did the virgin goddess Artemis, and rejected all suitors for her hand. Her father pleaded with her to take a husband and give him grandsons, but Daphne became so tearful at the prospect of marriage that Peneus did not insist. But Daphne was so beautiful that many fell in love with her. Apollo, wounded by one of the arrows of Eros because the god of love wished to punish him for mocking his skill with the bow and arrow, saw Daphne and fell in love with her. Leucippus, son of Oenomaus, also loved her. Leucippus, seeing that he could make no progress with Daphne, disguised himself as a maiden and joined Daphne and the nymphs in their hunting expeditions in order to be near the object of his adoration. Apollo, jealous of Leucippus' proximity to Daphne, suggested that the nymphs bathe naked in the mountain stream, and thus Leucippus' disguise was betrayed, whereupon the nymphs tore him to pieces. Apollo then pursued Daphne when she was separated from her companions. She fled from him in terror, some say because Eros had shot her with the arrow that drives away love. The more Apollo called to her of his love, the faster she flew from him. Nearly at the end of her strength in her flight, she approached the Peneus River and called out to her father to save her from the embraces of Apollo. Her prayer was answered. As Apollo was about to clasp her in his arms, she was transformed into a laurel tree. He embraced the tree, still quivering from the chase, and declared that its leaves would always be green and that he would always bind them around his head in memory of his love for Daphne. From then on the laurel wreath replaced the oak wreath as the prize to the victors in Apollo's festival of the Pythian Games, and laurel became the symbol of victory.

Daphne. In Greek legend, a daughter of Tiresias, the seer of Thebes. When the Thebans fled before the Epigoni Daphne remained in the city and was captured. The Epigoni sent her to Delphi as part of the fruit of their victory and dedicated her to the service of Apollo. She became famous for composing many of the oracular responses, and some say Homer borrowed some of his verses from her.

Daphne. In ancient geography, a famous grove and sanctuary of Apollo, situated about five miles SW of Antioch, in ancient Syria. It was established by Seleucus Nicator.

Daphnephoria (daf'nē-fō'ri-a). A festival in honor of Apollo, a kind of May-pole ceremony, observed in Thebes. It occurred once in eight years, but was probably annual at first. A boy, richly dressed and with his long hair let down, headed the procession. He was followed by his nearest relative carrying the decorated pole, and by a band of singing girls bearing olive branches.

Daphnis (daf'nis). In mythology, a son of Hermes and a Sicilian nymph. He was exposed by his mother in a laurel grove, but was found and brought up by shepherds. Pan taught him to sing and play the flute, the Muses endowed him with a love of poetry, and he was the companion of Apollo and Artemis. He was a shepherd who tended his flocks in Sicily. A nymph, Nomia, fell in love with him, and made him swear to be faithful to her. One of her rivals, Chimaera, made him drunk and then seduced him. When Nomia heard of it she blinded him. Daphnis, who is said to have invented pastoral or bucolic poetry, mourned the loss of his sight in song and Hermes took pity on him and transformed him into stone and caused a spring, named Daphnis, to flow from the earth near his home in Sicily. Annual sacrifices were offered there in memory of Daphnis.

Daphnis and Chloë (klō'ē). Greek pastoral romance attributed to Longus (3rd century A.D.?), a Greek sophist. It recounts the loves and pastoral life of Daphnis, foster son of Lamon, a goatherd, and Chloë, foster daughter of Dryas, a shepherd. The principals were each found as infants, and the circumstances surrounding the sites where they were found indicated divine birth. After various vicissitudes, they are united and their at least noble birth is acknowledged.

Dardanelles (dār-da-nelz'). See Hellespont.

Dardani (dār'da-ni). Ancient Illyrian people of the southern highland of Moesia. The Dardani became subject to the Macedonians under the Antigoni, and later to the Romans. Their chief city was Dardanus, after which the strait of the Dardanelles was named.

Dardani. Inhabitants of Dardania, mentioned in the Iliad.

Dardania (dār-dā'ni-a). [Also: Dardanice.] In ancient geography, a territory in Mysia, with uncertain boundaries. It is mentioned, indefinitely, in the Iliad.

Dardanus (dār'da-nus). In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus and the Pleiad Electra, and the ancestor of the Trojans. He migrated from Arcadia to Phrygia and built a city near the foot of Mount Ida, which he named Dardania. He brought with him to the Troad the sacred images of the gods which had formed part of his wife's dowry, and instituted their worship into the region. According to an oracle, his city would remain safe as long as the images remained in it. The city which Dardanus founded later became part of Ilium, or Troy. The children of Dardanus were Erichthonius, Ilus, Deimas, Idæus, and one daughter, Idæa.

Dardanus. [Also: Dardanum.] In ancient geography, a city in Mysia, Asia Minor, situated on the Hellespont, about nine miles SW of Abydos.

Dares (dār'ēz). In the Aeneid, one of the companions of Aeneas on the flight from Troy. He was a famous boxer who used to spar with Paris. In the games honoring Anchises in Sicily, Aeneas had to stop his match with the much older Entellus, because Dares was being battered to pieces by Entellus. Dares was later slain by Turnus in the war with the Latins.

Dares Phrygius (dār'ēz frij'i-us, dā'rēz). Priest of Hephaestus in Troy mentioned in the Iliad. De Excidio Troiae, a Latin poem on the fall of Troy, composed about the 5th century A.D., of little merit, was alleged to be a translation of an original poem by Dares Phrygius. (JJ)

Darius I (of Persia) (da-rī'us). [Called Darius the Great: also known as Darius Hystaspes.] King of Persia, born c558 B.C.; died 486 B.C. He was a son of Hystaspes; his brothers were Artaphernes, Artabanus, and Artanes; and he was fifth in the descent from Achaemenes. He succeeded (521 B.C.) Cambyses on the Persian throne, after defeating the magian Gaumata, who claimed to be Bardiya (the Greek Smerdis), brother of Cambyses and son of Cyrus. According to Herodotus, he won the throne in the following manner: While Cambyses was on his campaign in Egypt, the Median magus Patizeithes, whom he had left in charge of his household, plotted with his brother Bardiya to seize the throne of Persia. He set up Bardiya, pretending that he was Smerdis, the brother of Cambyses and son of Cyrus, and had him proclaimed king. He felt safe in doing this as he knew the real Smerdis had been secretly slain at Cambyses' order. Cambyses died before he could return to Susa and expose the False Smerdis. There were several Persian nobles who suspected, and finally proved to their own satisfaction, that the reigning Smerdis was not the son of Cyrus but an imposter. Six of these nobles took Darius into their confidence, proposing to overthrow the False Smerdis, who was a Mede, and regain the throne for a Persian. Darius had also suspected that this Smerdis was an impostor and now urged instant action. He threatened the other six nobles—Otanés, Gobryas,

Intaphernes, Megabyzus, Aspathines, and Hydarnes—that he would reveal their plot to Smerdis himself unless they acted at once. He would do so to protect himself, before the knowledge that he had been discovered reached the ears of Smerdis and caused him to take action against them. Darius convinced them, and they set off to the palace, planning to enter and slay the False Smerdis. On the way news reached them that Smerdis had been disclosed as an impostor by Prexaspes, the man who at Cambyses' order had secretly slain the real Smerdis. The conspirators now hesitated, and considered whether they should not delay a bit while the capital was in such a ferment. Darius again insisted on immediate action. As they discussed the matter, two pairs of vultures, pursued by seven pairs of hawks, flew by. The hawks overtook the vultures and tore them to pieces. At this omen the seven agreed to proceed at once. When they came to the palace the guards let them enter the courtyard without question. Eunuchs inside tried to stop them from entering the palace, but they were slain and the conspirators pushed on to the apartments of the king. The two magi heard the clamor and rose to defend themselves. One was instantly slain. The other rushed to an inner room. Darius and Gobryas followed. In the darkness Gobryas seized the magus but Darius, unable to see, hesitated. Gobryas asked why he hesitated and, hearing that Darius feared to strike lest he wound Gobryas, told him to strike anyway, even if both were killed by his blow. Darius obeyed and fortunately killed only the magus. After the slaying of the two magi, the seven nobles rushed from the palace, shouting what they had done and killing every magus they could lay their hands on.

Some days later they met to decide what they should do. After some discussion of the various merits of a monarchy, oligarchy, and democracy, they decided to restore the monarchy and choose one of their own number as king. They agreed to ride out of the city together the next morning, and that he whose horse was first to neigh after sunrise should become king. Darius was determined that the choice fall to him. He took his groom into his confidence, and was assured by him that if the choice depended on the neighing of the horse, Darius could cease to worry, as with the help of a mare he would cause Darius' stallion to neigh first. The next day the nobles, all except Otanes who favored a democracy and did not wish to become king, rode out as planned. As they rode along, they came to the spot where the groom had tethered a mare the night before. Darius' stallion leaped forward and neighed. At the same time there was a flash of lightning followed by a clap of thunder. The five other nobles leaped from their horses, knelt before Darius, and acknowledged him as their king. Thus he became ruler of all that was then known as Asia except the part occupied by the Arabians. In his own record of his reign, as set forth in the inscriptions of Behistun in three languages (Old Persian, Elamite, and Accadian), Darius caused the following to be inscribed: "Darius, son of Hystaspes, by aid of his good horse and his good groom Oebares, got himself the kingdom of the Persians." Darius, who was already married to a daughter of Gobryas, now married Atossa, daughter of Cyrus, who had been the wife of her brother Cambyses and then of the False Smerdis; she had great influence with him. He also married Phaedima, daughter of Otanes, who had proved that Smerdis was an impostor; Artystone, said to have been his favorite, another daughter of Cyrus; and Parmys, a granddaughter of Cyrus; and Phratagune, the daughter of his brother Artanes. Among the sons produced by these wives were: Artabazanes and Ariabignes, by the daughter of Otanes; Xerxes (his heir), Achaemenes, Hystaspes, and Masistes, by Atossa; Arsames and Gobryas, by Artystone; Ariomardus, by Parmys; Abrocomes and Hyperanthes (both of whom fell at Thermopylae, 480 B.C.), by Phratagune.

After gaining the throne, Darius turned his attention to putting down the revolts which broke out all over Persia following the unmasking of the impostor Smerdis. This was followed by two uprisings in Babylonia, led by Nidintu-Bel and Arachus, who made claim to be Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabonidus. He marched to Babylon and besieged the city. But the Babylonians had taken thorough measures to prepare for a siege, and jeered at the Persians, saying their city would not fall until mules foaled. More than a year and a half passed, and still the city held out. In the twentieth month from the beginning of the siege a mule belonging to Zopyrus (son of that Megabazus who had helped to overthrow the False Smerdis), gave birth to a foal. With a stratagem worked out by Zopyrus, Darius now won entrance into the city and took it a second time. He destroyed the walls of the city and crucified 3000 of the leading citizens. He honored Zopyrus by making him governor of the city for life, free from tribute. The other countries under Persian dominion revolted in turn, but at last were brought to submission. He besieged and took Samos and gave it to Syloson to repay him for an act of generosity Syloson had shown toward him when he was a mere member of Cambyse's bodyguard with no prospects of ever becoming king. After restoring order in the empire, Darius turned his attention to reorganization and reforms of the administration. He divided the whole land into 20 satrapies, each ruled by a governor, introduced regular taxation and uniformity of coinage, constructed roads, and founded a kind of postal system by placing stations and relays with saddled horses at regular intervals on the road between Susa and Sardis. To the capitals Susa in Elam, Ecbatana in Media, and Babylon, he added Persepolis in Persia proper, which was destroyed by Alexander the Great, but the imposing ruins of which have survived. On account of his attention to trade, taxes, and industry he was called "the Huckster." He sent an expedition to explore the Indus River, and to sail to its mouth; he dug a canal from the Nile to Suez, and compelled North Africa to pay him tribute. He also explored the shores of Sicily and Italy (Magna Graecia); Herodotus relates that this was a spying trip in preparation for war on Greece, and that the idea for it was proposed by Atossa to honor her promise to Democedes, a physician of Crotona, to secure his return to his homeland.

Throughout his empire he encouraged and promoted the native religions and priests. For this reason the oracles of Asia Minor supported the side of the Persians, and in Egypt he was regarded as a great benefactor. He is referred to in the Old Testament in connection with the building of the temple of Zerubbabel. In the second year of his reign he allowed the resumption of the building, and in the sixth it was completed (Ezra, vi. 15). In 512 B.C., over the protests of his brother Artabanus, who felt the rewards of the undertaking were not worth its difficulties, he prepared an expedition against Scythia with the idea of securing the northern boundaries of his empire. At the head of a great host he marched to the Thracian Bosphorus, leaving inscribed pillars along the way to commemorate his passage. He caused the Bosphorus to be bridged and passed over it into Europe. On the advice of Ceos of Lesbos he did not destroy the bridge, as he had intended to do, but left it to secure his return or possible retreat. Histiaeus, tyrant of Miletus, was left in charge of the Ionians who guarded the bridge, and fulfilled his charge well. Both Ceos and Histiaeus were richly rewarded by Darius, who never lost his gratitude to them. Now that they were in Europe, the Scythians refused to meet the hosts of Darius in open battle. Instead they kept always one day's march ahead of Darius, destroying the lands through which they passed and leading the Persians deep into Europe, to the lower steppes of Russia. Darius was exasperated with this manner of fighting and did not know which way to turn. According to the account given in Herodotus, he sent messengers to the Scythian chiefs, and asked them if they were afraid to stand and fight why they did not surrender. The Scythians sent back a bird, a mouse, a frog, and five arrows, but the Persians did not immediately understand the meaning of these tokens. After Darius had received these gifts, a part of the Scythian force was drawn up in battle array against the Persians as if to engage in battle. Suddenly a hare ran in front of their ranks. The Scythians broke their formation and went in loud pursuit of the hare. Darius, observing their action, asked what they were doing. When he was told the Scythians were pursuing a hare, he decided that these strange people were making sport of him, that they neither

feared him nor would fight him. The interpretation now put on the tokens sent by the Scythians was that unless the Persians became birds and could fly off into the sky, or mice and burrowed in the ground, or frogs and sought refuge in the marshes, they would never escape the Scythians but would die of their arrows. Darius decided to withdraw. He returned to the bridge and, leaving a part of his force in Europe to subdue Thrace, crossed safely back into Asia. Now Histiaeus, who had maintained the bridge in safety against the Scyths, was brought to Susa to become the king's counselor and friend, but he longed to return to Miletus where he had been tyrant. He sent secret messages to his nephew and son-in-law Aristagoras, and urged him to stir up the Ionian cities to revolt, assuring Aristagoras that Darius would send him, Histiaeus, to put down the revolt, and thus get him away from Susa. Aristagoras busied himself in this pursuit, and soon all Ionia was in open rebellion. The Athenians and Eretrians went to the aid of the Ionians, seized Sardis and burned it. When Darius heard of this, he shot an arrow into the air and prayed that he might be allowed to avenge the burning of Sardis. He commanded his servant to remind him each day to "Remember the Athenians." The revolt of the Ionians was put down, city by city. Histiaeus, whom Darius never suspected, fled when he realized that Artaphernes knew of his part in the revolt. He was ultimately captured and beheaded by a group of Persians, who killed him because they feared if he were returned to Darius, the king would forgive and restore him. And in fact, Darius was angry when he knew what they had done. He dressed the head of Histiaeus, which had been sent to him, and buried it with all the honor befitting one who had been a benefactor to himself and to Persia, because he had saved the bridge by which the Persians withdrew from Scythia. On many occasions Darius showed great magnanimity to his fallen enemies. After the revolts in Ionia had been quelled, he sent his son-in-law, Mardonius, to rehabilitate Ionia, and the latter deposed the tyrants and restored the governments to the people. Darius sent heralds to Greece demanding earth and water from the different states as tokens of submission. Many sent him the required tokens, but the Athenians threw the heralds who came to them into a pit, and the Spartans hurled their heralds into a well and told them to fetch their own earth and water. Reminded every day by his servant to "Remember the Athenians," constantly urged by the exiled sons of Pisistratus, who had fled to him, to seize Attica, and now inflamed by the outrage to his heralds, he sent Mardonius into Greece (492 B.C.) but the latter was unsuccessful and was relieved of his command. In his place Datis and Artaphernes, guided by the Athenian Hippias, went with a host to Marathon. There the Persians suffered a great defeat in one of the decisive battles of history (490 B.C.) at Marathon, and withdrew. Darius was now more avid than ever to conquer the Athenians. He set about preparing a great expedition against Greece, and at the same time, an expedition to put down a revolt that had broken out in Egypt. Before he could put his forces in motion he died (486 B.C.). His reign had lasted 36 years. On his death he was succeeded by Xerxes, his son by Atossa. The tomb of Darius is hewn in the rock at a place called Naksh-i-Rustam, near Persepolis, and is adorned with sculptures and inscriptions complementing those of Behistun.

Darius II (of Persia). [Original name, Ochus; Greek surname, Nothus, meaning "Bastard."] Persian king from c423 to 405 B.C.; son of Artaxerxes I. Through his son Cyrus the Younger, and Tissaphernes and Artabazus, satraps in Asia Minor, he pushed the plan to conquer the Athenian power, allying himself with Sparta, about 412 B.C., in the Peloponnesian Wars.

Darius III (of Persia). [Surnamed Codomanus.] Last king of Persia, died 330 B.C. He reigned 336–330 B.C., when he was dethroned by Alexander the Great. Fearing that Alexander might cross into Asia, he offered money to the Greeks to wage war against him. This maneuver failed. Alexander came to Asia and Darius met him at Issus. In the battle of Issus (333 B.C.) Alexander directed his attack at the spot where Darius, standing in his war chariot and surrounded by a guard of Persian nobles, was located. Alexander broke through; Darius wheeled his chariot and fled. Although his cavalry was successful on the other side of the river, when they heard the king was fleeing their line broke, they wavered and then fled. Darius abandoned his wife Statira and his mother in the camp at Issus, and when he had outdistanced his pursuers he abandoned his chariot, his armor, and his royal cloak, and continued his flight on horseback. Alexander gave up his pursuit of Darius at nightfall, returned to the Persian camp, and dined in the Great King's tent. He heard the wailing of women nearby and on inquiry learned that it proceeded from the abandoned family of Darius. Alexander sent word to them that Darius still lived, and that he would accord his royal captives all the respect due to royalty. Darius wrote Alexander from beyond the Euphrates, calling him an aggressor, asking that the royal captives be restored and proposing that a treaty of friendship and alliance be concluded between them (333 B.C.). Among other things, Alexander wrote the following in reply. "Your ancestors invaded Macedonia and the rest of Greece, and without provocation inflicted wrongs upon us. I was appointed leader of the Greeks, and crossed over into Asia for the purpose of avenging those wrongs; for you were the first aggressors. . . . I have overcome in battle, first your generals and satraps, and now yourself and your host, and possess your land, through the grace of the gods. . . . I am lord of all Asia, and therefore do thou come to me. . . . You have only to come to me to ask and receive your mother and wife and children, and whatever else you may desire. And for the future, whenever you send, send to me as to the Great King of Asia, and do not write as to an equal, but tell me what your need is, as to one who is lord of all that is yours. Otherwise I will deal with you as an offender. But if you dispute the kingdom, then wait and fight for it again, and do not flee; for I will march against you wherever you may be." Darius could not bring himself to submit to this arrogant, but perhaps justified, demand, and prepared to oppose Alexander. The forces met at Gaugamela (331 B.C.) for the battle often called the Battle of Arbela, from a town 60 miles away. Before the battle a eunuch from the train of Statira escaped from Alexander's camp and came to inform Darius that his wife had died in childbirth. Darius is said to have sighed that perhaps her death ended dishonor for her and for him at Alexander's hands, but the eunuch assured him that Alexander had never abused any of the women from Darius' household. On the contrary, he had treated them with great honor for, added the eunuch, "Alexander is as gentle after victory as he is terrible in the field." Convinced of the noble and honorable treatment Alexander had shown his wife, Darius, according to Plutarch, prayed to his gods that he might be allowed to restore the fortunes of Persia, but if fate decreed that Persia must be conquered, he prayed that Alexander would be the conqueror. In the battle of Gaugamela the forces of Alexander completely overwhelmed the superior numbers in Darius' army. Once again Darius fled before the onslaught. Again he abandoned his war car, and again on horseback, he galloped to the mountains of Media. Accompanied by a group of Persian nobles, he went deep into Asia past the Caspian Gates. Alexander consolidated his gains before pursuing him; then, true to his letter, took up the pursuit. Darius fell under the domination of his nobles, especially his cousin Bessus, and as Alexander, by a series of unbelievably swift rides with a small band, began to overtake him, Bessus urged Darius to mount again and flee. Darius refused; Bessus and the other Persians stabbed him (330 B.C.) at a place near Thara, south of the Caspian Sea, and deserted him. Plutarch says the dying king expressed his trust in Alexander and signified it by saying to his friend or servant, "I give him my right hand." But when Alexander arrived, the king had just died. In pity, he is said to have thrown his own cloak over the corpse, which he sent, with great pomp, to the dead king's mother for burial.

Darius the Mede (mēd). In the Bible, king of Chaldea or Babylonia after the overthrow and death of Belshazzar; 6th century B.C. He is said to have been a son of Ahasuerus (see Daniel, v. 31; vi. 28; ix. 1; xi. 1; and other passages). Some historians identify him with Cyaxares, son of Astyages, and uncle to Cyrus the Great.

Dascylus (das'ki-lus). In Greek legend, a son of Lycus, king of the Mariandyni. His father

sent him to accompany the Argonauts on their voyage to Colchis, as his presence would assure friendship in the lands they must pass through. Lycus did this out of gratitude to the Argonauts for defeating his ancient enemies, the Bebryces.

Datis (dā'tis). Median general, who with Artaphernes, commanded the army that Darius I sent to punish the Eretrians and the Athenians for their interference in the Ionian revolt (c499 B.C.), and the burning of Sardis. On the way to Greece the Persian fleet stopped at Naxos and burned the temples and houses of the town, which had been abandoned by the Naxians in terror. The Delians, informed of the approach of Datis, fled to Tenos. Datis anchored at Rhenia, a tiny island lying near Delos, and sent a message to the Delians, asking why they had fled, and assuring them that he would not harm the country that gave birth to the two gods (Apollo and Artemis). He offered a valuable sacrifice on the altar at Delos and sailed away to Eretria. There he besieged the city for six days, at the end of which time it was betrayed, according to Herodotus, by two citizens, and fell to the Persians, who plundered and burned the temples and the town to avenge the burning of Sardis, and carried off the inhabitants as captives. The Persians then proceeded toward Athens. They drew up their forces on the plain of Marathon and suffered overwhelming defeat (490 B.C.) at the hands of the Athenians and Plataeans. Datis sailed back to Persia. On the way, when he reached Rhenia, he was visited by a vision in a dream. The next day he caused a search to be made throughout the ships. When a golden image of Apollo was found aboard a Phoenician vessel in his fleet, he sailed to Delos and placed it in the temple there.

Daulis (dō'lis). In ancient geography, a city in Phocis, Greece, situated about 12 miles E of Delphi. Some say the city was named for a nymph, a daughter of the river-god Cephissus. The Daulians were renowned in ancient times for their size and strength. It was in Daulis, they say, that Procne and her sister Philomela served up the flesh of his son to Tereus. All three were transformed into birds by the gods. Philomela was changed into a swallow and Procne into a nightingale. Because of their never-ending fear of Tereus, who became a hawk, swallows do not lay eggs or hatch their young, nor even nest in Daulis, and the nightingales no longer sing there. There was a sanctuary of Athena at Daulis that contained a wooden image of the goddess, said to have been brought to Daulis from Athens by Procne.

Daunia (dā'ni-ā). In ancient geography, a kingdom in Apulia, in Italy. The Daunians were hostile to Aeneas and the Trojans when they landed in Italy. Their king, Daunus, had given his daughter in marriage to Diomedes, who came into the land after the Trojan War.

Daunus (dā'nus). Named in the Aeneid as a king of Daunia in Apulia. He was the father of Turnus by the nymph Venilia. When Diomedes came into his land after the Trojan War, Daunus gave him his daughter Euippe in marriage.

Dea Dia (dē'ā dī'ā). One of the most primitive deities of Italian mythology. Nothing is known of the rites associated with her cult until after the reorganization of religious ceremonies by Augustus; from these later ceremonies much may be inferred concerning the earlier rites. The worship of this goddess was entrusted to the Arval Brothers, from which it is thought that she may be in fact Acca Larentia, the mother of the original 12 Arval Brothers. There was a grove dedicated to her at Rome, and a temple in it, where professional priests assisted the 12 members of the brotherhood, which after Augustus always included the emperor, in rites which included the sacrifice of animals, prayer to wine jars, the wearing of wheat-ears as crowns, and ceremonial banquets. It is quite clear, especially as the chief ceremonies in her honor occurred in December and in May, that this was a goddess of the fields and the harvest; moreover, since Dea Dia is not a proper name but a descriptive term, it is certain that she was one of the very ancient deities whose names it was considered impious and dangerous to pronounce.

Deae Matres (dē'ē mā'trēz). [Also: Deae Matronae.] Fertility deities worshiped in ancient times in Belgic Gaul, and among the Teutons. Altars and inscriptions to these or similar deities have been found in those areas. Representations on altars and other monuments depict the Deae Matres as three seated women with baskets or bowls of fruit.

actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ċ as d or j, ſ as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z as z or zh.

De Amicitia (dē am-i-sish'i-a). [Eng. trans., "On Friendship;" also called Laelius.] Treatise by Cicero, in the form of a conversation between Laelius and his sons-in-law, C. Fannius and Q. Mucius Scaevola, devoted to the praise of friendship.

Decebalus (dē-seb'a-lus). Title of honor among the Dacians, meaning "chief" or "king," and borne by several of their kings; especially by a king, d. c106 A.D., who was at war with the Romans in the reigns of Domitian and Trajan. He committed suicide after his defeat by Trajan, and Dacia became a Roman province.

Decelea (des-e-lē'a). In ancient geography, a city and mountain citadel in Attica, Greece, situated about 14 miles from Athens and commanding the Attic plain and the routes to Euboea and Boeotia. On the advice of Alcibiades, Athenian general who fled to Sparta to escape trial for impiety, the Spartans under King Agis seized and fortified Decelea in the course of the Peloponnesian War, 413 B.C. This was a crushing blow for Athens. Hitherto the Spartans made raids into Attica and then withdrew, so that it was still possible for Athens to be supplied from the surrounding farms and from Euboea. With the continued occupation of Decelea the Spartans effectively cut off the farmlands as a source of supply, for they continually patrolled the area from the fortress, and cut off supplies from Euboea. This compelled Athens to import supplies by sea and caused great hardship. The Spartans held Decelea until the end of the Peloponnesian War, 404 B.C.

Decelean War (des-e-lē'an). Name frequently given to the third or final stage of the Peloponnesian War, on account of the occupation of Decelea by the Spartans (Lacedaemonians).

Decemvirate (dē-sem'vi-rāt). In Roman history, the commission of ten, presided over by Appius Claudius, sent c450 B.C. to Greece to study Greek law and codify the Roman law. It was renewed the next year, and drew up the Twelve Tables. During its existence it superseded provisionally the regular machinery of government. On account of its tyranny it was overthrown by a popular insurrection after Appius Claudius had attempted to make a slave of Virginia, daughter of Virginius, who became tribune after the decemvirs were deposed.

Decii (dē'shi-i). Several illustrious Romans of consular rank of the Decian gens, especially the father, son, and grandson Decius Mus: the father killed in the battle of Vesuvius, 340 B.C., the son killed in the battle of Sentinum, 295 B.C., the grandson killed in the battle of Ausculum Apulum, 279 B.C.

Decimus Junius Juvenalis (des'i-mus jōn'yus jō-ve-nā'lis). Full Latin name of the Roman satirist Juvenal.

De Corona (dē kō-rō'na). See Crown, Oration on the.

Decumanus (dek-ū-mā'nus). See Cardo and Decumanus.

De Finibus (dē fin'i-bus). [Full title, De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum, meaning "Of the Boundaries of Good and Evil."] Treatise in five books by Cicero, in the form of a dialogue, consisting in a presentation of the doctrines of the Greek schools concerning good and evil. It was written in 45 B.C.

Deianira (dē-ya-nī'ra). In Greek mythology, a supposed daughter of Oeneus, king of Calydon, and Althaea, but actually Dionysus was her father. After the death of her brother, Meleager, Artemis changed his grieving sisters into guinea hens, but Dionysus persuaded the goddess to let Deianira and Gorge keep their human forms. Heracles, on a journey to the Underworld to fetch Cerberus, promised Meleager that he would marry Deianira on his return to earth. After some years he went to Calydon and fought Achelous, the river-god and an unwelcome suitor of Deianira, and won her hand. She bore him Hyllus, Hodites, Glenus, possibly Ctesippus, and his only daughter, Macaria. On a journey from Calydon to Trachis, Deianira and Heracles came to the Evenus River. Here Nessus, a centaur, offered to ferry Deianira across on his back. He did so and attempted to ravish her. Heracles shot him with one of his poisoned arrows. Before he died Nessus secretly told Deianira to preserve his blood, that it would be a powerful love charm by which she would hold Heracles if his interest ever strayed to another woman. Deianira gathered up the blood and kept it. When Heracles left to wage war on Eurytus of Oechalia he told Deianira that he would return at the end of fifteen months and pass the rest of his days peacefully or, at the end of that time, he would be dead. He was successful in his war against Eurytus, and sent Iole, daughter of Eurytus, back to Deianira as his captive and his concubine. Deianira, although she had nothing but sympathy for the young and beautiful captive, decided that the time had come to make use of the love charm Nessus had given her. She rubbed it on a robe which Heracles had sent his herald Lichas to fetch so that he could wear it as he sacrificed to Zeus at Ceneum, and gave the robe to Lichas. After the herald had left, she noticed that a bit of wool with which she had anointed the robe had fallen to the ground and had caused the ground to smoulder. In fear she tried to recall Lichas but it was too late. Heracles received the robe, put it on, and soon his body was burning with the poison of the Hydra with which Heracles had coated the arrow that killed Nessus. When Deianira learned that Nessus had merely sought revenge by telling her of the love charm, and of the effect it had on Heracles, she hanged herself. Thus the poisoned robe killed Heracles long after Nessus had died, in accordance with a prophecy that no living man could kill him, but that he would fall at the hands of a dead enemy. Deianira was the innocent tool of that dead enemy, Nessus.

Deicoön (dē-ik'ō-on). In Greek legend, the third son of Megara and Heracles. He was intended to be the ruler of Oechalia but Heracles killed him when he was afflicted with madness.

Deidamia (dē'i-dā-mī'ā). In Greek legend, a daughter of Lycomedes, king of Scyros. When Achilles, disguised as a girl, was hidden at her father's court in an attempt to prevent him from going to Troy, he seduced Deidamia and she became the mother of his son Neoptolemus. The attempt to hold Achilles was unsuccessful and Deidamia sorrowfully watched him depart for Troy. According to some accounts, he returned during the first years of the war, which were occupied by raids on the coasts of the Troad, and married Deidamia. Some years later, after the death of Achilles, Odysseus and Diomedes came to Scyros to fetch Neoptolemus to the war. Deidamia, mindful of how Achilles had perished, tried to persuade Neoptolemus to remain safe at home, but was unsuccessful. When the war was over, Neoptolemus went to Greece. He gave Deidamia to Helenus as his wife to reward him for his good advice.

Deileon (dē-il'ē-on). In Greek legend, a son of Deimachus of Tricca. He lived with his brothers, Autolycus and Phlogius, near the Halys River on the Assyrian shore, whither they had wandered away from Heracles. The Argonauts encountered them there on their way to Colchis.

Deimos (dī'mos). Fear, or Terror, personified in the Iliad, and later regarded as a son of Ares.

Deinocrates (dī-nok'ra-tēz). See Dinocrates.
Deïoces (dē'yō-sēz). According to some accounts, the founder (reigned c700-647 B.C.) of the Median dynasty who led the Medes in revolt against Assyria and freed them. According to Herodotus, Deïoces achieved his ambition of supreme power over his fellow-countrymen by the use of intelligence and psychology. In his own village he became so noted for his just dealings that his fellow townsmen made him mediator in their disputes. At this time the Medes lived in scattered villages and lacked the discipline of law. The reputation of Deïoces for justice spread and it became the practice for disputants in other villages to come to him to settle their affairs. As he was increasingly sought out to pronounce judgments, he suddenly gave notice that he would no longer occupy himself with securing justice for others because, by spending his whole day in regulating other men's affairs, he was neglecting his own. When he withdrew from his acknowledged position as judge, robbery and lawlessness broke out and so harried the Medes that they met together and decided to invite Deïoces to become their king and restore order. He agreed to do so on condition that he be given a personal bodyguard and that the Medes build him a palace suitable to his new rank. Moreover, he demanded that they build him a new capital city. This was the city of Ecbatana. Surrounding the city on a hill was a series of seven encircling walls. According to Herodotus, the walls were coated, beginning with the outer one, in white, black, scarlet, blue, and orange colors, and the two innermost walls were coated respectively with silver and gold. Inside this fastness Deïoces had his palace and treasury. He retreated into it and thenceforth became a power remote from the eyes of the people, for, says Herodotus, if those who had been brought up with him and considered themselves his equals saw him often, they would become jealous of the power he had acquired, though he was no better than they, and might conspire against him. Therefore he decreed that no one could come into his presence. Petitions from his subjects were communicated to him by messengers. When he had secured his bodyguard, his palace fortress, and his city, Deïoces continued to dispense justice as before, but whereas in former times he had been freely sought out as an arbiter, now his judgments were imposed from above, and a complex spy system kept him informed of the affairs of his kingdom. Some say that Deïoces was in fact probably a local chieftain named Dayukku whose grandson Cyaxares founded the Median empire in 625 B.C. and whose name was included in the list of Median kings as a matter of policy.

Deïon (dē'i-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Aeolus, king of Magnesia in Thessaly, and Enarete. He became king of Phocis. He married Diomedes, daughter of Xuthus, and became the father of four sons: Aeneas, Actor the Argonaut, Phylacus, and Cephalus, and one daughter: Asterodia.

Deïope (dē-ī'ō-pē). According to some accounts, the daughter of Triptolemus and the mother of Eumolpus by Musaeus. But others say she was the mother of Triptolemus.

Deïotarus (dē-yot'ā-rus). Tetrarch and king of Galatia, and an ally of the Romans; died 40 B.C. He was defended before Caesar by Cicero in 45 B.C. on a charge of plotting to assassinate Caesar. Throughout the Roman struggle for power he kept his throne, siding successively with Pompey, Caesar, Brutus, and the triumvirate of Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus.

Deïphobe (dē-if'ō-bē). In the Aeneid, a daughter of the prophetic sea-deity Glaucus. She became a sibyl at Cumae in Italy.

Deïphobus (dē-if'ō-bus). In Greek legend, a son of Priam and Hecuba, and one of the great heroes of the Trojan War. He led a group at the siege of the Greek fortifications and slew many. He himself was wounded by Meriones. As Hector was fleeing around the walls of Troy before Achilles, Athena assumed the shape of Deïphobus and encouraged Hector to make a stand against Achilles. But when Hector hurled his spear in vain at Achilles, and turned to his supposed brother for another one, Deïphobus had disappeared, and Hector knew that the gods had forsaken him. After the death of Paris, Helen was given to Deïphobus because of his deeds in the war. He married her by force. When the Wooden Horse had been dragged inside the walls of Troy Deïphobus accompanied Helen, who walked around it and imitated the voices of the wives of the Greeks in an attempt to find out whether there were actually Greeks hiding inside the horse. Menelaus and Odysseus prevented the Greeks inside from answering Helen's calls and convinced the Trojans that the Horse was indeed a divine gift. In the sack of Troy Deïphobus was slain, and his body terribly mutilated, either by Menelaus or Odysseus. According to the Aeneid, Aeneas met his shade in the Underworld and learned that he had been betrayed by Helen, who revealed his hiding place to Menelaus and Odysseus. Other accounts say that it was Helen herself who killed him, by stabbing him.

Deïphobus. In Greek legend, a son of Hippolytus. He was a king of Amyclae, who purified Heracles for the murder of Iphitus, son of Eurytus.

Deiphontes (dē-i-fon'tēz). In Greek legend, the husband of Hyrnetho, daughter of Temenus. Temenus favored him and planned to pass his kingdom on to him rather than to his own sons. The sons of Temenus killed their father to prevent him from carrying out his plan, but Deiphontes inherited the kingdom anyway. He also won Epidaurus without a struggle, and the Argives took possession of it. The sons of Temenus sought to hurt Deiphontes. They knew he was most vulnerable through his love for their sister and decided to take her away from him. They went to Epidaurus and sent a herald to ask their sister for an interview with them. When she acceded to their request, they denounced her husband, urged her to come with them to Argos, and promised her a much better husband. Hyrnetho defied them; she defended her husband as a good man and labeled her brothers as murderers for the death of their father. The brothers realized they could not make her accompany them willingly. They seized her and carried her off in their chariot. Deiphontes learned that she had been seized and pursued, aided by the Epidaurians. He overtook the sons of Temenus and shot one of them, but dared not aim at the other because he was holding Hyrnetho before him as a shield. As the chase continued, Hyrnetho was slain by her brother and flung from the chariot. Deiphontes and his sons took up her body and buried it in a place that came to be known as the Hyrnethium. They built a hero-shrine for her and declared that all the pieces that break off from olive trees were sacred to Hyrnetho, and henceforth any such pieces were placed in her shrine.

Deipnosophists (dīp-nos'ō-fists). "The Banquet Philosophers." Set of imaginary dialogues by Athenaeus of Naucratis, in which 29 dinner guests spend several days recounting tales and anecdotes. In this way the author manages to present many stories and quotations from Greek literature. Among the imaginary guests are included some of the most eminent literary figures of the empire, for example Masurius Sabinus, Ulpian, and Galen. Athenaeus wrote in the third century A.D.

Deïpyle (dē-ip'i-lē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Adrastus, king of Argos. Her sister was Aegia or Argia. The sisters were wooed by many suitors and Adrastus was perplexed as to whom he should give his daughters. Following the instructions of an oracle, to yoke the boar and lion that fought in his palace to a two-wheeled chariot, Adrastus gave Deïpyle to Tydeus of Calydon, whose emblem was a boar. Aegia was wed to Polynices of Thebes, whose emblem was a lion. Deïpyle became the mother of Diomedes.

Deïpylus (dē-ip'i-lus). In Greek legend, a son of Ilione and Polymnestor, king of Thrace, and a grandson of Priam. According to some accounts, he was mistakenly killed by his father, who had intended to kill his mother's young brother Polydorus.

Dejaneira (dej-a-nī'ra). See Deianira.

Delia (dē'li-a). Epithet of Artemis, from the island of Delos, her birthplace. Similarly Apollo, the sun god, was called Delius.

Delian League (dē'li-an). [Also: Confederacy of Delos.] A Hellenic league, formed probably c477 B.C., with its political center at Athens and its treasury at Delos (removed later to Athens). The term is sometimes applied also to a similar league of 378-338 B.C. The great danger of conquest by the Persians compelled the Ionian Greek states, jealous of their independence, but mostly located on islands and individually indefensible against Persian power, to find some means of collaboration. Beginning in 489 B.C. such maritime states as Aegina, Megara, Naxos, Thasus, Lesbos, Chios, Samos, and others accepted the plan of a league with a treasury and a council on the island of Delos, the assessments for the treasury to be set by Athens, and the council to be under Athenian presidency. The League accomplished its purpose of nullifying the Persian peril, but when, after the death of Xerxes, Naxos and Thasus attempted to withdraw from it, their secession was prevented by Athens. By diplomacy and by their greater power, the Athenians were able to hold the confederacy together and to increase its adherents, which eventually numbered well over 200 states. In 457 B.C. Sparta was deterred from a threatened attack, and Thebes was subdued. But in 454 B.C., when under the pretext of new danger from the Persian quarter, the treasury was removed to Athens, the League became in fact an Athenian empire, which lasted for a troubled half century but came to an end with the close of the Peloponnesian War, disastrously for Athens, in 404 B.C. Subsequent restoration of Athenian sea power led in 378 B.C. to the formation of a new league, Athenian-dominated, but its course was also a troubled one, and in 338 B.C. it was extinguished by the power of Macedon. The story of the Delian League is the story of the fatal unwillingness of the small Greek states to coalesce into a nation, and of the inability of Athens to enforce unity. It was the high point of the hope for such an eventuation, and its failure made inevitable first the Macedonian hegemony and eventually the conquest by Rome.

Delium (dē'li-um). In ancient geography, a place in Boeotia, Greece, situated on the coast about 24 miles N of Athens. Here during the Peloponnesian War the Boeotians defeated (424 B.C.) the Athenians. Socrates took part in the battle. During the retreat as he made his way with others through the enemy, Alcibiades came along on horseback and protected him from the attacks of the enemy and saved his life.

Delius (dē'li-us). Epithet of Apollo, from his birthplace in Delos.

Delos (dē'los). [Also: Mikra Dilos; ancient names, Asteria, Ortygia.] Smallest island of the Cyclades, Greece, situated in the narrow passage between the islands of Myconus and Rhenia. Area, two square miles. Here, according to some accounts, Asteria, daughter of the Titans Coeus and Phoebe, leaped into the sea to escape the embraces of Zeus and was transformed into a quail. A city was named Asteria for her, but afterward renamed Delos. Delos was also known, in her memory, as Ortygia, "quail." Leto, about to bear her children by Zeus, was pursued all over the world by a serpent sent to harass her by jealous Hera. As the time for her confinement neared, no place on earth would receive her out of fear of the anger of Hera. At last she came to Delos, at that time a floating island, and there she was welcomed and kindly received. Some say her children, Artemis and Apollo, were both born on the tiny island, but others say Artemis was born on neighboring Rhenia, and as soon as she was born, helped her mother across to Delos. The birth of Apollo took place in the shadow of the Hill of Cynthus, where the stream of the Inopus issues from the hill. The palm tree there, that Leto clasped when she bore Apollo, was one of the sights of antiquity from the time of Homer to that of Pliny. In its joy at being the birthplace of the god, the island covered itself with golden blossoms. Some say four pillars rose from the sea after the birth of the twin gods and moored the island, so that henceforth it ceased to float. Others say Apollo himself anchored the island, to reward it for receiving his mother. From earliest times, Delos was connected with the Hyperboreans. When Apollo and Artemis were born, some say, two Hyperborean maidens, Arge and Opis, came to Delos to help the birth goddess deliver the children of Leto. The Hyperborean damsels died on Delos and were entombed behind the temple of Artemis. Ever after they were honored by the Delian women from whom the rest of the islanders learned to honor them also. Later two more Hyperborean maidens, Hyperoche and Laodice, came to Delos, accompanied by several men. They brought offerings wrapped in wheaten straw. These maidens also died on Delos and were entombed. In their honor the maidens of Delos cut off a lock of their hair before their wedding day and laid it upon the graves of the Hyperborean damsels. The youths also made offerings of their hair on their tombs. When the Hyperboreans saw that their envoys did not return, they ceased to send them to Delos. Instead they sent their offerings to Scythia, from where they were conveyed in relays to Delos.

Delos became the seat of a great sanctuary in honor of Apollo, one of the most famous religious foundations of antiquity. From the time of Solon, Athens sent an annual embassy to the Delian festival, in which the "tunic-trailing Ionians" honored Apollo with boxing, dancing, and song. When Pisistratus regained control of Athens for the third time, he purified Delos, on the advice of an oracle, by having all the bodies that were buried within sight of the temple dug up and reburied in another part of the island. Only the tomb of the two Hyperborean maidens who came to assist at the birth of Apollo and Artemis were left untouched. This spot was sacred and was not disturbed. In the Persian War, Datis assembled the Persian fleet off Delos. The Delians fled from their island and refused to return, even though Datis assured them that he would do no harm to the land that was the birthplace of two gods. On the contrary, he landed and made an offering of 300 talents' weight of frankincense on the altar at Delos and then sailed away. After he left, Delos was shaken by an earthquake. This was the first time such a thing had occurred and was taken as a warning of evils to come to Greece, and as a fulfillment of the oracle that had predicted:

"Delos self will I shake, which never yet has been shaken."

But Datis himself so much respected the sacred place that on his way back to Asia, after Marathon, he stopped at Delos and left a golden image of Apollo that had been stolen by some of his Phoenician allies and hidden on their ship. He asked the Delians to return it to the temple from which it had been stolen. Twenty years later, in obedience to an oracle, the Delians did so.

After the Persian War, Delos was the center of the Delian League (q.v.), formed (c477 B.C.) to resist Persian aggression. In 454 B.C. the sacred treasure of Delos, contributed by the members of the League, was removed to the Athenian Acropolis. In 426 B.C., Delos was purified again; all the dead who had been buried on the island were removed. Thenceforth no one was permitted to be born on the island, and no corpses could be buried there. The seriously ill were removed to some other place so as not to desecrate the island by dying there. Expectant mothers were taken off well before their time came so that no mortal children should first see the light of day in the island where Apollo was born. Games in honor of Apollo were restored, and a few years later all the inhabitants of the island were removed and it became purely a sacred place. The island was an Athenian dependency down to the Macedonian period, when it became semi-independent, and in the 2nd century B.C. it again became subject to Athens. The city of Delos was made a free port by the Romans and developed into a great commercial mart. It was raided in 88 B.C. by the forces of Mithridates VI and soon fell to the status of an almost uninhabited place. Now it is uninhabited. The sanctuary of Apollo was excavated by the French School at Athens, beginning in 1873. The work ranks as one of the chief achievements of its kind. The buildings disclosed lie for the most part within the enclosure or temenos of Apollo, which is of trapeziform shape, and about 650 feet to a side. Mosaic floors, bathing rooms, large underground drainage wells, and the floor plans of many buildings have been uncovered. In addition to the interesting finds of architecture and sculpture, epigraphical discoveries of the highest importance have been made, bearing upon history and particularly upon the ceremonial and administration of the sanctuary.

Delos, Confederacy of. See Delian League. Delphi (del'fi). [Also: Delphoi.] In ancient geography, a town in Phocis, Greece; the seat of the world-renowned oracle of Pythian Apollo, the most famous oracle of antiquity. It lies at an altitude of about 2000 feet, on the slopes of Mount Parnassus, whose peak rises to a height of more than 8000 feet to the NE. Towering 800 feet immediately above the sanctuary, on the N and E, are two great bare gray rocks, the Phaedriades or "shining ones." The Phaedriades are separated by a deep gorge at whose eastern foot is the sacred spring of Castalia. To the S, the ground falls away swiftly to the ravine cut by the Plistus River as it flows into the Gulf of Corinth at the ancient port of Cirrha (Itea), six miles away. The area is subject to earthquakes and the menace of rock slides. Fissures opened up in the ground, and closed again by tremors, exhaled vapors said to inspire the priestesses who inhaled them to prophecy. In its location alone, Delphi is majestic and dramatic, the "wild and rocky glen" described by the poets.

From remote ages this was the seat of an oracle. Because it was subject to violent earthquakes, the earliest oracle belonged to the chthonian gods, those who hold sway under the earth. The most ancient oracle belonged to Gaea (Earth). Some say Poseidon, "the earth-shaker," shared the oracle with her. Through her prophetess Daphnis, a nymph of Mount Parnassus, Gaea gave her oracles. Poseidon uttered his through priests called Pyrcones. Gaea set the serpent Pytho to guard the chasm whence the prophetic vapors emanated. Her priestesses were called Pythia. Some say Gaea gave her share of the oracle to Themis, but Pytho continued to guard it. This was the situation until Apollo arrived, a relative newcomer to an ancient oracle. Some say he took the form of a dolphin (hence his epithet Delphian Apollo), and swam with a Cretan ship to the port of Cirrha. Arrived there, actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; $\epsilon\eta$, then; δ as d or j, ς as s or sh, τ as t or ch, ζ as z or zh.

he resumed his divine form and commanded the Cretans to become his priests. When they protested that no one would come to worship at such a remote spot, he promised that so many would bring offerings that the sacrificial axes would never be idle. Having reassured them, he went to the chasm and slew the dragon that guarded the oracle. Some say the place was first named Pytho, "the place of the rotting," because he left the bones of the dragon to rot there, and that it was later named Delphi because Apollo had come to the nearby shores in the shape of a dolphin. But some say it was named Delphi in honor of Delphus, a son or a descendant of Apollo. Apollo received Poseidon's share in the oracle in exchange for a place near Troezen, in the Peloponnesus, and became sole master at Delphi. Having killed Pytho, Apollo was compelled to seek purification, and was away doing penance for eight years. The penance and purification of Apollo were commemorated in a sacred drama that was enacted at Delphi, at first, every eight years. The epithet Pythian was given to Apollo because he slew the dragon; his priestesses were called Pythia, or sometimes, Pythonesses. Others say, and the two legends existed side by side, that Apollo came from the land of the Hyperboreans at the back of the north wind, and seized the oracle. These say that his first prophet, the only man who ever served in this capacity, was Olen, a Hyperborean. But most say that Phemenoë was his first prophetess, and that she pronounced her oracles in hexameter verse. At first the priestess was available for consultation only once a year, on Apollo's birthday. In later times she prophesied once a month, or every day, if the omens were favorable. Those who sought advice from the oracle came as suppliants, wearing laurel wreaths and fillets of wool; they purified themselves, sacrificed a victim, and inquired whether it was worth their while to ask a question. If the response to this query was favorable, they approached the priestess in her shrine. Three priestesses served in turn. The priestess was purified, drank the waters of the spring of Cassotis, chewed laurel leaves, and seated herself on a tripod over the chasm from which the vapors issued and which stimulated prophetic utterance. Only a priest was present when the priestess gave her responses. His function was to interpret the utterances, which were often obscure or, at the least, capable of two interpretations. Heracles, seeking information from the oracle, was denied by the priestess because of his impurity. Enraged, Heracles attempted to seize the sacred tripod and threatened to set up his own oracle. Apollo came to protect his shrine and the two struggled until Zeus parted them by a thunderbolt and forced them to compose their differences. The priestess gave Heracles a response, and the sanctuary remained firmly in Apollo's hands. Some say that the myth of the fight between Heracles and Apollo symbolizes the Dorian invasion of Greece (c1100 B.C.). Most of the Dorians went on into the Peloponnesus, but some remained in Doris and continued to have great influence over the sanctuary. After the Dorian invasion the influence and power of the sanctuary flourished, and in the succeeding period of more than a thousand years, was felt from the shores of Asia to Rome. Other gods came to share the sacred spot with Apollo. Athena Pronoea (Forethought) had her place. Her sanctuary was on a slope below the temple of Apollo. (The temples in her precinct fell into ruin and the spot became known as the Marmaria, roughly, "the marble quarry," from the many fragments there.) Dionysus, an oracular god who prophesied during the winter, when Apollo was off with the Hyperboreans, was consulted. He was considered a god who died and was reborn annually, and his tomb at Delphi was the scene of rites held by women. Delphi also possessed the "omphalos" (navel), a stone that represented the exact center of the world. The myth was that Zeus sent out two eagles in opposite directions to make a circuit of the universe. They met at Delphi, and established it as the center. Another stone, or possibly it was the same one, was also called "omphalos," and was the stone given by Rhea to Cronus in place of her new-born son Zeus. A sacred city grew up around the oracle and these cult objects. According to tradition the first temple erected on the site was a hut of branches of laurel, a tree sacred to Apollo. This was replaced by a temple made by the bees, of beeswax and feathers, and sent to Delphi by the Hyperboreans. The third temple was of wood, covered with bronze plates and was made, some say, by Hephaestus. Of these three temples no trace has ever been found. The fourth temple was of stone. Trophonius and Agamedes, according to tradition, were the builders.

Delphi was at first under the control of Crissa, in Phocis, whose territory included the port of Cirrha. Pilgrims, making their way to the sanctuary, were subject to all sorts of dues and exactions by the Crissaeans. The priests of Delphi complained to the Amphictyonic Council, a group of representatives from 12 Greek cities (mostly Thessalian and Dorian), that had its seat at Anthela. The members were pledged to aid each other. The Amphictyons acted against Crissa. Solon of Athens and Cleisthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, lent their assistance in the Sacred War (c600–c590 B.C.). Crissa was destroyed, its territory was dedicated to Apollo and henceforth the tilling of the Crissaeon plain was forbidden, and Delphi became autonomous. The management of the sanctuary was left in the hands of the Am-phictyonic Council. The Pythian Games, descended from the old religious drama representing the purification of Apollo (the Stepteria), and with the addition of musical and athletic contests, also came under the supervision of the Council. Thereafter, from 586 B.C., the Games were held every four years. The end of the Sacred War marked the beginning of a period of great prosperity for Delphi. The treasuries of Corinth and Sicyon were dedicated. Cypselus, tyrant of Corinth (c655–625 B.C.), was said to have dedicated the former, and Cleisthenes the latter. These treasuries, the earliest of many, were small temple-like structures erected and dedicated by individual city-states. In them sacred, and often precious, vessels for religious ceremonies were kept. Rich offerings were made to them, and they also served as meeting places for pilgrims and officials from the cities that had dedicated them. The Lydian kings, Gyges (c685–653 B.C.), and Croesus (6th century king who reigned from 560–546 B.C.), made rich gifts to the sanctuary in gratitude for favorable oracles. Amasis II (fl. c569–525 B.C.), of Egypt was also a contributor. In 548 B.C. the temple built by Trophonius and Agamedes was destroyed by fire. The Alcmaeonidae, aristocrats who had been exiled from Athens, raised a great sum to rebuild it. Croesus and Amasis II again made large contributions for this cause. Spintharus of Corinth was the architect. At their own expense, it was said, the Alcmaeonidae had the temple faced with Parian marble instead of the limestone that was called for by the plan. The treasury of the Siphnians, one of the richest of them all, was dedicated c524 B.C. (Large fragments of its pediments and friezes, depicting the Greeks and the Trojans in combat, War of the Giants, the Judgment of Paris, and the exploits of Heracles, are preserved in the museum at Delphi.) The Cnidian raised their Lesche, a kind of club house, in the first half of the 5th century B.C. Its walls were decorated with paintings by the Thasian artist Polygnotus.

Croesus, who had made such rich gifts to Delphi in return for favorable responses, was later one of the most ill-fated victims of its obscure pronouncements. Having actor; up, lūte, pūll; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; q̄ as d or j, s̄ as s or sh, t̄ as t or ch, z̄ as z or zh.

made every provision to secure the most reliable oracle, he sent to Delphi to ask if he should wage war on Cyrus. He learned that if he crossed the Halys River and marched against the Persians, he would destroy a great empire. Greatly encouraged, he attacked Cyrus and destroyed a great empire—his own. When he reproached the priestess, he was told that he had misinterpreted the oracle, which had been duly fulfilled. Croesus humbly acknowledged his error, so it is said. Not all the answers, however, were equivocal. In a later time the question was put: who was the wisest man in the world? The priestess replied with the flat statement that there was no man in the world wiser than Socrates.

When the Persians invaded Europe in 490 B.C., Delphi feared to be destroyed if it resisted, and "medized," that is, it was favorable to the Persians. But the priests were able to gloss over this period of weakness, and the Athenians dedicated the treasury of Athens at Delphi with the spoils taken from the Persians at Marathon. The walls of their treasury were covered with inscriptions, many of which record the gratitude of freed slaves. Among the inscriptions is also a hymn to Apollo bearing the only recorded musical notations ever found in Greece. (The rebuilt treasury of Athens can still be seen at Delphi. The fitting together of its scattered and broken walls was greatly facilitated by matching the inscriptions.) Ten years after Marathon the Persians returned. When Xerxes had taken the pass at Thermopylae, he sent an army into Phocis to plunder the sanctuary of Delphi, of whose treasures, according to Herodotus, he knew more than those in his own palace; he had heard so much about them. The Delphians were stricken with terror and asked the oracle if they should bury the treasures or remove them to another place. The god replied, through his priestess, that he was well able without their help to protect his own. On receiving the response the Delphians concentrated on saving themselves and their goods. They retired, some across the Gulf of Corinth and some to the heights of Parnassus. Only 60 men and a prophet remained in the sanctuary. When the Persians approached, the prophet saw the sacred armor divinely removed from the shrine. The Persians advanced to the shrine of Athena Pronoea. Suddenly there was a crack of thunder. Two immense crags split off from Mount Parnassus and rolled down on the Persians, crushing a great number of them, while from the temple of Athena were heard a war-cry and a shout of victory. The Persians, terrified by the portents, fled in confusion. The Delphians, seeing how the god protected his own, fell on the Persians and slaughtered them wholesale. Those who escaped were pursued into Boeotia by two gigantic armed warriors, heroes who had sacred precincts at Delphi. Herodotus, who tells this tale, saw the huge stones that had crushed the Persians in the precinct of Athena Pronoea. Before this miraculous event, the Athenians had sent envoys to consult the oracle as to their defense against the Persians. The priestess replied:

"Wretches, why sit ye here? Fly, fly to the ends of creation,

Quitting your homes, and the crags which your city crowns with her circlet.

All—all ruined and lost. Since fire, and impetuous Ares, Speeding along in a Syrian chariot, hastes to destroy her."

The envoys refused to return to Athens with such a gloomy reply. They returned to the shrine as suppliants and vowed to die in the sanctuary rather than leave without some more encouraging word. It would be the greatest impiety if any died in the shrine. The priestess grudgingly and obscurely uttered the following:

"Safe shall the wooden wall continue for thee and thy children."

Themistocles interpreted the "wooden wall" to mean the fleet, worked to build it up, and went on to defeat the Persians at Salamis. The temporizing of Delphi was forgotten when the Persians were driven out. Rich offerings of trophies, statues, and tripods were made for the victories of Salamis, Plataea, and Mycale. The offering for Plataea was a golden tripod set upon a pillar of three bronze intertwined serpents. On its base were inscribed the names of the Greek peoples who dedicated it.

Following the Persian War, Delphi became embroiled in the disputes between the various city-states, and lost some of its credit, because it seemed to take sides and because the charge of bribery leveled against it was never satisfactorily cleared. In the Second Sacred War (c448 B.C.), Pericles returned control of Delphi to the Phocians, but it regained its autonomy by the Peace of Nicias (421 B.C.), according to the terms of which the common temples of Greece were to be free to all. As a great sanctuary, it continued to receive gifts and offerings from the rival city-states and from foreign rulers as well. In 373 B.C. the temple was destroyed by an earthquake. Funds were raised by international subscription, and construction of a new temple was begun which was finished c330 B.C. Before its completion, a Third Sacred War broke out (357-346 B.C.) when the Phocians cultivated the sacred plain of Crissa and were punished by the Amphictyonic Council. Philomelus, the Phocian general, pillaged the rich treasures of the sanctuary to build a fortress. Philip of Macedon intervened, crushed the Phocians and imposed a heavy fine on them. Peace was short-lived. The city of Amphissa committed impiety against Delphi (339 B.C.), and brought on the Fourth Sacred War. Philip of Macedon, who had taken the place of the Phocians in the Amphictyonic League, interfered to "restore order." The Athenians and Thebans, fearing his growing power in Greece, resisted him, and he overwhelmingly defeated them at Chaeronea, 338 B.C. In 279 B.C., the Gauls, under Brennus, attacked Delphi and were driven off, so it was said, by the direct intervention of the god, who sent earthquakes, snow, and bitter cold to repulse them. After 189 B.C., Delphi came under the dominion of the Romans. In 91 B.C. the temple was burned by Thracians. In 86 B.C. Sulla pillaged the sanctuary. The story is that the priests, to deter Sulla from his purpose, set a harpist to playing in a concealed place and warned Sulla that the god was playing to forbid him to violate his temple. Sulla turned their remark by saying that the god was playing to show that he welcomed a friend, and proceeded to carry off what he wished. Later, the Emperor Nero carried off over 500 statues from the sacred city, but 3000 or so were still left there. Even so, Delphi retained great wealth. But it had lost its place as the center of the universe, and enjoyed only a short revival as a religious center under Hadrian. In the reigns of Constantine and Theodosius many of its treasures were stolen to adorn other capitals, including the golden tripod of Plataea, which Constantine set up in the city named for him. Theodosius II, a Christian emperor, delivered the final blow to Delphi when he silenced the oracle, destroyed (390 A.D.) the temple, and systematically mutilated the statues and images.

The influence of Delphi was felt throughout the Mediterranean world for a period of centuries. It received pilgrims and envoys from all quarters, and became a great clearing house for receiving and spreading information. No colonizing force set out from Greece before consulting the oracle. Political decisions were based on its responses. It was the arbiter in education, art, and literature, as well as in religion. It was an enlightening and elevating force, emphasizing as it did on many occasions, a rule of law rather than of vengeance, moral purity rather than purifying rites. With the Pythian Games it brought the Greeks together, in athletics, musical contests, and literary competitions, and stressed the tendencies that unified the Greeks rather than those which divided them. In addition, as the recipient of rich gifts from city-states, generals, heroes, kings, victors in athletic contests, grateful individuals, and even beautiful women, Delphi was the art center of Greece. Images and statues by the finest sculptors over the course of centuries adorned the sanctuary and its environs. Among them was the famous bronze Charioteer on view in the museum at Delphi today. The site was occupied by a great temple of Apollo, to which pilgrims ascended by a winding sacred way that was lined with treasuries and votive offerings. All around the temple were other shrines and buildings, as well as uncounted hundreds of statues. In the flanks of the hill that rises sharply behind Apollo's temple was a theater, near the fountain of Cassotis whose waters flowed underground into the shrine and were drunk by the priestesses. Above the theater was a stadium where certain of the contests were held. The stadium, remains of which can still be seen, replaced an earlier one on the plain around Crissa. The sacred monuments and temples were carried off or destroyed, early in the Christian era. Earthquakes and landslides covered the site. A village, Castri, grew up over the buried remains. In 1892, the entire village having been removed to a new site, French excavators began work there. In succeeding years, many remains of the ancient site have been uncovered, including the temple of Apollo, the theater, bases of votive offerings and sites of treasuries, so that today it is possible not only to admire the imposing majesty of the physical scene, but to recreate, with the help of some imagination, the profusion and richness of the site as it existed in an earlier time.

Delphinia (del-fin'i-ä). A festival of Apollo Delphinus (the Dolphin or protector of navigation), of expiatory character, celebrated at Athens and Aegina, and generally among Ionian colonies along the Mediterranean coasts. At Athens it was held at the end of March, toward the close of the period of winter storms at sea, and included a procession in which seven boys and seven maidens bore olive branches, bound with fillets of white wool, to the Delphinian temple near the temple of the Olympian Zeus.

Delphinus (del-fin'i-us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Dolphin." It was attached to the god because as a god of sailors and seaports he often took the form of a dolphin. It was also in the form of a dolphin that he sought his first priests on a Cretan ship, according to some accounts. There was a sanctuary of Apollo Delphinus near the temple of Olympian Zeus at Athens. According to one legend, when the temple was completed except for the roof, Theseus arrived in the city, unknown. Wearing a long tunic, and with his hair neatly braided, he approached the temple of Apollo Delphinus. Laborers working on the roof of the temple observed him and mocked him. They asked what a marriageable virgin was doing walking about by herself. In sudden anger, Theseus unyoked oxen from a nearby cart and hurled them over the top of the temple.

Delphinus (del-fi'nus). In Greek mythology, an agent of Poseidon who followed Amphitrite to the Atlas Mountains, whither she had fled to escape the attentions of Poseidon. He pleaded Poseidon's cause so successfully that Amphitrite yielded and agreed to marry Poseidon. As a reward for his services, Poseidon placed Delphinus among the stars, where he was known in ancient times as the constellation Dolphin.

Delphinus. An ancient constellation, representing a dolphin. It is situated east of Aquila.

Delphus (del'fus). According to some accounts, a son of Poseidon and Melanthe, daughter of Deucalion. Others say he was a son of Celaeno and Apollo. Some say Delphi, Apollo's shrine, was named for him.

Delphyne (del-fi'nē). In Greek mythology, a monstrous earth-born serpent who guarded the oracle at Delphi and, according to some accounts, gave the site his name. Apollo slew Delphyne at Delphi, and made the oracle his own from that time forth. The serpent is also known as Python.

Delphyne. In Greek mythology, a fabulous creature, half maiden and half beast, that guarded Zeus when Typhon imprisoned him in a cave in Cilicia. The sinews of Zeus' hands and feet had been severed by Typhon and given to Delphyne to guard. Hermes and Pan went to the cave and stole the sinews and restored them to the body of Zeus, after which Zeus escaped and returned to Olympus.

Demades (dem'a-dēz). Athenian orator, born c350 B.C.; died 319 B.C. By his eloquence and complete lack of scruples he rose to a position of prominence in Athens. He was a member of the peace party and opposed Demosthenes, who urged war on Philip of Macedon. Demosthenes' policy prevailed. At the battle of Chaeronea (338 B.C.) Philip inflicted a disastrous defeat on the Greeks. Demades was one of 2000 captives taken. According to one story Philip celebrated his victory by drinking much wine, and after a drunken carousal went to the place where the prisoners were under guard. He mocked them and sneered at the great Demosthenes, who had fled. Demades rebuked him, saying, "O King, fortune has given you the role of Agamemnon, and you play the part of Thersites." Philip was immediately sobered by the rebuke, freed Demades, and sent him as one of the envoys to make peace with Athens, the terms of which were remarkably lenient in comparison with his treatment of Thebes at the same time. After the death of Philip (336 B.C.) Thebes revolted against his successor, Alexander the Great. Athens prepared to help Thebes, but Alexander swooped down from the north, completely defeated Thebes, and destroyed the city. Alexander demanded the surrender of the leaders of the war party at Athens, including Demosthenes. Demades, who had proposed that an embassy from Athens be sent to congratulate Alexander on his victory at Thebes, was sent as a peacemaker from Athens, and persuaded Alexander to let Athens deal with the offenders. From this time on Demades supported Phocion (q.v.), the Athenian general who played a large part in guiding Athens away from her rash desire to wage war on Macedonia. Along with Phocion, and even Demosthenes, he persuaded the Athenians not to help the Spartan king Agis in a war against Macedonia (331 B.C.), and he continued to support the peace policy of Phocion in the 12 years between the fall of Thebes (335 B.C.) and the death of Alexander (323 B.C.). At the same time that he supported the Macedonian party, he accepted bribes from their opponents, was discovered, and was several times fined. Nevertheless, he maintained his position. When news of Alexander's death reached Athens, men could scarcely believe it. Demades declared, "If he were indeed dead, the whole world would have been filled with the stench of his corpse." Nevertheless, he was indeed dead. Athens rose again in rebellion, spurred on by Demosthenes, and was defeated at Crannon, 322 B.C., by the Macedonians under Antipater. Again Demades acted as a peace envoy, but this time the terms were not so lenient, for Antipater did not share the admiration and respect for Athenian culture held by Philip and Alexander. From this time Demades conducted affairs at Athens so as to please Antipater, and excused his servile conduct on the ground that he was "in command of a shipwrecked state." According to Plutarch, his life and administration were so outrageous that Antipater said of him, when he was an old man, that he was like a victim when the sacrifice was over:

nothing left but tongue and guts. Antipater also said he had two friends at Athens: Phocion, whom he could not persuade to take anything, and Demades, to whom he could never give enough. After the death of Antipater (319 B.C.) Demades went to Cassander, his son, to plead for relief from the payment Athens had agreed to make after the battle of Crannon. Cassander had found a letter written by Demades to Perdiccas, which was a betrayal of Antipater. He had Demades slain for his ingratitude and his treachery (319 B.C.).

Demaratus (dem-a-rā'tus). A son of Ariston and co-king of Sparta with Cleomenes; fl. c.510-480 B.C., and shared the throne with Cleomenes from 510-491 B.C. He shared with Cleomenes the command of the army sent in 510 B.C. to assist the Athenians in expelling Hippias. In 506 B.C. when Cleomenes sought to restore Hippias, Demaratus withdrew at the moment when battle was to be joined. Demaratus later brought charges against Cleomenes for a war he was waging against the Aeginetans, and when he returned from the war, Cleomenes sought to drive Demaratus from his office as king and adopted the following means to do so: He claimed that Demaratus was not the true son of Ariston because when he was born to the third wife of Ariston, the latter, on reckoning the time he had been married, exclaimed an oath that this could not be his son. Ariston later became convinced that Demaratus was truly the son he had prayed for and forgot all about the matter. But Cleomenes revived the early incident. The oracle at Delphi was consulted. To make sure that a favorable answer was given, Cleomenes sent bribes to the oracle, which thereupon declared Demaratus was not the son of Ariston and therefore not rightfully a king of Sparta. Demaratus, on losing the throne (491 B.C.), sacrificed an ox to Zeus and questioned his mother. He begged her to tell him the truth. If he were not the son of Ariston but the offspring of a groom, as some claimed, he would forgive her as such an eventuality might come to anyone, but he wanted to know the truth of his origin. His mother told him that an apparition had come to her in the appearance of Ariston, embraced her, and placed garlands on her head. The same night Ariston came, again as she thought, and asked where the garlands had come from. To her reply that he himself had placed them there, he made strong denials. The conclusion, on consultation of the priests, was that he who placed the garlands on her head and embraced her was the spirit of a hero whose shrine was nearby. His mother ended her story by telling Demaratus that he was either the son of that hero or of Ariston; which, she did not know. Demaratus now fled from Sparta, pursued by the Spartans, and sought asylum with King Darius in Susa. The bribery of the oracle was later disclosed and the priestess was removed, and when Cleomenes' part became known, he was forced to flee. Demaratus, meanwhile, was received as a guest in King Darius' court, and afterward became the bond-friend of his son and successor Xerxes. He accompanied Xerxes when the latter invaded Greece. After the Persians had crossed into Europe, Xerxes called Demaratus and asked him whether he thought the Greeks would resist the onslaught of his mighty army. Demaratus replied that even if all the other Greeks submitted, the Spartans would not submit to the slavery Xerxes proposed to subject them to; and if there were only 1000 Spartans, they would resist, no matter what the size of the Persian host. Xerxes scoffed at what he considered a ridiculous estimate of the bravery of the Spartans. Demaratus insisted. He said the Spartans, as free men who submitted voluntarily to the discipline of law, were the bravest men in the world, for the law forbade them to flee in battle, but commanded them to stand firm and conquer or die. Xerxes laughed. Just before the battle of Thermopylae, when Xerxes was opposed by 1000 Greeks, Spartans and Thespians, he again questioned Demaratus, and received the reply that if he could subdue the Spartans at Thermopylae and those in Lacedaemonia, he would have all Greece at his feet. After the battle of Thermopylae Xerxes was compelled to admit that Demaratus had not lied about the bravery of the Spartans. He asked his advice how to conquer those still in Lacedaemonia. Demaratus advised him to attack them directly by sea. Xerxes ignored his advice, saying at the same time that he knew Demaratus meant it for his good but in this instance he was mistaken. But some say that Demaratus had sent a message warning the Spartans of what the Persians intended before they ever left Susa.

Demeter (dē-mē'tēr). One of the great Olympian deities; the golden-haired giver of the fruits and flowers of the earth, protectress of social order and of marriage, she was "Mother Earth," "the Good Goddess," and the great benefactress of mankind. The gentle goddess of the fertility of the earth and of man was called "the greatest help and cause of joy to the undying gods and mortal men." In the Greek theogony she is one of the most important and revered of the gods, and her mysteries are among the holiest of the Greek rites.

Demeter was the second child of Cronus and Rhea, and like the first, Hestia, was swallowed by Cronus as soon as she was born. Zeus, with the aid of Metis, caused Cronus to disgorge her, along with his sisters and brothers. In her youth, some say, Demeter, during the wedding festivities of Cadmus and Harmonia, lay with Iasion, son of Electra and Zeus, in a thrice-plowed field and bore Plutus (Wealth) to him. Some say the thrice-plowed field where Iasion loved Demeter was a fertile district in Crete. And some say Zeus slew Iasion with a thunderbolt because he embraced the goddess. But others say Iasion was slain by his brother Dardanus. By her brother Zeus, Demeter was the mother of Iacchus and Core (The Maid), who is widely known as Persephone, and some say that it was she who bore Dionysus to Zeus. The rape of Persephone by Hades is the heart of the legend and worship of Demeter, symbolizing as it does the death and rebirth, or disappearance and reappearance, of the nourishing produce of the earth.

According to the myth, Hades saw Persephone and desired her. (Some say it was Aphrodite, wishing to extend her sway over Tartarus as well as over Earth and Sea, who caused her son Erös to shoot his arrows into the heart of Hades and awaken love for Persephone in him.) With the connivance of Zeus, who did not like to thwart his brother, Hades planned to seize Persephone. One day as she was gathering flowers with her maidens, Persephone wandered away from them, enticed by a strange and beautiful flower, which some say was a kind of narcissus. As she bent to pluck the flower the earth parted; a great chariot drawn by black horses thundered forth, swept down on Persephone, and the black-clad charioteer swept her into his car. She cried out for help but her companions neither heard her nor saw the stranger who carried her off, for the chariot flew over the meadow and disappeared in a chasm that opened in the earth. The Sicilians say that the abduction took place near Enna, in Sicily. Others claim it was at Colonus in Attica, or at Hermion in Argolis, or at Pisa, Lerna, Pheneüs, Nysa, or Crete, but the priests of Demeter say it was at Eleusis. Demeter was heartbroken when she learned of the disappearance of her daughter. For nine days she searched frantically for her, carrying blazing torches through the night and stopping neither to eat nor to bathe. Of all those she questioned, gods and men, none would tell her the truth. On the ninth day she met Hecate, who said she had heard Persephone's cries, but when she rushed up to assist her, she had disappeared without a trace. Together, Demeter and Hecate went in search of Helius and questioned him on whether in his passage through the skies he had seen anything. Helius told Demeter that Hades had carried off Persephone with the consent of Zeus, and he advised Demeter not to grieve, for the ruler of Tartarus was not an unworthy son-in-law. But some say that Demeter, as she wandered about looking for Persephone, learned from the people of Hermion that it was Hades who had carried off her child, and the chasm through which he disappeared into the earth in their land was the same one by which Heracles dragged Cerberus to the upper air from Tartarus. And some say that the nymph Cyane, in Sicily, saw Hades as he prepared to steal Persephone, and that she attempted, without success, to stop him. Afterward, in grief, Cyane was transformed into a fountain, so that when Demeter came her way, she was unable to tell the goddess what had happened, but on the waters of her fountain she caused Persephone's girdle, dropped when she was caught up into Hades'

chariot, to float. Demeter saw the girdle and knew that Persephone had passed that way. In any event, when Demeter learned that it was by the consent of the gods that Hades had abducted Persephone, she left Olympus and wandered all over the face of the earth to search for her. As she roamed through Arcadia, Poseidon saw her and pursued her. Demeter, weary and grief-stricken, wished to elude Poseidon and his amorous intentions. She transformed herself into a mare and grazed with the mares of Oncus. But Poseidon would not be denied. He changed himself into a stallion and ravished her. From this union was born the marvelous horse, Arion, and a girl child whose name it was unlawful to utter, but some say this child's name was Despoena. Demeter was so infuriated by the outrage of Poseidon that the people of the region gave her the name Erinnys (Fury), but afterward her rage subsided, and she cleansed herself by bathing in the Ladon River, whence her epithet Lusia (Bather). In her temple at Thelpusa, in Arcadia, were two images, one for each of these names. The images had face, hands, and feet of marble, but the body was of wood. Also in Arcadia, Demeter went to the city of Pheneüs and was received kindly by the inhabitants. To reward them she gave them every kind of pulse except the bean, which was considered to be impure by the Pheneatians. Wherever she was treated kindly in her wanderings, Demeter rewarded the people, as she gave the fig tree to Phytalus, who welcomed her when she stopped beside the Cephissus River on the Isthmus. The Argives say that when she came to Argos, Pelasgus received her, and that one Chrysanthis, knowing of the rape of Persephone, told it to her. Disguised as a humble old woman she came to Eleusis. Some say it was in the reign of King Pandion of Athens that she came to Eleusis; others say it was when Erechtheus, son of Pandion, was king that wheat was first sown by Triptolemus, and that the mysteries of Demeter were first celebrated by Eumolpus. On the road from Megara to Eleusis she sat down on a rock, called Laughless because of her sorrow when she rested on it. Nearby was a well where the inhabitants came to draw water; some name this well Anthium (Flowery) and some name it Callichorum (Well of Fair Dances). While the goddess rested here the four daughters of Celeus came to fetch water. They saw the sad old woman and spoke kindly to her, and asked her what fortune had brought her to their land. Demeter told them she had escaped from pirates who had carried her away from her home in Crete and intended to sell her as a slave, and that she had made her way alone to this place seeking refuge. She asked the maidens if they knew a house where she might be welcome as a nurse or helper. The daughters of Celeus said there were many who would be glad to welcome her, but that they would like best to have her come to their father's house, and asked her to wait while they went and consulted with their mother. They soon returned and invited Demeter to go home with them. When she entered the doorway of Celeus' house, a heavenly radiance glowed about her. Metanira, wife of Celeus, was awed by the sight, and asked her to be seated, but Demeter would take only the lowliest stool, denying herself all comforts in her grief. The family of Celeus welcomed her warmly, but she seemed so sad that Iambe, the lame daughter of Celeus, made bawdy jokes and caused her to smile, and Baubo, nurse of the new-born son of the house, Demophoön, gave her barley water flavored with mint, and to make her laugh, Baubo groaned as if in labor, and suddenly produced Demeter's own son Iacchus from beneath her skirt. The child leaped into his mother's arms and kissed her. Because of the kindly efforts of these two to cheer Demeter in her grief, it became the custom to make broad jests at Demeter's feast of the Thesmophoria, and the cup of mint-flavored barley water was the cup offered to worshipers at the great mysteries of Eleusis. As Demeter drank, Abas, an older son of Celeus, mocked her because she drank so thirstily. Some say she threw the liquid in his face, in her anger, and transformed him into a spotted lizard, and some say that it was by a look alone that he was transformed into an animal that needs very little water and slithered away before his stricken mother's eyes. Demeter became the nurse of Demophoön, and because of the kindness of his parents, she decided to make the child immortal. Under her care he flourished like a god. By day she fed him ambrosia, and each night she plunged him into the fire to burn away his mortal parts. One night as she was engaged in this ritual, she was surprised by his mother, who cried out in fear and broke the spell. Some say Demeter dropped the child, revealed herself in all the glory of her godhead, and told Metanira and her astonished household who she was. Now, she said, she could not make Demophoön immortal, but because he had been nursed by a goddess, great honor would come to him. Others say that when she dropped the child, he was consumed in the fire, and to make up for the loss of this son, Demeter promised to make his brother Triptolemus immortal. Some say she chose to confer immortality on Triptolemus because he had recognized her as a goddess, and had told her that some days before his brothers—Eumolpus and Eubuleus—had seen the earth open, and into it a chariot bearing a black-

clad figure clasping a maiden had disappeared. This had happened as they were tending their father's swine and cattle in the fields, and Eumolpus had made a song about the event. It is because of this that the priests of Demeter say the rape of Persephone took place at Eleusis. Demeter commanded Celeus to raise a temple to her at Eleusis, and instructed him and Eumolpus, as well as Triptolemus, in her mysteries. (Later, when Heracles came to Eleusis, she established the Lesser Mysteries in his honor.) Then she sat in her temple and mourned her lost daughter. At her command the earth became barren; men plowed, but as fast as the plants sprang from the soil they withered. Some say this continued for a year, and then Zeus sent Iris to persuade her to return to Olympus, and to restore fertility to the earth, for he did not wish mankind to die, nor to lose the rich sacrifices and gifts men made to the gods of Olympus. But Demeter ignored his messenger because he had turned his head while Hades seized Persephone; and when the gods themselves, bearing gifts, came and tried to persuade her she still refused to return to Olympus, and declared the earth must remain barren until Persephone was restored to her. At last Zeus sent Hermes to Hades with an order to him to restore Persephone to her mother; and from Hades Hermes went to Demeter to inform her that Persephone would be returned on condition that she had not eaten anything while she was in Tartarus. When Hades received his message, he had no choice but to let Persephone go, but he spoke regretfully to her, and reminded her that it was no small thing to be his wife and a queen in Tartarus. Hermes came to fetch her; as she set out Ascalaphus, a gardener in Tartarus, said that he had seen her eat some seeds of a pomegranate, and therefore, as she had eaten of the food of the dead, she must return to the world of the dead. Demeter was overjoyed when Persephone returned to her at Eleusis, but was immediately downcast when she learned of the pomegranate seeds, and hurled a great stone on Ascalaphus for his tale-bearing. She refused to restore fruitfulness to the earth if Persephone was compelled to return to the Underworld. In the end a compromise was worked out by Rhea; Persephone, having eaten some of the food of the dead in the form of the pomegranate seeds (some say she ate seven), must spend one third of the year in the kingdom of the dead; the rest of the time she could spend with her mother. On this basis, with Hecate watching to see that the agreement was faithfully carried out, the matter was settled, and Demeter returned to her home among the gods. But before she left Eleusis she gave Triptolemus the gift of wheat and a wooden plow, and taught him the arts of sowing and threshing on the Rharian Plain in a place that came to be known as the "Threshing Floor," and which annually ever after was plowed in commemoration of this event. Then, in a car drawn by winged dragons, she sent him all over the earth to teach men how to cultivate crops. The time that Persephone spends with her mother represents the time of the sowing, growing, and harvesting of crops; the time when she must reign as a queen in the kingdom of the dead is the period of barren and blasted fields. The great Eleusinian Mysteries, among the holiest rites celebrated by the Greeks, were established at Eleusis by Demeter herself. When Athens conquered Eleusis, the Athenians won the right to share in them, and Eleusinia were also established in the other Greek states, but those at Eleusis were always the most sacred. The mysteries are thought to have been a reënactment of the suffering and grief of Demeter over the loss of her daughter, and of her joy when Persephone was restored. By extension, the mysteries and their symbolism were an expression of the idea of the immortality of the soul. But the rites of the mysteries were a well-kept secret; only the initiated knew them and they never betrayed the secret.

Demeter is a kind and gentle goddess, the giver of good to man. She takes no part in war and strife, and seldom is aroused to wrath. Erysichthon, however, did feel her just anger. He cut down a tree, the home of a nymph, in her sacred grove. Demeter appeared to him, disguised as her own priestess, and remonstrated with him when she heard the cries of the nymph, but Erysichthon defied her and proceeded to cut down her sacred trees. To punish him, Demeter sent insatiable hunger to destroy him.

Eleusis and Athens were the most ancient seats of the worship of Demeter, but she was worshiped throughout Greece; and Sicily, noted for its fertility, was said to be one of her favorite haunts. Among her many names, Demeter was called Black Demeter, for the time, during the loss of Persephone, when she clothed herself in black and went into seclusion in a cave in Phigalia in Arcadia. The Phigalians say that after Poseidon, in the form of a stallion, ravished Demeter, disguised as a mare, she clothed herself in black and hid in this cave. The Phigalians later set up an image in the cave; it was a figure of a woman seated on a rock, but instead of a woman's head it had a horse's head, out of which grew serpents and other beasts. In one of her hands the image held a dolphin, in the other, a dove. This was the image called "Mare-headed Demeter." She was known as "Cabirea" because she instructed the Cabiri of Thebes in her rites and entrusted a sacred thing into their keeping. Because of her connection with the kingdom of the dead through the annual loss of Persephone she was called Chthonia (Of the Lower World), and a festival of the same name was held annually in her honor. She was widely known as Eleusinian Demeter and had many sanctuaries in this name. As Thesmophorus (Law-giver), she was worshiped at the great festival of the Thesmophoria, and had many sanctuaries. She was also called Lernaia (Of Lerna) because, some say, Hades disappeared into the earth with Persephone at Lerna; Carpophorus (Fruit-bearer); Malophorus (Sheep-bearer or Apple-bearer); Mycalessia (Of Mycalessus), after the city in Boeotia where her sanctuary was said to be opened each morning and closed each night by Heracles the Dactyl; Mysia, from Mysius, an Argive who entertained her; Panachaea (All Achaea) from her sanctuary in Aegium, in Achaea; Pelasgis, because Pelasgus founded a sanctuary for her in Argos; Stiria or Stiritis (Of Stiris) from her sanctuary at that place in Phocis; Thermasia (Warmth); Thesmia (Law-goddess); Chloë (Green); and Anesidora (Sender-up of Gifts).

The festivals of Demeter, celebrated in conjunction with rites for her daughter Persephone, were the Great Eleusinian Mysteries and the Thesmophoria. Fruit, honey, the cow and the sow were offered to her. Her attributes were the poppy, a flower that grows with the wheat and is also a symbol of sleep and death, and stalks of wheat. In art she was sometimes also depicted with a basket of fruit and a piglet, or with a torch or a serpent. The Romans of the end of the Republic and of the empire assimilated to the Greek conception of Demeter the primitive Italic chthonian divinity Ceres.

Demeter of Cnidus (nī'dus). Greek statue (4th century B.C.) of the school of Scopas, now in the British Museum at London. The goddess is represented, fully draped and seated, as mourning for her daughter, and conveys a feeling of profound grief.

Demetrius I (dē-mē'tri-us). [Surnamed Poliorcetes, meaning "Taker of Cities" or "Besieger."] King of Macedonia (294–288 B.C.); born 336 B.C.; died at Apamea, in ancient Syria, 283 B.C. He was a son of Antigonos I, who was called Antigonos Cyclops. He liberated Athens and Megara in 307 B.C., defeated Ptolemy I in 306, unsuccessfully besieged Rhodes (305–304), and was defeated at Ipsus in 301 B.C. He was chosen king by the army in 294 B.C., gained control (293–289 B.C.) of Greece, and invaded Asia, which Antigonos had held, with an inferior force in 287 B.C. He surrendered to Seleucus I in 285 B.C. and drank himself to death.

Demetrius II. King of Macedonia; born c276 B.C.; died 229 B.C. He was a son of Antigonos II Gonatus, whom he succeeded c239 B.C. During his reign the Macedonians fought to preserve their territory; the Demetrian War, so called, was fought against the Aetolian League and the Achaeans, but Demetrius was defeated in the north. Philip V of Macedon was his son by his second wife Phthia (or Chryseis).

Demetrius I (of Syria). [Surnamed Soter, meaning "Savior."] King of Syria from 162 B.C.; born 187 B.C.; killed 150 B.C. He was a grandson of Antiochus the Great. After living as a captive in Rome while his uncle, Antiochus IV, and his cousin, Antiochus V, sat on the throne, he escaped (162 B.C.), killed his cousin, and became king himself. He suppressed the revolt of Timarchus in Babylon and put down the Maccabee uprising in Palestine. But Alexander Balas, a pretender, claimed the throne, and, with the help of the Maccabees, Egyptians, and others, overthrew Demetrius.

Demetrius II (of Syria). [Surnamed Nicator.] King of Syria (145–141 and 129–126 B.C.); son of Demetrius I. He was born c161 B.C.; died near Tyre, 126 B.C. He overthrew Alexander Balas, the usurper, with the aid of Ptolemy VI (Ptolemy Philometor), obtaining both the throne and Ptolemy's daughter, Cleopatra Thea, wife of Alexander Balas. He defeated the attempt (145–142 B.C.) to place Antiochus VI, son of Alexander Balas, on the throne. In 141 B.C. he was captured by the Parthians and remained their prisoner for about ten years, his brother Antiochus VII occupying the throne in his absence and marrying Cleopatra, Demetrius' wife. Demetrius regained the throne in 129 B.C. but was soon after killed in a civil war. He was succeeded by his sons Seleucus V and Antiochus VIII.

Demetrius III (of Syria). [Surnamed Euergetes and Philometor.] King of Syria 94–88 B.C.; son of Antiochus VIII Grypus. He struggled for the throne with his cousin Antiochus X and his brother Philip; he was defeated, captured, and held prisoner until his death by the Parthians.

Demetrius Phalereus (fa-lē'rös, fa-lir'ē-us). Athenian statesman and orator; born at Phalerum, in Attica, 345 B.C.; died in Upper Egypt, 283 B.C. He entered public life c325 B.C. as a supporter of Phocion, and in 317 B.C. was placed by Phocion's successor, Cassander, at the head of the administration of Athens. Expelled from Athens in 307 B.C. by Demetrius I of Macedonia (Demetrius Poliorcetes), he retired to the court of Ptolemy Lagus at Alexandria, where he devoted himself wholly to literary pursuits. He was exiled by Ptolemy's successor to Upper Egypt, where he is said to have died of the bite of a snake.

Demiphon (dem'i-fon). According to legend, a king whose land was smitten by a pestilence. He was commanded by an oracle to sacrifice one noble maiden each year and the pestilence would be lifted. Annually thereafter one noble maiden's name was drawn by lot and she was sacrificed. At last one Mastusius, whose daughter was sacrificed, learned that the names of Demiphon's own daughters were never placed among the lots to be drawn. He invited Demiphon and his daughters to a banquet and had the daughters murdered. He then served Demiphon with a cup containing their blood. When Demiphon discovered the horrible deed, he caused Mastusius and the cup to be hurled into the sea.

Democedes (dem-ō-sē'dēz). A native of Croton, in Magna Graecia in Italy (now Crotona in Calabria), who flourished in the second half of the 6th century B.C. He was the most skilled physician of his day. He left his home in Croton to escape his father's harshness and went to Aegina. There he soon became the most skilled physician of the area. In a few years his reputation was so great that Polycrates of Samos heard of him and hired him away from Aegina. He went to Samos and became a friend of Polycrates. When Polycrates went to Oroetes, governor of Sardis, Democedes accompanied him, although he had tried to persuade Polycrates not to go. Polycrates was treacherously and horribly slain by Oroetes and his followers, among them Democedes, were enslaved. Darius, king of Persia, having injured his foot, suffered grievously, for the Egyptian physicians who treated him were clumsy and only aggravated the injury. One who had heard of Democedes recommended him to the king. Darius sent for him. He was found among the slaves of Oroetes, who had only recently been slain at the command of Darius, and was brought into the presence of the king, clothed in rags and still shackled in fetters. Darius asked him if he understood medicine. Democedes answered that he did not, for he feared if Darius found him to be a skillful practitioner he would never be allowed to depart for his home, which it was his ardent wish to do. Darius suspected him of deceit and ordered him to be scourged, whereupon Democedes confessed that he had some slight knowledge of medicine and agreed to treat the king's injured ankle. In a few days he had reduced the swelling and cured the injury so that Darius, who had feared to lose the use of his foot altogether, was completely restored. He presented Democedes with two sets of fetters wrought of pure gold. Democedes reproached him with doubling his sufferings because he had restored him to health. Darius was pleased with the remark and made him a present of much gold. From that time Democedes was treated royally by Darius and wanted for nothing except the one thing his heart most desired: liberty to return to his native land. Atossa, the wife of Darius, now approached him to cure an abscess on her breast. He promised to cure it if she would give him her oath that once it was healed she would grant whatever he requested of her, assuring her he would make no dishonorable demands. She agreed and after a few days he cured the abscess. His request was that she should secure his return to his homeland. Atossa did not directly ask Darius for the release of Democedes. Instead she inspired him with the idea of conquest and suggested that she would like to have some Greek serving women and advised him to consider the conquest of Greece. She proposed to Darius that he send Democedes, as the man who knew the most about Greece, to act as a guide for spies. Darius acted on her suggestion. He told Democedes he wished him to go with 15 Persians, and spy out the land for him. He suggested to Democedes that he take all his riches with him as gifts to his parents, and even offered to fit out a merchant ship and load it with gifts for the relatives of Democedes. Herodotus, who tells this story, feels sure that Darius had no ulterior motive in making these generous offerings, but Democedes feared that if he accepted and removed his treasure from Persia, Darius might suspect that he did not mean to return. Therefore he gratefully declined the king's offer to take his treasures with him. He departed in a ship with the Persian spies. They sailed along the shores of Greece, noting all that they saw, and went to Tarentum in Magna Graecia. There the ruler, out of friendship for Democedes, took the rudder off the ship and detained the Persians as spies. Democedes escaped to Croton. The Persians, released from Tarentum, pursued him but the people of Croton refused to give him up, and the Persians sailed away. According to Herodotus, who gives this story as one of the opening chapters of the impending Persian Wars, these were the first Persians to come from Asia into Greek lands, and their purpose was to spy out the land for the purpose of invasion. Demochares (dē-mok'ā-rēz). Athenian orator; fl. 322–280 B.C. He was a nephew of Demosthenes. He came forward in 322 B.C. as an orator of the anti-Macedonian party, and after the restoration of democracy by Demetrius I of Macedonia (Demetrius Poliorcetes) in 307 B.C. became the leader of the popular party. He was several times expelled by the anti-democratic party, returning the last time in 287 or 286. He was sent as ambassador to Lysimachus c282, and disappears from view in 280 B.C.

Democoön (dē-mok'ō-on). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a bastard son of Priam, king of Troy. In the Trojan war he was slain by Odysseus to avenge the slaying of Odysseus' "valiant companion," Leucus.

Democritus (dē-mok'ri-tus). [Called the Abderite, and the Laughing Philosopher.] Greek philosopher, born at Abdera, in Thrace, c460 B.C.; died c370 B.C. He inherited an ample fortune, which enabled him to visit the chief countries of Asia and Africa in pursuit of knowledge, and through his studies and his travels became, according to some, the most learned of the Greeks before Aristotle. He adopted and expanded the atomistic theory of Leucippus, applying it even to the soul, which he considered to be compounded of smooth atoms, with the qualities of fire, that are constantly in motion and permeate the entire body. The soul he considered to be a manifestation of the real existence of the body and perishes with the body. He left a number of works, written in a lively manner, on ethics, physics, astronomy, mathematics, art, and literature, fragments only of which are extant. He is said to have been of a cheerful disposition, which prompted him to laugh at the follies of men (hence the epithet "the Laughing Philosopher"). According to tradition he put out his eyes in order to be less disturbed by outward things in his philosophical speculations. He distinguished between the things belonging to a substance by convention (heat, hardness) and in reality (atoms). His mechanistic philosophy extended to the gods, mortal to Democritus, though composed of finer atomic stuff than man was. His ethical system was based on pleasure, tempered by self-control, as an end, and he believed man could secure happiness by doing good for its own sake, not through fear or the promise of a reward.

Demodocus (dē-mod'ō-kus.) In the Odyssey, a blind minstrel of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians. It was said of him that the gods took away his sight but gave him in its place the great gift of song. During the stay of Odysseus at the court of Alcinous he delighted the guests by recounting the feats of the Greeks at Troy, but as he sang of the quarrel between Odysseus and Achilles, Odysseus, whose true identity was unknown to Alcinous, wept. At the request of Odysseus Demodocus sang of the Wooden Horse, and ended with singing of the amours of Aphrodite and Ares.

Demodocus. Greek epigrammatist of Lerus, active c537 B.C. Writer of witty maxims.

Demonassa (dē-mon-as'ā). In Greek tradition, a daughter of Amphiaraus and Eriphyle, and the wife of Thersander. She was the mother of Tisamenus.

Demonice (dē-mon'i-sē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Agenor and Epicaste, descendants of Endymion. By Ares she was the mother of Evenus, Molus, Pylus, and Thes-tius.

Demophon (dē'mō-fon). In Greek mythology, a son of Theseus. Some say his mother was Phaedra; others say his mother was the Amazon Antiope. He and his brother Acamas accompanied the Greeks to Troy. According to some accounts, Demophon was one of the envoys who went with Diomedes to the court of Priam at the beginning of the war to seek a peaceful restoration of Helen. The mission failed, but in the course of it Laodice, daughter of Priam, fell in love with Demophon and later bore him a son, Munitus. (Others say the father of Munitus was Acamas.) In the fierce fighting before Troy in the last year of the war Demophon fought valiantly. When Troy fell, he was reunited with his grandmother, Aethra, who had been carried to Troy with Helen. He demanded his grandmother as his part in the spoils of war, and with her and his son set out for Greece. On the way he stopped in King Sithon's kingdom in Thrace. Phyllis, daughter of the king, fell in love with him and he promised to marry her. Before he did so however, he returned to Athens and regained the throne from Menestheus. When he did not return to Thrace on the appointed day, Phyllis hanged herself and was transformed into an almond tree. Demophon, returning too late, embraced the tree and instantly buds and leaves were put forth from it. (For another version of this story, see Phyllis.) In Athens again, Diomedes was blown ashore on the coasts of Attica by storms. He did not recognize the land and began ravaging the countryside. Demophon set out to repel the invading host, unaware of their identity. He took the Palladium of Troy from them, and killed an Athenian in the process, for which he was later tried in Athens on a charge of murder. Some say it was Demophon who helped the sons of Heracles in their struggles against Eurystheus, and who gave them land in Attica. And some say that when Orestes, pursued by the Furies, arrived in Attica Demophon received him kindly, but extended by one day the festival that was then in progress, fearing that Orestes in his guilt had polluted the first day of holy rites. In the paintings at Delphi Demophon was shown with Helen and Aethra, planning the rescue of his grandmother Aethra.

Demophoön (dē-mof'ō-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Celeus of Eleusis and Metanira. He was nursed by Demeter when she sought refuge in Celeus' house in her search for Persephone. The goddess fed him on nectar and ambrosia and each night she placed him in fiery embers to burn away his mortal parts and give him eternal youth. Metanira, unaware of the goddess' true identity, observed this ritual one night and screamed in alarm. Demeter dropped Demophoön and the spell which would have freed him from old age and death was broken.

Demosthenes (dē-mos'thē-nēz). Athenian general in the Peloponnesian War. He died at Syracuse, 413 B.C. He led an expedition (426 B.C.) against the Aetolians which ended in failure. He did not dare return to Athens with the news that he had lost 120 Athenian hoplites to the Aetolian javelins. Instead he went to Naupactus, where he drove off an attack by the Spartans, and followed this up by defeating the Ambracians, Spartan allies. In 425 B.C., sailing to the relief of the people of Corcyra, Demosthenes put in at Pylus, on the western coast of the Peloponnesus, and fortified it, in defiance of the jeers of his fellow commanders who thought it a forsaken, useless spot. He remained at Pylus with five of his ships when the rest of the fleet sailed on. The Spartans hurried to Pylus to destroy a fortress that the enemy had raised on their own soil. For a time they blockaded the Athenians under Demosthenes at Pylus. Then they occupied the island of Sphacteria in the mouth of the bay, but the Athenians destroyed the ships by which the Spartans had landed and in turn blockaded them on the island. The siege went on longer than was expected and the Athenians at home became impatient. They sent Cleon, who had boasted that he would take the Spartans alive or kill them on the spot, with enlarged forces to end the siege. He arrived at Pylus and with Demosthenes, who had worked out a plan of attack, as his co-commander, did succeed in bringing about the surrender of the Spartans on Sphacteria. Cleon claimed the credit for this great victory, glorious not for the importance of the place but because of the unheard-of exploit of taking Spartans alive. Such was their reputation that they were expected to fight to the death in any encounter, and "come home either with their shields or on them." Demosthenes had made the disposition by which the surrender of the Spartans was accomplished. Later he commanded under Nicias in the unsuccessful expedition against Syracuse in 413 B.C. Having been captured in the retreat, he was put to death by order of the Syracusan assembly.

Demosthenes. Greatest of Greek orators. He was born at Paeania, in Attica, 384 B.C., and died on the island of Calauria, in the Saronic Gulf, 322 B.C. When he was seven years old, his father died and the guardians entrusted with his property made off with it. When Demosthenes, a weakly child reared by his mother, grew up, he brought an action against the guardians and, though they were prominent and attempted to frighten him, he won the case. Although most of his father's property had been lost, with the damages he won he fitted out a trireme and presented it to the Athenian fleet. He is said to have been the pupil of the orator Isaeus, and entered public life as a speaker in the popular assembly in 355 B.C. In that same year he delivered his speech Against Leptines, in which he favored the continuance of public grants of immunity from taxation which were awarded from time to time to those who had rendered outstanding service to the state. In 351 B.C. he delivered the first of a splendid series of orations directed against the encroachment of Philip II of Macedon, three of which are specifically denominated Philippics. In 346 B.C. he served as a member of the embassy which concluded with Philip the so-called peace of Philocrates. In the ten-member peace commission Demosthenes alone was not satisfied with the peace because of certain ambiguous clauses, and in the end refused the rich presents Philip offered the negotiators as was the custom, refused to be associated with them in the peace, and when he reached Athens proposed that the crown usually awarded to ambassadors be withheld from them all, including himself. As Philip immediately after broke this treaty, Demosthenes came forward as the leader of the patriotic party, in opposition to the Macedonian party which was headed by Aeschines. In the years immediately following, the ambassadors who had arranged the peace were violently attacked and some left Athens. Demosthenes came out against Aeschines in a speech On the Embassy (344 B.C.), but failed to convict him. In 340 B.C. he caused a fleet to be sent to the relief of Byzantium, which was besieged by Philip. On the outbreak of the Amphictyonic War, he persuaded the Athenians to form an alliance with Thebes against Philip, who defeated the allies at Chaeronea in 338 B.C., and usurped the hegemony of Greece. The Macedonian party in Athens attacked Demosthenes, who called unceasingly for the overthrow of Philip, but the people were loyal to Demosthenes, his accusers failed to convict him, and he was chosen to pronounce the funeral oration for the fallen of Chaeronea. Athens was powerless to free herself from the alliance Philip had imposed on her. Following the murder of Philip

(336 B.C.), Demosthenes was one of the leaders of the unsuccessful rising against Macedon. Alexander the Great razed Thebes to the ground and demanded that the leaders who had encouraged the Theban revolt, among them Demosthenes, be handed over to him. But on the representation of a trusted mediator, they were spared. In 324 B.C. Harpalus, treasurer of Alexander, fled with considerable treasure and some forces, his peculations and extravagance having been discovered, and came to Greece. The Athenians would not receive him as long as he was accompanied by an armed force. But when he came alone to Athens they received him and took from him, Demosthenes being the authority in charge, 700 talents which they placed in the Parthenon until such time as the stolen money could be returned to Alexander. This was a matter of honor with the Athenians. Before the money could be restored Harpalus escaped. The money that had been deposited in the Parthenon was counted and was found to amount to only about half the sum originally deposited. The Macedonian party raised a great hue and cry against Demosthenes, claiming he had taken it as a bribe. The amount he received, if any, could not be proved, but the case went against him and he was fined such a large sum he could not pay it and went into exile on the island of Calauria, off Troezen. On the outbreak of a fresh rising at the death of Alexander in 323 B.C. he was recalled by the patriotic party, and on the capture of Athens by Antipater and Craterus in 322 B.C. fled to Calauria again, where he took poison in the temple of Poseidon to avoid capture. His tomb was at Calauria, where he was especially honored. The chief of the orations of Demosthenes are three Philippics (351, 344, 341 B.C.), three Olynthiacs (349, 349, 348 B.C.), On the Peace (346 B.C.), On the Embassy (344 B.C.), On the Affairs of the Chersonese (341 B.C.), On the Crown (330 B.C.). This last-named speech, the most famous of Demosthenes' orations, was in answer to Aeschines, who prosecuted Ctesiphon for moving that a crown be given to Demosthenes for his services to the state. Demosthenes was the great opponent of the Macedonian conquest of Greece, holding that Athens, traditionally and actually, was the heart of any Greek nation, and that it was necessary that the spark be rekindled that had died during the Peloponnesian War. Many legendary stories are told of how he obtained his oratorical power: a stammerer, he taught himself to speak slowly by putting pebbles in his mouth; he went to the seashore and declaimed to the waves so that the noise of an audience would not disturb him; he would run uphill while orating in order to strengthen his weak voice; he shut himself in a cave and copied Thucydides' history eight times in order to attain to a fine style. He seems actually to have had a speech defect; his style in oratory was not complex, but simple and pithy and effective.

De Natura Deorum (dē nā-tū'ra dē-ō'rum). [Eng. trans., "On the Nature of the Gods."] Dialogues by Cicero, in three books, treating of the existence, nature, and providence of the gods.

Dendera (den'dēr-ə). See Tentyra.

Dendrites (den-drī'tēz). An epithet of Dionysus, meaning "Tree-youth."

Dentatus (den-tā'tus), Manius Curius. Roman tribune, consul, praetor, and censor; fl. in the first part of the 3rd century B.C. He is celebrated as a model of the early Roman virtues of simplicity, frugality, and patriotism. He defeated Pyrrhus in 275 B.C., and the Samnites (290) and the Lucanians (274 B.C.).

De Officiis (dē ō-fish'i-is). [Eng. trans., "Of Duties."] Treatise in three books, by Cicero, on moral obligations, written c44 B.C.

De Oratore (dē or-ə-tō'rē). [Eng. trans., "Of the Orator."] Rhetorical work by Cicero, in three books, written (55 B.C.) in the form of a dialogue, the principal characters being L. Crassus and M. Antoninus. Its style and varied contents make it one of Cicero's most polished works.

Derceto (dēr'sē-tō). [Also: Derketo.] Principal Philistine female deity, worshiped especially in Ashkelon (Ascalon). She was represented in the form of a woman terminating in a fish, and is considered the female counterpart of Dagon. She was a nature goddess, the principle of generation and fertility, and corresponds in her attributes and the mode of her worship to Ashtoreth (Astarte) of the Canaanites and Syrians (the Assyro-Babylonian Ishtar), and to Atargatis of the Hittites; and is sometimes thought of as an eastern counterpart of the Greek Aphrodite. She was the mother of Semiramis, who, though human, was the counterpart of the goddess.

Dercyllus (dêr-sil'is). See Dinias and Dercyllis.

De Republica (dê rê-pub'li-ka). [Eng. trans., "Of the Republic."] Philosophical political treatise in six books, by Cicero, in the form of a dialogue between Africanus the Younger (in whose gardens the scene is laid), C. Laelius, and others. The theme is the best form of government and the duty of the citizen. It was published in 51 B.C. About one-third of it has survived.

De Rerum Natura (dê rê-rum na-tû'ra). [Eng. trans., "Of the Nature of Things."] Didactic poem by T. Lucretius Carus, in six books. Completed shortly before his death about 55 B.C., the poem is one of the monuments of Roman literature, an exposition of things as they are in the world as viewed by an Epicurean. Lucretius discusses superstition, the nature of matter and of the universe, atoms, the mind, mortality, the senses, dreams, sex, the earth, man and society, and the phenomena of nature in the sky and on earth.

De Senectute (dê sen-ek-tû'tē). [Eng. trans., "On Old Age;" also, Cato Major.] Short treatise by Cicero, in the form of a conversation, devoted to the praise (in the person of Cato the Censor) of old age. It was written in 45 or 44 B.C.

Desmontes (des-mon'tēz). In Greek legend, the foster father of Arne, whom he blinded and imprisoned when he learned she was about to bear a child. He exposed her twin sons, Aeolus and Boeotus, to die, but they were saved. When they grew up, they rescued their mother and slew Desmontes.

Despoena (des-pē'na). The name, meaning "the Mistress," given by the Arcadians to the daughter of Demeter and Poseidon. This goddess may be identified with Persephone, who is usually described as the daughter of Zeus and Demeter. Pausanias indicates his unwillingness to identify "the Mistress," but mentions Persephone as "the Maid." Despoena appears also as an epithet of Aphrodite and Demeter. The Arcadians worshiped Despoena more than any other gods. In their sanctuary of the Mistress near Acacesium, there were altars to Demeter and Despoena, and an image of them. The images, along with the throne and pedestal for them, were carved from one block of stone. The Arcadians had dug this huge stone from the earth in obedience to a command given in a dream. Next to Demeter stood Artemis clad in a deer skin and accompanied by a hunting dog. Next to Despoena stood Anytus, a Titan who was thought to have reared her. The Arcadians made offerings of all kinds of cultivated fruits except the pomegranate. In the sacred grove behind the sanctuary an oak and olive tree grew from the same root. Also in the precinct there was an altar of Poseidon Hippius, the father of Despoena.

Deucalion (dū-kā'li-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Prometheus and king of Phthia. Because of the wickedness of mankind Zeus determined to send a flood to destroy the evil race of man. Deucalion, who because of his piety was intended to found a new race, was warned by Prometheus of the impending destruction. He and his wife Pyrrha, the daughter of Epimetheus, took refuge in a huge chest. Rather than set the earth afire with his thunderbolts, and risk destroying the heavens as well, Zeus enlisted the aid of Poseidon in his plan to destroy mankind. For nine days the rains fell, the winds blew, and the sea washed over the earth, inundating villages and farms and drowning all the inhabitants. At the end of that time the waters began to recede and the chest in which Deucalion and Pyrrha had ridden out the flood came to rest on Mount Parnassus. Now the water subsided, the winds ceased, and the earth was restored to its normal appearance, but as far as he could tell Deucalion and his wife were the only living creatures left in the land. Near the banks of the Cephissus River they found a temple still standing and entered it. Deucalion thanked the gods for saving him from the flood and prayed to Themis that the earth would be repopled. Themis heard their prayers and instructed them, through an oracle, to leave the temple, veil their heads, loosen the girdles of their garments, and throw the bones of their mother behind them. Deucalion interpreted this to mean that their mother was the earth and that stones were her bones. They veiled their heads, loosened their garments, and picked up stones which they cast over their shoulders behind them. After a short time the stones were transformed: those which Deucalion had cast became men; those thrown by Pyrrha became women. Soon the land was repopulated, and animals, birds, and insects sprang up from the muddy earth which presently recovered its customary verdure. Thus a new and, it was to be hoped, better race of man populated the earth. Deucalion was the father of Orestheus, Amphictyon, and Hellen.

Deucalion. In Greek legend a king of Crete and father of Idomeneus. He was a son of King Minos.

Dexamenus (dek-sä'me-nus). In Greek mythology, a centaur, king of Olenus in Achaea. His twin daughters married the Moliones, twin sons of Actor and Molione. The centaur Eurytion wished to marry his youngest daughter, whose name, according to some accounts, was Mnesimache. Dexamenus did not approve of the marriage but dared not refuse his consent. On the wedding day Heracles arrived and slew Eurytion and his brothers.

Dexileus (dek-sil'ē-us), Monument of. Monument on the Street of Tombs at Athens. It is a beautiful stele bearing in relief a youthful horseman who has ridden down an enemy. Dexileus fell before Corinth in 394 or 393 B.C.

Dia (dī'ā). In Greek legend, a daughter of Eioneus. She was the wife of the Lapith, Ixion, and the mother of Pirithous. According to some accounts Ixion was his father. According to others, Zeus was the father of Pirithous.

Dia. An island in the Aegean Sea, one of the Cyclades. It was one of the homes of Dionysus, and was also the island on which Theseus abandoned Ariadne on his return from Crete after escaping the Minotaur. Here Dionysus found Ariadne and married her. This island is better known by its name Naxos.

Diablites (dī-ā-blin'tēz) or Diablini (-blin'-di). Tribe of NW Gaul, allies of the Veneti against Caesar in 56 B.C. The Diablites are thought to have lived near what is now Le Mans. They were one of four tribes forming a group known as the Aulerici. The other three members of this group were the Cenomani, the Eburonici, and the Brannonici.

Diadochi (dī'ad'ō-kī). The Macedonian generals of Alexander the Great who, after his death in 323 B.C., divided his empire. Literally, the name means "Successors." The several empires that were established were the Seleucid in Syria and Asia Minor, the Ptolemaic in Egypt, the Attalid in Pergamum, and the Antigonid in Macedonia.

Diadumenos (dī-ā-dū'me-nos). Athlete binding his brow with a fillet, by the 5th century Greek sculptor Polyclitus, known from a Hellenistic copy found at Delos, now in Athens, and a head in Dresden. (JJ)

Diagoras (dī-ag'ō-ras). [Surnamed the Atheist.] Greek philosopher, born on the island of Melos; fl. last half of the 5th century B.C. He was accused by the Athenians of impiety because of his attacks on the Eleusinian mysteries.

Diana (dī-an'ā). Ancient Italian divinity, goddess of the moon, protectress of the female sex, later identified with the Greek Artemis. Like Artemis she was goddess of the hunt and the woods, protectress of chastity, and patroness of childbirth. She was called Luna, as goddess of the moon; Hecate, as an infernal deity, invoked in magic rites; and Diana, as goddess of the chase. Her famous shrine in the grove at Aricia was the scene of the custom investigated by Sir J. G. Frazer in the Golden Bough. Her companion, Virbius or Hippolytus, was worshiped there with her. Her priest, who came to his office by killing his predecessor in single combat, likewise might be killed by one in similar straits (specifically, a runaway slave).

Diana of Versailles (vēr-sälz', ver-sī'). [Also: Diana the Huntress.] Greek statue in the Louvre, Paris, commonly regarded as a companion piece to the Apollo Belvedere, though inferior in execution. The goddess is advancing, clad in the short Dorian tunic and himation girded at her waist; she looks toward the right, as with raised arm she takes an arrow from her quiver.

Diasia (dī-ā'si-ā). In ancient Attica, a festival in honor of Zeus Meilichius (Gracious), celebrated annually in the latter half of the month Anthesterion (about the 14th of March). According to Thucydides, this was the greatest festival of Zeus celebrated by the Athenians. The ceremonies of the festival took place outside the city, and the entire population made sacrifices. In early times the sacrifice demanded was a holocaust of pigs, in which the victims were entirely consecrated to the god. In later times the victims were sometimes animals, but cakes made in the shape of animals came to be acceptable sacrifices. The sacrifices were not used as a feast shared by the god and the celebrants of the festival; they were for the god alone. The Diasia was celebrated in an atmosphere of gloom. Zeus Meilichius was a god of purification and, at the same time, an avenging god who must be placated. For in order to purify, the spilled blood that made purification necessary must be avenged. It seems likely that the familiar Zeus assumed the function of a chthonian divinity who is represented by a serpent. Part of the ceremony of purification involved the "fleece of Zeus." When the victim had been sacrificed he who sought purification put his left foot on the fleece, for the skins of victims were thought to have marvelous purifying properties. With the celebration of the Diasia, pollution of the city was removed, the city was cleansed and joy prevailed.

Dicaearchus (dī-sē-ār'kūs). Greek geographer, historian, and philosopher of the Peripatetic school. He was born in Sicily but spent most of his life in Greece; fl. c320 B.C. He was a disciple of Aristotle. His Life of Hellas, in three books, describes the geography and political condition of Greece, details public and private life, and gives an account of Greek theater, games, and religions. Fragments of this work survive.

Dicaeopolis (dī-sē-op'ō-lis). See Segesta.

Dice (dī'sē) or Dike (dī'kē). In Greek mythology, one of the Horae, the personification of justice; daughter of Zeus and Themis (Law), and sister of Irene (Peace) and Eunomia (Order).

Dicte (dik'tē). A cave in the mountains of Lassithion, in E Crete. It was one of many caves where, according to legend, Zeus was born. In the Minoan and Archaic eras it was used as a cult site. It has two chambers; one held an altar and was a place for making sacrifices; the other, approached by a stairway, was a place where votive offerings were deposited.

Dictynna (dik-tin'ā). A Cretan goddess, identified with Britomartis. She was the protectress of hunters and seafarers. In Sparta she was identified with Artemis; the Aeginetans worshiped her as Aphaea; but the Samians, who built her a temple at Cydonia, in Crete, worshiped her as Dictynna.

Dictys (dik'tis). In Greek mythology, a kind fisherman on the island of Seriphus who discovered the chest in which Danaë and Perseus had been cast on the sea. He rescued them and took them to his house where he and his wife cared for them for many years. His brother Polydectes was king of the island and wished to marry Danaë. She and Dictys fled from him and hid while Perseus was off on his expedition for the head of Medusa. When he returned, Perseus sought and found his mother and Dictys, turned Polydectes to stone, and made Dictys king of the island.

Dictys Cretensis (dik'tis krē-ten'sis). A native of Cnossus, Crete, depicted as a companion of Idomeneus, leader of the Cretans at Troy, asserted to be the author of a diary of the Trojan War, the Ephemeris Belli Troiani, claimed to have been discovered during the reign of Nero. The work is fictitious, one of the earliest recorded examples of the literary hoax, and was actually composed in the 2nd or 3rd century A.D. A 4th century A.D. Latin prose translation by one L. Septimius survives. This narrative, with the De Excidio Troiae of Dares Phrygius, was one of the chief sources from which the heroic legends of Greece passed into the literature of the Middle Ages. (JJ)

Dido (dī'dō). A daughter of Belus, king of Tyre. In Roman legend, her husband Sychaeus was secretly murdered for his wealth by her brother, Pygmalion, king of Tyre. The ghost of Sychaeus appeared to Dido, told her of the murder, and warned her to flee. She fled to North Africa with some companions. There she was allowed by the natives to purchase as much land as could be encompassed by a bull's hide. By cutting the hide into narrow strips a fabulous amount of land was encompassed. On it Dido built the citadel Byrsa (so-named from the Greek for "hide") around which the city of Carthage grew. When Aeneas was driven to her shores, Venus sent Cupid, in the guise of Aeneas' son Ascanius, to cause Dido to fall in love with Aeneas, so that she would protect and succor him. Dido had, up until this time, remained faithful to the memory of Sychaeus, and had rejected many suitors, including Iarbas, lord of a neighboring country. As a result of the interference of Venus she now fell passionately and generously in love with Aeneas. She showered him with gifts and showed him the utmost generosity and understanding. After about a year had passed, she suddenly heard that Aeneas was planning to leave Carthage in secret. She reproached him, reminding him of what she had done for him and his friends, and also pointing out to him that she had lost her honor, had not even the consolation of having been faithful to the memory of Sychaeus, and had made many powerful enemies for love of Aeneas. Aeneas acknowledged that everything she said was true and declared that if the decision were left to him, he would certainly prefer to remain with her. But, he said, he was compelled by the gods to leave for his destined home in Italy. Dido was in an agony of despair. When she offered sacrifices, the water on her altars turned black, wine changed to blood, and voices spoke to her from her husband's statue. She resolved to kill herself, and arranged a great funeral pyre under the pretext that she intended to burn relics and an effigy of Aeneas on it. She duped her sister into helping her with the pyre by telling her a Massylian sorceress had told her this would cure her of the love for Aeneas which was consuming her. When all was in readiness, she saw Aeneas' ships putting to sea. Dido sent her attendants to fetch her sister. While they were gone, she uttered a curse against the Trojans, and prayed that their people and hers would be eternal enemies. She then hurled herself on the sword she had once given to Aeneas and fell dying in the arms of her sister, who had just rushed in. Juno sent Iris from heaven to cut a lock of Dido's hair representing her life and to relieve Dido of her agony, and then conduct her to the Underworld. When Aeneas later visited Anchises in the Underworld, he saw the shade of Dido in the region reserved for those who had died of unhappy love, but when he called out to her, she turned her back on him. Dido was also the epithet of the Phoenician goddess of the moon (Astarte), who was worshiped as the protecting deity of the citadel of Carthage. This name was taken by Elissa of Tyre, who fled from Phoenicia and founded Carthage, and who killed herself rather than submit to marriage with Iarbas. The story of Elissa was the basis on which Vergil constructed his story of Dido, outlined above, in the Aeneid.

Didymaea (did-i-mē'ā). A festival in honor of Zeus and Apollo held at Didyma near Miletus in Asia Minor.

Didymaeum (did-i-mē'um). A temple or shrine sacred to Zeus and Apollo at Didyma or Branchidae near Miletus. There was a sacred way leading to it which had been built for an earlier temple on the site, and which was bordered by a series of archaic seated figures. The later building probably dates from about 334 B.C. It was dipteral, with the cella open to the sky.

Didyme (did'i-mē). Ancient name for one of the Lipari islands, now called Salina.

Didymi (did'i-mī). The Greek name of the sign of the Zodiac whose Latin name is Gemini, the Twins. (JJ)

Didymus (did'i-mus). [Surnamed Chalcenterus, meaning "bowels of brass," because he was such a tireless worker.] Greek scholar of the Augustan Age, born in Alexandria in 63 B.C. He spent most of his life in Rome. He was a prodigious worker and profound student. Of his many works (4000 according to an estimate by Seneca), the most important was a commentary on Aristarchus' edition of Homer. He also wrote on Hesiod, the poets, and the orators, and is responsible for the most valuable part of the information in the lexicons and commentaries of the Byzantines.

Dieneces (dī-ē-nē'sēz). A Spartan in the company of Leonidas at the defence of the pass of Thermopylae (480 B.C.). According to Herodotus, he was warned by a Trachinian that the number of barbarians attacking was so vast that when they shot their arrows the face of the sun was darkened. Fearless, Dieneces replied that this was good news, for if the barbarians darkened the sun then the Greeks would be able to fight in the shade.

Dinaric Alps (di-nar'ik alps). [Latin, Alpae Dinaricae.] Mountain ranges in Illyria (now Yugoslavia), which are a continuation of the main Alpine system. They run parallel to the Adriatic Sea coast.

Dindymene (din-di-mē'nē). [Also: the Dindymenian Mother.] Cybele, the Phrygian mother-goddess: so-called from Mount Dindymus in Galatia.

Dindymus (din'di-mus). [Also: Dindymum.] A mountain in Phrygia, sacred to Cybele. It was near the realm of Cyzicus, king of the Doliones. When Jason and the Argonauts were driven back to the shores of Cyzicus by storms and, in the darkness, were attacked in the belief that they were pirates, Jason killed Cyzicus, unaware that he was the king from whose hospitable shores he had recently departed. Daylight revealed the tragic mistake but, after proper funeral rites, the Argonauts were prevented from continuing their journey by a howling tempest. Mopsus, the seer, heard a bird singing that only sacrifices to Rhea (Cybele) on Mount Dindymus would calm the storm. The Argonauts went to the mountain and performed propitiatory sacrifices and engaged in dances, as commanded, in which they clashed their shields to drown out the sounds of mourning for Cyzicus. Rhea acknowledged their homage by sending favorable omens: trees suddenly bore fruit, beasts became tame, and a spring gushed forth. The tempest was stilled and the Argonauts could proceed on their journey.

Dine (dī'nē). In ancient geography, a place in Argolis, on the seacoast, where a fountain of fresh water rises out of the sea. The name means "whirlpool." The Argives used to cast bridled horses into this fountain of fresh water as offerings to Poseidon.

Dinias and Dercyllis (din'i-as; dēr-sil'is). Chief characters of a lost Greek novel, usually entitled The Incredible Things beyond Thule. Their love story furnishes the plot. According to Photius, who gives an abstract of it, it was written soon after the death of Alexander the Great; others, however, believed it had been written by Antonius Diogenes, who was thought to have lived in Syria c100 A.D.

Dinocrates or Deinocrates (dī-nok'ra-tēz). Ablest of the architects of Alexander the Great; fl. 4th century B.C. He planned the new city of Alexandria, and rebuilt the Artemisium of Ephesus after its destruction by fire. He had a plan, never executed, of making a huge statue of a seated figure of Mount Athos (the mountain, personified, was to have a city in one hand and a basin to catch the rivers in the other).

Dio Chrysostomus (dī'ō kri-sos'tō-mus). [Also: Chrysostom.] Greek rhetorician and philosopher; born at Prusa, in Bithynia, c50 A.D. He died at Rome c117 A.D. He traveled widely, partly as a result of banishment due to political difficulties, and partly in obedience to the commands of the oracle at Delphi. He went to Egypt, Rome, the northern reaches of the Roman Empire, and finally, on the accession of his friend Cocceius Nerva, returned to Rome where he ended his days. He was a student of philosophy and an orator. His epithet Chrysostomus, "golden mouth," was a tribute to his powers as a speaker. The style and content of his speeches, 80 of which survive, were greatly admired by the Romans, and he was honored by Nerva and Trajan.

Diocles (dī'ō-klēz). Syracusan popular leader; fl. 5th century B.C. He was the reputed chief author of a code of laws named for him.

Diocles Carystius (kā-ris'ti-us). Greek physician, born at Carystus in Euboea; fl. 4th century B.C.

Diodorus (dī'ō-dō'rus). [Surnamed Siculus, meaning "of Sicily."] Greek historian, born in Agyrium in Sicily, and active in the time of Caesar and Augustus. He traveled widely in Europe and Asia, and after 30 years of travel and study, and using the works of ancient writers that were available to him in Rome, he wrote a Universal History in 40 books. This was a history of the known world from the earliest times to his own era. The first six books covered the ancient history, religion, and mythology of the Egyptians, Asians of Western Asia, North Africans, and Greeks. In them he drew generously and uncritically from ancient authorities to describe the people, geography, and legends of the regions he studied. Although he apparently accepted the general beliefs of his time as to the gods, their powers, and their stories, wherever possible (and sometimes when it was impossible), he attempted to give a rationalistic explanation to the stories of mythology which he could, by straining, link with natural phenomena. Books VII through XVII covered the period from the Trojan War to the death of Alexander the Great. The last 23 books brought his history to Caesar's wars in Gaul. Of the 40 books, books I-V and XI-XX survive intact, and there are fragments, some quite large, of the others. Despite many imperfections, errors, and a prosaic and dull approach, particularly with regard to the mythology, his work is valuable as an important source (to some extent for the authorities he quotes), for the history of the ancient world, particularly for the ancient history of Sicily.

Diogenes (dī-ōj'ē-nēz). Greek Cynic philosopher, famous for his eccentricities. He was born at Sinope in Asia Minor, c400 B.C., and died at Corinth, c325 B.C. He emigrated to Athens in his youth, where, according to one tradition, he became the pupil of Antisthenes, and lived, according to Seneca, in a tub. While on a voyage from Athens to Aegina, he was captured by pirates who exposed him for sale on the slave market in Crete. When asked what business he understood, he replied, "How to command men," and requested to be sold to some one in need of a master. He was purchased by Xenitades, a wealthy citizen of Corinth, who restored him to liberty, and in whose house he passed his old age. At Corinth he was, according to tradition, visited by Alexander the Great. Alexander inquired whether he could oblige him in any way. "Yes," replied Diogenes, "stand from between me and the sun." Diogenes taught and believed in an extreme of asceticism as a means of attaining truth and good. As a result he was looked down upon and in turn rejected his contemporaries. The story, true or not, of his search with a lighted lamp in broad daylight (as he said, "for an honest man"), vividly illustrates this.

Diogenes of Apollonia (ap-ō-lō'ni-ā). Greek natural philosopher, born at Apollonia, Crete; fl. in the 5th century B.C. According to tradition, he was a pupil of Anaximenes.

Diomedes (dī-ō-mē'dēz). In Greek legend, the "high-souled" son of Tydeus and Deïpyle. He was a king in Argos and was one of the Epigoni—the sons of the Seven against Thebes—who successfully attacked Thebes and avenged their fathers. In fulfillment of the oath he had taken as an ardent suitor of

Helen—to protect whomever she should choose as a husband—he rallied to Menelaus when Helen was carried off by Paris. In the war which followed he was one of Agamemnon's most loyal supporters. He went with Sthenelus and Euryalus to Troy as the commander of a great fleet of 80 ships carrying warriors from Argos, Tiryns, Hermione, Asine, Troezen, Eionae, Epidaurus, Aegina, and Mases. He was the darling of Athena, and next to Achilles was the mightiest of the Greek heroes. To his own reckless courage the goddess added unparalleled strength, marvelous skill at arms, and unfailing valor. He was fearless and at times held off the Trojans single-handed. When he was wounded by Pandarus, Athena saved his life and restored him. Later she guided the spear with which he killed Pandarus. He felled Aeneas with a huge stone and would have killed him, but Aphrodite came and saved her son. Undaunted by the interference of a goddess, Diomedes pursued her, wounded her, and drove her from the field. Athena now encouraged him to attack Ares. He caught the spear which Ares hurled at him and in his turn turned on Ares, wounded him and forced the god of war to quit the field. In addition to attacking the gods, he killed many Trojans. In the savage fighting he came face to face with Glaucus, the companion of the Lycian king Sarpedon. As they squared off to fight, each boasted of his ancestry and prowess, and thus it was that they discovered that their grandfathers had been friends. They put down their weapons and swore an oath of friendship. To bind the oath, they exchanged arms. In this Diomedes got by far the better bargain. He gave Glaucus his bronze armor. Glaucus graciously, but foolishly, handed over his own armor of pure gold. Several times when the war went against the Greeks, Agamemnon proposed that they give up the struggle and go home. This was a purely psychological gambit. Agamemnon knew he could count on the fearless Diomedes to regard such a suggestion as a personal insult and to rally the Greeks to fight harder than ever. Diomedes was one of those who accepted Hector's challenge to a duel, but he was eliminated in the drawing of the lots. He rescued Nestor from Hector's attack and was prevented from pursuing

Hector only by the thunderbolt of Zeus. He accused Agamemnon of cowardice when the latter, believing the gods favored the Trojans, wanted to leave Troy, and volunteered to go with Odysseus as a spy on the Trojan camp. On this expedition they captured and killed Dolon, a Trojan spy, raided the Trojan camp and slew Rhesus, a king of Thrace and an ally of Troy, captured his marvelous horses, and returned safely to the Greek camp. This patrol with Odysseus was one of many. He and Odysseus went to Lemnos to fetch Philoctetes, the owner of the arrows of Heracles, when it was learned that Troy could not be taken without them. Accompanied by Phoenix, they next went to Scyros and successfully persuaded Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, to join the Greeks at Troy. The last mission was to steal from the citadel of Troy the Palladium, which guarded Troy as long as it remained in the city. In rags and tatters they made their way to the walls of the city. Diomedes, according to some accounts, climbed on Odysseus' shoulders but refused to pull Odysseus up after him. He scaled the wall and entered the city alone, found and stole the Palladium, and rejoined Odysseus at the wall. As they were returning, Diomedes, who was carrying the Palladium ahead of Odysseus, caught a glint of moonlight reflected from Odysseus' naked sword. He whirled around in time to see Odysseus with his sword raised ready to strike him. Odysseus had planned to murder Diomedes so that he could return alone and reap the glory of having stolen the Palladium. Diomedes now laid about Odysseus' flanks and sides with the flat of his sword. Odysseus had no choice but to run before him, howling miserably from the whacks of Diomedes' sword, and in this undignified manner he was driven back into the Greek camp. From this incident arises the expression "Diomedes' compulsion"—to do something because necessity leaves no choice. Some say Diomedes, cousin of Thersites, was the only one who mourned him when he was slain by Achilles for mocking the latter as he grieved over the death of Penthesilea. Diomedes in a rage seized Penthesilea's body by the foot, dragged it to the river, and hurled it in. Her body was rescued and restored to the Trojans for burial. He was one of those who entered Troy in the Wooden Horse, and after the sack of the city, was according to some accounts, one of the few who had a prosperous voyage home to Greece. Others say Aphrodite caused him to be shipwrecked on the coasts of Lycia, and that he was saved from being sacrificed by the king only through the good offices of the king's daughter, who helped him to escape. Arrived in Argos he found that his wife, Aegiale, had been unfaithful to him, largely owing to false reports spread by Nauplius. She and her lover drove him out of his kingdom. He went to Corinth, and then to Calydon and restored his grandfather, Oeneus, to his throne. Ultimately he sailed to Italy and settled in Daunum. He married Euippe, daughter of King Daunus and founded many cities, among them Brundisium. The Latins asked his help in their war against Aeneas, who had also come to Italy. Diomedes cited the suffering the Greeks had endured during and after the Trojan War, and said he had had enough of fighting Trojans. As he refused to lend his aid to the Latins, he advised them, out of his own experience, to make peace with Aeneas and his Trojan followers. According to some accounts, Diomedes was murdered by King Daunus, who had become jealous of the wealth and power he had acquired in Italy, and he was secretly buried on the Diomedan Islands. Others say he was divinely spirited away, and that his followers were transformed into gentle birds which nest on these islands. The golden armor that he got from Glaucus was preserved by the priests of Athena in Apulia, and he was worshiped as a god in southern Italy and in the region around Venice.

Diomedes. In Greek mythology, a son of Cyrene and Ares. He was a king in Thrace and the owner of fierce mares which he fed on the flesh of human beings. Heracles captured and tamed the mares, as one of his labors for Eurystheus, by feeding them the flesh of their master. He then harnessed them to a chariot, although they had never been broken to the bridle, and drove them over the mountains to Eurystheus. He consecrated them to Hera and set them free. They were ultimately torn to pieces by wild beasts on Mount Olympus.

Dion (dī'on). Syracusan philosopher and statesman; born at Syracuse, c408 B.C.; assassinated there, 354 B.C. His sister Aristomache was one of two wives whom Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, married at the same time. Ultimately, Dion married Arete, the daughter of Dionysius and Aristomache. From his connection with Dionysius and because of his own wisdom and capacity, he gained an influential role in Syracusan affairs, and was one of very few who dared speak freely to Dionysius. Dionysius the Younger succeeded his father, and Dion became one of his counselors. Dion, a gifted and ardent disciple of Plato, earnestly wished Dionysius the Younger to put into practice some of Plato's theories of government. The young tyrant had had no education, because his father feared that if he mingled with intelligent and capable men, he might seek to overthrow him and seize the tyranny. Dion now encouraged him to seek the company of philosophers; he pointed out the magnificence in which the young ruler lived and advised him to furnish "the royal palace of his soul" as richly as he had furnished the palace of his body. He tried to instill in him the idea that with a just government his people would obey him out of respect and admiration rather than give him the sullen obedience they now rendered through fear. Dionysius was all enthusiasm for learning, and Plato was sent for. He arrived in Syracuse in 367 B.C. and was warmly welcomed, and a wave of enthusiasm for philosophy and letters swept Syracuse. It did not last long. Dion's influence was resented and feared by those who profited from the tyranny. They set all manner of criticisms of Dion afloat and declared that his aim was to depose Dionysius, seize power himself, and secure the succession for his sister's children. Dionysius, a weak and profligate man, believed the enemies of Dion, and when a letter Dion had written to the Carthaginians fell into his hands his suspicions against Dion seemed to be confirmed. By a trick he led Dion to the shore, accused him of treachery, commanded him to board a small boat waiting there, and ordered the crew to set Dion ashore in Italy. However, the Syracusans were so aroused by the departure of Dion that Dionysius was frightened and denied he had exiled him. He loaded two ships with the goods and treasure of Dion and sent them to him. After a time, Plato left Syracuse also, with a promise from Dionysius that he would recall Dion. Dion went to Athens and joined Plato. He visited cities throughout Greece and was widely welcomed, the Spartans even going so far as to make him a citizen. Dionysius made no attempt to recall him. On the contrary, he discontinued sending him the revenues from his estates and forced Dion's wife to marry one of his friends. News came to Dion from Syracuse that the people were so discontented that they would overthrow Dionysius if Dion returned. He decided to do so. He collected a small force of Greek mercenaries on the island of Zacynthus, made a splendid sacrifice to Apollo, gave a feast, and was ready to depart. On the eve of departure there was an eclipse of the moon which frightened his soldiers, but seers said it betokened the eclipse of Dionysius. Another omen, swarms of bees that settled on the prows of the ships, was not publicly interpreted for the soothsayers feared it meant Dion's efforts would first prosper and then fail. Yet there were other definitely favorable signs: an eagle seized a spear, flew up with it, and then dropped it into the sea; sea water became sweet and drinkable for a whole day. The forces of Dion landed at Minoa in Sicily and marched toward Syracuse. Dionysius was away from the city, and letters warning him of the approach of Dion with an army failed to reach him. Dion, whose forces were increased by volunteers along the way, entered Syracuse without a struggle (357 B.C.), and was welcomed with joy. A week later, Dionysius sailed into the harbor, and though envoys were treating with Dion, he treacherously attacked the city. Dion rallied the defenders and won a victory, but not before Dionysius had gained the citadel where he took refuge. Dion was master of the city, but his aloof manner and determination to teach the Syracusans how to govern themselves under his direction offended them. The fickle people now appointed Heraclides as admiral of the fleet, but when Dion rebuked them for infringing the supreme power they had already give him, they withdrew the appointment. Dion himself then appointed Heraclides admiral, though his friends warned that Heraclides was not a friend to him. Philistus, a Syracusan exile, returned with a fleet to help Dionysius, who was under siege in the citadel, but Philistus was defeated and slain. Dionysius escaped through Heraclides' fleet and the people rose up in anger against Heraclides, but he diverted them by criticizing Dion, claiming that Dion's mercenaries got the best rewards and rousing the people against the foreign soldiers. He also suggested a land reform and proposed that the Syracusans choose new generals. The foolish Syracusans swung over to his side and turned against Dion. All sorts of unfavorable omens occurred the day the new generals were to be chosen, but they were ignored. Twenty-five new generals were selected, among them Heraclides, and a threatening crowd sought to drive Dion and his mercenaries out of the city. The Greek mercenaries would have attacked the crowd but Dion would not turn against his own city. Instead, his loyal mercenaries repelled the hostile Syracusans with scowls and conducted him safely to Leontini, where they and he were welcomed (356 B.C.). In a short time, Dionysius sent forces to Syracuse that took the city with great slaughter. Envoys were hurriedly sent to Dion in Leontini, begging him to come and save the city. Dion, according to Plutarch, made a moving speech to his mercenaries, telling them he meant to return to Syracuse himself, but would understand if they did not wish to accompany him. "If, however, in your displeasure at the Syracusans, you shall leave them to their fate, at least for your former bravery and zeal in my behalf may you obtain a worthy reward from the gods, and may you think of Dion as one who abandoned neither you when you were wronged, nor, afterwards, his fellow citizens when they were in distress." The mercenaries leaped to their feet and shouted for him to lead them back. When the enemy captain learned that Dion was coming to the relief of the city, he sacked it and put it to the torch. Dion found it in flames. With his mercenaries he overcame the forces of Dionysius, who again took refuge in the citadel, and put out the fires in the city. The son of Dionysius in the citadel was compelled to surrender, and was permitted to sail away. Dion was reunited with his wife and his sister, who had been held in the fortress ever since he returned from Greece. All the Syracusans, with wildest rejoicing, went down to the harbor to witness the departure of the son of Dionysius. Dion was now at the height of his power and prestige. He rewarded his friends, allies, and mercenaries, but continued to live simply and modestly himself. His friend Plato wrote that the eyes of the world were on him. But Dion did not propose to restore a democracy; he favored a limited monarchy. However, he was, in fact, a new tyrant of Syracuse. He brought in Corinthians to advise him and by so doing aroused resentment among the Syracusans. Once again Heraclides stirred up discontent and plotted against him. This time Dion, who had always forgiven him though he was a known enemy, permitted his friends, who had been urging it for a long time, to go to the house of Heraclides and slay him. Dion gave him a splendid funeral and followed his body to the grave, but the murder of Heraclides oppressed him;

he knew it was a stain on his honor. After this, a heavier blow fell. His dear friend, the Athenian Callippus, who had come to Syracuse with him, plotted to seize control. Dion's friends warned him, but he no longer wanted to struggle for the people of Syracuse or himself. He was ready to die, he said, if it had become necessary for him to live on his guard not only against his enemies, but even against his friends. Omens of death had already come to him. As he was sitting in his house, he saw a woman of great height, dressed like and resembling one of the Furies, and sweeping his courtyard with a broom; a few days later, his son threw himself from the roof in a fit of anger and was killed. Nevertheless, his friends, and especially his wife Arete and his sister Aristomache, tried to protect him. Callippus was charged with a plot but swore a most sacred oath that he was innocent. He then committed the greatest impiety of all. As Dion was sitting among friends, during the festival of the Coreia, in honor of the goddess in whose name Callippus had sworn his oath, Callippus attacked him and killed him (354 B.C.).

Dione (dī-ō'nē). In early Greek mythology, the consort of Zeus; his feminine counterpart as sky-deity, supplanted by Hera. In later mythological genealogy, she is a female Titan, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. In the Iliad, she is named as the mother of Aphrodite, who comforted Aphrodite when the latter was attacked and wounded by Diomedes in the Trojan War. Dione foretold the death of Diomedes for waging war against immortals.

Dionysia (dī-ō-nish'ā). Ancient Greek festivals in honor of Dionysus, a fertility god. Those held at Athens were the chief ones, and are usually considered to have been four in number: the Lesser or Rural Dionysia, the Lenaea, the Anthesteria, and the Greater or City Dionysia. The Anthesteria appears to be an older festival which was overlaid by a festival of Dionysus centered about the Lenaeum, or sanctuary of Dionysus in the marshes, whose shrine was opened on only one day in the year. The date of this festival was the 11th-13th of Anthesterion (about March 2-4). The Lesser Dionysia were wine-feasts of very early origin, a solstice celebration held throughout the Attic demes between the 9th and 11th of Poseideon (about Dec. 19-22), accompanied by drinking, boisterous processions, and dramatic performances, of which those at the Piraeus had the chief reputation. The Greater Dionysia were celebrated at Athens, probably the 9th-13th of Elaphebolion (about March 28-April 2), a spring equinox observance. This, the best known of the festivals of Dionysus, was the occasion on which the Greek tragedies were presented at Athens. See Dionysus.

Dionysius (dī-ō-nish'i-us, -nish'us). [Surnamed the Elder.] Tyrant of Syracuse, born c430 B.C.; died at Syracuse, 367 B.C. He was of obscure birth and had served as a clerk in a government office. In the siege of Acragas (406 B.C.), he fought bravely with the Syracusans who went to the relief of the city, was wounded, and left for dead on the field. His experience convinced him that the democratic government of Syracuse was so weak that a strong man could easily take control. He resolved to be that strong man. In an assembly he rose and denounced the generals of Syracuse who had failed to relieve Acragas. His views coincided with those of the populace. The generals were removed and a new board of generals, of which he was a member, was named. He soon discredited his fellow generals on the new board; they were deposed and he was made sole general (405 B.C.). He caused a rumor to be spread that an attempt had been made on his life, demanded and was permitted a personal bodyguard. Through the fear of the Syracusans of Carthage they had allowed Dionysius to make himself tyrant of Syracuse, although he kept the outward forms of democracy.

He led a force to the relief of Gela, besieged by the Carthaginians, but through what was probably treachery on his part, an attack on the Carthaginian camp ended in failure. Rather than attempt to raise the siege he decided to remove the people of Gela; they abandoned their city at night. At Camarina he made the same decision, although Camarina had not even been attacked. His Italian allies withdrew in disgust. Some Syracusan horsemen thought he was a traitor, rode to his house, plundered it, and attacked his wife. Dionysius hurried to Syracuse, entered the city at night by burning the gate, and overcame his opponents. It seems that his activities in the case of Gela and Camarina were deliberate—he did not want the annihilation of Carthage in Sicily, for as long as Carthage presented a danger there was justification of his dictatorial power. In 404 B.C. he made a treaty with Himilco, the Carthaginian general, by which each side was to keep, in general, what it held at the time, but the significant clause of the treaty, from the standpoint of Dionysius, was that Carthage guaranteed his power in Syracuse.

He now set to work to fortify Syracuse, a city on an island. But his rule was not popular or secure. In a war against Herbesus the army mutinied. Dionysius withdrew to his fortified island and suffered siege by his own people (403 B.C.), who were assisted by forces from Rhegium and Messina. He called a council of his followers in the fortress. Some advised him to flee, others to stay; one Heloris remarked, that "Sovereign power is a fair winding-sheet." Dionysius, as he did so often, resorted to stratagem. He asked the besiegers to let him depart from Syracuse with his possessions. They agreed, and so implicitly trusted him that they sent away some of their forces and relaxed the siege. Meantime, Dionysius sent a secret call for assistance to the Campanian mercenaries of Carthage. They came, in accordance with the treaty of Himilco guaranteeing his power. When they arrived they completely routed the rebels and Dionysius re-established his control. He sold the inhabitants of the Greek cities of Naxos and Catana as slaves, gave Catana to Campanian mercenaries, and razed Naxos. Next he won back Leontini, which had been made independent by his treaty with Himilco. This left Sicily divided between Greek cities under control of Dionysius, and Carthaginian cities, except for Messina which remained independent. He expanded the fortifications of Syracuse, reorganized his army, introduced the catapult as an engine of siege warfare, and strengthened his fleet by building ships with five banks of oars. Having made such preparations, he was ready to move against the Carthaginians in Sicily. Gela, Camarina, Agragas, and Eryx gave him their allegiance. He besieged (398 B.C.) the Carthaginian city of Motya, a fortified island city, and after a tremendous effort and despite heroic resistance, he reduced and took it. This was the first Phoenician town taken by the Greeks.

Himilco was sent from Carthage to protect the Punic cities. He took Eryx by treason and recaptured Motya. Dionysius did not oppose him. He withdrew to Syracuse and sent a fleet, under command of his brother Leptines, to attack the Carthaginian fleet at Catana (396 B.C.). He observed the defeat of the fleet from the shore and again retreated to Syracuse, although his men were eager to stand and fight. The Carthaginians sailed into the harbor, their army disembarked and encamped in the marsh nearby, and laid siege to Syracuse. During the 11-month siege, discontent in the city was great. Outside, the army of Himilco was attacked by pestilence and greatly weakened. Dionysius chose the moment to counterattack. He ordered his fleet against the Carthaginian ships and himself led a land force out of the city. His attack was a great success; the Carthaginian fleet was burned, the land forces of Dionysius were victorious. The Carthaginians were routed, but Dionysius, on receipt of 300 talents, treacherously allowed Himilco to escape with 40 triremes. Himilco's mercenaries, deserted by their commander, were enslaved or slaughtered. Again, Dionysius was unwilling, for the sake of his own power, to allow the annihilation of Carthage in Sicily.

Following the victory, he extended his power in Sicily. In 392 B.C. the Carthaginians, under the command of Mago, returned, and were again defeated. They sued for peace. By the terms of the peace Syracuse became the acknowledged master of all the Greek communities of Sicily. The city of Tauromenium, once unsuccessfully besieged by Dionysius, was awarded to him, and he now began to expand his power on the mainland of Italy. Rhegium was a personal as well as a political enemy, for when he asked for a maiden of Rhegium for a wife he was told that the only maiden of Rhegium he could have was the hangman's daughter; Rhegium had sent assistance to the rebels who besieged Dionysius in his own city; and Rhegium controlled the strait between Sicily and Italy. He defeated the Italians at Elleporus (388

B.C.), and instead of killing his captives or selling them as slaves or even demanding ransom, he let them all go free. Thus he won the gratitude and friendship of all the Italian towns from which they came, and also isolated Rhegium, which he now (386 B.C.) besieged and captured. He scourged the defeated commander through his army and then drowned him, with all his relatives. With the capture of Rhegium he controlled both sides of the strait (he had earlier restored Messina), and in 379 B.C. he captured Croton. Continuing his expansion, he founded commercial settlements along the Adriatic coast up to what is now Venice. The Carthaginians returned in 379 B.C., Dionysius was defeated and forced to accept a humiliating peace. In 368 B.C. he again marched against the Punic cities, but failed to take Lilybaeum and died before peace could be concluded.

The tyranny of Dionysius lasted 38 years. It was maintained by force against all attempts to depose him and restore the Republic. He was harsh and cruel to his political enemies, but on the whole did not indulge in vengeance and murder for personal reasons. He had great capacity and energy, and above all, his ability to protect Syracuse from its enemies abroad continually kept his enemies at home off balance. Vast sums were needed to carry on his wars. He raised them by levying heavy taxes and by plundering the temples of their treasures. He even planned a raid on the holiest of Greek sanctuaries, Delphi, but was unable to put his plan into execution. He sent aid to Sparta several times, and was in turn aided by the Spartans.

Dionysius' first wife, abused by the Syracusans who had attempted to seize his power, killed herself in shame at her dishonor. He then married, so it is said, two wives at the same time, to whom he was equally devoted. One was a Locrian and bore his eldest son, Dionysius the Younger. The other was Aristomache, sister of Dion, one of his most trusted advisers. Dionysius accused the mother of his Locrian wife of drugging Aristomache so that she would not bear children and had her killed. Aristomache later had children, one of whom, Arete, was given in marriage to her brother Dion. Busy as he was in securing his own power, protecting Syracuse from Carthage and enlarging its sphere of influence, Dionysius found time to encourage letters. In 388 B.C. Dion invited Plato to Syracuse and became one of his most ardent disciples. He was anxious to have Dionysius hear the philosopher, in the hope that the tyrant might be imbued with some of his theories of a government based on law and justice. He took Dionysius to hear Plato lecture. That day the philosopher discoursed on the nature of tyrants. He branded them as timid men, who ruled with iron hands out of fear. He might have been speaking of Dionysius personally, for the tyrant was frighteningly aware of the hatred he had roused against himself among his own people. He was so afraid of assassination he would not allow a barber to cut his hair, but had it singed with live coals. No one was permitted to come before him who had not first taken off his clothes in an antechamber and put on robes supplied by the tyrant in which it would be impossible to conceal a weapon. On one occasion, his brother Leptines was describing some plans to him. To clarify his explanation he seized a spear and drew the plans in the sand. Dionysius had the man from whom the spear was borrowed slain for having brought a weapon into his presence. Once he dreamed a certain man had attempted to kill him. The next day he had the man put to death for his dream convinced him that this man would make an attempt on his life. He dared not trust his own children, and had his eldest son and heir, Dionysius the Younger, brought up in relative ignorance and isolation from public affairs, lest if he associated with intelligent men he try to overthrow his father. Nevertheless, to hear Plato discourse on the timidity of tyrants enraged him, and shortly thereafter Plato left Syracuse. Dionysius gave orders to the captain of the ship on which he sailed to kill Plato if it was possible to do so quietly; if not, to sell him into slavery, for, said Dionysius, Plato claimed a just man was blessed, and since he himself was just he would be happy even in slavery. The incident did not disturb Dion's relationship with Dionysius, and the latter continued to encourage letters and to work as a dramatic poet himself. He had several times sent his tragedies to compete in the Dionysia at Athens, and had won third and second prizes. In a later time, his son Dionysius the Younger met Philip of Macedon at a banquet in Corinth. Philip mockingly asked him when his father had found time to write the tragedies and poems he left behind. Dionysius the Younger answered, "When thou and I and all those whom men call happy are busy at the bowl." But Dionysius was not satisfied with second and third prizes. In 367 B.C., after his failure to take Lilybaeum from the Carthaginians, he learned that his tragedy, Ransom of Hector, had won first prize at the Lenaea in Athens. The news more than consoled him for his military failure. In his delight he celebrated mightily. He drank too much wine and was taken with a fever. The soporific drink he was given to calm him put him to sleep forever. Under the tyranny of Dionysius Syracuse became the leading state in Europe; his own power and influence are said to have exceeded those of any other Greek before Alexander the Great. Nevertheless, the "adamantine bonds" with which he boasted he had secured his power were loosened within a generation.

Dionysius. [Surnamed the Younger.] Tyrant of Syracuse, born c395 B.C.; died, probably at Corinth, after 343 B.C. He was the eldest son of Dionysius the Elder and his Locrian wife, Doris. His father deliberately denied him an education through the fear that if Dionysius mingled with intelligent and capable men he would attempt to seize the tyranny. Instead, Dionysius the Younger was kept in virtual isolation from public affairs, and occupied himself by making little wooden wagons, chairs, and tables, and in revelry with his friends. On the death of his father (367 B.C.), Dionysius the Younger became tyrant of Syracuse with no preparation for governing, but with a highly developed taste for debauchery and extravagant living. Dion, the adviser and brother-in-law of his father, now became adviser to the son. Dion was an ardent follower of the philosopher Plato. He hoped that with an education in philosophy Dionysius the Younger would become a wise and just ruler, that the tyranny might be converted into a benevolent monarchy under a constitution along the lines proposed by Plato in the Republic. Dion was not an advocate of democracy; rather he hoped for a state that would prosper under a philosopher-king. He urged on the young tyrant the pursuit of knowledge and prevailed on him to send for Plato. The philosopher was reluctant to come, for his experiences in Syracuse under Dionysius the Elder had been unfortunate, but he admitted that he must not refuse the chance to put his theories to the test and sailed to Syracuse. Dionysius welcomed him warmly, and flung himself into the task of becoming a philosopher. To prepare him to become a philosopher-king, Plato insisted on a solid foundation of scientific study and set Dionysius to studying geometry. Soon the whole court of Syracuse was feverishly engaged in drawing diagrams on the sand, which served as a blackboard. But the mastery of geometry was slow and difficult. Dionysius soon tired of it; he was weak, impressionable, and easily swayed by those about him. Those who resented and feared the influence of Dion and Plato now brought their influence to bear. They flattered Dionysius, pandered to his extravagant tastes, and at last openly accused Dion of plotting against him. A letter Dion had written to the Carthaginians concerning negotiations between them and Syracuse was intercepted. Dionysius seized on it as evidence of treachery, and sent Dion away from Syracuse (366 B.C.). Frightened by the anger this roused in the Syracusans and by the threat of revolt, he sent Dion's treasure after him, declared he had not exiled him, and sent him the revenues from his estates at regular intervals. Dion went to Greece, where he traveled widely. Dionysius kept Plato in Syracuse, and became passionately attached to him, and jealously demanded to be the most loved and admired of his disciples. However, his mental equipment was inadequate, his will to discipline himself with work flickered, and his appetite for pleasure never faltered. Plato realized that Dionysius would never become the instrument to bring the ideal state into being. Having secured a promise from Dionysius that he would recall Dion, he returned to Athens. Dionysius made no attempt to recall Dion. Instead, when he learned how popular his former adviser was with the Greeks in the homeland he became fearful of him, lest he return and seize power in Syracuse. He stopped sending the revenues of his estates to him and compelled his wife, his own half-sister, to marry one of his friends. He sent for Plato again, promising that he would show mercy to Dion if Plato returned, otherwise he would not. Whether it was from friendship for Dion or a lingering hope that he might influence Dionysius, Plato returned to Syracuse (361 B.C.). When he arrived, Dionysius, under the pretext of giving him an honor guard, kept him under virtual arrest for a time, then allowed him to return to Athens.

Syracuse was in a state of great unrest under the harsh, extravagant, and unpredictable rule of Dionysius. Dion returned with an army of Peloponnesian mercenaries and led a revolt against him. Dionysius was out of Syracuse when Dion arrived, and the city was taken without a struggle. A week later Dionysius sailed into the harbor with a fleet and attacked. He was defeated, but not before he had won the citadel of Syracuse, which was a fortified island guarding the city. Here he took refuge with many soliders, much material, and with the wife and sister of Dion as his captives. When he found he could not raise the siege, he left command of the citadel to his son and escaped through the Syracusan fleet. He went to his mother's home (356 B.C.), in Locri, ruled it with an iron hand, and indulged his taste for profligacy. The hatred of the Locrians was so intense that when Dionysius at last left their city, abandoning his wife and children to the care of a small garrison, the Locrians seized them, outraged them in the streets, and slew them. They chopped up the bones of their victims, as ghosts could not rise from pulverized bones to haunt them, and served their flesh to the people of Locri, compelling all to taste of it on pain of being put under a terrible curse. The ashes of their bones were cast into the sea, along with any remains of their diced flesh. This occurred when Dionysius, after ten years of exile, returned to Syracuse (346 B.C.) and reestablished himself as tyrant. Shortly after his return Hicetas, tyrant of Leontini, who had made a treacherous agreement with the Carthaginians, besieged him in Syracuse. The city was in despair. Carthaginian ships were in the harbor, the forces of Hicetas were in the city, and Dionysius had shut himself up in the island citadel. Corinth, the mother city of Syracuse, sent a force under Timoleon to relieve Syracuse. Dionysius sent him a message offering to surrender to him. Timoleon sent a small force into the city in secret and took him off the citadel and passed him in safety through the encircling enemies. All the material Dionysius had stored in the citadel and 2000 soldiers fell to Timoleon. Dionysius sailed off to Corinth (343 B.C.) with his personal treasure. There he lived aimlessly, occasionally mingling with the great. On one occasion he was asked what was the cause of the quarrel between him and Plato. He answered that the worst evil of a tyranny was that no one spoke the truth to a tyrant, and this cost him the good will of Plato. When he had exhausted his treasure, he passed the rest of his life as a mendicant priest of Cybele.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus (hal'i-kär-nas'us). Greek rhetorician and historian, born at Halicarnassus in Caria, and died at Rome in 8 B.C. He went to Rome in the time of Cicero and there became a profound student of the Roman language and literature, particularly the historical literature of the Romans. He wrote a history of Rome (Archaeologia) from its mythological beginnings to the time of the Punic Wars, parts of which are extant. In this work, as the Scottish classicist Richard Jebb has pointed out, Dionysius "aimed at writing an Introduction to Polybius. He maintains, on fanciful grounds, that the Romans, who deserve to rule the world, are not 'barbarians,' but are of Greek descent." Although the work was intended to glorify the Romans to their Greek subjects, it was soundly based on ancient authorities and provides a valuable source of early Roman history. He was a teacher of rhetoric and wrote on that subject, including On the Arrangement of Words. He also wrote critical works on the Greek classics, some of which were cast in the form of letters to prominent Romans. Since his main interest was in style, all his criticisms of Plato, Isocrates, Isaeus, and others, are based on style as the criterion. As a rhetorician his influence was important in the development of prose style.

Egypt, and active c100 B.C. He studied at Alexandria, taught there and at Rhodes and Rome, and wrote The Art of Grammar, the first written study of that subject in Greek. This work, which has come down to us, probably with later alterations and additions, is not exhaustive, but Dionysius' approach and method greatly influenced later grammarians. He is known also to have written commentaries on the works of ancient writers.

Dionysus (di-ō-nī'sus). God of the vine, and youngest of the Olympian gods. He was the son of Zeus and Semele, and the only god to have a mortal for a parent. Zeus fell in love with Semele, a daughter of Cadmus, and the sister of Ino, Agave, and Autonoë. He visited her in mortal guise, although he assured her that he was the god Zeus. A few months before it was time for her child to be born, Semele, inspired thereto by jealous Hera who had taken the guise of Semele's nurse for the purpose, pleaded with Zeus to appear to her in the same majesty he showed to Hera, and thus prove to her that her lover was really a god. Zeus tried to persuade her to ask any other boon, but Semele insisted this was the only boon she craved. Since he had sworn by the Styx, the most sacred of oaths, that he would grant whatever she asked, Zeus appeared to her in blazing majesty, armed with the awful thunderbolts. Mortal Semele could not stand the divine fire and was burned to ashes, but Zeus snatched her unborn child from her womb and sewed it up in his thigh. When the child reached maturity, he was born from the thigh of Zeus. Because he had been taken from his mother and also from Zeus, Dionysus was sometimes called the child of "the double door," or given the epithet "Twice-born." But some say this epithet came from another circumstance. They say he was born with a horn growing from his head, around which serpents twined, and that Hera commanded the Titans to seize him. This they did, although he transformed himself into various shapes to escape, and tore him to pieces. His grandmother Rhea gathered up the fragments of his body, which the Titans had boiled in a cauldron, and restored him to life. (A similar story is told of Zagreus, with whom Dionysus is identified.) Others say, to save his son from Hera, who always sought to destroy her rival's child, Zeus gave him to the nymphs Philia, Coronis, and Clide, to rear on the isle of Naxos. Still others say Zeus gave him to Hermes, with orders to convey him to Ino and her husband Athamas in Thebes. Ino disguised him as a girl and reared him in secret. But Hera unmasked the secret and drove Ino and Athamas mad. Zeus saved Ino for her kindness to Dionysus by transforming her into the sea-goddess Leucothea. To protect Dionysus from the wrath of Hera, Zeus now transformed him into a kid and Hermes transported him to the nymphs of Nysa, who cared for him. Some say these nymphs were afterward placed among the stars as the Hyades, to reward them, and that these stars rise in the rainy season that makes the vine grow. Nysa has never been definitely located: Asia, Ethiopia, Libya, Egypt, and Mount Helicon in Greece, as well as other places where the vine is cultivated, have all been named as the site which held the cave of Nysa where Dionysus was nurtured. The name Dionysus has been fancifully interpreted as a combination of Zeus (Dio) and Nysa. Silenus became the tutor of the young god, taught him the secrets of nature, and helped him to discover wine, a two-sided gift to man, for it could be the source of freedom and joyousness, or of weakness and brutality. The attributes of wine were also embodied in the god, who could be merry and gentle or ruthless and powerful. He traveled about the earth teaching men the mysteries of his worship and how to cultivate the vine. Those who welcomed him received the gift of the vine; those who resisted him were visited with terrible punishments. According to tradition, Oeneus of Calydon was the first mortal to whom he gave the vine, Icarius of Attica was the first mortal to discover wine, and Amphiclyon, who entertained Dionysus, was the first whom he taught to mix wine with water. In the vineyards, masks of Dionysus were hung, which turned in the wind and were supposed to make fruitful whatever vines they looked upon. Dionysus grew to be a beautiful girlish-appearing young man, but Hera recognized him and drove him mad. He began to wander about the world, accompanied by Silenus, satyrs, nymphs, other woodland deities, and a band of female followers called maenads. In his mad wanderings he went to Egypt, where he was warmly welcomed and taught the cultivation of the vine. With the help of the Amazons he waged a successful war. Next he went on toward India. He crossed the Euphrates River on a bridge of ivy and vines. When he came to another broad river, Zeus sent a tiger to carry him across, for which reason the river came to be called "Tigris." In India, where he taught the arts of cultivation, many became his willing worshipers; even lions and panthers submitted to him and willingly drew his triumphal chariot. On his way back from India he passed through Phrygia, where he was purified by Rhea of the murders he had committed during his madness, and where he learned the rites of initiation into her mysteries. She, some say, gave him the costume for his ceremonies: a fawn skin or panther skin draped about his body, a band of ivy or vine leaves for his head, and a reed, the narthex, tipped with a pine cone and wreathed with ivy for his staff. This reed-turned-staff was the thyrsus. Dionysus adopted it rather than a wooden staff so that his followers, flushed with wine, would not hurt each other when they beat about with it. In Phrygia he lost Silenus for a short time. Silenus was brought before Midas, the king, and entertained him so delightfully with his stories that it was with regret that Midas restored him to Dionysus. In return for his courtesies to Silenus, Dionysus offered to grant Midas whatever he wished. Unhappily his greed got the better of him, and Midas wished for the golden touch. Dionysus was disappointed but granted the wish from which he ultimately freed him. From Phrygia he went to Thrace. Lycurgus, king of the Edonians on the Strymon River, did not welcome the wild new religion. He chased Dionysus with an ox-goad and captured his followers. Dionysus fled to the sea and was given asylum by the Nereid Thetis. Rhea freed the maenads and the gods (Rhea or Zeus) drove Lycurgus mad, so that he killed his own son Dryas, under the impression he was pruning a vine. Thrace was afflicted by a plague, which was lifted only when Lycurgus, guilty of the murder of his own kin, was torn to pieces by wild horses. Some say that when he was in Thrace, Dionysus found that Orpheus refused to honor him, and preached other mysteries, and to punish him Dionysus inspired the maenads to attack Orpheus and tear him to pieces. His dismembered head was flung into the Hebrus River and floated, still singing, to the island of Lesbos. Afterward it was laid to rest in a cave sacred to Dionysus. But others say this was not the case at all, that Dionysus did not cause the death of Orpheus, for it was the latter who invented the mysteries of Dionysus. Still others say, concerning these mysteries, that they were brought from Egypt to Greece by Melampus, who also introduced the ceremonies and phallic procession with which the god was honored, and these identify Dionysus with Egyptian Osiris. At the end of three years, or in the third year after his departure, Dionysus returned to Greece at the head of a great triumphal procession, in which Indian elephants were a feature. He freed the cities of Boeotia, and founded Eleutherae, the "city of freedom." When he came to his birthplace, Thebes, Pentheus, the king, who was the son of Agave and therefore a cousin of Dionysus, looked with misgiving on the revels of the followers of this new leader who claimed to be a god. The Theban women immediately accepted him and flocked to his revels on the mountain, but Pentheus denied his divinity and ordered him and his followers seized. This Pentheus did in spite of the warnings of Cadmus and the seer Tiresias, who warned him not to resist the gods. The walls of the prison where Pentheus had jailed the companions of Dionysus fell down of their own accord. Dionysus willingly appeared before Pentheus and endeavored by persuasion to secure his acceptance of the new god, but Pentheus would not be persuaded and ordered him bound; the fetters instantly fell from his limbs. Even these signs did not convince Pentheus; he arrogantly refused to recognize the divinity of the new god. Agave, his mother, had likewise refused to believe that Semele's lover was a god. Dionysus caused her and the women of Thebes to revel frenetically on Mount Cithaeron in celebration of his rites. He now caused Pentheus, who had refused every chance offered him to accept and worship the new god, to go mad. In his madness he went to the mountain to spy on the women at their revels, was discovered by them, and was torn to pieces by his own mother, who in her frenzy thought she had captured a young lion. From Thebes Dionysus went to Argos. There all the women except the daughters of King Proetus joined in his worship. To punish those who refused, Dionysus drove them mad, and they fled wildly over the mountains. They were ultimately cured of their madness by the seer Melampus. Wishing to go to Naxos, he hired a ship at Icaria and set off. The ship was manned by Tyrrhenian pirates, and they, observing the beauty of their young passenger and his rich robes, resolved to kidnap him and sell him for ransom. They changed the course of their ship and set out for Asia. When Dionysus accused them, they scorned him. Only one member of the crew, the steersman, recognized him as a god and warned his fellows, but they mocked him and ordered him to steer for Asia. Suddenly the ship stood still as if on rock; ivy grew up the mast, vine leaves covered the sails, wine streamed over the deck, and their passenger himself was transformed into a lion; or, as some say, lions and panthers were suddenly seen crouching at his feet. The pirates were maddened with fright and leaped into the sea, where they were transformed into dolphins. Only the steersman who had recognized his godhead was spared, and at his request steered the ship to Naxos. Theseus had stopped on Naxos with Ariadne on his way from Crete to Athens. There Dionysus, according to some accounts, fell in love with Ariadne. He appeared to Theseus in a dream and ordered him to leave Ariadne and depart for Athens. While Ariadne slept, Theseus obeyed his command. Dionysus woke her with a kiss and bore her away to Drius in Thessaly. She bore him Oenopion, Thoas, Staphylus, Latromis, Euanthes, and Taupopolus. But others say Theseus, for reasons unknown, abandoned Ariadne on Naxos, and that Dionysus came upon her weeping, fell in love with her, and married her. He loved her devotedly, and when she died he placed the gem-studded crown, made by Hephaestus, which he had given her as a wedding gift, among the stars as the Corona Borealis, or Ariadne's Crown. Dionysus was also said to have had a short-lived affair with Aphrodite, who bore him Priapus, and to have loved Carya, daughter of a king in Laconia, but she died suddenly and he transformed her into a walnut tree. At last, when he was universally recognized and worshiped as a god, Dionysus ascended to Olympus and took his place among the gods. As there were to be only Twelve Olympians, Hestia withdrew and gave her place to him. Once he had taken his place among the gods, he desired to fetch his mother from Hades. According to some accounts, he did not know the way, and asked a wayfarer to show him the path. The wayfarer agreed to do so in return for a reward. He led him to the Alcyonian Lake at Lerna, which was one of the entrances to Hades. Dionysus plunged into its bottomless depths and found his mother in the Underworld. He defied the lord of the Underworld to rescue her, or, as some say, he bribed Persephone with a gift of myrtle to free her, and returned with her to the upper air. When he returned, the wayfarer to whom he had promised a reward had died, but Dionysus honored his promise by placing the agreed sum on the dead man's grave. But some say he returned from Hades at a place near the bay of Troezen. The descent of Dionysus to Hades was annually celebrated with nocturnal rites on the bank of the Alcyonian Lake. A lamb was thrown into it as an offering to the guardian of Hades; trumpets were sounded with startling suddenness to summon Dionysus from the depths of the lake. When Dionysus took his mother to Olympus, he changed her name to Thyone so that the spirits who had been left behind in Hades would not know of her resurrection. The gods received her as the mother of a god and made her immortal.

Dionysus was the god of the vine, fertility, and of joyous life. He was the god of hospitality who brings joy to the feast and frees men from care. He was a god of peace, who brings men law and civilization. He was associated with Apollo and the Muses as a god of poets and musicians. He was honored with a special series of festivals, the Oscho-phoria, Lesser Dionysia, Lenaea, Anthesteria, and the Greater Dionysia. This last, celebrated in Athens in the spring (March-April), when the vine begins to sprout, and lasting for five days, was most splendid of all. During the celebration all the ordinary business of life stopped, prisoners were freed to take part, and no one was imprisoned during its course. The festival was marked by the Thymelic contest (the Thymele was the altar of Dionysus that stood in the center of the orchestra in the Greek theaters). These were performances of the works of poets given in open air theaters. Even to observe them was an act of worship. The works the poets and musicians wrote for the Greater Dionysia were the foundation, and ultimately, the whole magnificent structure of Greek drama. The dithyramb, the form used by the poets, was invented by Arion of Corinth in honor of Dionysus. In honor of Dionysus musicians were freed from paying taxes, and from the 4th century B.C. for 800 years thereafter, members of the guild of the Artists of Dionysus were freed from military service. Dionysus was the god of joy and freedom, of vegetation, of peace, and the arts of civilization, who was everywhere worshiped with merry revels. He was also a god of the earth. The death of the vine and vegetation with the coming of winter was associated with the flight or the death of the god. The renewal of the vine in the spring was associated with his rebirth. Every third year festivals, celebrated by women and girls only, were held in his honor. Some say the festivals were held every third year because Dionysus was away on his travels this length of time before he returned to Greece. Others say the interval marks the period which Dionysus, as a son of Zeus and Persephone, spends in the Underworld, at the end of which he is reborn. The tomb from which he was resurrected was at Delphi. During the festival the rites symbolized frantic grief over the death of the god and wild joy over his resurrection. The women who performed them were the maenads (also called bacchantes and Thyiades). The maenads celebrated his worship with wild dances, clashing cymbals, drums, and piping flutes. They did not worship him in temples, but rather held their revels in the unblemished fastnesses of mountain and forest, coursing through the wilderness with heads crowned with ivy and swinging torches to light their revels. They tore the flesh of sacrificial victims apart with their hands and ate it raw to commemorate the dismemberment of Dionysus by the Titans. The wildest orgies took place in Thrace and Asiatic Greece, in which latter area the worship of Dionysus came to be associated with that of Cybele (Rhea), Atys, and Sabazius. In Greece itself, the revelers retired to Mount Parnassus near Delphi, and to Mount Cithaeron and Taygetus for their orgies, as well as to various other places in Boeotia, Argos and Laconia. Some say there was another Dionysus, a son of Zeus and Persephone, who was called Zagreus and Sabazius. As Sabazius he was very wise, and was the first to yoke oxen, for which reason he was sometimes represented wearing a horn. Celebrations for Sabazius, particularly in Thrace, were held at night to cloak the disgraceful conduct attending them. Dionysus was also identified with Iacchus, the brother or lover of Demeter, and was worshiped at the Eleusinian Mysteries with Demeter and Persephone.

Dionysus had many epithets. Among them were Lenaeus, because he taught men how to crush grapes in vats—lenoi; Mitrephorus (Mitre-bearer), because he wore a band around his head to prevent, according to some accounts, the headache which sometimes followed over-indulgence in wine;

actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; q̄ as d or j, s̄ as s or sh, t̄ as t or ch, z̄ as z or zh.

Bromius, from the thunder which accompanied his birth; Pyrigenes, because he was born amid fire; Thriambus, because he was the first to celebrate a triumph on his return from India; and Lyaeus (the Loosener) because of the relaxing effect of wine. The vine, ivy, rose, laurel, and asphodel were sacred to him, as well as the lion, panther, lynx, tiger, dolphin, ox, and goat. In art he appeared sometimes as a mature, bearded man, but the more usual representation was as a slim youth of almost effeminate beauty, clad in the skin of a wild animal, and with his flowing locks crowned with a wreath of ivy or vine leaves. His attributes are the thyrsus and cup, or grapes, and often he is represented surrounded by satyrs, nymphs, maenads, Muses, or other members of his retinue.

Perhaps more than the other gods, except Demeter, Dionysus represented an enlightened symbolism on the part of the Greeks. The wine he gave to man was a power for good or ill, depending on the use to which it was put. His worship embraced wild and savage elements, as well as the most highly developed arts. The death and renewal of vegetation, symbolized by the death and resurrection of the god, was an intimation of immortality.

Diores (dī-ō'rēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Amarynceus of Messene. He accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan War as a captain of the Epeans, and was slain by a Thracian ally of the Trojans.

Dioscouri (dī-os-kū'ri). In mythology, Castor and Polydeuces (Latin, Pollux), the twin sons of Leda, and the brothers of Helen and Clytemnestra. According to some accounts, Tyndareus of Sparta was the father of Leda's sons, and as such they were called Tyndaridae. Others say Tyndareus was the father of Polydeuces only, and Zeus was the father of Castor. Some maintain that Zeus was the father of both (Dios-Kouroi, i.e. "Sons of Zeus"), but the generally accepted account is that Castor and his sister Clytemnestra were the children of Tyndareus, and Polydeuces and Helen were the offspring of Zeus. In any event, they were such noble, manly youths that they were named Dioscouri, "striplings of Zeus," and became Spartan heroes. Castor was renowned as a tamer of horses, and won prizes at the Olympic Games. Some say he taught Heracles the arts of fencing, cavalry tactics, and strategy. Polydeuces was noted for his skill in boxing, and also won prizes at the Olympic Games, as well as at the funeral games for Pelias. The brothers were among the Argonauts who accompanied Jason to Colchis to recover the Golden Fleece. In the course of the journey Polydeuces overcame Amycus, king of the Bebryces, in a boxing match, and killed him. The Dioscouri also took part in the Calydonian Hunt. Among their other deeds, they helped Peleus devastate Iolcus and kill Cretheis, the wife of Acastus who had falsely accused Peleus. When their sister Helen was carried off at an early age by Theseus and Pirithous, they went to Athens to rescue her. They conquered Athens, and, as Theseus was at this time in Hades with Pirithous, they set Menestheus on the throne of Athens, found Helen in Aphidnae where Theseus had hidden her with his mother, and carried her and the mother of Theseus back to Sparta. When, much later, Helen stood on the walls of Troy and pointed out to King Priam various Greek heroes who were besieging the city to recover her, she looked in vain for her valorous brothers, unaware that they had died and been deified since she had been carried off from Sparta by Paris. The Dioscouri were invited to attend the marriage of the twins, Idas and Lynceus, to the daughters of Leucippus, Phoebe and Hilaira. At the wedding they seized the prospective brides and carried them off and had children by them. Phoebe bore Mnesilus to Polydeuces; Hilaira bore Anogon to Castor. At some later date the Dioscouri and Idas and Lynceus were reconciled, and united their forces to make a cattle raid in Arcadia. When it came time to divide the spoils, Idas, who had been chosen by lot to fix on a method of division, cut one of the cows into four parts and decreed that whoever ate his part first should have half the stolen cattle, and that he who finished his part next should get the other half. Idas thereupon gobbled down his quarter and immediately set to work to help Lynceus finish his. Thus having disposed of their two quarters the quickest, Idas and Lynceus claimed all the cattle and drove them off to Messenia. Castor and Polydeuces later followed them into Messenia, and while Idas and Lynceus were away sacrificing they seized the cattle, took other booty, and waited in a hollow tree to waylay Idas and Lynceus on their return. But Lynceus, who had such sharp eyes he could see through the bole of a tree, warned Idas, and as they came toward the place of ambush Idas hurled his spear and killed Castor. Polydeuces attacked him, and though felled by a stone Idas cast at him, he succeeded in killing Lynceus. At this point Zeus intervened to save his son, and killed Idas with a thunderbolt. (But some say this fight between the two sets of twins broke out when the Dioscuri carried off the brides of Idas and Lynceus.) Polydeuces was heartbroken over the loss of his brother, and after he had set up a trophy to commemorate his victory over Lynceus, he prayed that he might die too. But as the son of Zeus, he was immortal. He asked to share his immortality with his brother. Zeus agreed. Thereafter Castor lived in the upper air one day, while Polydeuces was under the earth, and the next day they changed places, and so they alternated. Or, as some say, Polydeuces spent every other day with the gods in Olympus, the intervening day being spent with his brother in Hades. But according to the Spartans, Polydeuces, the immortal twin, was the Morning Star and Castor was the Evening Star; as one set, the other rose. And some say that Zeus set the images of the Dioscuri in the heavens as the Twins to honor their devotion to each other. According to a story told by Pausanias, the house where the Dioscuri lived still stood in Sparta long after their disappearance from the earth. Once the Dioscuri, pretending to be strangers, appeared there one night and asked to be allowed to sleep in their old room. The owner, although welcoming them, regretfully refused their request for that room, as it was occupied by his daughter. The next morning the girl and everything in the room had disappeared. All that remained were images of the Dioscuri and some sprigs of an herb. The Dioscuri were regarded as the saviors of shipwrecked sailors: sailors in danger, seeing the sign of their presence in a flame at the masthead, prayed to them, vowed the sacrifice of a white lamb, and the danger passed. They were renowned for their bravery and skill in arms, and were the patron gods of warlike youth, by whom they were honored as the composers of certain warlike dances and songs. They were also the protecting gods of the rites of hospitality. Their attribute is an egg-shaped cap crowned with a star. They were honored in Athens as gods, and at Sparta they were worshiped with Heracles and other heroes. The Spartans carried a symbol of the Dioscuri, consisting of two parallel beams connected by cross-pieces, when they went into battle. The Dioscuri were said to have hated the Messenians, because two Messenian youths, Gonippus and Panormus, impersonated them in the Second Messenian War. The Dioscuri sat in a wild pear tree during a battle, and when Aristomenes, a Messenian hero, was driving the Spartans back, the Dioscuri seized his shield. While he looked for his shield, the Spartans escaped. Again, with their sister Helen, they drove Aristomenes back when he attempted to make a night attack on Sparta. Their enmity to the Messenians lasted until the founding of the new city of Messene (369 B.C.), when the Messenians sacrificed to them and won their forgiveness. At the Battle of Aegospotami (405 B.C.), the Dioscuri were said to have hovered over the Spartan fleet and to have helped them to the decisive victory they won over the Athenians there which brought the Peloponnesian Wars to a close. After this victory the Spartans dedicated two golden stars at the shrine of Delphi to commemorate their divine companions in the battle. Shortly before the Battle of Leuctra (371 B.C.), the golden stars fell from their place at Delphi and disappeared. The Spartans met disastrous defeat at the hands of the Thebans in this battle, from which Sparta never recovered. The worship of the Dioscuri passed to Italy in early times, and they were especially honored in Rome and Tusculum. The original temple of Castor in Rome, in which the Senate sometimes sat, was erected in the Forum in their honor in 484 B.C., in gratitude for their assistance at the battle of Lake Regillus that had taken place 12 years earlier. An annual review of the Roman knights was held in their honor on the 15th of July. Greeks and Romans also worshiped them as gods of the sea; before the invention of the compass, the twin stars Castor and Pollux were important aids to navigation.

Diphilus (dif'i-lus). One of the chief Athenian poets of the New Comedy, and a contemporary of Menander. He was born at Sinope, in Asia Minor, and was active c300 B.C. Of the 100 plays he is said to have written, titles of 60 and fragments of 50 survive. His subjects were drawn from every day life—an extant fragment of his work is concerned with the sign, the way the smoke rises from the hearth, by which he can tell whether he will get a good dinner when he is invited to dine out—and from mythology. He was greatly admired in antiquity; Plautus and Terence borrowed extensively from him.

Dipoenus and Scyllis (di-pe'nus; sil'is). Greek sculptors of the archaic period (fl. c580 B.C.). They worked together and their names are always coupled. They executed sculptures in wood and ivory and also, it is thought, in marble. Some say they were sons or pupils of Daedalus, and that Scyllis invented the art of carving in marble. Little is really known about them, although Pliny the Elder mentions that they worked at Sicyon, and it is thought that the noted school of sculpture at that city owed its rise to them.

Dipolia (di-pol'i-a) or Diipolia (di-ip-ō-li'a). An ancient Athenian festival celebrated annually, with the sacrifice of an ox, about the end of June, on the Acropolis, in honor of Zeus Polieus—that is, Protector of the City. Also called Boughponia (q.v.).

Dipylon Gate (dip'i-lon). Chief gateway of ancient Athens, traversing the walls on the NW side. As its name indicates, it was in fact a double gate, consisting of a strongly fortified rectangular court between an outer and an inner portal. Each portal also was double, having two doors, each $11\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, separated by a central pier. The foundations of this gate, alone among those of ancient Athens, survive in great part, and from it toward the SW extends a beautiful stretch of the original wall of Themistocles, built under Peloponnesian menace after the Greek victories over the Persians in 480 and 479 B.C. This wall, in its contrasted construction of admirably fitted blocks and rough stones, confirms literary witness to the haste of work spurred on by emergency. The Dipylon is identical with the Sacred Gate, and among the roads diverging from it is the Sacred Way to Eleusis. It was long held that an opening in the wall immediately SW of the Dipylon was the Sacred Gate, but Dörpfeld found that this was a passage for the stream which he identified as the Eridanus.

Dirce (dër'sē). In Greek mythology, the wife of Lycus, put to death by Amphion and Zethus, sons of Antiope, in revenge for her ill treatment of their mother. She was bound to the horns of a bull and dragged to death. (Her execution is represented in the famous sculpture group The Farnese Bull.) Her body was thrown into a well on Mount Cithaeron thereafter known as the fountain of Dirce.

Dis (dis). In Roman mythology, a name of Pluto, and hence of the lower world.

Discobolus (dis-kob'ō-lus). Statue of a discus thrower by Myron, Greek sculptor of the 5th century B.C., known from literary descriptions and from copies in Rome (the Lancalotti head, the torso in the Museo Nazionale, the Vatican restoration) and in the British Museum. The body is bent forward and turned toward the right as the heavy discus is swung back, wonderful art being shown in the choice and expression of the moment of repose when, the backward motion completed, the powerful cast forward is on the point of execution.

Discordia (dis-kôr'di-a). Latin name of Eris.

Dithyrambus (dith-i-ram'bus). An epithet of Dionysus, meaning "the Child of the Double Door," from the fact that he was born twice. From this epithet comes the dithyramb, a form of Greek lyric composition, originally a choral song in honor of Dionysus, afterward of other gods, heroes, etc. First given artistic form by Arion (c625 B.C.) and rendered by cyclic choruses, it was perfected, about a century later, by Lasus of Hermione, and at about the same time tragedy was developed from it in Attica. Its simpler and more majestic form, as composed by Lasus, Simonides, Bacchylides, and Pindar, assumed in the latter part of the 5th century a complexity of rhythmical and musical form and of verbal expression which degenerated in the 4th century into a mimetic performance rendered by a single artist. From these different stages in its history the word dithyramb has been used in later ages both for a nobly enthusiastic and elevated and for a wild or inflated composition.

Dittany (dit'a-ni). A plant which grew, among other places, on Mount Dicte in Crete, whence its name. In the Aeneid, it is named as an herb, prepared by Venus and given to the physician Iapis, without his knowledge, to heal the wound which Aeneas had received in the war with Turnus in Latium. It was often referred to as a sacred herb.

Dium or Deium (di'um). Place in Macedonia near the Hebrus River. According to the legend, Orpheus withdrew to this spot after his final parting from Eurydice and played and sang for birds, beasts, and trees only, refusing to have anything more to do with women. Here he was set upon, according to some accounts, by maenads who were sent by Dionysus to punish him for denying his cult; according to others, it was the women of the Cicones who attacked him for keeping apart from the society of women. In any case, the women tore him limb from limb and cast his severed head into the Hebrus River. Afterward the women were transformed into oak trees.

Dives (di'vēz), Crassus. See Crassus, Marcus Licinius.

Divitiacus (div-i-ti'a-kus). Aeduan noble, brother of Dumnorix. He was an ally of Rome and a warm personal friend of Caesar. He was the guest of Cicero during a political visit to Rome. He rendered services to Caesar against Ariovistus and against the Belgae. Through his intercession Dumnorix' treason in 58 B.C. was pardoned by Caesar.

Dodecanese (dō-dek-ā-nēz', nēs'). [Greek, Dodekanesos, meaning "Twelve Islands."] Group of Greek islands in the SE part of the Aegean Sea near the SW coast of Turkey. There are 12 main islands: Astypalea, Chalce, Calymna, Carpathus, Casus, Cos, Lerus, Nisyros, Patmos, Rhodes, Syme, and Telus. In addition, there are many small ones.

Dodona (dō-dō'nā). An ancient town in Epirus, probably situated on or near Mount Tomarus, SW of modern Ioannina. It was the seat of the oldest Greek oracle, dedicated to Zeus Naios in an oak grove hung with vessels of brass, by which the god's voice was thought to be made audible. The priestess of the oracle instructed the ancient Pelasgi, according to Herodotus, to adopt the names of the gods that were brought to Greece by the Egyptians, for these names had not, as many thought, originated with the Greeks. Some say that two of the sacred women of the temple of Zeus in Egyptian Thebes were carried off by Phoenicians. One of them was sold in Libya, where she founded the oracle of Ammon. The other was sold in Greece and founded the first oracle in Greece, this one of Dodona. But the priestesses at Dodona said that two black doves flew away from Egyptian Thebes. One went to Libya. The other flew to Dodona, alighted on an oak tree there, and began to speak in a human voice. She said that on that spot there should henceforth be an oracle of Zeus. The people of Dodona, feeling they had received instructions from heaven, immediately set to work to build the shrine. The oaks of the grove were sacred, and had the power of speech and prophecy, as in the oaken beam that Athena put in the keel of the Argo. Sometimes the prophecies were made known by the rustling of the leaves of the sacred trees. This oracle, with those of Delphi and Zeus Ammon in Libya, enjoyed the highest repute throughout the ancient world.

Dodonian (dō-dō'ni-an). Epithet of Zeus from the famous sanctuary, grove and oracle of Zeus at Dodona in Epirus.

Dolabella (dol-a-bel'a), Publius Cornelius. Roman patrician; born c70 B.C.; died at Laodicea in Asia Minor, 43 B.C. He is noted chiefly as the son-in-law of Cicero. Ruined by his profligate habits, he sought to restore his fortunes by joining the standard of Caesar in the civil war. He commanded Caesar's fleet in the Adriatic in 49 B.C., and in 48 B.C. participated in the battle of Pharsalus. He obtained the consulship after the death of Caesar in 44 B.C. At first he acted in support of the Senate, but was subsequently influenced by bribery to join the party of Antony. He received from Antony Syria as his proconsular province, but was defeated at Laodicea by Cassius. He was, at his own request, killed by one of his soldiers in order not to fall into the hands of the enemy.

Dolabra (dō-lā'bra). In Roman antiquity, a cutting implement of various shapes, used, actor; up, lūte, pūll; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

according to shape and purpose, as a hatchet, an ax, a knife, a chisel, a mattock, or a pickax. Dolabrae of an ornate form were employed by the priests in slaughtering their sacrificial victims.

Dolius (dō'li-us). In the Odyssey, a faithful slave given to Penelope by her father when she married Odysseus. He cared for Laertes in the country during the absence of Odysseus, welcomed Odysseus when he returned after 20 years, and helped him to defeat the relatives of Penelope's suitors after Odysseus himself had slain the suitors.

Dolius. An epithet of Hermes, meaning "Crafty."

Dolon (dō'lon). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Eumedes. On condition that he be given the immortal horses of Achilles once they were captured, he volunteered to go as a spy to the Greek camp in the tenth year of the Trojan War. Clad in a wolf's skin, he set out on his mission, but was captured by Diomedes and Odysseus, who had set out to spy on the Trojan camp. He betrayed the positions of the Trojans and their allies, and advised Diomedes and Odysseus that Rhesus, leader of the Thracian allies, was encamped at some distance from the main body of the Trojans. As soon as they had learned what they wanted from Dolon, the two Greeks, ignoring his pleas, killed him and proceeded to the Trojan camp.

Dolonea (dō-lon-ē'ā). The "Adventures of Dolon," a name given by grammarians to the tenth book of the Iliad. (JJ)

Domitian (dō-mish'ān). [Full Latin name, Titus Flavius Domitianus Augustus.] Roman emperor (81-96); born at Rome, Oct. 25, 51 A.D.; died there, Sept. 18, 96 A.D. He was the second son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, and the brother of Titus, whom he succeeded. He undertook a campaign against the Chatti in 83, in the course of which he began the construction of a boundary wall between the Danube and the Rhine. This wall was guarded by soldiers settled upon public lands (agri decumates) along its course. He carried on (86-90) unsuccessful wars against the Dacians under Decebalus, finally purchasing peace by the promise of a yearly tribute. He recalled Agricola, whose victories (78-84) in Britain aroused his jealousy. Though the beginning of his reign had been marked by sincere attempts to govern well, to enforce the laws, to build temples, and to supervise the government closely, the last years of his reign were sullied by cruelty and tyranny, induced by fear of revolt and assassination. He was murdered by the freedman Stephanus, at the instance of the empress and several officers of the court, who were in fear of their lives.

Domitius Ulpianus (dō-mish'us ul-pi-ā'nus). See Ulpian.

Dorian Hexapolis (dō'ri-ān hek-sap'ō-lis). See Hexapolis, Dorian.

Dorians (dō'ri-anz). One of the traditional branches of the ancient Greek people. According to the tradition, they were descendants of Dorus, the youngest son of Hellen and Orseis. They were probably of Illyrian stock and, fighting on foot instead of on horseback and carrying iron weapons, they pushed into Epirus and Aetolia and destroyed the civilizations they found there. The Dorian invasion of Greece, as a point of departure for subsequent legend and history, was equalled in importance only by the Trojan War. Some went into the region between Mount Oeta and the Corinthian Gulf, a part of which afterward came to be known as Doris, but played only a minor role in Greek history. Others took to the sea and established settlements in Crete and the Greek islands, bringing strife and warfare in their train. Important Dorian settlements were founded in Asia Minor, Cos, and Rhodes. The greatest number moved across the Corinthian Gulf, perhaps from Naupactus, as the legend states, and conquered the Peloponnesus (c1100 B.C.). Everywhere they went the names of their three tribes—the Hylleis, Pamphyli, and Dymanes—persisted. In the Peloponnesus the Dorians conquered Corinthia and Argos. The destruction of the strongholds of Mycenae and Tiryns is thought to have taken place at this time. The largest number settled in the valley of the Eurotas River in Laconia. And it was in this area that the impact of their race made its most consistent impression in the development of what came to be thought of as the Dorian character, for they subdued the inhabitants, making them their subjects, yet maintained the purity of their own race. In connection with their conquest of the Peloponnesus the Dorians called their invasion a "return." They linked themselves to Heracles and claimed that they were regaining an inheritance in the Peloponnesus that he had won for them. The Dorian tribe called the Hylleis claimed that their name was derived from Hyllus, the son of Heracles. The Dorian invasion marks the end of the Mycenaean civilization and begins the so-called Dark Ages of Greece, a period of some 300 years during which extensive changes occurred in many aspects of Greek life.

Doric Order (dor'ik). In architecture, the oldest and strongest of the three Greek orders, in its external forms the simplest of all, but in its most perfect examples, especially as exhibited in the monuments of the age of Pericles at Athens, combining with solidity and force the most subtle and delicate refinement of outlines and proportions that architecture has known. A characteristic of the Grecian Doric column is the absence of a base; the channelings are usually 20 in number, and in section approximate to a semi-ellipse; the capital has generally no astragal (an ornamental molding), but only one or more fillets or annulets, which separate the channelings from the echinus (convex projecting molding of eccentric curve, supporting the abacus). The profile of the capital in the best examples is a carefully studied eccentric curve, neither flat enough to be hard in effect, nor full enough to be weak. The echinus prior to the time of perfection spread out far beyond the shaft; the later Greeks made it a frustum of a cone. In good Greek examples, as a rule, no horizontal lines are found in a Doric building, floor- and cornice-lines, etc., being curved slightly upward, the profiles of the column-shafts are slightly convex, and all columns are slightly inclined toward the center of the building. All these particularities have relation to the optical effects so subtle that their influence is felt rather than seen.

DORIC ORDER

Dorieus (dôr'i-us). Son of Anaxandridas, king of Sparta, and the first of his two wives to whom he was married concurrently. According to Herodotus, the reason for this unusual marital state was that the first wife of Anaxandridas bore him no children. The Spartans urged him to take a second wife, since he would not give up the first one, and maintain the two in separate houses and with nearly equal honors. The second wife bore Anaxandridas a son, Cleomenes, who became the heir to the throne. Some time thereafter, the first wife, who up to this time had seemed to be incapable of bearing children, also produced a son, whom she named Dorieus. In rapid succession she also bore Leonidas, later to become the hero of Thermopylae, and Cleombrotus. Dorieus was the most promising of the sons and, since Cleomenes seemed to be mentally unbalanced at times, Dorieus fully expected to succeed his father as king. However, when Anaxandridas died, the Spartans followed the law and made Cleomenes, the first-born son, the king. Dorieus could not bear to be subject to Cleomenes, and in anger sailed away with a company of Spartans to found a colony. In his disappointment, he failed to consult the oracle at Delphi, and to observe the customs before setting out to found a colony. He went to Libya and established a city there, but after three years was driven out. He returned to Sparta to consider what he should do, and was told by a seer to go to Heraclea in Sicily, for as a descendant of Heracles, he was entitled to the land. The claims of the Heraclidae to this region rested on the following grounds: When Heracles was driving the cattle of Geryon back to Argos, a bull escaped at Rhegium and swam across to Sicily. Heracles swam across after him. He landed in the kingdom of Eryx, in whose herds the bull had found a welcome. Eryx challenged Heracles to a series of contests, staking his kingdom against the bull. In the contests Heracles slew Eryx and won his kingdom, but left it to the inhabitants to enjoy until one of his descendants could come to claim it. Now Dorieus decided to be that descendant who recovered the land formerly won by Heracles. This time he went to the oracle at Delphi before he set out, and was assured by the priestess that he would gain the land as he intended. Dorieus returned to Libya, gathered up his followers, and proceeded to Sicily. On the way, according to some accounts, he stopped to help the people of Croton in a war against the Sybarites, and dedicated a temple to Athena in Sybaris after he had helped to take the city. The Crotonians disclaimed this story entirely; they said Dorieus only came to their aid when victims foreshadowed defeat of the Sybarites, at which point he deserted them and came over to the side of the Crotonians. From Sybaris he proceeded to Heraclea Minoa, in Sicily, helped the Selinuntians to overthrow their tyrant, and made himself tyrant of Selinus. After a while the inhabitants revolted against him, and though he fled to the altar of Zeus, they seized him and put him to death. Ironically, if Dorieus had been patient he would have become king of Sparta, for Cleomenes reigned only a short time and died without male issue. Leonidas, brother of Dorieus and half-brother of Cleomenes, became king in his place.

Doris (dō'ris, dōr'is). In classical mythology, the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married Nereus, and their 50 daughters were called the Nereids. The name Doris is sometimes given to the sea by the poets, as by Vergil.

Doris. In ancient geography, a territory in C Greece, surrounded by Phocis, Locris, Aetolia, and Malis; a valley between Oeta and Parnassus. It was occupied by the Dorians, perhaps c1100 B.C. Although they moved on through Greece, conquered the Peloponnesus, made forays into Crete and the Aegean islands, founded many cities in Greece and Asia Minor, the small area of Doris was ever after considered as the motherland of the Dorians. This was its most important role in Greek history.

Doris. In ancient geography, a part of the coast of Caria, Asia Minor.

Doritis (dō-rī'tis). An epithet of Aphrodite meaning "Bountiful."

Dorium (dō-rī'um). In ancient geography, a town in Nestor's realm, in N Messenia. Here, some say, Thamyris engaged in a contest with the Muses. He lost in the contest and was struck blind and lost his art of singing.

Dorus (dō'rus). In Greek mythology, generally represented as the youngest son of Hellen and Orseis (but some say he was the son of Creusa and Hellen's son Xuthus). He migrated from Thessaly to the region between Mount Ossa and Mount Olympus. His followers, being compelled to move from there, went to the Pindus mountains, and from there to Dryopis. From Dryopis they crossed over into the Peloponnesus and established the race of the Dorians.

Dorus. In Greek legend, a son of Apollo and Phthia. He was slain by Aetolus, who seized the land and named it Aetolia after himself. The brothers of Dorus were Laodocus and Polypoetes.

Doryphorus (dō-rif'ō-rus). In Greek antiquity, and in art and archaeology, a spear-bearer, a man armed with a spear; specifically, a nude figure, or one almost nude, holding a spear or lance: a favorite subject with ancient sculptors. The most noted Doryphorus was that by the great artist Polyclitus, best known from the copy in Naples, which is regarded as his celebrated canon or type of what the perfectly proportioned human figure should be.

Drabescus (dra-bes'kus). [Modern name, Drama.] In ancient geography, town in N Greece, situated between the Strymon and Nestus rivers, about 78 miles NE of Thessalonica.

Draco (drā'kō) or Dracon (drā'kon). Athenian legislator; fl. in the last half of the 7th century B.C. According to tradition, he was appointed (c621 B.C.) to reform existing laws and to formulate the first written code of laws for Athens. Among his reforms was the establishment of 51 Ephetae (judges), chosen from the Eupatrids (nobles), to try cases of bloodshed that did not come before the Areopagus. The court of the Ephetae sat in various places, depending on the nature of the offense, as at Delphi, in the temple of Apollo, or at Phalerum, the old port of Athens. Those who had committed the crime of manslaughter abroad were not permitted to set foot on Attic soil until they were cleared of the charge. Since they had to make their defense standing in a boat drawn up near the shore, the court went to Munychia, the hill above the Piraeus, to hear their cases. (Telamon, charged with the murder of his brother Phocus, was not permitted to land at Aegina, his father's home, to defend himself; he secretly built a mole and shouted his defense from the end of it that reached out into the sea.) According to Draco's code, one who was unable to pay a debt could be claimed as a slave by his creditor. On the completion of the code, there having been no written code previously, the people were so overjoyed that they smothered Draco accidentally under a deluge of cloaks. On account of the number of offenses to which it affixed the penalty of death, his code was said to have been written in blood. His code was superseded for the most part by that of Solon (594 B.C.).

Draco. A northern constellation—the Dragon. As pictured since ancient times, the figure is that of a serpent with several small coils. It appears at a very ancient date to have had wings in the space now occupied by the Little Bear.

Drama. Greek Tragedy. Greek tragedy (goat-song) came into being in the 6th century B.C. as part of the festival of Dionysus, god of wine. The circular threshing-floor, where the harvested grain was brought for threshing, provided a suitable stage, or so we assume from the form long preserved by the orchestra (dancing-place). At one side could be erected a tent (in Greek, skene, whence our word scene), where performers might rest, or change their costumes to appear in a new role. Presently someone added wooden bleachers, and the open-air theatron or theater (watching-place) was born. The temporary scene, replaced by a permanent structure in stone and wood, was the forerunner of the permanent scene-buildings of the Hellenistic theater and those of the still more elaborate Roman stage. After an accident, we are told, the wooden stands were given up, and the orchestra was moved to the foot of a hill, where spectators might stand or sit on the sloping ground, and where eventually stone seats were cut or set. As early as the 7th century B.C. we hear of the performance of dithyrambs, odes sung and danced by a chorus in honor of Dionysus, and c600 B.C. of Arion who fixed their form, gave them definite subjects, and trained Corinthian choruses to perform them. Introduced to Athens by one Lasus, the dithyramb quickly became popular, and by 508 B.C. the Athenians had established a competition in dithyramb at the Dionysus festivals; the old legends of the epic cycles provided hundreds of themes, and the list of winners includes Simonides, Pindar, and Bacchylides, but after 470 B.C. it was eclipsed by the towering popularity of the competition in tragedy, and ceased to attract leading poets. In the meantime, a critical date in the development of the drama at Athens had been 534 B.C., when an actor-producer of dithyrambs named Thespis (whence thespian) detached the chorus leader from the chorus, creating a character (hypocrites, meaning "answerer") and making possible monologue (e.g., a herald or messenger responds to questioning of the chorus by describing events which have occurred off-stage) and dialogue between character and chorus, as well as the purely choral odes. This is regarded as the birth of tragedy. The prize, we are told, was a goat, which the company might appropriately sacrifice to Dionysus and then eat.

After Thespis we hear next of Choerilus, Phrynichus, and Pratinas. Of Choerilus, we learn that he wrote 160 plays. Of Phrynichus, Herodotus tells us that when his Capture of Miletus was presented, the guilt-stricken Athenians, who had refused to support the Ionian city of Miletus in its disastrous revolt against Darius, fined him 1000 drachmas and forbade further performance of the play; forty years after its beginnings, tragedy could prove a diet too strong for its audience. Phrynichus is said to have been the first to introduce female characters; female parts, however, were always taken by men or boys. By this time each playwright competing in the contest in tragedy was required to submit a tetralogy, consisting of a trilogy—three tragedies which might deal with the changing fortunes of an individual or a family (e.g., Prometheus Bound, Prometheus Released, Prometheus Fire-Bringer), or might be unrelated—and a fourth play known as a satyr-play. From the scripts submitted, officials selected three tetralogies for production. Apparently the prize was awarded for the best tetralogy, though some references seem to designate single plays as winners. Of the 33 tragedies which have chanced to survive, not all won first place; second- and third-place plays are also represented. The plots regularly center around a hero or heroine who because of some defect ("tragic flaw"), not necessarily his own, is involved in conflict and crisis. In the hands of a master playwright it became a medium of social criticism. The chorus is usually a group of citizens or bystanders, elders, old women, captives, sea-nymphs, spokesmen, insofar as the poet has chosen to employ them in this capacity, for the force of public opinion; but they may be principals in the plot, as in Aeschylus' Suppliants, in which the 50 daughters of Danaus seeking refuge form the chorus. Retaining at first from the dithyrambic competition the traditional chorus of 50, the number was presently reduced to 12, then increased to 15. The titles of tragedy are most often taken from the principal figure (Agamemnon, Orestes, Electra, Oedipus, Medea) or from the chorus (Suppliants, Women of Trachis, Bacchae).

Our knowledge of Attic tragedy is based largely on the three dramatists from whose pens survive complete plays: Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. That this represents a consensus of ancient approval cannot be denied, because popularity determined the demand for manuscript copies, which in turn increased the chances of survival of any given play. We must remember that not all the extant plays received the prize on their initial performance, the judges frequently awarding the prize to plays now known only by their titles or fragments. Aeschylus (525–456 B.C.) makes his appearance early in the 5th century. He fought at Marathon, probably also at Salamis, and won his first victory in 484 B.C. An innovator, he added a second actor, making it possible to portray two characters in conflict, whose implications were underscored by the comments of the chorus. Of his 90 or so plays, seven have survived. The earliest, the oldest surviving European drama, is Suppliants, mentioned above. Agamemnon, relating the victorious return from Troy of Agamemnon and his prompt murder by his embittered wife Clytemnestra, is usually regarded as Aeschylus' greatest play and by some as the greatest Greek play. No tetralogy has survived intact; the only complete Attic trilogy is Aeschylus' Oresteia, consisting of Agamemnon, Choëphoroe, and Eumenides, which with its now lost satyr-play, Proteus, was presented in 458 B.C. and won the prize. Altogether, we are told, he won first prize 13 times.

After Aeschylus the next great tragic poet is Sophocles (c496–406 B.C.), like Aeschylus a profound thinker, a superb poet, and an innovator. Sophocles added a third actor, multiplying the possibilities of dramatic exchange, and we are told that it was he who increased the tragic chorus from 12 dancers to 15. Of his 125 or more plays, seven survive, and substantial fragments of others. In his first victory, 468 B.C., he defeated Aeschylus. Those who have sought a tragedy surpassing Aeschylus' Agamemnon have professed to find it in Sophocles' Oedipus the King, a play which in its initial performance took only second place, but many critics find Antigone also strangely moving. Contemporaries and rivals of Aeschylus and Sophocles were Aristias, the son of Pratinas, and Polyphrasmon or Polyphradmon, the son of Phrynichus, who in 467 B.C. competed, unsuccessfully, against Aeschylus' Theban tetralogy; Aristarchus of Tegea; and Ion of Chios. Later in the century we hear of Aeschylus' nephew Philocles, one of whose plays defeated (sic) Sophocles' Oedipus the King; Sophocles' son Iophon; Meletus, Sthenelus, Agathon, etc. Aeschylus' son Euphorion is said to have presented unproduced plays of his father, and with one of them in 431 B.C. to have won over both Sophocles and Euripides.

Euripides (c485–c406 B.C.), third of the three great tragic poets, made his first appearance in 455, but won his first victory only in 441 B.C. Of Greek dramatists, he was the least respectful of the Olympian gods, the most insistent in his demand for social reform, and the most modern in his appeal. His fellow Athenians regarded him as too advanced for their tastes, and he was repeatedly lampooned. In a long active career he was awarded the prize only five times, but among succeeding generations he was Greece's most popular tragic poet, the one whose plays were most frequently revived and the one most translated and adapted by the Romans. Of his 90-odd plays, the manuscript tradition has preserved 19 (or 18), of which those most frequently read today are Alcestis, Medea, Hippolytus, and Bacchae. Although in its own day it placed third, Medea has been staged for modern audiences with brilliant success. Of the obscure satyr-plays a single complete example, Euripides' Cyclops, has survived, but papyri from the trash-heaps of Egypt have yielded about 400 lines of Sophocles' Ichneutae and extended passages from Aeschylus' Dictyulci and Isthmiastae. For the traditional satyr-play of one of his tetralogies Euripides substituted Alcestis, a tragedy with a rare happy ending.

After Euripides we have the names of Neophron, Critias, Theodectes, Moschion, Polyidus, Chaeremon, Carcinus, Xenocles, two or even three poets named Astydamos, and many others, no play by any of whom did antiquity regard highly enough to preserve for posterity, unless Rhesus (which goes under Euripides' name) is in fact, as some scholars think, a 4th century composition. For fuller biographies and appraisals of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, see their separate articles, and for synopses of surviving Attic tragedies see under their titles. Roman Tragedy. The Romans, considering themselves obliged to cultivate a theater more intellectual than the boisterous and rowdy native mime, found in their search for innovations of plot and characterization that the Greek dramatists had virtually exhausted the old legends. Much Roman drama was therefore derivative—versions, adaptations, or even direct translations of familiar Greek plays. We are told that at Rome drama began in 240 B.C., when a manumitted Greek slave from Tarentum, Livius Andronicus (c284–c204 B.C.) presented both a Greek tragedy and a comedy in translation. We have the titles of eight tragedies and three comedies from his pen. His contemporary Cnaeus Naevius (c270–c201 B.C.) is credited with 34 comedies and seven tragedies adapted from Greek models, including an Andromacha and an Iphigenia, and two fabulae praetextae, historical dramas on Roman themes, a form of which he is regarded as the inventor. Quintus Ennius (239–169 B.C.) adapted from the Greek, especially from Euripides, at least 20 tragedies, and several unsuccessful comedies, and also composed two fabulae praetextae. Marcus Pacuvius (220–c130 B.C.), a nephew of Ennius, presented ten or more tragedies, one of which was a praetexta. Lucius Accius (c170–c85 B.C.), the most popular Roman tragic poet, admired and quoted by Cicero, imitated by Vergil, and frequently revived, adapted at least 45 Greek dramas, depending heavily on Euripides and Sophocles. We have also the titles, and a few fragments, of Decius and Brutus, two praetextae by Accius. After him the tragic theater in Rome consisted principally of revivals of earlier plays, but we hear of the success of a Thyestes by Varius, the editor of Vergil's Aeneid, and of a Medea by Ovid. Of this substantial corpus only fragments survive. In the 1st century A.D. the distinguished critic, orator, philosopher, essayist, and court wit, Lucius Annaeus Seneca, composed nine tragedies on Greek models; these are extant. Scholars have questioned whether they could ever have been successfully produced on the stage, though most are agreed that they are good armchair reading, and they profoundly influenced Elizabethan drama. Octavia, a praetexta, the only surviving example of a play of this form, has long had Seneca's name attached to it, but it is now held to be written by an imitator, later and less able, of Seneca's style. Repeated efforts to establish the native praetexta as an enduring attraction had failed, and thereafter in Rome the tragic stage is silent.

edy, like those of tragedy, are obscure; the word seems to mean "revel-song," and most scholars agree that it probably originated in spontaneous and no doubt often ribald merry-making at rural agricultural festivals. Ancient sources allude to little farces or mimes enacted at Sparta, Tarentum, Megara, and Thebes, perhaps also at Sicyon. In due course someone gave these form, the unity implied by a central idea and a plot. According to the Parian Marble, the first performance of comedy, in Attica at least, took place at the village of Icaria, and the author-producer was one Susarion of Megara; the date would be somewhat before 560 B.C., but some scholars question the veracity of the statement. About 500 B.C. Epicharmus and Phormis founded a much-admired school of comedy at Syracuse in Sicily. Mention of a comic prize awarded to Chionides of Athens in 486 B.C. indicates that by that time a contest in comedy comparable to the tragic competition, and like it dedicated to Dionysus, had been established at Athens. Ancient critics divided comedy into two styles, Old Comedy, represented by the political satire of Aristophanes, and New Comedy, represented by the comedy of manners of Menander. Between Chionides and Aristophanes we hear of Magnes, Cratinus, Crates, Pherecrates, Teleclides, Hermippus, Eupolis, and Phrynichus. Of all their works antiquity selected none for preservation; we have only titles and occasional fragments; but ancient critics ranked Cratinus and Eupolis, at least, as Aristophanes' equals, and Aristophanes often had to settle for second prize, or third. Aristophanes won only four first prizes, Teleclides eight, Eupolis seven.

Old Comedy, as is clear from the surviving plays of Aristophanes (c450-c385 B.C.) and what is known of those of his rivals, was extremely adult political or social farce; e.g., Aristophanes' Wasps, a satire on the Athenian jury system, which presents Philocleon ("Loves-Cleon"), an indefatigable jurymen, and his son Bdelycleon ("Hates-Cleon"), who in an effort to cure Philocleon of his addiction locks him up and prevents the chorus (of wasps: his fellow-jurymen) from rescuing him, but consents to his tapering off by holding court at home. Philocleon, trying the dog for stealing a Sicilian cheese, inadvertently votes to acquit, and when he realizes what he has done he collapses. The Frogs presents an uproarious debate in Hades, umpired by Dionysus, between Aeschylus and Euripides, who venomously attack each other's verse; the debate (agon) is a regular feature of Aristophanic comedy. In the Acharnians, Diceopolis, weary of war, negotiates a private peace with Sparta, purveyors of war-scarce delicacies flock to his market, and he ends up in the arms of two admiring flute-girls. In the Lysistrata, the women of Athens and Sparta, weary of war, withhold their favors from husbands and lovers, which soon brings a frantic embassy from Sparta to negotiate a truce. Of his 40 (or 44) plays 11 survive: Acharnians (first prize, 425 B.C.), Knights (first prize, 424 B.C.), Clouds (third prize, 423 B.C.; the text we have is a later revision), Wasps (second prize, 422 B.C.), Peace (second prize, 421 B.C.), Birds (second prize 414 B.C.), Lysistrata and Thesmophoriazusae (411 B.C.), Frogs (first prize, 405 B.C.), Plutus (408 B.C.; the surviving play is a revision presented in 388 B.C.), and Ecclesiazusae (391 B.C.). For comic effect Aristophanes employs situation, surprise, parody, ambiguity, and puns. He lodges charges of cowardice, effeminacy, thievery, and assorted rascalities against named Athenians who were presumably present in the audience; he repeatedly pillories the demagogue Cleon, and in the Clouds presents so grotesque a caricature of Socrates that at his trial, 24 years later, Socrates is still deploring it. The chorus, 24 in number, enthusiastically abet the principal character or violently oppose him; it plays an essential role in the unfolding of the plot, and at least once in each play turns to the audience and gives it a thorough scolding (the parabasis) for its faults and failings. Aristophanes' choral odes prove him a lyric poet of surpassing talent. His plays are sometimes described as "raw" or "pornographic"; it is true that he light-heartedly introduced a number of regrettable human weaknesses, but there is nothing in Aristophanes which, judged against the background of his times, would have seemed in bad taste to an audience of adult male Athenian citizens.

After Aristophanes comes a transitional period, for which critics of much later date

devised the term Middle Comedy. Of the playwrights associated with Middle Comedy, and the 800 plays they are said to have presented, not enough survives to make possible a neat characterization of the style; but we are given to understand that in Middle Comedy personal abuse was gradually dropped and the chorus, perhaps because of its expense, much reduced in importance. When we find these changes in effect in Aristophanes' two latest surviving plays, Plutus and Ecclesiazusae, we conclude that these are in fact early examples of Middle Comedy. In Plutus, a humble citizen named Chremylus, honest and consequently poor, is advised by Apollo's oracle to take home with him the first person he meets. This turns out to be Plutus, god of wealth, who is blind. Chremylus conducts him to the sanctuary of Asclepius, where he is healed, to the lasting benefit of Chremylus and his friends and the confusion of rascals everywhere. Among younger contemporaries of Aristophanes who composed both Old and Middle Comedy we have the names of Plato, sometimes called Plato Comicus to distinguish him from Plato the philosopher, and Eubulus. Of other Middle Comedy writers, ancient critics singled out for special admiration Anaxandrides, Antiphanes, Diodorus of Sinope, Alexis, Xenarchus, Timocles, Sotades, and three sons of Aristophanes: Ararus, Nicostratus, and Philetærus.

New Comedy developed out of Middle Comedy; by c320 B.C. the process of transition was complete. No New Comedy play has come down to us in the manuscript tradition. Until 1905 our knowledge of this style depended on a multitude of fragments, quoted by ancient grammarians to illustrate some point of grammar, diction, or meter, and the ubiquitous "cooking fragments," referring to the preparation of food, some hundreds of titles of lost plays, the comments of critics and literary historians, and translations and adaptations by Roman comic poets, who borrowed freely from New Comedy. New Comedy was a comedy of manners, its themes taken from daily life, involving misunderstandings, lovers' quarrels and reconciliations, lost children and recognition, coincidence, mistaken identity, and seduction, and a fairly constant cast of characters: the skinflint father, the sex-directed son, the madam, the call girl, the ingenue, the impudent slave, and the parasite or scrounger. The ingenue is often a foundling, an exposed child sold into slavery and used as slaves are used, identified in the last act as freeborn, a citizen, and thereby eligible for matrimony with the undependable but repentant young man; in New Comedy it seems to trouble no one that the ingenue may at the same time be a prostitute. The emphasis is away from broad social problems and centered on the individual and his struggle to achieve happiness. New Comedy is a direct ancestor of modern drawing-room comedy. By this time, if not earlier, the permanent stage background had become fixed, three doorways, which may represent the entrances to three private houses; the stage itself represents a street, leading, by lateral exits (the parodoi) to market-place, harbor, or suburbs, as required by the plot. This arrangement was perpetuated in the still more elaborate façades of the Roman scene. To the extent that it puts a limitation on entrances and exits, it affects the poet's development of the plot.

Ancient critics agreed that the greatest of New Comedy playwrights was Menander (342–291 B.C.), who wrote more than 100 plays. He won only eight prizes; like Euripides, he was more appreciated after his death. In 1905 there was found in Egypt a papyrus containing important sections of Menander, comprising at least one-half of his Arbitration, about one-third of his She Who Was Shorn and his Women of Samos, and one scene from the Hero. Then in 1959 the Swiss scholar Victor Martin published a new papyrus discovery, sensational in that it contains the complete text of Menander's Dyscolus (Grouch), certainly not one of his greatest efforts—by current standards it is astonishingly dull—but containing a promise of more to come. Roman playwrights, among them Naevius, Plautus, Caecilius Statius, Terence, Luscius Lanuvinus, Turpilius, and Afranius, borrowed ideas, characters, scenes, plots, or entire plays from Menander. Of his rivals, the most successful, ranked as his peers by their contemporaries, were Philemon (c361–262 B.C.; 97 plays, known from 64 titles, over 200 fragments, and three adaptations by Plautus) and Diphilus (341?–289 B.C.; about 100 plays, three prizes, and adaptations by Plautus and Terence). One Posidippus, we are told, won four prizes. Apollodorus of Carystus, who wrote 47 plays and won five victories, is represented by two adaptations by Terence, Hecyra and Phormio. Philemon's son Philemon is said to have won six prizes. A play by Demophilus was the original of Plautus' Asinaria. The records list many more.

Roman Comedy. Roman comedy, like Roman tragedy, was largely derivative. Finding in the New Comedy of the Greeks plots, themes, situations, and characters readily appreciated by Roman audiences, Roman playwrights for the most part set themselves to adapt Greek plays for Roman audiences, the adaptations in some instances approaching direct translations. Thus we are told of a beginning of a Roman theater in 240 B.C. when Livius Andronicus (c284–c204 B.C.), an emancipated Greek slave from Tarentum, presented Latin translations of a Greek tragedy and a Greek comedy, in Greek meters, setting a precedent for his successors who attempted both comedy (fabula palliata) and tragedy: Cnaeus Naevius (c270–c201 B.C.), credited with seven tragedies, 34 comedies mainly adapted from Greek New Comedy, and the creation of the Roman historical drama, known as the fabula praetexta; and Quintus Ennius (239–169 B.C.), author of 20 or more tragedies and of an undetermined number of comedies. Titus Maccius Plautus (c251–184 B.C.) confined his efforts to comedy; of his 'joke-packed comedies 21 have survived, and titles of others, among them unabashed adaptations from Menander, Philemon, Diphilus, and Demophilus; he was the most popular Roman comic poet, and his plays were repeatedly revived. Of Caecilius Statius, another manumitted slave, Roman comic poet next most admired after Plautus, we have titles and fragments, but no complete plays. Greek titles betray the source of most of his theater, and his Plocium was a close paraphrase of Menander's Plokion. Of Publius Terentius Afer (Terence), c195–159 B.C., still another manumitted slave, six plays survive, four adapted from Menander, two from Apollodorus of Carystus. Apparently these were all he ever presented, all very sophisticated and polished, too much so for his audience, it appears, for he never achieved popularity, even if the preservation of his plays indicates a measure of grudging respect. Terence was criticized for contaminatio, which seems to refer to his acknowledged practice of combining scenes from two or more Greek plays. Luscius Lanuvinus borrowed two plays from Menander, Sextus Turpilius six. Other Roman comic poets who adapted Greek New Comedy are hardly more than names: Quintus Trabea, Marcus Atilius, Aquilius, Licinius Imbrix. We hear also of a native Roman comedy, native insofar as it professed to abjure Greek models, the fabula togata or tabernaria, represented only by titles and fragments, whose principal poets were Titinius, Quinctius Atta, and L. Afranius. Thereafter the popular taste demanded less exacting fare, and farce and mime took over the Roman stage. (JJ)

Drama (drä'mä). See Drabescus.

Drances (dran'sēz). In the Aeneid, an aged and garrulous Latin, an enemy of Turnus. Following the death of Mezentius during the war between Aeneas and Turnus, Drances attempted to arrange a peace between Latinus and Aeneas so that the Latins could help to build the new Troy. He was unsuccessful in this attempt. He goaded and taunted Turnus and dared him to engage in single combat with Aeneas so that the rest of the Latins might be spared the horrors of further warfare.

Drangiana (dran-ji-ā'nā). [Also: Drangiane; modern name, Seistan.] In ancient geography, a region in C Asia, bounded on the N by Areia, on the E by Arachosia, on the S by Gedrosia, and on the W by Carmania. It was a province of the ancient Persian empire, and was conquered by Alexander the Great, who brought it into his empire. The area lies in what is now SW Afghanistan and E Iran.

Drepana (drep'an-ā). The island of the Phaeacians, later known as Corcyra (Corfu). The name Drepana means sickle and was given to this island either because it was formed from the sickle which Cronus threw into the sea after mutilating Uranus, or because Demeter, whose symbol is the sickle, once lived on the island. Still another explanation is that the outline of the island,

as seen on a map, suggests the shape of a sickle.

Drepanum (drep'a-num). [Modern name, Trapani.] A cape and town on the west coast of Sicily. It was near the cape that Cronus threw the mutilated genitals of Uranus, along with the sickle that performed the emasculation, into the sea, according to some accounts. The discarded sickle gave the cape its name. Aeneas stopped at Drepanum on his way to seek his destined home in Italy after the Trojan War. Here Anchises, the father of Aeneas, died. In the First Punic War the city was one of the strongholds of the Carthaginians, was fortified by Hamilcar Barca, and was close to the scene of the great Carthaginian naval victory (249 B.C.) by Adherbal over the Roman fleet under Publius Claudius. It fell to the Romans only after a protracted siege in 241 B.C.

Drusilla (drö-sil'a). Daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, and sister and mistress of Caligula.

Drusilla. Daughter of Caligula and Caesonia. She was murdered following the murder of Caligula.

Drusilla Livia. See Livia Drusilla.

Drusus (drö'sus), Marcus Livius. Roman politician, who died probably 109 B.C. He was tribune of the plebs conjointly with Caius Gracchus in 122 B.C., his election having been procured by the Senate, whose members were alarmed at the democratic-innovations of the latter. In collusion with the Senate he opposed his veto to the bills brought forward by his colleague, and introduced instead bills of similar import, but making more extravagant concessions, which were passed by the Senate. He was consul in 112 B.C., and while governor of Macedonia, which he obtained as his province, defeated the Thracians and reached the Danube.

Drusus, Marcus Livius. Roman politician; son of Marcus Livius Drusus (d. 109 B.C.). Marcus Livius the son was assassinated at Rome in 91 B.C. He became tribune of the plebs (91 B.C.), whose favor he won by largesses of grain, and by the introduction of a bill providing for a new division of the public lands. This bill, together with another which restored to the Senate the places on the juries of which it had been deprived by Caius Gracchus, was passed by the comitia, but declared null and void by the Senate. He was assassinated as he was about to bring forward a proposal to bestow Roman citizenship on the Italians (that is to say, on the people of Italy as a whole and not simply those who lived in the city of Rome). His death gave the signal for the outbreak of the Social War.

Drusus, Nero Claudius. [Called Drusus Senior; surnamed Germanicus.] Roman general, born 38 B.C.; died in Germany, 9 B.C. He was the son of Livia Drusilla by Tiberius Claudius Nero, and was born shortly after the marriage of his mother with the emperor Augustus. With his older brother Tiberius, who later became emperor, he was adopted by Augustus, and at an early age married Antonia, the daughter of Mark Antony. He subdued a revolt in Gaul in 13 B.C., and, starting in 12 B.C. from the left bank of the Rhine, undertook four campaigns in Germany proper with his brother Tiberius. In the course of these campaigns, whence his name Germanicus, he led the Roman armies to the Weser and the Elbe. He died on the way back, in consequence of a fall from his horse.

Drusus Caesar. [Called Drusus Junior.] Son of Tiberius and Vipsania, born c13 B.C.; poisoned 23 A.D. He quelled a mutiny of the legions in Pannonia in 14 A.D., was consul in 15 A.D., was appointed governor of Illyricum in 17, was consul in 21, and in 22 was invested with the tribunicia potestas, whereby he was declared heir apparent to the throne. He is said to have lived an extremely dissolute life and so angered his father thereby, that when Drusus died, Tiberius curtailed the period of official mourning. Moreover, the tale is told that when an embassy from Troy arrived to offer condolences to Tiberius a month or two after the death of Drusus, Tiberius ironically offered condolences to the embassy on the loss of their eminent citizen, Hector. Later, Tiberius learned that Drusus had not died from his excesses, but that his wife Livilla had brought about his death by poison, in alliance with Sejanus, the commander of the Praetorian Guard, favorite of Tiberius, and Livilla's lover. When he learned this, Tiberius energetically sought to investigate the crime and eventually ordered the death of Sejanus.

Dryad/Dura

Dryad (dri'ad). A deity or nymph of the woods, or a nymph supposed to live in trees or preside over woods. See Hamadryad.

Dryas (dri'as). In Greek mythology, a son of Lycurgus of Thrace. Lycurgus, driven mad for his indignities to Dionysus, killed Dryas under the impression that he was pruning a tree. Thrace became barren because of this crime and could become fruitful again only if Lycurgus was punished. He was torn to pieces by wild horses.

Dryope (dri'ō-pē). In mythology, sometimes named as a nymph and sometimes as the sister of Iole, daughter of Eurytus. As she played with the hamadryads, Apollo appeared among them disguised as a turtle. Dryope picked up the turtle, which immediately changed into a snake and frightened the hamadryads away. Apollo then assumed his own form and ravished Dryope, who bore him a son, Amphissus. One day as she was carrying her infant son, she stopped to pick blossoms from a lotus tree for her child. Blood dropped from the blossoms and ran down the tree trunk, for Dryope had unfortunately chosen to pick flowers from a tree that was the home of the nymph Lotis. In terror Dryope tried to flee but her feet were rooted to the ground, her body became wooden, and as her husband, Andraemon, and her father came to look for her, bark grew up over her breast and neck. She had time only to plead with Andraemon to take care of her child before her face was forever enclosed in bark. In place of the nymph there stood a slender poplar tree.

Dryope. In Greek mythology, a nymph of the fountain, Pegae, in Mysia, who fell in love with Hylas, squire of Heracles, as he stopped to draw water, and pulled him into the spring to dwell with the nymphs.

Dryopes (dri'ō-pēz) or Dryopians (dri-ō'pē-anz). An ancient people of Greece. According to legendary accounts, Dryops was a son of Apollo and Dia, the daughter of Lycaon. Fearing her father's anger, Dia hid her infant son in a hollow oak tree, whence his name is derived. Dryops became the founder of the Dryopians, and settled with his people near Mount Parnassus. During the reign of Dryops' son Thiodamas, Heracles passed through the land on his way to Trachis. He saw Thiodamas plowing with a yoke of oxen and demanded one of them. Thiodamas refused his demand. Heracles killed him and carried off his son who, some say, was Hylas. Afterward Heracles conquered the Dryopians and carried off their leading citizens and dedicated them as slaves at Delphi. The priestess of Delphi ordered them to be taken to the Peloponnesus, where they sought asylum with Eurystheus, the enemy of Heracles. With other Dryopians, they built the Argive towns of Hermione, Asine, and Eion. Those Dryopians who did not go to the Peloponnesus fled to Euboea and Cyprus and ultimately lost their language, customs, and identity as a separate tribe. The Argives drove the Dryopians out of Argos and they went to Messenia. On the Messenian coast they occupied Messenian Asine. The Dryopians who settled there (some say the town was given to them by the Spartans after the Second Messenian War) were the only Dryopians who were proud to keep their name. They built a shrine to Dryops and celebrated mysteries in his honor every other year.

Duilius (dū-il'i-us), Caius. Roman general; fl. in the 3rd century B.C. He was consul in 260 B.C., when he defeated the Carthaginians near Mylae (modern Milazzo), on the N coast of Sicily. This was the first naval success gained by Rome. Duilius, a land officer placed in charge of the fleet by necessity, decided to fight the naval engagement as a land battle, and won by using his new device, the corvus (q.v.).

Dulichium (dū-lik'i-um). In ancient geography, an island in the Ionian Sea, near Ithaca. According to legend, it was a part of the island kingdom of Odysseus, and the home of some of the suitors of Penelope.

Dumnorix (dum'nō-riks). A chief of the Aedui; killed in Gaul, 54 B.C. He was a brother of Divitiacus, friend of Caesar. Pardon once by Caesar for permitting hostile forces through his territory, he led his cavalry from the Roman camp as Caesar prepared the British invasion, and was captured and killed.

Dura (dū'ra). The Latin form of a Semitic word dūr "wall," which appears as the name fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pine; not, nōte, mōve, nōr, of several fortified communities in western Asia, e.g. dūr sharrukin was Sargon's palace at Khorsabad. See Europus (Dura). (JJ)

Dura-Europus. See Europus (Dura).

Duris (dū'ris). Attic potter and painter in the red-figure style, active c500-470 B.C., fond of scenes from everyday life. Thirty vessels with his signature as painter are extant, and over 200 more have been attributed to him. Among his extant works is a kylix (Louvre) with Eos carrying off the body of her son Memnon, and a psykter (British Museum) with Satyrs. The inside of a cup (Munich) c480 B.C., shows Heracles resting as Athena pours wine into his cup. Scenes showing Peleus carrying off Thetis as her sisters run to their father for aid decorate the outside of the cup. This vessel was signed by Hieron as the potter. Another cup (Munich) shows a banqueter and a flute player on the inside, and Heracles striking his teacher Linus on the outside.

Duris. Greek historian. He was a native of Samos and was active in the first half of the 3rd century B.C. He wrote the Samian Chronicle, on the history of Samos, and a history of Greece and Macedonia, from 370 to about 281 B.C. in 23 books. Fragments of his works which survive show them to have been rather random collections of material on the regions with which he occupied himself.

Dying Alexander (al-eg-zan'dēr). Name given to a sculptured head, held to be a Greek original of Hellenistic date, very remarkable for the intensity of its expression of pain, and of admirable execution.

Dying Gaul (gôl), The. [Formerly called The Dying Gladiator.] Ancient statue of the Pergamene school, in the Capitoline Museum, Rome. The warrior, nude, sits on the ground with bowed head, supporting himself with his right arm. The statue is considered especially fine in the mastery of anatomy displayed, and in its characterization of the racial type. It is thought possibly to have been commissioned by Attalus as a monument to his victories over the Gauls.

Dymas (dī'mas). Named in the Iliad as a king in Phrygia who dwelt near the Sangarius River. Homer calls him the father of Hecuba and Asius, and the grandfather of Hector.

Dymas. In the Aeneid, a Trojan who came to Aeneas' side fighting the Greeks on the night Troy fell. He had disguised himself in armor taken from a dead Greek in order to circulate freely among the Greeks and slay them. His Trojan comrades, thinking he was a Greek, slew him.

Dyme (dī'mē). In ancient geography, a city of Achaea in the Peloponnesus, situated on the Gulf of Calydon (Gulf of Patras). It was founded by the Epeans. It was the westernmost of the 12 Ionian cities of Achaea.

Dysaules (dī-sô'lēz). According to some accounts, a man of Eleusis who was the father of Triptolemus. But others say he was Celeus, and that he took the name Dysaules (Unfortunate) when he lost two of his sons. According to this account, Demeter came to his house in Eleusis in disguise when she was searching for Persephone. Abas, a son of the house, mocked her because, being thirsty, she drank greedily, and Demeter transformed him into a lizard. Then Demeter sought to make a second son of Celeus, Demophoön, immortal by burning away his mortal parts in the fire. The child's mother interrupted her and cried out in alarm, Demeter dropped the child, and he perished. It was then that Celeus took the name Dysaules. However, Demeter promised to make amends for the loss of his two sons by making a third one, Triptolemus, immortal and a great benefactor of mankind.

Dyscolus (dis'kō-lus), Apollonius. See Apollonius Dyscolus.

Dysponteus (dis-pon'tūs). In Greek legend, a son of Oenomaus. According to some accounts, he founded the town of Dyspontium (q.v.), on the Alpheus River in Elis.

Dyspontium (dis-pon'ti-um). Town near the Alpheus River, in Elis. According to some accounts, it was founded by Dysponteus, a son of Oenomaus. It was a vassal community of Elis, and was destroyed in the 6th century B.C. when it joined Pisa in a revolt against Elis.

Eagle. A bird sacred to Zeus. He appeared in the form of an eagle when he abducted Ganymede, according to some accounts, and frequently he sent the eagle as an omen.

Eburum (eb'ū-rum). [Modern name, Eboli.] Town in Campania, S Italy, situated near the Silarus River, about 45 miles SE of Naples. The ruins of ancient Paestum, including beautiful Greek temples, are nearby.

Ecbatana (ek-bat'a-na). In ancient geography, the capital of Media. According to the Greeks it was built by order of Deïoces in the first half of the 7th century B.C. The ancient city, on a hill, was surrounded by seven encircling walls which were coated, beginning with the outer one, in white, black, scarlet, blue, and orange colors, with the two innermost walls coated respectively with silver and gold. Ecbatana was taken from the Median king Astyages by Cyrus the Great (550 B.C.), and became the summer palace of the Persian and Parthian kings. Alexander the Great captured it in 330 B.C. When Alexander returned from India he stopped at Ecbatana for several months and held great feasts and celebrations. Here, 324 B.C., his friend Hephaestion died. Modern Hamadan, in W Iran, occupies the ancient site of Ecbatana, and is, according to tradition, the site of the tombs of Biblical Mordecai and Esther.

Ecclesia (ē-klē'zi-a). A Greek word meaning a "calling-forth," or convocation, and thus an assembly of, e.g., the voting populace, the people, as distinct from the boule or council of elders. Aristophanes' play Ecclesiazusae is "Women in the Assembly." A building designed as a meeting-place for the ecclesia might be called an ecclesiasterion, as at Priene. In Christian contexts ecclesia denoted an assembly of Christians, a congregation, and then came to refer to the building in which an ecclesia or congregation met to worship, a church, and as such survives, as in It. chiesa, Fr. église, Sp. iglesia, etc., and in such English derivatives as "ec-clesiastic(al)." As the title of a book of the Old Testament, Ecclesiastes, means "Preacher." (JJ)

Ecclesiazusae (ē-klē'zi-a-zō'sē). Comedy of Aristophanes, exhibited in 392 B.C. In it the women of Athens meet in the Ecclesia or Assembly (whence the name, which means "Women in the Assembly"), and decide to take control of the state, with community of goods and husbands. The comedy ridicules alike rights for women and socialistic theories. The longest word in the Greek language, a compound of 169 letters, and 77 syllables, is found in the play.

Echecles (ē'kē-klēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Actor and a prince of the Myrmidons. He married Polymela, daughter of Phylas, who had born Eudorus to Hermes, and brought up Eudorus as his own son.

Echemus (ē'kē-mus). In Greek legend, a king in Arcadia. He was a descendant of Aleus. When Hyllus, son of Heracles, made his second invasion of the Peloponnesus, he proposed that control of the land be decided by single combat, in order to avoid bloodshed. Hyllus offered to fight any champion the Arcadians or other Peloponnesians named. He promised that if he was defeated the Heraclidae would withdraw for a long period of years, but if he won, the Heraclidae would assume power in the Peloponnesus. Echemus volunteered to accept the challenge of Hyllus, and on the boundary between Megara and Corinth the duel was fought. Echemus defeated and slew Hyllus, and the Heraclidae withdrew as they had promised. Echemus married Timandra, daughter of Tyndareus. His tomb was at Tegea, in Arcadia.

Echetus (ē'kē-tus). A mythical king of Epirus who put out his daughter's eyes with bronze spikes and set her to grinding grains of bronze in a dungeon, with the cruel promise that he would restore her sight when she had ground the bronze into corn. Arete recalled

her sufferings in order to persuade Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians, not to surrender Medea to the Colchians, who had pursued her and now demanded her return to Colchis. Echidna (ē-kid'nā). In Greek mythology, a monster, half beautiful maiden and half serpent. She was the daughter of Ceto and Phorcy (or of Chrysaor and Callirhoë), and by Typhon was the mother of: two-headed Orthus, the hound of Geryon; Cerberus, the brazen-throated hound of Hades; the Hydra of Lerna; the fabulous Chimaera. By her own son Orthus she was the mother of the Theban Sphinx that was slain by Oedipus, and of the Nemean Lion, slain by Heracles. In addition, according to some accounts, she was the mother of Ladon, the vultures that gnawed Prometheus' vitals, and the sea monster Scylla. Echidna was slain while asleep by the many-eyed Argus.

Echinades (ē-kin'a-dēz). In ancient geography, a group of islands W of Acarnania in Greece, formed in and near the mouth of the Achelous River and now reunited, in part, to the mainland. According to Greek mythology, the islands were once naiads. These five naiads forgot to sacrifice to Artemis when they sacrificed to all the other rural deities at a festival. In her anger Artemis flooded the area where they were dancing, split it up into five parts and washed it into the sea where the land and the naiads became the islands known as the Echinades. Another one of the Echinades had formerly been the daughter of Hippodamas. She was loved by the river-god Achelous and transformed into an island when her father hurled her into the sea.

Echion (ē-kī'on). In Greek legend, a son of Hermes and Antianeira. With his brother, Erytus, he joined Jason on the voyage of the Argo. As herald of the Argonauts it was he who went ashore on Lemnos and convinced Hypsipyle, the queen, that the Argonauts were not hostile and persuaded her to let them land. They remained in Lemnos over a year.

Echion. In Greek mythology, one of the crop of armed men who sprang up when Cadmus sowed the dragon's teeth. He was one of the five who survived when the armed men warred among themselves, and later married Agave, daughter of Cadmus, and founded one of the five great families of Thebes. Pentheus was his son.

Echion. In Greek legend, one of the Greeks who entered Troy in the Wooden Horse. According to some accounts, when the Greeks silently descended the ladder from the belly of the horse, Echion fell and broke his neck.

Echo (ek'ō). In mythology, a talkative wood nymph who at last lost the power to originate any conversation. This came about because Hera, suspicious of the many amorous adventures of her husband Zeus, was too often delayed in discovering him in his affairs by listening to the chatter of Echo. To punish Echo for protecting Zeus in this manner Hera took away her power of speech, leaving her only the ability to repeat the last words spoken to her. By Pan, Echo was the mother of Lynx. Later she fell in love with Narcissus and, being scorned by him, wasted away until nothing was left of her but her voice.

Enomus (ek'nō-mus). Hill near the modern town of Licata, on the S coast of Sicily. Here the Carthaginians defeated (311 B.C.) the Syracusan tyrant Agathocles. Near here the Roman fleet defeated (256 B.C.) the Carthaginians.

Edile (ē'dil). See Aedile.

Eëtion (ē-ē'ti-on). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a king of Thebes in Cilicia and ruler of the Cilicians. He was the father of Hector's wife Andromache. Achilles attacked his land in the years before the siege of Troy, killed Eëtion and seven of his sons, and sacked his city, but he gave Eëtion honorable burial, in full armor. Nymphs planted a grove about his grave.

Eëtion. In Homeric legend (Iliad), an Imbrian who ransomed Priam's son, Lycaon, from Euneus (who had bought him from Achilles), and sent him to Arisbe, from whence Lycaon returned home to the war and to his death.

Egeria (ē-jir'i-a). [Also: Aegeria.] In Roman mythology, one of the Camenae, or nymphs of springs, as well as a birth goddess and a prophetess. She had a fountain in the grove of Diana at Aricia. According to the Romans, she was the wife of Numa, and instructed him with regard to the forms of worship he was to introduce. Because of her role as instructress of a king, the name actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ġ as d or j, ſ as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

Egeria is sometimes applied to any woman adviser of statesmen, or others. On the death of Numa, Egeria went to Aricia and so disturbed the worship there by her lamentations that she was transformed into a fountain. Other accounts say that she married Hippolytus, son of Theseus, who was restored to life by Asclepius and carried to Italy by Artemis.

Egesta (ē-jes'ta) or Aegesta, or Segesta (sē-). In the Aeneid, a Trojan woman who was sold as a slave to Sicilian merchants by Laomedon, king of Troy. Aphrodite rescued her and she became the mother of Acestes, or Aegestes, by the river-god Crimisus in Sicily. The city of Segesta, founded by her son, was named for her. Some say Egesta later returned to Troy and bore Anchises to Capys.

Egypt (ē-jipt). [Biblical name, Mizraim; Latin, Aegyptus; Arabic Misr.] Country in NE Africa, famous for the great antiquity and former splendor of its civilization. It is bounded by the Mediterranean Sea on the N, and extends S, including the delta and the valley of the Nile River, to the second cataract of the Nile and the border of the Sudan. On the E it is bounded by Israel, the Gulf of Aqaba, and the Red Sea, and on the W by Libya. It includes the Sinai Peninsula, between the gulfs of Suez and Aqaba. The usual geographical divisions are the Nile valley region from Cairo south, called Upper Egypt, and the delta region, called Lower Egypt. To the ancient Greeks Egypt consisted of the delta and the land lying along the Nile, and was for this reason called, "The Gift of the River." According to them, the regions to the west and the interior of Africa were Libya (of indefinite boundaries), and those to the east and south were Aethiopia. Trade between Egypt and Crete began at least as early as the 16th century B.C. and probably from much earlier times. The Egyptians called the Cretans Keftiu, and evidence of commerce between the Keftiu kings and the Egyptian rulers exists from the XVIIIth Dynasty.

A history of ancient Egypt for Greek consumption was compiled in the 3rd century B.C. by the priest Manetho, who listed the kings in 31 dynasties. The dynasties are grouped thus by Breasted: the Old Kingdom (c3400-c2475 B.C.), Dynasties I-VI; the Middle Kingdom (c2445-1580 B.C.), Dynasties IX-XVII; the New Kingdom or Empire (1580-1090 B.C.), Dynasties XVIII-XX. The First Dynasty was founded by Menes c3400 B.C. During the early dynasties Memphis was the leading city, and in the time of the IVth Dynasty occurred the building of the Pyramids (c2900-2800 B.C.). The construction of Lake Moeris and the labyrinth are assigned to the XIIth Dynasty. Thebes now became the center, and later the invasion of the Hyksos occurred (in the XVth Dynasty). After a period of confusion and obscurity Egypt was united under the great Theban XVIIIth Dynasty, and under this and the XIXth Dynasty reached its highest point in extent and in the grandeur of its monuments. Among the great sovereigns were Thutmose III, Seti I, and Rameses II. The "Pharaoh" of the Exodus has frequently been identified with Merneptah or Meneptah of the XIXth Dynasty, and the date stated approximately at c1300 B.C., but he is now dated at 1225-1215 B.C. With the next dynasty began the decline of the country's power. There were some revivals of power, and in the 7th and 6th centuries Greek settlements began, but in 525 B.C. Egypt was conquered by Cambyses, and this Persian dynasty ranks as the XXVIIth. From 406 B.C. native rulers again held power, but in 340 B.C. a short-lived Persian dynasty (the XXXIst and the last of Manetho) began; this was overthrown in 332 B.C. by Alexander the Great. After his death Egypt was ruled by his general Ptolemy and Ptolemy's successors down to the death of the famous Cleopatra (Cleopatra VII or VI) in 30 B.C., when Augustus seized it as the private province of the emperor.

Eidothea (i-dō'thē-a). See Idothea.

Eidyia (i-dī'ya). See Idyia.

Eileithyia (i-lī-thī'ya). Goddess who attended women in childbirth. See Ilithyia.

Eioneus (ē-yō'nē-us). In Greek mythology, the father of Dia. Ixion promised Eioneus rich gifts in return for Dia but instead of handing them over he laid a trap for Eioneus. He constructed in front of his palace a hidden pit, into which Eioneus fell and was burned to death by the charcoal fire in it.

Eioneus. Named by Homer as the father of

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, the Thracian king, Rhesus. Others give the river-god Strymon as the father of Rhesus.

Eirene (ī-rē'nē). See Irene, goddess of peace.
Elais (ē'lā-is). In Greek mythology, one of the three daughters of Anius, king of Delos, and his wife Dorippe. By a gift of Dionysus, to whom her father had dedicated her and her sisters, she could turn whatever she touched into oil if she first invoked Dionysus. Her sisters were Oeno and Spermo, and by gifts of the same god they could turn whatever they wished into wine and grain respectively. Agamemnon ordered them brought to Troy to provision the Greek fleet, and when their father refused to let them go, Odysseus, who had been sent to fetch them, bound them and carried them off. They escaped, but as Agamemnon threatened war, they surrendered. They appealed to Dionysus for aid and were transformed into doves by the god, for which reason doves were especially protected on Delos.

Elam (ē'lām). [Also: Susiana; ancient Greek, Elymaïs.] Ancient country and empire E of the lower Tigris, S of Media, and N of the Persian Gulf. It is a region of fertile and picturesque mountains, valleys, and ravines, the only flat tract being on the shores of the Persian Gulf; and was in very high antiquity the seat of a mighty empire of which Susa was the capital. The oldest historical information about Elam is that it subjugated Babylonia in the period c2300-2076 B.C. The Elamite dynasty is identical with the Median of Berosus, which ruled over Babylonia, c2300-2076 B.C. Among these Elamite kings is also very probably to be counted Chedorlaomer (Kudur-Lagamaru) of Gen. xiv. The next historical notice is that Elam was subdued by Nebuchadnezzar I, king of Babylonia, c1130 B.C. From the 8th century B.C. on, Elam was connected with the rivalry between Assyria and Babylonia, supporting the latter against the former. Elam was defeated by Sargon in 721 and 710 B.C., and by Sennacherib in several campaigns, especially in a decisive battle on the Tigris c691 B.C. In 645 B.C. Assurbanipal destroyed Susa. Soon after this catastrophe Elam is met with under the dominion of Theispes. In union with Media and Persia it helped to bring about the fall of Assyria and Babylonia. It shared thenceforth the fate of the other Assyrian provinces, and had no history of its own. The ancient Elamites were not Semites. This is ascertained by the names of their kings, which are alien to all of the Semitic dialects, and by their representations on the monuments, which exhibit a type widely different from the Semitic. The enumeration of Elam among the sons of Shem in Gen. x. 22 may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that the Elamite valley was early settled by the Semites, who predominated over the non-Semitic element of the population, and also by the fact that the Elamites had for more than two centuries the upper hand in Semitic Babylonia. The name Elymaïs was used either as an equivalent of Elam or for a part of it.

Elaphebolion (el'ā-fē-bō'li-on). The ninth month of the Attic year, corresponding to the latter part of March to the middle of April, approximately. A feast of Artemis Elaphebolos in Phocis was held in this month.

Elaphios (ē-laf'i-os). Epithet of Artemis. Some say it refers to Artemis as a huntress of deer. Others say the epithet was given to her because Elaphios was the name of an Elean woman who was reared by the goddess.

Elara (ē'lā-rā). According to some accounts, the mother of Tityus by Zeus, but Gaea nursed him and gave him second birth.

Elatus (ē'lā-tus). In Greek mythology, a son of Arcas and either Meganira, the nymph Chrysopelia, or the dryad Erato. He inherited the region around Mount Cyllene in Arcadia as his share of his fathers' kingdom, and named it Cyllene for his son. Some say he married Laodice, daughter of Cinyras, and that she bore him Stymphalus and Pereus. Others say he was also the father of that Ischys who was slain by the gods for causing Coronis to be unfaithful to Apollo; and of Aepytus and Cyllen. Elatus went to Phocis to assist the Phocians in a war, and remained to found the city of Elateia there.

Elea (ē'lē-ā). See Velia.

Eleatics (el-ē-at'iks). School of Greek philosophy founded by Xenophanes of Colophon (c570-480 B.C.), who resided in Elea, or Velia, in Magna Graecia. The most distinguished philosophers of this school were Parmenides and Zeno. The main Eleatic doctrines are developments of the conception that the One, or Absolute, alone is real.

Electra (ē-lek'tra). In Greek legend, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and the sister of Orestes, Iphigenia, and Chrysothemis. When Agamemnon returned victorious from Troy he was brutally murdered by Clytemnestra and her lover Aegisthus. Electra secretly gave the young Orestes into the charge of an aged tutor and commanded him to take the boy to Strophius in Phocis, where he would be safe from the evil designs of Aegisthus. Electra remained in Mycenae, kept in a state of virtual slavery by Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. However, her spirit was far from broken and she continually and publicly condemned her mother as an adulteress and a murderess. Electra had been betrothed to her cousin Castor, and after he died and was deified the leading princes of Greece sought her hand. But Aegisthus feared that she might bear a son who would avenge the murder of Agamemnon, and so rejected all her suitors. He wanted to have Electra slain but Clytemnestra heeded the prohibitions of the gods against the slaying of one's own kin and forbade him to do so. As she saw it was impossible to convince Electra that the murder of Agamemnon was justified, because of his sacrifice of Iphigenia at Aulis, she kept her in a state of misery, and according to some accounts, finally allowed Aegisthus to marry her to a peasant. But he, out of respect for his high-born bride, and out of fear of her brother, never consummated the marriage. Electra's one hope for release from her miserable state and for vengeance for her father's murder lay in the return of Orestes. She sent him frequent urgent reminders of his obligation and maintained her defiance of Clytemnestra and her scorn for Aegisthus by vociferously praying for the return of Orestes and with open expressions of her hope for vengeance. In the eighth year after the murder of Agamemnon Orestes secretly returned to Mycenae with Pylades, a son of Strophius and the faithful friend of Orestes. While his presence in Mycenae was still unknown to Clytemnestra he made himself known to Electra and was joyously reunited with her. Rapidly they made their plans. Orestes was troubled by doubts concerning the deed he was planning, but Electra spurred him on: a son must avenge his father or risk the displeasure of the gods. She had been beside herself for years with grief over her father's hateful death, humiliation over her own state, and a burning desire for vengeance on Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. When Orestes wavered she stiffened his resolution. By pretending he was a messenger with news of Orestes' death he secured entry into the palace and killed his mother and Aegisthus. Electra ultimately married Pylades, after he had returned from Tauris with Orestes, and bore him two sons, Medon and Strophius. She died and was buried at Mycenae. See also The Choëphoroe, by Aeschylus, Electra, by Sophocles, and Orestes, by Euripides.

Electra. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pleione and Atlas; one of the Pleiades. She was the mother of Dardanus by Zeus. With her sisters her image was placed among the stars but she withdrew from the group, according to some accounts, so that she would not have to witness the fall of Troy, a city inhabited by descendants of her son. See Pleiades.

Electra. In Greek mythology, an ocean-nymph. She was wedded to Thaumias and bore him Iris of the "fast-flying feet," and the Harpies—Aello and Ocypete.

Electra. A drama by Sophocles. Agamemnon, commander of the Greeks assembled to sail to Troy to recapture Helen, sacrificed his daughter, Iphigenia, in order to propitiate Artemis and obtain favorable winds for his fleet. When, ten years later, he returned victorious from Troy, his wife Clytemnestra, with the aid of her lover Aegisthus, murdered him, and she and Aegisthus became the rulers of his kingdom. Agamemnon's daughters, Electra and Chrysothemis, remained in the palace as virtual prisoners, but his young son Orestes had been sent away by Electra in the care of a trusted tutor. Grown to manhood, Orestes, at the command of Apollo, returned to avenge his father's death. The play relates the manner of his doing so.

Orestes, Pylades, his close friend, and the now-aged tutor enter. The tutor points out the house of Agamemnon, now the house of Aegisthus, at Mycenae, overlooking the plain and city of Argos, and tells him that now is the time to act. Orestes bids him enter the house and inform Clytemnestra that he is dead, killed in a chariot race. Meanwhile he goes with Pylades to make offerings to his father's grave. Electra then appears and bewails her unhappy fate. She longs for Orestes to return and avenge her father, whose skull was split with an ax by Aegisthus, and laments that she is now the only one who mourns him. A chorus of women of Mycenae try to comfort her. They tell her that since tears cannot lighten her sorrow she should hope for the return of Orestes and put her trust in god. But Electra is beside herself. She is outraged that Aegisthus is in her father's place, and implacable in her desire to punish her mother and her lover. Her sister Chrysothemis joins her and tries to persuade her to give up her defiance and her mad desire for vengeance. She feels that, being weak, helpless women, they must adjust themselves to their situation. Electra absolutely refuses to play any such part. Then Chrysothemis tells her that Clytemnestra is frightened; she dreamed that Agamemnon returned, took the sceptre from Aegisthus and planted it so firmly in the ground that it blossomed into a tree whose shade covered all Mycenae. Encouraged, Electra sends Chrysothemis to put a lock of her own hair on Agamemnon's grave, in place of the libations Clytemnestra had ordered to ward off the evil omen of the dream. Next there follows a bitter conversation between Clytemnestra and Electra, in which Clytemnestra justifies the murder of Agamemnon because he had sacrificed Iphigenia, and Electra defends the sacrifice, and adds that Clytemnestra's real reason for the murder was that she was Aegisthus' paramour. Clytemnestra then prays to Apollo to avert the evil foreshadowed in her dream. The tutor now enters and tells the two women that Orestes is dead. Clytemnestra is torn between maternal anguish at the loss of a child and great relief that he can no longer return and punish her for his father's death. Electra is in despair. As Clytemnestra departs Chrysothemis returns. In great excitement she says that Orestes has come home: she has found a lock of hair at their father's grave that can only be his. Desolately Electra tells her that Orestes is dead. But she is resolved on vengeance and asks Chrysothemis to help her, since now there is no one else to do it. Chrysothemis points out that they are only weak women and, adding that she would rather be alive in misery than a dead heroine, refuses. When she has gone Orestes and Pylades come before Electra as messengers. They give her an urn which they say contains the ashes of Orestes, but on seeing her grief and learning that she is Electra, Orestes reveals himself to her. She rejoices. The tutor comes and warns Orestes to act at once: Clytemnestra is alone. Orestes and Pylades go inside. Presently Electra exults as she hears Clytemnestra scream. Now Aegisthus approaches and asks after the messengers who have brought news of Orestes. Informed that they are in the house and that he will see proof that they bring a message of death, he orders the doors to be flung open. A covered corpse, flanked by Orestes and Pylades, is revealed. Aegisthus, at the suggestion of Orestes, whom he has not recognized, draws back the sheet from the face of the corpse and looks on the face of Clytemnestra. Almost at once he realizes that the messenger is Orestes and knows why he has come. Orestes commands him to go to the place where Agamemnon was murdered, for it is there he intends to kill him. They go into the house. The play ends with the chorus saying that now at last the House of Atreus is free from suffering.

Electrides (ē-lek'tri-dēz). In Greek legend, the Amber Islands (where the trees weep amber), situated at the mouth of the fabulous river Eridanus (later identified with the Po River in Italy). See also Amber Islands.

Electryon (ē-lek'tri-on). In Greek mythology, the son of Perseus and Andromeda, and the grandfather of Heracles. He was a king of Mycenae. He left Amphitryon to rule in his place while he waged war against the Taphians, who had slain eight of his sons during a raid in which they stole his cattle, and promised his daughter Alcmena to Amphitryon if he ruled well during his absence. When he returned he found that Amphitryon had ransomed the cattle and expected him to pay the ransom. He refused. Amphitryon angrily hurled a club at one of the cattle, but it struck Electryon instead and killed him.

mathematical work of all time, the earliest extant Greek treatise on mathematics, and the oldest scientific textbook still in actual use. It is a book on geometry, both plane and solid, and the theory of numbers, a compendium of mathematical knowledge of the time, arranged in logical order. It was composed by Euclid c300 B.C., was frequently copied in manuscript, and was first printed in 1482. Since that time over a thousand editions have appeared.

Eleusinian (el-ū-sin'i-an). Epithet of Demeter, from the Mysteries which she established at Eleusis. There were sanctuaries of Eleusinian Demeter in various parts of Greece. Among them was one at Pheneüs in Arcadia; in Laconia; and on the borders of Thelpusa in Arcadia. In this last there were stone images of Demeter and the Maid, as well as one of Dionysus. There were also sanctuaries of Eleusinian Demeter at Basilis in Arcadia near the Alpheus River, and at Plataea in Boeotia.

Eleusinian Mysteries. The famous Athenian mysteries and festival of Eleusis, developed from a local agrarian cult into a ritual of personal edification. The gods connected with the mysteries were Demeter, the Greek equivalent of the Roman Ceres, her daughter, Persephone (the Roman Proserpina), and the local Attic divinity Iacchus as the special protectors of agriculture and of all fruitfulness, and as the guardians of Athens. They were held at Eleusis, in Attica, about 14 miles W of Athens, and were the chief cause of its fame. At first initiation into the mysteries was limited to residents of Attica; later it was extended to all Greek citizens, and still later, Romans were admitted to the privileges of membership. Barbarians (which initially of course, included the Romans), murderers, and all who were guilty of serious crimes were barred. A candidate for initiation was proposed by an Athenian citizen who already belonged. The candidates were called mystae before full initiation, and epoptae, or seers of the highest rite, after. The mysteries were divided into two parts, the Lesser, held in Antestherion, corresponding more or less to February, and the Greater, in Boedromion, equivalent to part of the end of September and the beginning of October. The mysteries were regarded by the ancients themselves as having moral and ethical values in that they promised, or seemed to promise, happiness after death as a reward for goodness. The chief rites are unknown. Hadrian and Marcus Aurelius did not think it beneath them to accept initiation. Valentinian, the Christian emperor, allowed the Eleusinian mysteries after he had abolished all others, but Theodosius did away with them at the end of the 4th century.

Eleusinium (el-ū-sin'i-um). Sanctuary at Athens, near the western foot of the Acropolis. In accordance with a law of Solon, the Council of 500 met there the day after the celebration of the Mysteries at Eleusis.

Eleusis (ē-lō'sis). A little town about 14 miles W of Athens, in Attica, situated near the bay and opposite the island of Salamis. It was said by some to have been founded by a hero of this name who was a son of Hermes, or of Ogyges. The Cephissus River, a more turbulent stream than the one of the same name in Athens, flowed through the plain of Eleusis into the Gulf of Eleusis. Near this stream is Erineus, where Hades, some say, descended into the lower world with Persephone, and it was nearby that Theseus killed Procrustes. In her desperate search for her daughter Persephone, Demeter, disguised as a humble old woman, came to Eleusis. The daughters of Celeus met her at a place called Anthium (Flowery Well) and offered her hospitality in their father's house. As a reward for their kind treatment the goddess, who revealed her identity to Celeus, commanded the people of Eleusis to build a temple for her. When it was completed she occupied it for a time, mourning for her lost daughter. While she mourned the earth was barren and, lest the people perish, the gods arranged for the return of Persephone so that Demeter would restore the fertility of the earth. After this Demeter chose a prince of Eleusis to be her priest, and taught him, Celeus, and others, the arts of agriculture and her sacred rites. At Eleusis is a well called Callichorum (Well of Fair Dances), where the women of Eleusis first danced and sang in honor of Demeter. Nearby is the Plain of Rharium, the first land to be sown to wheat and to bear crops. At the annual sacrifices here barley cakes were offered. Here too was the threshing-floor and an altar of Triptolemus who, some say, was the first to whom Demeter taught the arts of agriculture. Eumolpus was a priest of Demeter and the founder of her mysteries. In the time of Erechtheus the Athenians, under his command, and the Eleusinians, aided by Eumolpus, waged war. Eumolpus and his son were killed and the Eleusinians were defeated. Eleusis retained the right to have independent control of the mysteries of Demeter, but in everything else was subordinated to Athens.

Eleusis (Advent) was one of the oldest of the parishes of Attica, the seat of a very ancient cult of Demeter, and of the famous Eleusinian mysteries. It was annexed to Athens in the 7th century B.C., but kept control of the mysteries, in the celebration of which the Athenians, as well as Greeks from all other states, annually came for initiation into and celebration of the rites. The observation of the mysteries of Demeter and Kore (Persephone) continued down to the end of the 4th century A.D. Politically, Eleusis played no role in the development of Greece, but its religious significance was of paramount importance. The most important monuments lay within the sacred enclosure at Eleusis, which consisted of a spacious terrace on the E slope of an acropolis, surrounded by a massive wall and towers. The earliest sanctuary antedated the 7th century B.C., and was reconstructed and enlarged in the 6th century B.C. by the Pisistratidae. In succeeding years it was further enlarged as the importance of the mysteries increased. During the Persian Wars it was burned, but was restored by Cimon and Pericles. Entrance to the sanctuary of the Great Goddesses (Demeter and Kore) was forbidden, on pain of death, to the uninitiated. Those who had been initiated, like the traveler Pausanias, never described the buildings within the wall, only ruins of which now remain. Before the sacred enclosure was a large paved court, constructed in Roman times, and nearby an ancient spring where pilgrims purified themselves. Also in the area was a large altar and a ditch where victims, sacrifices to the gods of the Underworld, were burned. A sacred way led to the sanctuary. On the right of the sacred way a grotto cut into the flank of the hill was the precinct of Pluto and represented the entrance to the Underworld by which Hades (Pluto) carried off Persephone. The sacred precinct was entered through two propylaea (of Roman construction) in succession, and its chief building was the Telesterion, where the rites of initiation took place, rites surrounded by a secrecy that was never entirely violated. The remains of the Telesterion date from the 6th century B.C., with additions made in the time of the Roman emperors, and replace much earlier buildings. The Telesterion was a huge, nearly square, roofed hall, on the four sides of which rows of seats, some of which were cut into the rock, were constructed for the mystae (initiated), who sat on them and observed the rites of initiation as they took place. The seats accommodated about 3000 spectators. The unique architecture of the Telesterion and its successive transformations, as well as remains of the entire precinct, were revealed by the excavations of the Archaeological Society of Athens and others, carried out at intervals since 1882.

Eleusis, Bas-relief of. Ancient Greek work of high artistic importance in the National Museum, Athens. It represents Demeter, Kore, and Triptolemus, and is most delicate in execution and expression. It dates from the early 5th century B.C.

Eleutherae (ē-lō'thēr-ē). When Dionysus returned from Asia he freed the cities of Boeotia and founded Eleutherae, the "City of Freedom." The city, originally in Boeotia, later allied itself to Athens, out of hatred of the Thebans. In a cave near Eleutherae Antiope left her twin sons, Amphion and Zethus, as soon as they were born. They were found by shepherds, who washed them in a cold spring beside the cave and took them to their huts to rear them.

Eleutherius (el-ū-thir'i-us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Liberator," or "God of Freedom." There was an image of Zeus Eleutherius at Athens. Near the common tomb of the Greeks who fell at the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.), an altar of Zeus Eleutherius was set up. For many years it was the custom to hold games every four years called the Eleutheria. The competitors ran, in armor, before the altar, and were awarded prizes.

ing plastic decoration of the Parthenon, and a caryatid and column from the Erechtheum, and recognized as containing the finest existing productions of Greek sculpture. The marbles, now in the British Museum, were brought from Athens between 1801 and 1803 by Thomas Bruce, the 7th Earl of Elgin. The Parthenon sculptures were executed under the direction of Phidias, c440 B.C. The collection includes remains of the pediment statues in the round, a great part of the frieze, in low relief, about 525 ft. long, which surrounded the exterior of the cella, and 15 of the metopes of the exterior frieze, carved in very high relief with episodes of the contest between the Centaurs and the Lapiths. Among the chief of the pediment figures are the reclining figure of Theseus, Iris with wind-blown drapery, and the group of one reclining and two seated female figures popularly called the "Three Fates."

Elicius (ē-lī'shus). A Roman epithet of Jupiter, as the god who sends the lightning, or as the giver of celestial signs and omens.

Elis (ē'lis). [Also: Eleia.] In ancient geography, a country in the W part of the Peloponnesus, Greece, lying between Achaea on the N, Arcadia on the E, Messenia on the S, and the Ionian Sea on the W. It comprised three parts: Elis proper or Hollow Elis, Pisatis, and Triphylia. Olympia, the site of the Olympic Games and the temple of Olympian Zeus, is in Elis; Elis, Pisa (later known as Olympia), Pylus, Lepreum, Letrini, and Hyrmine were some of the cities of Elis. According to tradition, the people of Elis came into the Peloponnesus from Calydon and Aetolia. Their first king was Aëthlius, the father of Endymion. Endymion later decided to award the throne to that one of his sons who won in a running race. Epeus was the victor and became king. He was succeeded by Aetolus, who was forced to flee, and the throne fell to Eleus, a son of Poseidon and the daughter of Endymion. Eleus called his people Eleans after himself. This Eleus was, according to some accounts, the father of Augeas (those who say Helius was the father of Augeas do so simply to glorify him), who hired Heracles to cleanse his stables and then refused to pay him as he had promised. Heracles made war on him, unsuccessful because Augeas was supported by the sons of

Actor, the Actoridae—Cteatus and Eurytus—and by Amarynceus. Later Heracles fell on the sons of Actor at Cleonae, during a truce for the Isthmian Games, and murdered them. Their mother, Molione, learned who their murderer was and demanded satisfaction from the Argives, among whom Heracles was living, at Tiryns. The Argives refused satisfaction. Molione sought to have the Argives banned thereafter from the Isthmian Games, but failing in this, she put a curse on any Eleans who should take part in the Games, and it was for this reason that the Eleans henceforth refused to compete in the Isthmian Games. Heracles, with an army of Argives, Thebans, and Arcadians, again attacked Elis. He destroyed Pylus but abandoned his expedition against Pisa because of an oracle. As master of Elis, he gave the land to Phyleus, son of Augeas, who had tried to persuade Augeas to pay Heracles as promised. Phyleus put the affairs of the country in order and departed to Dulichium. After the death of Augeas the kingdom fell to his son Agasthenes, and to the sons of the Actoridae. The Eleans sent 40 ships to accompany the Greek forces in the war against Troy. When the Heraclidae (Cresphontes, Temenus, and their nephews, Procles and Eurysthenes) decided to return to the Peloponnesus, on the ground that it belonged to them because Heracles had conquered it, they were told by an oracle to choose "one with three eyes" as their leader. They met Oxylus driving a one-eyed mule, and decided he was the leader indicated by the oracle. They promised him Elis in return for his services as leader of their expedition, thus Oxylus, an Aetolian, became ruler of Elis. In later times, Elis was afflicted by strife. The king, Iphitus, a contemporary of the Spartan law-giver Lycurgus, asked the oracle at Delphi how peace could be restored. The priestess told him to revive the Olympic Games, which had been abandoned for a time because of the war. She told him also to crown the victors, hitherto uncrowned, with wreaths of wild olive that had been cut from a tree shrouded in spider webs. Iphitus found such a tree in the sacred precinct at Olympia, and raised a wall around it. He revived the Olympic Games, some say in 793 B.C., and some say the time was 408

years after the fall of Troy (776 B.C.), and also persuaded the Eleans to worship Heracles, as the oracle had commanded, though hitherto he was always considered their worst enemy. The people of Elis were said to be the only Greeks to worship Hades, because when Heracles led his expedition against Pylus in Elis, Athena aided him, but Hades aided the Eleans, and even suffered a wound from Heracles for their sake. The Eleans raised a sanctuary to Hades, which was opened only once a year. They also worshiped Dionysus with the greatest reverence, and claimed that he attended their festival, Thyia. At the time of this festival three empty pots were brought into the temple by priests and set down empty in the presence of all who wished to see. The building was then sealed, in the presence of the onlookers. Next day, still with witnesses, the seals were broken, the pots were examined, and were found to be filled with wine. No mules can be bred within the borders of Elis. The Eleans claimed this is because of a curse of Oenomaus, who was a lover of fine horses.

Historically, the Eleans played their part in the Persian Wars. Later they reluctantly joined with Sparta (420 B.C.) in the invasion of Attica, but soon abandoned the alliance with their ancient enemy, which enmity had survived since Pisans of Elis aided the Messenians in their war with Sparta, and drove the Spartans (401-399 B.C.) out of the sacred precinct at Olympia. In 398 B.C. they submitted to Sparta and were compelled to allow the Spartans to take part in the Olympic Games, from which they had banned them. For a time they were unwilling allies of Philip II of Macedon, but after the death of Alexander they fought on the side of the Peloponnesians against Antipater and the Macedonians and were defeated with their allies.

Elissa (ē-lis'ā). [Also: Elisa.] In Phoenician legend, a princess of the royal house of Tyre, daughter of King Matgen (or Belus), grandson of Eth-Baal. She was married to her uncle Sicharbaal or Sicharbas (in Greek, Acerbas; in Latin, Sychaeus). Her brother Pygmalion having murdered Sicharbas, she sought safety in flight. With her sister Anna and a band of Tyrian colonists she set out for Africa, a term then applied to a section of the Mediterranean coast in what is now Tunisia. The local dynast contemptuously offering to sell the pilgrims as much land as could be enclosed within a bull's hide, Elissa had it cut following the margin in a cord some miles in length, with which she purchased enough land for her citadel, naming it Carthage, in Greek Byrsa. Unable to counter the insistence of the native king Iarbas that she marry him, she had a funeral pyre built and committed suicide by stabbing herself on it.

As appropriated by Vergil, the saga of Elissa becomes a key episode of the Aeneid. Carthage is newly founded, the scene of intense building activity; its governor is Elissa, who here appears as Dido, an epithet of the Phoenician Astarte as moon-goddess, still mourning Sychaeus; to Aeneas' storm-tossed companions she graciously grants haven. Dido and Aeneas, buffeted by fortune, form a romantic attachment, interrupted by the god's insistence that Aeneas continue his destined journey to Italy. When Aeneas dutifully sails away, Dido, dishonored and heartbroken, kills herself on her pyre, leaving a legacy of hatred between Carthage and Rome. (JJ)

Elpenor (el-pē'nôr). In the Odyssey, one of the companions of Odysseus on his return voyage from Troy. With others, he was changed into a swine by Circe and then, at Odysseus' command, changed back into a man by her. But in a drunken stupor he fell asleep on the roof of Circe's palace, and when it was time to leave he rolled off and was killed. Odysseus saw his shade when he visited the Underworld, and promised to do funeral honors for him so that he could cross the Styx, and to build a sepulchral mound for him and place his oar on it.

Elymus (el'i-mus). According to legend, a bastard son of Anchises. He fled from Troy to Italy with Acestes and helped the latter establish the city of Segesta in Sicily. He was reunited with Aeneas in Sicily, who arrived some time later, and the half-brothers celebrated funeral games in honor of Anchises together.

Elysian Fields (ē-lizh'ān). Name given to a region near the ancient town of Baiae (modern Baia), Italy, which is particularly fertile and delightful, and is, therefore, supposed to Elysium (ē-liz'i-um, -lizh'um). [Also: Elysian Fields.] Abode of the souls of the good and of heroes exempt from death, in ancient classical mythology. It is described, particularly by later poets, as a place of exceeding bliss, and contrasted with Tartarus, an afterworld of torment. Some have thought it to be in the center of the earth, some in the Islands of the Blest, and some in the sun or mid-air. In the Odyssey it is a plain at the end of the earth "where life is easiest to man. No snow is there, nor yet great storm nor any rain."

Emathia (ē-mā'thi-a). An ancient name for Macedonia, or a region in Macedonia. The name was also sometimes applied to Thessaly and Pharsalia.

Emathion (ē-mā'thi-on). In Greek mythology, a son of Tithonus and Eos, goddess of the dawn. He seized the throne of his brother, Memnon, king of Aethiopia. Later Heracles, passing through his country in search of the golden apples of the Hesperides, killed Emathion and restored the throne to Memnon.

Empedocles (em-ped'ō-klēz). Greek poet, philosopher, and statesman, born in Acragas in Sicily, c493 B.C. He died probably in the Peloponnesus, c433 B.C. Although born of a rich and noble family, he was an ardent champion of liberty, and resisted the tyrants Theron and Thrasydaeus. On the expulsion of the latter he helped to set up a democratic constitution. Under it he exerted great influence through his vast learning, his powerful oratory, and his wealth. In later life it is thought he left Sicily, perhaps because of political disturbances, and went to the Peloponnesus, where he died. He followed Pythagoras and Parmenides in his teachings, but he was a real poet, and expressed his doctrine in poetic form. His system was based on the belief that there are four original elements—Fire, Earth, Water, and Air—and that these elements do not change in themselves but are mixed and moved by the action upon them of such non-physical forces as Love and Strife. The earth and all life on it originated from the endless mixing and moving of these elements. He also expressed in poetry his belief that the sinner who stained his hands with innocent blood, or was false to his oath, must wander through untold eons, never attaining the peace of the dead, received and cast out by Air, Sea, Earth, and Sun, and endlessly being transformed from one mortal shape to another. He professed magic powers, prophecy, and a miraculous power of healing. In support of such professions he is said to have stopped the etesian winds, drained a vast swamp, and restored a dead woman to life. He also prophesied the hour when the gods would summon him and, according to some accounts, he disappeared without trace and was believed to have passed away without dying. Others said he threw himself into the crater of Aetna in order that, from his sudden disappearance, the people might believe he correctly prophesied his own passing and was a god. It is claimed by these latter that they knew he hurled himself into the crater because one of his brass boots was cast up by the volcano. The general tradition is that he died in the Peloponnesus. His influence on Greek and Arabian thought was great; books in his name appeared in both languages. Fragments of his hexameter poem, On Nature, survive. It was very highly regarded in antiquity for its content and its style. Some verses of his poem, Purifications, also survive.

Empusae (em-pū'sē). In Greek mythology, cannibal monsters with the legs of asses and hoofs of brass. Sometimes called the children of Hecate, at her direction they were sent to frighten travelers, disguised as bitches, cows, or even as beautiful maidens. The Lamiae were reckoned among the Empusae, who were believed eventually to devour their human lovers.

Enalus (ē'na-lus). According to legend, a young man who leaped into the sea because his sweetheart, Phineis, was chosen by lot to be hurled into the sea as a sacrifice to Amphritrite when colonists were first setting out for Lesbos. He was saved by a dolphin, who bore Enalus on his back to shore. The dolphin's mate rescued Phineis.

Enarete (en-ä'rē-tē). In Greek mythology, the wife of Aeolus, king of the winds, and the mother of his six sons and six daughters.

Enceladus (en-sel'a-dus). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle he was crushed flat by a huge stone flung at him by Athena as he fled. He now lies crushed under Aetna in Sicily. When he stirs the mountain shakes, and when he breathes it erupts.

Encheleans (en-ke-lē'anz). A people of Illyria. According to legend, Cadmus emigrated to their country after the death of Pentheus, his son-in-law, and was chosen by the Encheleans as their king. His tomb is in their land. Some of the Colchians who pursued Jason later settled among the Encheleans, rather than face the wrath of Aeëtes by returning to Colchis without Medea.

Endeis (en-dē'is). In Greek mythology, the second wife of Aeacus, king of Aegina. She was the mother of Telamon and Peleus and encouraged them to murder their half-brother Phocus.

Endoeus (en-dē'us). Ionian sculptor, active in the latter part of the 6th century B.C. Some say he was a pupil of Daedalus and fled with him to Crete. Among his works, in the archaic style, was a statue of seated Athena on the Acropolis, and an ancient image of Athena at Tegea. He also made images for temples in Ionia, including an image of Artemis at Ephesus.

Endymion (en-dim'i-on). According to some accounts, he was a son of Zeus and the nymph Calyce; but some say he was a son of Aëthlius. He seized the throne of the region that was later known as Elis and made himself king. By his wife, whose name is variously given as Cromia, Asterodia, and Hyparippe, he was the father of three sons—Paeon, Epeus, and Aetolus—and a daughter, Eurycyda (or Eurydice). To choose a successor for his throne, he had his sons engage in a running race at Olympia. Epeus won, became king, and named the people of the land Epeans. Selene, the moon-goddess, came upon Endymion lying asleep in a cave, and fell in love with his beauty. She visited him nightly and bore him 50 daughters. Some say she asked Zeus to give him perpetual youth and eternal sleep. Others say that Endymion was a hunter on Mount Latmos in Caria, and that it was in a cave there that Selene found him, and that it was he himself who asked Zeus for immortality, eternal slumber, and undying youth. In all versions of his myth he is described as a youth of great beauty who kept his youth and his beauty in never-waking slumber. The Eleans (the name by which the Epeans came to be known) claimed that the tomb of Endymion was at Olympia in Elis, but others say he lies in eternal sleep in a cave on Mount Latmos in Caria, near Miletus.

Endymion, Sleeping. Classical statue in Parian marble, found in Hadrian's villa at Tivoli, Italy, and acquired by the National Museum at Stockholm, Sweden.

Engyum (en'ji-um) or Enguium (eng'gwi-um). In ancient geography, a city of Sicily, supposed to have been situated in the mountains N of Enna on a site near the modern town of Gangi. It possessed a celebrated temple of the Great Mother of the Gods.

Eniopeus (ē-nī'ō-pūs). Named in the Iliad as one of Hector's charioteers. He was slain by Diomedes.

Enipeus (ē-nī'pē-us). A river of Thessaly which flows into the Peneus (also sometimes called the Alpheus) River. According to mythology, Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, fell in love with the river-god Enipeus and wooed him daily, but he scorned her. Poseidon took the form of Enipeus when he wooed Tyro and became the father, by her, of Pelias and Neleus. Later Tyro cast the children adrift on the waters of the Enipeus when she learned that she had been tricked by Poseidon, according to some accounts. Others say she exposed them on a mountain. Enna (en'a) or Henna (hen'a). [Former name, Castro Giovanni.] City of Sicily, situated in a mountainous region in the center of the island. In ancient times, Enna was the seat of the cult of the goddess Demeter, whose temple was here; Enna, more specifically the nearby Lake of Pergusa, was supposed to be the location at which the rape of Persephone, Demeter's daughter, occurred. The city was called the navel of Sicily, because of its position in the center of the island. It belonged to the Carthaginians, and fell into the hands of the Romans in the First Punic War. It was a headquarters of the slaves in the First Servile War, resisting the Roman armies for two years.

Ennius (en'i-us), Quintus. Roman epic poet, born at Rudiae, in Bruttii, 239 B.C. He died probably at Rome, 169 B.C. He was one of the founders of Latin literature and was admired by the ancients as the father of Latin poetry. He served in the Roman army in Sardinia (204 B.C.), in the Second Punic War, and there met Marcus Porcius Cato (Cato the Censor), who brought him to Rome, where he taught Greek and translated Greek plays. He became friendly with the Scipios and with Fulvius Nobilior, whom he accompanied to the Aetolian War in 189 B.C. and whose son secured Roman citizenship for Ennius in 184 B.C. He was the author of Annales (in 18 books, only fragments of which survive), an epic poem on the history of Rome from the fall of Troy down to his own time. With this poem he produced the first national epic of the Romans and also introduced the Greek hexameter as a literary form. This greatly influenced later Latin poets. He also wrote tragedies, modeled on those of Euripides, some comedies, and miscellaneous poems in various meters.

Ennomus (en'ō-mus). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a seer or augur of Mysia, who fought as an ally of the Trojans and was slain by Achilles.

Ennosigaeus (en-ō-sig'ē-us). Epithet of Poseidon, meaning "Earth-shaker," as one who causes the earth to quake and tremble when he strikes it with his trident, thus causing chasms, valleys, springs, and river-beds. This epithet was particularly applied in regions which were subject to earthquakes. In one early attempt at cosmology, the continental land masses of the earth were held to be islands floating in the sea, and thus subject to disturbance at Poseidon's whim. There was a sanctuary of Poseidon Ennosigaeus near Therapne in Sparta, and an image of him in the harbor town of Gythium in Laconia.

Enope (ē'nō-pē). A town on the border between Laconia and Messenia. It was one of the "gift" cities that Agamemnon offered to Achilles if the latter would forget his quarrel with Agamemnon and return to the fight in the Trojan War. The town was later called Gerenia.

Entellus (en-tel'us). In the Aeneid, a noted Sicilian boxer who had been instructed by Eryx and who inherited the boxing gloves Eryx wore in the bout in which Heracles defeated him. In the funeral games for Anchises in Sicily Acestes persuaded him, against his will, to accept the challenge of Dares, a much younger man. In the match which followed he battered young Dares so murderously that Aeneas stopped the match and awarded Entellus the prize. With one great blow of his fist he smashed in the head of the bullock which he received as a prize and offered it to Eryx, and then announced that his boxing days were over.

Enyalios (e-ni-ā'li-us). An epithet of Ares, "Slayer of Heroes." Appearance of this name in lists of divinities deciphered in the bronze-age Linear B tablets suggests that Enyalios was an early Greek or even pre-Greek god worshiped in Mycenaean times and later identified with Ares, a view supported by references in classical writers to temples of Enyalios in Salamis and the Megarid. (JJ)

Enyeus (ē-nī'yūs). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a king of Scyros whose fortress was captured by Patroclus in the years of the Trojan War before the siege of Troy began.

Enyo (ē-nī'ō). In Greek mythology, a goddess of war, sacker of cities, and companion of Ares. The Romans identified her with Bellona, destroyer of cities.

Enyo. One of the Graeae, a daughter of Ceto and Phorcys. See Graeae.

Eoiae (ē-oi'ē). Poem, attributed to Hesiod, celebrating Boeotian and Thessalian heroines who wedded gods. It formed a fourth book of the Catalogue of Women, an epic history of Dorian and Aeolian women. The name is sometimes used as being synonymous with the Catalogue of Women.

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

Eos (ē'ōs). The "rosy-fingered" goddess of the dawn. Clad in a saffron-colored mantle she drives her golden chariot, drawn by two white horses, from the east to Olympus each day to announce to men and gods the coming of her brother Helios. She is the herald of the day. Eos is a daughter of the Titans Hyperion and Thia, and by Astraeus she is the mother of the winds and the stars, especially the morning star. It is said that Eos once seduced Ares, the lover of Aphrodite, and so enraged the latter that she caused Eos to yearn for the fresh and youthful beauty of mortals. This accounts for her many mortal lovers. When Orion, blinded, came to the east Eos fell in love with him and caused her brother Helios to restore his sight by touching his lids with his rays. Eos then carried him off to Delos with her. She bore a son, Phaëthon, to Cephalus, whom she had caused to doubt his wife Procris. Some say it was Eos who carried off Ganyমেদে, and that Zeus took him from her to be his cup-bearer. In return she asked Zeus Emathion to Tithonous. In the Trojan War Memnon went to the aid of the Trojans. On the day he was fated to die Eos came reluctantly from the east. When death, at the hands of Achilles, overtook him that day, the children of Eos slipped down from heaven and rescued his body and carried it off. Eos threatened to withdraw her light from the earth. If Zeus loved Thetis and her son Achilles better than Eos and her son Memnon, let Thetis provide light to the world, she said. For some time darkness covered the earth, but the Horae came to Eos and led her to Zeus. At his command she resumed her daily course, but thenceforth she wept tears of dew each morning, in memory of Memnon.

Epaminondas (ē'pam-i-non'das). Theban general and statesman, born c418 B.C.; died at Mantinea, Arcadia, Greece, 362 B.C. He was of a noble but impoverished family. Modest and not personally ambitious, he determined to lighten his poverty by the study of Pythagorean philosophy, to which he had been introduced by Lysis, an exile from Tarentum. He was as interested in music as he was in physical prowess, and became an accomplished player on the lyre and the flute. Further to lighten his poverty, he denied himself the luxury of taking a wife. He was the good friend of Pelopidas, a man of wealth, and so high were his principles that he alone of the friends of Pelopidas refused to accept any financial help from him. Pelopidas, since he could not share his wealth with Epaminondas, decided to share the poverty of his friend—to some extent. Both were animated by ardent patriotism, both were noted for their integrity. They were colleagues in government and in command. At the battle of Mantinea (385 B.C.), Thebes was an ally of Sparta. Pelopidas fell, pierced by seven wounds. Epaminondas rescued him from the enemy and saved his life. The Theban alliance with Sparta was an unequal one. In 382 B.C. the Spartans seized the citadel of Thebes and set a Spartan governor, with a garrison of 1500 Spartan hoplites, over the Thebans. Pelopidas fled to Athens rather than live under Spartan rule. Epaminondas remained in Thebes, hoping for the day when Spartan control would be thrown off. By a daring coup, Pelopidas secretly returned to Thebes with six companions and to grant eternal life to Tithonous, another Trojan whom she had carried off. Zeus granted her plea and she bore Memnon and killed the Spartan rulers. Epaminondas, in the turmoil that then broke out in the city, came to his aid with an armed band, and urged the Thebans to expel the Spartan garrison that had taken refuge in the citadel. But force was unnecessary, for the Spartans decided to withdraw under a truce. Thebes was thus freed of the Spartan yoke (378 B.C.) and a democratic constitution was proclaimed. An elite corps, called the Sacred Band, was created. It consisted of 300 young men of noble Theban families; 150 pairs of devoted friends determined to fight to victory or die together. The Sacred Band, maintained at the expense of the city, was the spearhead and rallying point of every attack. Epaminondas used it to revolutionize military tactics. In the years following the expulsion of the Spartans, Thebes repelled several Spartan attacks, and brought most of the Boeotian cities under her control. At a general peace conference between the various warring Greek states and their allies (371 B.C.), Agesilaus, the Spartan general, demanded that Epaminondas, the Theban envoy, allow every Boeotian city to sign the treaty separately. Epaminondas replied that he would if the Spartans would allow each of their vassal states to sign separately also. He knew that Sparta would not yield such control to her vassal states, and the result was that Thebes was not a party to the peace treaty. In the same year the Spartans, in violation of their treaty with their allies, decided to march against Thebes and free the Boeotian cities from Theban domination. At Leuctra they were met by Epaminondas and his army. The Thebans and their allies were appalled at the numbers and reputation of the forces marshaled against them and wished to withdraw. Epaminondas insisted that here was the place to make a stand, and his view prevailed. In accordance with a dream of Pelopidas, a roan colt was sacrificed to the daughters of the Theban Scedalus, Epaminondas permitted the Thespian allies, who had joined the Thebans against their will, to depart, and the next day, using the Sacred Band as a flying wedge, the Thebans defeated the Spartans at Leuctra (July, 371 B.C.). Cleombrotus, the Spartan king, was slain in the battle, 1000 Spartans fell, and 47 Thebans or their allies lost their lives. The Spartans admitted defeat by asking for a truce and were permitted to withdraw. By defeating them at Leuctra, Epaminondas destroyed the Spartan superiority in Greece that they had obtained 30 years before in the Peloponnesian War. The destruction of Spartan influence in Greek affairs was the most important and lasting of the accomplishments of Epaminondas. The Thespians, fearing the anger of Epaminondas because they had left him on the eve of Leuctra, withdrew to one of their strongholds, that at Ceressus, which had never been captured in its history. However, there was an oracle of Delphi saying Ceressus would fall when "the Dorians have lost their glorious youth." Epaminondas marched to Ceressus and took it. He then (370 B.C.) carried the war to the Peloponnesus in support of the Arcadians against Sparta. He restored the Mantineans of Arcadia to their city and persuaded the Arcadians to join in building a great new city, Megalopolis, which would serve as a bastion against Sparta. He marched to the very borders of Sparta and ravaged southern Laconia. This created despair in Sparta, which, for generations, had not known war so near its own lands. Next he went to Messenia, for he was advised in a dream, some say, to restore the Messenians to their homeland from which they had been driven by the Spartans. Sparta now knew the humiliation of losing some of her territory. Messenia was detached from her control. Using the ancient citadel of Ithome as one wall, Epaminondas ordered the boundaries of the new city of Messene to be marked out to the piping of flutes. To the city he recalled the Messenian exiles. While he was in Messenia his one-year term as boeotarch (commander) expired. Although it was against the law, he retained his command, and when he returned to Thebes he was brought to trial for ignoring the law. The jury that heard the case did not even record their votes. Duly elected boeotarch again, Epaminondas again defeated the Spartans in the Peloponnesus. He marched into Sicyon (369 B.C.) and took many captives, including many Boeotians of cities now under Theban control who had fled into Sicyon. It was the practice for the Thebans to allow prisoners of war to be

ransomed, but for any Boeotians captured in any engagement to be killed as traitors. As an example of his dislike for unnecessary harshness, in this case Epaminondas gave all the Boeotian captives a new nationality so that their lives might be spared. In 368 B.C. Pelopidas, who had gone to visit Alexander of Phœræ after a campaign in Thessaly, was treacherously thrown into prison by Alexander. Epaminondas, no longer boeotarch, marched in the ranks of an army sent to rescue him. The Thebans were surprised by the army of Alexander in Thessaly and were thrown into confusion. The two legal boeotarchs voluntarily resigned their posts and handed over the command to Epaminondas. He skillfully extricated the Thebans from a dangerous position, and the following year secured the release of Pelopidas without striking a blow.

On the advice of Epaminondas, the Thebans created a navy, of which he became the first admiral. Events in the Peloponnese then caused him to lead an army into that region for a fourth time, to bring the disaffected cities there under Theban control again. He attacked the enemy—Spartans, Athenians, Mantineans, and others who had united against Thebes—at Mantinea (362 B.C.) and overwhelmed them. As he pursued the fleeing enemy he was mortally wounded by a spear thrust. Dying, he sent for the two men whom he wanted to appoint to succeed him in command. On learning that they had been slain he advised that peace be made with the enemy. By his death, a crushing victory was transformed into a stalemate, for when he pulled the spear from his body and died there was no one to take his place. Epaminondas was a brilliant military innovator, whose tactics were successfully imitated by Alexander the Great. He was noted for his patriotism, his learning and his eloquence (which was seldom employed, but then to great effect), and for the nobility and purity of his character. Notably successful as a general, he was unable, as a statesman, to secure the dominant place in Greek affairs which he had won for Thebes, and after his death Theban influence declined.

Epaphroditus (ē-paf-rō-dī'tus). Freedman of Nero, and his secretary. He assisted Nero in his attempt at suicide. He was also secretary of Domitian by whom he was killed (95 A.D.). The philosopher Epictetus was the freedman of Epaphroditus.

Epaphus (ep'ā-fus). In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus and Io. As foretold to Io by Prometheus when she visited him on his crag in the Caucasus, Zeus touched Io and she bore him Epaphus on the Nile, after she had completed many years of wandering. The Curetes, at the request of Hera, made off with Epaphus. When Zeus learned of their theft he slew them. Io searched for her son, found him in Syria, and returned with him to Egypt. According to some accounts, Epaphus married Memphis, a daughter of the Nile, and founded a city which he named Memphis in her honor. He became king of Egypt, and was the ancestor of the Danaids and of Heracles, as was also foretold by Prometheus. Epaphus was considered by some to be the divine bull Apis. His daughter Libya became the mother of the twins Agenor and Belus by Poseidon.

Epeans (ep-ē'anz). Descendants of Epeus, one of the sons of Endymion. He won the throne by defeating his brothers in a running race, and named the people after himself. The Epeans dwelt in the land that was later known as Elis. Some say that Pelops took Olympia (formerly called Pisa) from the Epeans during the reign of Epeus. When Nestor was a youth he won his spurs in battle in a war between the Epeans and the Pylians, in which he drove off great numbers of Epean cattle, killed many, and completely routed the Epeans. In the Trojan War, Epeans from Epea in Elis were under the command of Nestor.

Epeus (ep-ē'us). In legend, a son of Panopeus. Although he had the reputation of being a coward, and was, as a punishment to his father for breaking his oath, he accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan War. At the funeral games for Patroclus he won the boxing match, and again, at the funeral games for Achilles, he contended with Acamas, son of Theseus, in the boxing match. The match was stopped, as the contestants were evenly matched. Epeus, with the aid of Athena, built the Wooden Horse which led to the fall of Troy, and entered the city in it, although trembling with fear.

Epeus. According to legend, a son of Endymion. In a race arranged by his father against his brothers, he won and was awarded the throne of his land in the Peloponnesus. He named the people after himself, Epeans. He married Anaxiroë and had one daughter, Hyrmina, but no sons. During his reign, Pelops won the land of Pisa and neighboring Olympia after the death of Oenomaus, and separated it from the land of Epeus. The Eleans, the name by which the Epeans were later called, said that Pelops was the first in the Peloponnesus to erect a temple of Hermes. He did this to appease the god for the death of Myrtilus. Epeus was succeeded by his brother Aetolus, who was forced to flee from his country because he accidentally killed Apis at the funeral games for Azan. The kingdom fell to Eleus, son of Poseidon and the daughter of Endymion, who changed the name of the people to Eleans.

Ephebos (e-fē'bos) or Ephebus (-bus). In Greek antiquity, particularly at Athens, a young man, the son of a citizen, between the ages of 18 and 20. At Athens, upon attaining the age of 18 each youth was subjected to an examination as to his physical development and his legal claims to citizenship. During the next two years (later reduced to one year) his education, moral, physical and military, was taken in charge by the state, and conducted under the most rigid discipline, in conformity with a fixed course designed to prepare him to understand and to perform the duties of citizenship. Upon being admitted to take the sacred oath, at which time he was formally presented with a spear and a shield, he received some of the citizen's privileges, and he became a full citizen after completing with honor his two years as an ephebos. Hence, in works on Greek art, etc., the name is applied to any youth, particularly if bearing arms, or otherwise shown to be of free estate.

Ephesian Artemis. An ancient Asiatic divinity whose worship was adopted by the Ionian Greeks. She was a personification of the fruitfulness of nature, and was quite distinct from the Greek goddess, though assimilated to her by the Ephesians from some resemblance of attributes. She was represented wearing a mural crown and with many breasts, and with the lower part of her body cased, like a mummy, in a sheath bearing mystical figures. Also called "Diana of the Ephesians."

Ephesian Stories. See Abrocomes and Atheia. Ephesus (ef'e-sus). In ancient geography, one of the 12 Ionian cities in Asia Minor, in Lydia, situated on the Caÿster River near its mouth, S of Smyrna. According to legend, it was founded by Ephesus, a son of the river-god Caÿster, and by Coresus. The first inhabitants were Leleges and Lydians, and Amazons dwelt nearby. Later, Androclus, a son of Codrus, the legendary king of Athens, drove out the natives and settled there with Ionian colonists. They identified the nature-goddess who was worshiped there from very ancient times with their Artemis, and allowed the natives who dwelt near the ancient temple to remain, and exchanged oaths of friendship with them. Androclus died in battle and was buried at Ephesus. Through its trade and its importance as a port, the city flourished mightily. In later times the tyrant of Ephesus married a daughter of Alyattes, king of Lydia and father of Croesus, and the city became part of the kingdom of Croesus when he succeeded his father. Subsequently the city fell to the Persians, but continued to thrive. Alexander the Great established (334 B.C.) a democratic constitution there. While he was in the city the artist Apelles painted a portrait of him, holding the lightning in his hands, that was set up in the temple of Artemis. In 133 B.C. Ephesus was taken by the Romans but still remained great and powerful. Through ancient times Ephesus, the city of Artemis, was celebrated for its temple of Artemis, and as a great commercial city whose wealth was proverbial. It was sacked by the Goths (262 A.D.), the temple was destroyed, the harbor silted up and destroyed the importance of the city as a port, and small villages and ruins covered the site. Among its ruins are a theater, an odeum, a stadium, and the temple of Artemis. The great theater is mentioned in Acts, xix. 23. It is Greek in plan, with Roman modifications. The cavea (auditorium), 495 feet in diameter, has two precincts (landings between tiers of seats), with 11 cunei (blocks of seats) in the two lower ranges, and 22 in the highest, which is skirted by a colonnaded gallery. The orchestra is 110 feet in diameter, and the proscenium 22 feet wide. The odeum (a type of small theater) is ascribed to the 2nd century A.D. In plan it is a half-circle 153 feet in diameter. There is one precinct, with five cunei below and ten above it, and a rich Corinthian gallery around the top. The orchestra is 30 feet in diameter; the stage has five doors and Corinthian columns. The stadium, ascribed to the time of Augustus, is 850 feet long and about 200 feet wide. The N side and semicircular E end are supported on vaulted substructions, the S side on the rock of the hillside. A double colonnade was carried along its entire length, and communicated with the upper gallery of the stadium by a series of stairways. The temple of Artemis (Diana of the Ephesians) was a famous and ancient sanctuary celebrated as one of the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World. It was burned in the 4th century B.C. and rebuilt. The temple was Ionic, dipteral, octastyle, with 21 columns on the flanks, and measured 164 by 342 feet. The base-diameter of the columns was 6 feet, their height 55 feet. The base-drums of 36 columns of the front and rear were beautifully sculptured with figures in relief. Croesus dedicated the golden heifers at the temple, and gave most of the columns, on the bases of which fragments of the words "Dedicated by Croesus," can be seen. The cella had interior ranges of columns, Ionic in the lower tier, Corinthian above. Xenophon, author of the Anabasis, deposited ransom money received for captives taken during the retreat of the 10,000 in the temple at Ephesus. The money was subsequently restored to him, and he used it to build (c370 B.C.) a small replica of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus at Scillus, in Elis, and for an annual festival of the goddess.

Ephialtes (ef-i-al'tēz). In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon. He was the brother of Otus. See Aloidae. Ephialtes was also the name of the nightmare demon of ancient Greece.

Ephialtes. In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle Apollo pierced him with an arrow through one eye, and Heracles sent an arrow through the other eye and killed him.

Ephialtes. A Greek of Malis who betrayed the Spartans and other Greeks under the command of Leonidas at the pass of Thermopylae (480 B.C.). In the hope of reward, he went to Xerxes, whose forces had three times been thrown back by the Greeks, and offered to lead the Persians by a path over the mountains so that they could attack from the rear the Greeks defending the pass. Xerxes accepted his offer; Ephialtes led them over the mountain, and the Greeks, fighting with enormous valor, were wiped out. Ephialtes afterward fled and a price was put on his head by the Greeks. Some time later he returned from his exile to Anticyra, and there was slain, his slayer being greatly honored by the Spartans.

Ephialtes. Athenian statesman and general; died 461 B.C. He was the friend and partisan of Pericles, and was the principal author of a law which abridged the power of the Areopagus and changed the government of Athens into a pure democracy (i.e., for citizens). Ephialtes opposed Cimon, the leader of the oligarchic and aristocratic party. With Pericles he brought charges against Cimon of having accepted bribes from the king of Macedon, but the charges were not pressed and Cimon was acquitted. Again, Ephialtes opposed Cimon's policy of aiding Sparta to put down a revolt of the Helots (462 B.C.). It was while he was off at the head of an expedition to aid Sparta in this affair that Ephialtes and Pericles put through the reforms that made Athens a democracy. When Cimon returned he was banished, and shortly afterward Ephialtes was mysteriously murdered. He was, according to Aristotle, assassinated by Aristodicus of Tanagra, at the instance of the oligarchs.

Ephor (ef'ôr). In ancient Greece, one of a body of magistrates common to many ancient Dorian constitutions, the most celebrated being that of the Spartans, among whom the board of ephors consisted of five members, elected yearly by the people. Their authority ultimately became superior to that of the kings, and virtually supreme before the office was abolished, c227 B.C., by Cleomenes III, who is said to have executed the incumbents. The term means "overseer" or "inspector," and in this meaning is widely used in Roman, Byzantine, and modern Greece.

Ephorus (ef'ô-rus). Greek historian, born at Cyme, in Aeolis, and active in the first half of the 4th century B.C. He wrote a universal history, in 30 books, covering the period from the Dorian migrations to 340 B.C. Book 30 was added by his son. In his work he rejected the history of the earliest times as being mythical. He was a collector and critic of earlier authorities, whom he used freely, and made an attempt to correct them by comparing and checking them against each other. His work, which includes ethnography, geography, and mythology, was greatly and justly admired and used. Fragments of his work have been preserved, and large parts of it appear in the extant parts of the Universal History of Diodorus Siculus.

Ephyra (ef'i-râ). Ancient name of Corinth, in the Peloponnesus, named, according to some, for Ephyra, daughter of Oceanus. Some say that Helius divided the land around the Asopus River. That which was later called Sicyonia he gave to Aloeus. That known as Ephyraea he gave to his son Aeëtes. When Aeëtes migrated to Colchis he left his share in the care of Bunus, a son of Hermes and Alcideamea. After Bunus, Epopeus, the son of Aloeus, added Ephyraea to his kingdom. Marathon succeeded his father Epopeus, and he in turn was succeeded by his son Corinthus. Corinthus, for whom the city was renamed, according to the Corinthians, died childless, and it was then, some say, that Medea, daughter of Aeëtes, claimed the kingdom for Jason. Some say that when Medea was compelled to flee from Corinth she handed the kingdom over to Sisyphus. Others say Sisyphus founded the city, c1350 B.C., and that its first inhabitants were a race sprung from mushrooms. See Corinth.

Ephyraea (ef-i-rē'ā). Ancient name for Corinthia.

Epibaterius (ep'i-bā-tē'ri-us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Seafaring." Diomedes raised a temple to Apollo Epibaterius in gratitude for his safe return after storms had battered the Greek ships on their way home from Troy.

Epicaste (ep-i-kas'tē). Name used in Homer for Jocasta.

Epic Cycle. Cycle of legends and songs about events relating to the Trojan War, produced as a chronological narrative by later compilers from material by various epic poets of the Ionian school, between 776 B.C. and 550 B.C.

Epicharmus (ep-i-kār'mus). Greek comic poet born in Sicily or on the island of Cos, c540 B.C. At an early age he was carried to Megara, in Sicily, and thence, when Megara was sacked by Gelon, to Syracuse. He died at Syracuse at an advanced age (90 or 97). He was the leading writer of comedy in the Dorian dialect. His works were farces, employing no chorus, and were greatly admired by Plato, who is said to have learned the art of writing dialogue from them. He made free use of puns in his works, and took for his subjects the gods and heroes, whom he treated in a light-hearted manner, and incidents of everyday life. He was also the author of such philosophical sayings as "Character is destiny to man." Thirty-five titles of his comedies are extant, but only scanty fragments remain.

Epictetus (ep-ik-tē'tus). Attic potter and painter, active at the end of the 6th century B.C. His signature appears as potter on at least one vessel, and as painter on thirty vessels. He was one of the greatest masters of his time. About 80 of his works—mostly cups and plates—are extant. He worked in the red-figure style mainly, although in his early work he sometimes used the black-figure technique. A plate (British Museum) shows an archer, possibly an Amazon. Another shows a satyr holding a wineskin.

Epictetus. [Also: Epictetus of Hierapolis.] Greek Stoic philosopher, active about 100 A.D. He was a crippled Phrygian slave, born in Hierapolis in Phrygia, and went to Rome as a slave in the house of Epaphroditus (the freedman and favorite of Nero). He was a pupil of Musonius Rufus and, having been emancipated by his master, lectured on philosophy in Rome until c94 A.D., when he removed to Nicopolis in Epirus, in consequence of an edict of Domitian banishing the philosophers from Rome. At Nicopolis he became a friend of Trajan, formed a school, and made many disciples. Although he left no written works, his essential doctrines are preserved in a manual compiled by his pupil Arrian. He taught that the sum of wisdom is to desire nothing but freedom and contentment, and to bear and forbear; that all unavoidable evil in the world is only apparent and external; and that our happiness depends upon our own will, which even Zeus cannot break.

Epicurus (ep-i-kū'rus). Greek philosopher, the founder of the Epicurean school of philosophy. He was born on the island of Samos, 342 or 341 B.C., and died at Athens 271 or 270 B.C. He was the son of Neocles, an Athenian cleruch (colonist) settled on Samos, and belonged to the Attic deme of Gargettus (whence he is sometimes called the Gargettian). He revealed an early aptitude for philosophy, which he studied as a youth at Athens and subsequently taught as a young man at Mytilene and Lampsacus. In 306 B.C. he returned to Athens, where he established a school in a garden outside the city walls. There, in an atmosphere of quiet withdrawal, he devoted the rest of his life to teaching. We owe most of our information about him to a biography by Diogenes Laertius. Of the approximately 300 rolls which he is said to have written, only fragments remain. Fortunately, however, his biographer gives us the texts of three of his rather lengthy epistles, a transcript of his will, and some 40 propositions known as "Principal Doctrines," all of which contain the substance of his views on "physics" and ethics. As Epicurus developed his system of hedonism, he was influenced by Plato's views on pleasure as well as by the Cyrenaic doctrine of Aristippus. Pleasure, according to Epicurus, meant freedom from pain and peace in body and mind. With the ethical principle of pleasure as the highest good, Epicurus blended the physics of Democritus and the other atomists of the 5th century B.C. This materialistic physics asserted such principles as "nothing can come from nothing," and "all that exists is atoms and void." As such it could be supported by empirical evidence, and was easily made to integrate on rational grounds with a hedonistic ethic. Adhering to an enlightened view of pleasure, Epicurus primarily desired that his system should free mankind from religious superstition and fear of death. He argued that the view of the universe as consisting only of atoms and void would rid man of his besetting anxieties and hence would enable him to achieve that best of pleasures, inner calm and security. He advocated the principle of moderation, and urged men to seek the pleasures of friendship, of simple living, even to the extent of recommending withdrawal from active life. Only by these and like means, Epicurus insisted, could real freedom and its attendant peace be attained. So carefully articulated was his philosophy that it endured without significant change for centuries after his death.

Epidaurum (ep-i-dô'rum). In ancient geography, a maritime town in Illyricum. It was destroyed sometime after the reign of Justinian, and was replaced by Ragusa, now Dubrovnik, Yugoslavia. It was a Roman colony.

Epidaurus (ep-i-dô'rus). Ancient town on the E coast of the Peloponnesus, in the district called Argolis. It was named, according to the Eleans, for a son of Pelops. But others say the Epidaurus for whom the town was named was a son of Argus and a descendant of Zeus, and some say he was a son of Apollo. According to legend, the last king before the arrival of the Dorians was Pityreus, a descendant of Ion, son of Creusa and Apollo, though Xuthus was his acknowledged father. When Deiphontes, son-in-law of Temenus, marched into the land Pityreus handed it over to him without a struggle and went off to Athens. The land was especially sacred to Asclepius, for the Epidaurians said that when Phlegyas, the Lapith king, came to the Peloponnesus to spy out the land and learn whether its people were warlike, he brought his daughter Coronis with him, unaware that she was about to bear Apollo's child. When her child, Asclepius, was born, she exposed him on a mountain, formerly called Myrtium but subsequently named Nipple. A she-goat pastured on the mountain slopes nursed him, and the watch-dog of the flock stood guard over him. The shepherd of the flock remarked that one she-goat and the watch-dog were missing. He looked about for them and found them behind a bush, guarding an infant. As he approached to take up the infant, lightning flashed from the child's body. The shepherd concluded that it was a divine child and so left it to divine protection. (For another version of the birth of Asclepius, see Asclepius.) From the beginning Asclepius was a god, and his fame as a healer spread throughout the land. The most famous of his sanctuaries had their origin in Epidaurus. Throughout the flourishing period of Greek history Epidaurus was an independent state, possessing a small territory, bounded on the W by Argeia, on the N by Corinthia, on the S by Troezenia, and on the E by the Saronic Gulf. It was the most celebrated seat of the ancient cult of Asclepius. The sanctuary occupied a valley among hills, at some distance from the city. The sacred grove was enclosed and contained a temple of Asclepius, in which lived tame sacred serpents, the architecturally important tholos (round building) of Polyclitus, extensive porticoes which served as hospitals to the sick who came to seek the aid of the god and his priests, and many votive offerings. As at Delos, no birth or death could take place in the sacred enclosure, and all offerings must be consumed within it. In the temple was an ivory and gold image of the god, representing him seated, holding a staff in one hand, and the other hand held above the head of a serpent. A dog stretched out at the side of the image. Originally, suppliants at the temple slept in the open air, but in the time of the Romans shelters were built for them. On slabs about the precinct were inscribed the names of the people who had been cured by Asclepius and the diseases from which he had freed them. Pausanias tells of a very old slab on which it was recorded that Hippolytus dedicated 20 horses to the god, because Asclepius had raised him from the dead. Outside of the sacred enclosure were the stadium, a gymnasium, propylaea, and other buildings, the arrangements for the collection and distribution of water being especially noteworthy. The theater at Epidaurus built probably by Polyclitus the Younger, was, and still is, unrivaled in its acoustical perfection. Extensive excavations conducted by the Archaeological Society of Athens (1881, et seq.) have greatly added to our knowledge of the sanctuary of Epidaurus.

Epidaurus Limera (li-mě'ra). In ancient geography, a town on the E coast of Laconia, Greece, about 22 miles NW of Cape Malea. According to tradition, some Epidaurians who were on their way to Cos, touched here and were warned by dreams to remain here. A snake they were bringing from Epidaurus escaped from their ship and disappeared into the ground near the shore. This event confirmed the dreams which instructed the Epidaurians to remain. On the spot where the snake disappeared into the ground they built altars of Asclepius and planted olive trees around them, and founded a city.

Epigeus (e-pí'jūs). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Agacles, king of Budeum. He murdered a kinsman and fled to Peleus for sanctuary. He later followed Achilles, son of Peleus, to Troy as one of the Myrmidons. He was slain by Hector in the struggle for Sarpedon's body.

Epigoni (ē-pig'ō-nī). The name given to the sons of the Seven against Thebes; it means "the After-born." Ten years after the disastrous rout of the Seven against Thebes by the Thebans the Epigoni proposed to march against Thebes to avenge their fathers. An oracle foretold that they would be successful if Alcmaeon commanded the expedition. Alcmaeon was persuaded to do so and the expedition set out. The chieftains who made up the Epigoni were: Alcmaeon and Amphilocheus, sons of Amphiaraus; Aegialeus, son of Adrastus; Diomedes, son of Tydeus; Promachus, son of Parthenopaeus; Sthenelus, son of Capaneus; Thersander, son of Polynices; and Euryalus, son of Mecisteus. The Thebans, under the command of Laodamas, son of Eteocles, met the Epigoni on the plain outside the walls of Thebes. Aegialeus was killed by Laodamas, but he in his turn was slain by Alcmaeon. The Thebans retired within the walls and were advised by Tiresias the seer to send a herald to negotiate with the Epigoni and to flee the city, for, said Tiresias, Thebes would fall when Adrastus, the only survivor of the original seven, died. And Adrastus would die of grief when he learned of the death of his son Aegialeus. The Thebans followed Tiresias' advice and fled to the north and founded Hestiaea in Thessaly. But some say they went to Illyria where the descendants of Cadmus ruled. The Argives entered Thebes, pulled down the walls, and took much booty, some of which they sent to Apollo at Delphi in fulfillment of a vow to give him the best fruits of their victory. Thersander and his heirs became the rulers of Thebes. The successful war of the Epigoni took place before the expedition of the Argonauts and before the Trojan War. It has been placed by some in the 14th century B.C.

Epigoni. Greek epic poem of the Theban cycle, by Antimachus of Clarus, relating to the renewal of the war between Argos and Thebes by the epigoni (descendants) of its heroes.

Epimelius (ep-i-mē'li-us). An epithet of Hermes, meaning "Keeper of Flocks."

Epimenides (ep-i-men'i-dēz). Cretan poet, religious teacher, and wonder worker who was active in the 7th and 6th centuries B.C. He was the Rip Van Winkle of Greek legend, for he was said to have gone into a cave to rest while looking for a lost sheep, to have fallen asleep, and to have awakened 20, 57, or 100 years later, unaware of the duration of his sleep. He came home to find his younger brother now an old man. He became a well-known sage and was called (596 B.C.) to Athens to determine the reason and cure for a plague. The oracle at Delphi told him that the plague was due to the murder of the supporters of Cylon, an Athenian noble who attempted to seize power, who had been killed (c632 B.C.) by Megacles despite a promise of safe-conduct. Epimenides performed the proper rites and freed the city of its impurity. He asked as his only reward that Athens and Cnossus, his home, should make treaties of friendship. Tradition assigned to him a number of mystical writings.

Epimetheus (ep-i-mē'thūs, -thē-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Iapetus, and the brother of Prometheus, Atlas, and Menoetius. Some say Epimetheus, whose name means "Afterthought," was given the task of creating animals to populate the world after it had been formed. He carelessly gave the best gifts to the animals—fur to keep them warm, feathers to soar into the air, cunning, and courage. When it came to man all the protections had been used up, and he sought the aid of Prometheus to find some means by which men could protect themselves. Prometheus made man to stand erect and stole fire from heaven and gave it to man. To counterbalance the gift of fire, Zeus commanded Hephaestus to make a maiden, Pandora. She was endowed with gifts by all the gods and taken by Hermes to Epimetheus as a gift. Epimetheus forgot until it was too late Prometheus' warning never to accept a gift from Zeus. He married Pandora. Up to this time there had been only men in the world, and they lived without evils or hardship. Pandora, in her character and in the dowry she brought with her, inflicted endless trouble and grief on men. Epimetheus and Pandora were the parents of Deucalion's wife Pyrrha.

Epinaos (ep-i-nā'os). An open vestibule behind the cella of some temples, corresponding to the pronaos in front.

Epione (ē-pī'ō-nē). According to some accounts, the wife of Asclepius. Her image was among those included in the sacred precinct of Asclepius at Epidaurus.

Epirus or Epeiros (ē-pī'rus). In ancient geography, that part of N Greece lying between Illyria on the N, Macedonia and Thessaly on the E, Aetolia, Acarnania, and the Ambracian Gulf on the S, and the Ionian Sea on the W (to the Acroceraunian promontory). In earlier times the name was given to the entire W coast S to the Corinthian Gulf. The kingdom of Epirus was at its height under Pyrrhus (295-272 B.C.). It was ravaged by Aemilius Paulus in 167 B.C., and was a part of the Roman Empire from 146 B.C. to 1204 A.D. The N part is now in Albania, the remainder in Greece.

Epistrophia (ep'i-strō-fī'a). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as goddess of love, meaning "She Who Turns Men to Love."

Epistrophus (e-pis'trō-fus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of King Evenus and a brother of Mynes. He was slain along with his brother when Achilles raided his land, Lyrnessus, during the Trojan War.

Epitymbia (ep-i-tim-bī'a). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as goddess of death-in-life, meaning "Of the Tombs."

Epium (ē'pi-um). See Aepy.

Epona (ep'ō-nā). In Roman mythology, a female divinity, protectress of horses. See Bubona.

Epopeus (ē-pō'pūs, -pē-us). In Greek legend, a son of Aloeus, and a grandson of Helius, but some say Poseidon was his father. Iphimedia was his mother and he was a brother of the Alodidae. Or, as some say, Canace was his mother. He was a king in Sicyon, having inherited the land about the Asopus River from his father. The adjoining land of Ephyra (Corinth) belonged to Aeëtes, and when Aeëtes departed for Colchis he left his realm in the care of Bunus. After the death of Bunus, Epopeus conquered Ephyra and added it to this kingdom. He was married to Antiope, daughter of Nycteus of Thebes. Some say Antiope fled to him when she was with child; others say Epopeus carried her off. In any event, his connection with Nycteus led to a war with Thebes, in which Nycteus was wounded. Epopeus was also wounded, but his forces won the battle. In gratitude for his success he raised a temple to Athena. When it was complete he prayed to the goddess to give him some sign that the temple was pleasing to her. The goddess caused olive oil to flow before the temple to express her satisfaction. Epopeus also raised sanctuaries of Apollo and Artemis and altars of Pan and Helius in Sicyon. He neglected his wound and died of it, and was buried before the altar in the temple of Athena.

Epyllion (ē-pil'i-on). A narrative poem in epic style, a "little epic," a literary form developed at Alexandria, or under Alexandrian influence, whose motif is usually a romantic episode from the life of a legendary hero or heroine. Epyllia by Theocritus, Bion, Moschus, Callimachus, Euphorion, Cicero, Catullus, Vergil, Ovid, and others survive, in whole or fragments. Catullus' "Wedding of Peleus and Thetis," in 408 polished Latin hexameters, well represents the form. (JJ)

Equuleus (e-kwō'lē-us). An ancient northern constellation, supposed to represent a horse's head. It lies west of the head of Pegasus.

Erasistratus (er-a-sis'tra-tus). Greek physician and anatomist; born probably on the island of Chios; fl. c300 B.C. He lived first at the court of the king of Syria, then went to Alexandria, where he founded a school of anatomy. He studied the convolutions of the brain, investigated the bile, spleen, liver, and the anatomy of the heart, named the trachea, and invented a catheter. In his investigation of the nerves he distinguished sensory and motor nerves. He also made studies of the arteries and veins, and believed that the elixir or substance vital to life was circulated by the arteries. According to his conclusions, the escape of this vital substance caused bleeding, and any impediment in its flow caused disease.

Erato (er'a-tō). One of the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne. She is the muse of lyric and amorous poetry. In art she is often represented with the lyre. See Muses.

Erato. In Greek mythology, an Arcadian dryad who, according to some accounts, was the wife of Arcas and the mother of his sons. She was also a prophetess of Pan, and gave his oracles.

Eratosthenes (er-ā-tos'thē-nēz). Alexandrian astronomer, geometer, geographer, grammarian, and philosopher, born at Cyrene, in Africa, c275 B.C.; died c194 B.C. He has been called "the founder of astronomical geography and of scientific chronology." He studied at Athens, and his reputation for learning became such that he was invited by Ptolemy III to become the chief librarian (the third to hold the position) of the great Library at Alexandria (247 B.C.). He wrote on a wide variety of subjects, as On Ancient Comedy, in which he described among other things the mechanics of production; he also composed a short epic on the death of Hesiod and the punishment of his murderers, and a celebrated elegy, the Erigone, which was probably part of his epic poem, Hermes. His greatest work was the Geographica, in three books, of which the first was on physical geography, the second was on mathematical geography and embraced a system for calculating latitude and longitude which he devised himself, and the third was on map-making. This work has been lost except for fragments preserved in the writings of later writers. His greatest accomplishment in mathematical geography was his measurement of the circumference of the earth. He also calculated the degree of inclination of the great circle of the earth and the magnitude and distance of the sun and the moon. He wrote on chronology and worked out a system into which he fitted such events as the dates of Heracles (1261-1209 B.C.), the voyage of the Argonauts (1225 B.C.), the Expedition of the Seven against Thebes (1213 B.C.), the Fall of Troy (1183 B.C.), the Return of the Heraclidae (c1100 B.C.), and the time of Lycurgus at Sparta (885 B.C.).

Ercta (ēr'k'tā) or Ercte (ēr'k'tē). [Modern name, Monte Pellegrino.] Isolated mountain peak just N of Panormus (Palermo), in Sicily, overlooking the city and harbor. It was occupied by Hamilcar in the First Punic War. Elevation, about 1900 feet.

Erebus (er'ē-bus). [Also: Erebos.] In Greek mythology, the son of Chaos and some say, of Darkness, but others say Erebus was Darkness. He was the brother of Nyx (Night) and, according to some accounts, of Aether (Air) and Hemera (Day), but others say Aether and Hemera were his children. By his sister Nyx he was the father of the Fates and such personified evils as Doom, Death, Slumber, Dreams, Misery, Deceit, Eld (the Destroyer), and Strife. In general, Erebus signified the unknown darkness.

Erebus. [Also: Erebos.] In Greek mythology, a place or region, and a state or condition. As the first, it is that part or section of the Underworld through which the souls of the dead must pass in order to reach Hades. As the second, it is "darkness" itself, and, in particular, the darkness of the west.

Erechtheum (ē-rek'thē-um). The popular name of a white marble temple of Athena, of the Ionic order, on the Acropolis of Athens, dating from the last quarter of the 5th century B.C. and one of the most remarkable creations of Greek architecture. In plan it is unique; whereas at this period Greek temples were almost invariably peristyle (surrounded by colonnades) or amphiprostyle (columned porches on front and rear), the Erechtheum has a conventional hexastyle porch on the E, but at the W, where the still more ancient sanctuary of Cecrops resisted encroachment, there are no steps and no free-standing columns, the order of the E front being suggested by four attached Ionic half-columns between antae, rising above a high basement. At the W end of the N flank is a deep porch, four columns in front and one behind each corner column, leading to the magnificent North Doorway which gave access to the W chambers. At the W end of the S flank is a porch ("Porch of the Maidens") in which six architectural statues of fully-draped young women ("Caryatids") take the place of columns, carrying the entablature on their heads. Around the cella block and north porch was a continuous frieze of separately-carved white marble figures attached by pins to a background of dark gray limestone. If the plan is awkward, or at least unorthodox, the decorative elements, capitals, bases, antae, cornice moldings, door and window frames, and ceilings, are widely admired; the North Porch, in particular, has been described as the finest expression of the Ionic order, while visitors are inevitably drawn to the graceful Caryatid Porch.

but enough foundations remain to indicate that inside were four rooms on at least two levels. In addition to the cult of Athena Polias (Protectress of the City), which we may locate in the E chamber, we learn that Poseidon and Hephaestus were worshiped there, and Pausanias also reports altars of Erechtheus, legendary founder of Athens, the name of whose chapel was eventually extended to the whole building, and his nephew Boutos, while beside the N porch was an altar of Zeus Hypatos. A fenced opening in the floor of the N porch permitted a view of markings in the native rock, said to have been made by Poseidon's trident in his contest with Athena for possession of Attica. To the west was the Pandroseum, in which stood the sacred olive tree.

The name of the architect of the Erechtheum is not recorded, but it has been observed that the complex design would give ample scope for the versatility displayed by Mnesicles, architect of the Propylaea. Construction was begun about 420 B.C., suspended in consequence of the Sicilian disaster of 413, resumed in 409, and completed probably in 405 B.C. It suffered from interior fires in the 4th century B.C. and at least twice in Roman times. In the Byzantine period it became a Christian church and during the Turkish domination it became the residence of the Pasha. Protracted researches by a commission of architectural historians of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens have resolved many of the problems of reconstruction and detail. (JJ)

Erechtheus (ē-rek'thūs, -thē-us). A son of Pandion, the twin of Butes, and the brother of Procne and Philomela. He was a legendary king of Athens and a protégé of Athena, who gave him her shrine for a dwelling. By his wife Praxithea he had four sons: Cecrops, Metion, Orneus, and Pandorus, and seven daughters: Chthonia, Creusa, Orithyia, Otionia, Pandora, Procris, and Protogonia. During a war between the Athenians and the Eleusinians an oracle informed him that if he sacrificed his youngest daughter he would secure victory. She, Otionia, willingly gave her life for Athens. Protogonia and Pandora killed themselves also, as they had vowed that they would kill themselves if one of them died by violence. In the same war, Erechtheus slew Eumolpus, leader of the Eleusinians, who was his own great-grandson. Poseidon, father of Eumolpus, took immediate revenge, either by destroying Erechtheus with his trident, or by invoking Zeus, who felled Erechtheus with a thunderbolt.
